thirty days; the two autumnal months, Cheshvan and Kislev, which follow the important month Tishri, are left changeable [HAPHTARA], because they depend upon certain astronomical phenomena and the following points of Jewish law:—1. That the month of Tishri is never to begin with the day which, to a great extent, belongs to the former month. 2. The Day of Atonement is not to fall on the day before or after Sabbath; and 3. That the Hossana Day is not to be on a Sabbath. It is impossible now to say with certainty how much of this calendar is Hillel's own, and how much he took from the national traditions, since it is beyond question that some astronomical rules were handed down by the presidents. This calendar Hillel introduced A.D. 359. That he convened a synod who fixed the epoch of the creation at the vernal equinox, 3761 years before the birth of Christ, which is the Jewish chronology of the present day, is simply conjecture. As to the story of his having embraced Christianity and been baptised on his death-bed by a neighbouring bishop, who ostensibly came to visit him in a medical capacity, and of there having been found in his coffer a Hebrew translation of the Gospel according to John, of the Acts of the Apostles, and of the Lord's genealogy as recorded by Matthew (Epiphanius, Adv. Her. xxx. 4, etc.), this fact is entirely unknown to the Jews of Hillel's time, who, if it had actually taken place, would have execrated his name. It is, however, an interesting fact connected with Biblical literature to know that a Hebrew translation of many portions of the N. T. existed at so early a period of Christianity. Comp. HILLS. [PALESTINE.]

HIN, a Hebrew liquid measure. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

HIND (חֵזֶה ajalah, Gen. xlix. 21; 2 Sam. xxii. 34; Job xxxix. 1; Ps. xviii. 33, etc.), the female of the hart or stag, doe being the female of the fallow-deer, and roe being sometimes used for that of the roebuck. All the females of the Cervide, with the exception of the reindeer, are hornless. It may be remarked on Ps. xviii. 33 and Hab. iii. 19, where the Lord is said to cause the feet to stand firm like those of a hind on high places, that this representation is in perfect harmony with the habits of mountain stags; but the version of Prov. v. 19, 'Let the wife of thy bosom be as the beloved hind and favourite roe,' seems to indicate that here the words are generalized so as to include under roe monogamous species of antelopes, whose affections and consortship are permanent and strong; for stags are polygamous. Finally, the emendation of Bochart on the version of Gen. xlix. 21, where for 'Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words,' he, by a small change in the punctuation of the original, proposes to read 'Naphtali is a spreading-tree, shooting forth beautiful branches,' restores the text to a consistent meaning, agreeing with the Sept., the Chaldee paraphrase, and the Arabic version. [AJAL.]—C. H. S.

HINGE. The Greeks and Romans, in common with the Oriental nations, instead of a hinge made use of a pivot and socket to hang their doors with freedom of action for opening and shutting. By the Greeks the pivot was termed στροφόγυξ, and the socket στροφεύς; the Latins commonly used cardo for each part or for the whole apparatus. In Hebrew there are two words, פֶּתַח and צֵדִי, both translated hinge in the A. V.; the first occurs in 1 Kings vii. 50; and the second in Prov. xxvi. 14. In 2 Chron. iv. 22, instead of פֶּתַח, Supōmata, cardines, we find פֶּתַח, Supō. [GATE; DOOR.]—J. E. R.

HINNOM, or Valley of Ben-Hinnom (הֶנּוֹם, usually כְּרִיתֹם; 'Ennōm and Talevna; Ennom and Geennom, etc.), a well-known valley (נֵי or נֵי; Sept. φάραγξ, and also simply rendered in Greek letters γαι and γη; hence Talevna, Gehenna), described in Josh. xviii. 16 as on the south side of Jebusi, that is, Mount Zion, on which the ancient stronghold of the Jebusites stood. The border of the tribe of Benjamin ran along this valley, from En-Rogel to the top of the mountain 'that lieth before the valley westward,' at the north end of the plain of Rephaim (Josh. xv. 8). The topographical notice is here singularly minute and accurate. The valley of Hinnom, still called by its ancient name, though in an Arabic form, Jehennam (جَهَنَّمَ), commences in a broad depression in the rocky ridge, or plateau, west of Jerusalem. It runs in a south-easterly direction for about 700 yards towards the Yafa Gate, where it turns due south along the base of Mount Zion; still keeping close to the base of the mount it sweeps round to the eastward and joins the Kidron at En-Rogel. Its total length is about a mile and a half. Its banks have at first an easy slope, but they soon contract and become steep and rocky. South of Zion the right bank rises in broken irregular cliffs of naked limestone, filled with excavated tombs, and having a few gnarled olives clinging to the rocks here and there. On the side of the ravine, overhanging the point of junction with the Kidron, is Acaldema (Handbook for S. and P., i. 99; Robinson, B. R. i. 239; Barclay, City of the Great King, 90).

The origin of the name Hinnom, or Ben-Hinnom, is unknown; it may have been derived from some of its ancient possessors. The valley obtained wide notoriety at the scene of the barbarous rites of Molech and Chemosh, first introduced by Solomon, who built 'an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem (Olivet); and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon' (1 Kings xi. 7). The inhuman rites were continued by the idolatrous kings of Judah. A monster idol of brass was erected in the opening of the valley, facing the steep side of Olivet; and there the infatuated inhabitants of Jerusalem burnt their sons and their daughters in the fire—casting them, it is said, into the red-hot arms of the idol (Jer. vii. 31; 2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxxiii. 6). No spot could have been selected near the Holy City so well fitted for the perpetration of these horrid cruelties: the deep retired glen, shut in by rugged cliffs; and the bleak mountain sides rising over all. The worship of Molech was abolished by Josiah, and the place dedicated to him was defiled by being strewn with human bones: 'He defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter pass through the fire to Molech . . . and he brake in pieces the images, and cut down their groves, and filled their places with the bones of men' (2 Kings xxiii. 10, 14). The place thus became ceremonially unclean; no Jew could enter it. It was afterwards a public cemetery; and the traveller who now stands in the bottom of this valley, and looks up at the multitude of tombs in the cliffs above and around him, and which thickly dot the side of Olivet, will be able to see with what wondrous accuracy the prophetic curse of Jeremiah has been fulfilled—'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor, The Valley of the Son of Hinnom, but, The Valley of Slaughter; for they shall bury in Tophet till there be no place' (vii. 32). We learn from Josephus that the last terrible struggle between the Jews and Romans took place here (Bell. Jud. vi. 8. 5); and here, too, it appears the dead bodies were thrown out of the city after the siege (v. 12. 7).

The inhuman rites anciently practised in the Valley of Hinnom caused the latter Jews to regard it with feelings of horror and detestation. The Rabbins suppose it to be the gate of Hell (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 286); and the Jews applied the name given to the valley in some passages of the Septuagint, Γέννα, to the place of eternal torment. Hence we find in Matt. v. 22, 'Whosoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of τῆς γέννας τοῦ πυρός—the Gehenna of fire.' The word is formed from the Hebrew גִּנּוֹן נֵץ, 'Valley of Hinnom.'

The valley was also called Topheth (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Is. xxx. 33; Jer. vii. 31), either from תפת, 'spittle,' and it would hence mean 'a place to spit upon;' or from תחת, 'place of burning.' For other theories about the valley of Hinnom the student may consult Hengstenberg, Christology, iv. 40 seq., ed. 1858.—J. L. P.

HIPPOLYTUS, PORTUENSIS, a bishop of Portus during the early part of the 3d century. The facts of his life are few and uncertain, and we shall mainly confine ourselves to giving the results which may now be considered as generally accepted. Eusebius (H. E., vi. 20) mentions Hippolytus as a bishop and eminent ecclesiastical author in the times of Zephyrinus, but does not mention his diocese, which Jerome also says that 'he could not learn' (Cat. vir. illustr., 61). As Eusebius names him with Beryllus of Bostra, Le Moyne (Proleg. ad Var. Sacr.) unfortunately conjectured that he was bishop of Aden (Portus Romanus) in Arabia, and Cave (Script. Eccles., i. 48) supposed him to have been an Arabian by birth. But, on the other hand, the Chronicon Paschale, our earliest authority, makes him 'bishop of the so-called Portus near Rome;' and as this statement is supported by the authority of Cyril, Zonaras, Anastasius, Nicephorus, and Syncellus (see Bunsen's Hippolytus, i. 205), and as Prudentius (lib., περὶ στεφάνων; Hymn ix.) describes his martyrdom as having taken place at Ostia, close by Portus, we may regard this point as finally settled. His mastery of the Greek language would render him peculiarly fit to be a 'bishop of the nations,' who frequented the Harbour of Rome in multitudes. In spite of Jacobi's assertion of the contrary, there seems to be no reason why he should not at the same time have been (what the Ἐλεγχος shews him to have been) a presbyter and head of a party at Rome. We know, further, that he was a disciple of Irenæus (Phot. Cod. 121), and was engaged in some warm disputes with Callistus on points of doctrine and discipline, which are graphically described in his recovered book, κατὰ πασῶν αἰρεσῶν ἔλεγχος. From the confused and sometimes contradictory accounts of the martyrdom, we may glean the following probabilities:—That in the year of the death of Alexander Severus he was banished to Sardinia (Catal. Liberianus, sec. iv.), B.C. 235; that he returned the following year, and was martyred at Ostia. The mode of his martyrdom is wholly conjectural, for the story of Prudentius (Hymn ix. 123-174) is obviously derived from the painting on the walls of the chapel built in honour of St. Hippolytus at Rome, and can hardly be otherwise than a mere legendary confusion. The day set apart to his memory was Aug. 13. One statement of Prudentius—that before his martyrdom the saint recanted his approval of the Novation schism—is very perplexing, because, on the one hand, such a particular could not have been invented, and, on the other hand, Novation belongs to a later period (A.D. 245). The explanation seems to be that Hippolytus strongly opposed the Noetianism of Callistus, and was therefore in later times considered as a Novation (Bunsen, i. 220).

In 1551 an old and unique statue of Hippolytus was dug up on the site of his chapel; at the back of which was inscribed a list of his works, and among others a book περὶ τοῦ πάντος. Now this book is claimed by the author of the Ἐλεγχος, and on this and other irrefragable grounds, that remarkable treatise (a confutation of all the heresies) is now universally considered to have been the work of Hippolytus. This book was formerly ascribed to Origen. Having been brought from Mount Athos with other manuscripts in 1842, it attracted the attention of M. Emmanuel Miller, under whose direction it was published at the Oxford Press in 1851, under the title, Ἀριγέτους φιλοσοφούμενα ἢ κατὰ πασῶν αἰρεσῶν ἔλεγχος; but all European scholars now admit that it could not have been written by Origen, and that Hippolytus is the only author to whom it can be attributed. It is a work of great value and interest, and although it refutes thirty-two heresies, is mainly directed against Gnosticism. Hippolytus is a calm, acute, and learned writer. Most of his other works have either perished, or only remain to us in fragments. These have been published by J. A. Fabricius (Sancti Hippolyti, Episcopi et Martyris Opera, 2 vols.

Hamb. 1718). Among them are parts of various commentaries on books of Scripture. Jerome calls him Vir disertissimus, and a Greek author γλυκύτατος καὶ εὐνοίστατος. He was a worthy disciple of Irenæus, and the free use he made of great Pagan authors (e.g., Heraclitus) gives additional value to his writings. Besides this, 'he was the first preacher of note whom the Church of Rome ever produced.' (See Bunsen, Hippolytus and his Age, 4 vols. 1852; Gieseler, Stud. und Krit., 1853; Dollinger, Hippolytus and Callistus, Ratisb. 1853, etc.)—F. W. F.

HIPPOPOTAMUS. [BEHEMOTH.]

HIRAM or HURAM (חִירָם, חִירָם; Sept. Χειράμ. The name also appears in the form חִירָם, and this was probably the original form, as Menander in Josephus (C. Apion. i. 18) gives it Εἰρωμος, and in Herodotus (vii. 98) it appears as Σιρωμος). 1. A king of Tyre, whose name appears as that of the friend and ally both of David and Solomon, to the former of whom he sent artificers who built for him a palace (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chron. xiv. 1); and to the latter of whom he sent both materials and artificers for the erection of the temple (1 Kings v. 15, ff. [A. V. v. 1, ff.]; 2 Chron. ii. 3, ff.). In return Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities in Galilee; which, however, seemed to Hiram so unworthy a return that he applied to them a term of contempt [CABUL], and restored them to the Jewish king (1 Kings ix. 11; 2 Chron. viii. 2).

It is not easy to determine whether it was the same Hiram who was the friend of both David and Solomon, or whether different princes of the same name had relations with these two monarchs successively. The latter is on the whole the more probable solution. The chronological difficulties of the former supposition seem insuperable. The Hiram who was the friend of Solomon is said by Menander (ap. Joseph. l. c.) to have reigned 33 years. Now we know he was alive and on the throne in the twentieth year of Solomon's reign (1 Kings ix. 10-13), so that he could not at the first have been king for more than 13 years before David's death. How, then, could he be the Hiram who assisted David to build his house more than 30 years before? This difficulty is aggravated if we accept the statement of Josephus that the Hiram who assisted Solomon had only been 11 years on the throne when the temple began to be built in the fourth year of Solomon's reign; for this would allow only 7 years for his being king before David's death. It will hardly do with Michaelis to resort to the supposition that though the building of David's house is mentioned in the history of the early part of his reign, it was not really commenced till near the close of it; for not only is this improbable in itself—improbable that David should have been content without a fitting house so long—improbable that had he wanted one so long he would have begun to build one at the close of his life (his sixty-third year if we take the statement of Josephus); but we must deal in the most arbitrary manner with the narrative to make it accord with this supposition; as, ex. gr., we must suppose the 'king's house,' mentioned 2 Sam. xi. 2, to be not the house said to have been built for the king in ch. v. 11, unless we would place David's affair with Bethsheba in his extreme old age, and make Solomon little more than an infant at the time of his father's death. These difficulties may, indeed, be avoided by rejecting the statement of Menander that Hiram reigned 33 years, and supposing that his reign extended from the commencement of David's reign over Israel, to the 15th year of Solomon's reign, a period of nearly 50 years. But so long a reign is in itself improbable, and the testimony of Menander seems, from the minuteness of some of his details, to have rested on authentic documents. On the whole it appears better to suppose two Hirams. But in what relation did they stand to each other? The natural supposition is that they were father and son. But here the testimony of Menander again interposes a difficulty, for he says that Hiram the friend of Solomon was the son of Abibal. This has led some to conjecture that the later Hiram was the grandson of the earlier; while others suggest that Abibal (אַבִּיבָל) was the distinctive honorary name of the former, whose proper name was Hiram. This latter suggestion is rendered probable by the fact that other persons of the name of Hiram occur in the series of kings of Tyre (Joseph. Cont. Apion. i. 21). Tatian (Orat. C. Græc., p. 171, ed. Col.) says, on the authority of Phœnician historians, that Solomon married Hiram's daughter. He was succeeded by his son Baecazar (Joseph. l. c.)—W. L. A.

2. The son of a widow in the tribe of Dan, and of a Tyrian father. He was sent by the king of the same name to execute the principal works of the interior of the temple, and the various utensils required for the sacred services. We recognise in the enumeration of this man's talents by the king of Tyre a character common in the industrial history of the ancients, namely, a skilful artificer, knowing all the arts, or at least many of those arts which we practise, in their different branches. [HANDICRAFT.] It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king from among others equally gifted, in the notion that his half Hebrew blood would render him the more acceptable at Jerusalem.—J. K.

HIRCANUS (LXX. Ἱρκανός; Vulg. Hircanus), 'a son of Tobias, a man of great dignity' (Ἱρκανός ὁ Τωβίου σφόδρα ἀνὴρ ἐν ὑπεροχῇ κείμενος, 2 Maccab. iii. 11). At the time when Heliodorus, the treasurer (ὁ ἐν τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was ordered to seize the riches which had been placed in the temple of Jerusalem, Hircanus owned a large treasure there deposited for safety (2 Maccab. iii. 8 seq.) Nothing more is mentioned in 2 Maccab. than that he was a 'son of Tobias,' but Josephus gives an account of some 'children of Tobias' (παῖδες Τωβίου) who took part with the high-priest Menelaus (Onias) against Jason (Jesus), who had been deprived of the high-priesthood by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (Antiq. xii. 5. 1). This Tobias had among his children a son named Joseph, who married as a second wife the daughter of his brother Solymius, and by her had a son, whose name was Hircanus (Joseph. Antiq. xii. 4. 2). Hircanus, from this statement, would not be the son but the grandson of Tobias. Grotius, Calmet, Prideaux, and others, have supposed that the Hircanus of Josephus is the same person as the Hircanus of 2 Maccab., and that Ἱρκανός ὁ Τωβίου should be translated 'Hircanus, grandson of Tobias.' It is, however, worthy of notice that the story in

2 Maccab. respecting the sending of Heliodorus by Seleucus to rob the treasures at Jerusalem, his miraculous punishment, and his recovery from death at the prayer of Onias, is rendered very suspicious by the silence of Josephus, and that (though Hircanus is represented both in 2 Maccab. and Josephus as being connected by blood with Tobias, yet it is not recorded in Josephus (as it is in 2 Maccab.) that he had any treasure in the temple. It seems hardly probable that the Hircanus whose history is given by Josephus at some length can be identified with the 'son of Tobias' of 2 Maccab. The Hircanus in question may have been one of 'the sons of Tobias' (παῖδες Τωβίου) mentioned above as assisting in the sedition of the two high-priests.

The name of Hircanus occurs at a later period under the Maccabees. It has been thought that it was adopted on account of a victory gained by John, the son and successor of Simon Maccabæus, over the Hircanians (Euseb., Chron. lib. ii.; Sulp. Severus, Hist. Sacr., lib. ii. c. xxvi.) Josephus informs us that Hircanus accompanied Antiochus VII. Sidetes into Parthia, and Nicolaus of Damascus says that a trophy was erected at the river Lycus to commemorate the victory over the Parthian general (Antiq. xiii. 8. 4). The Hircanians were a nation whose territory was bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, and would thus be at no great distance from Parthia, where John Hircanus had gained the victory. It is remarkable that the different statements agree in the position of the countries, Hircania, Parthia, and the river Lycus (of Assyria) being contiguous. As Josephus, however, does not give any explanation of the name (Antiq. xiii. 7. 4; Bell. Jud. i. 2. 3), and the son of Simon is nowhere called Hircanus in 1 Maccab., the reason for its assumption is uncertain [MACCABEES].—F. W. M.

HISTORY. Under this term we here intend to give, not a narrative of the leading events detailed in the Bible, but such general remarks on the Biblical history as may enable the reader to estimate the comparative value, and apply for information to the proper sources, of historical knowledge, as presented in or deduced from the sacred records.

The matter contained in the Biblical history is of a most extensive nature. In its greatest length and fullest meaning it comes down from the creation of the world till near the close of the 1st century of the Christian era, thus covering a space of some 4000 years. The books presenting this long train of historical details are most diverse in age, in kind, in execution, and in worth; nor seldom is it the fact that the modern historian has to construct his narrative as much out of the implications of a letter, the highly coloured materials of poetry, the far-reaching visions of prophecy, and the indirect and allusive information of didactic and moral precepts, as from the immediate and express statements of history strictly so denominated. The history of Herodotus, embracing as it does most of the world known at this time, and passing, under the leading of a certain thread of events, from land to land—this history, with its naive, graphic, gossip, and traveller-like narratives, interweaving in a succession of fine old tapestries many of the great events and moving scenes which had, up to his time, taken place on the theatre of the world, presents to the intelligent reader a continuation of varied gratifications. But even the history of Herodotus must yield to that contained or implied in the Bible, not merely in extent of compass, but also in variety, in interest, and beyond all comparison, in grandeur, importance, and moral and spiritual significance. The children of the faithful Abraham seem to have had one great work of Providence intrusted to them, namely, the development, transmission, and infusion into the world of the religious element of civilization. Their history, accordingly, is the history of the rise, progress, and diffusion of true religion, considered in its source and its developments. Such a history must possess large and peculiar interest for every student of human nature, and pre-eminently for those who love to study the unfoldings of Providence, and desire to learn that greatest of all arts—the art of living at once for time and for eternity.

The Jewish history contained in the Bible embraces more and less than the history of the Israelites;—more, since it begins with the beginning of the earth and narrates with extraordinary brevity events which marked the period terminated by the flood, going on till it introduces us to Abraham, the primogenitor of the Hebrew race; less, since, even with the assistance of the poetical books, its narratives do not come down to a later date than some 600 years before the birth of Christ. The historical materials furnished relating to the Hebrew nation may be divided into three great divisions: 1. The books which are consecrated to the antiquity of the Hebrew nation—the period that elapsed before the era of the judges. These works are the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua, which, according to Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i. 72), properly constitute only one work, and which may be termed the great book of original documents. 2. The books which describe the times of the judges and the kings up to the first destruction of Jerusalem; that is, Judges, Kings, and Samuel, to which belongs the book of Ruth: 'all these,' says Ewald, 'constitute also, according to their last formation, but one work, which may be called the Great Book of Kings.' 3. The third class comprises the books included under the head of Hagiographa, which are of a much later origin, Chronicles, with Ezra and Nehemiah, forming the great book of general history reaching to the Grecian period. After these books came those which are classed together under the name of Apocrypha, whose use in this country we think unduly neglected. Then the circle of evangelical records begins, which closed within the century that saw it open. Other books found in the O. and N. T., which are not properly of a historical character, connect themselves with one or other of these periods, and give important aid to students of sacred history.

Biblical history was often treated by the older writers as a part of church history in general, as they considered the history given in the Bible as presenting different and successive phases of the church of God (Buddei, Hist. Eccles., 2 vols. 1726-29; Stolberg, Geschichte der Religion Jesu, i. 111). Other writers have viewed this subject in a more practical light, presenting the characters found in the Bible for imitation or avoidance; among whom may be enumerated Hess (Geschichte der Israeliten vor den Zeiten Jesu). Hess also wrote a history of Jesus (Geschichte Jesu; Zürich 1775); but the best work is a more recent, and a very valuable one, by Niemeyer (Charakteristik der Bibel, Halle 1830). Among the more strictly learned writers several have had it in view to supply the gaps left in the succession of events by the Bible, out of sources found in profane writers. Here the chief authors are of English birth, namely, Prideaux, Shuckford, Russell; and for the N. T., the learned, cautious, and fair-dealing Lardner. There is a valuable work by G. Langen: Versuch einer Harmonie der heiligen und profan scrib. in der Geschichte der Welt, Bayreuth 1775-80. Jahn, in his Bib. Archäologie, has, according to Gesenius (art. 'Bib. Geschichte' in Ersch and Gruber's Allg. Enc.), made free use of Prideaux. Other writers have pursued a strictly chronological method, such as Ussher (Annales Vet. N. T., London 1650), and Des Vignoles (Chronologie de l'Hist. Sainte, Berlin 1738). Heeren (Handb. der Geschichte, p. 50) recommends, as containing many valuable inquiries on the monarchical period, the following work: J. Bernhardi Commentatio de causis quibus effectum sit ut regnum Juda diutius persisteret quam regnum Israel, Lovanni 1825. Heeren also declares that Bauer's Handbuch der Geschichte des H. Volkes, 1800, is the best introduction both to the history and the antiquities of the Hebrew nation; though Gesenius complains that he is too much given to the construction of hypotheses. The English reader will find a useful but not sufficiently critical compendium in The History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, translated from the German of John Jahn, D.D. A more valuable as well as more interesting, yet by no means faultless work, is Milman's History of the Jews, published originally in Murray's Family Library [a new edition of which is said to be now (1863) in preparation]. A more recent and very valuable work, Kitto's Pictorial History of Palestine, 1841, combines, with the Bible history of the Jews, the results of travel and antiquarian research, and is preceded by an elaborate Introduction, which forms the only Natural History of Palestine in our language.

[An impulse has been given to the study of Biblical history of late years in Germany, which has led to important results. The great work of Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, in 7 vols. 8vo, with a supplementary volume, Allerthümer d. V. Israel, presents a thorough investigation of the whole subject, from the earliest times to the destruction of the Jewish state by the Romans; a work of great learning, acuteness, and power of construction; but displaying tendencies towards a treatment of the sacred books with which no one who receives them as divine can sympathise. A more orthodox but less able work is Kurz's Gesch. des Alten Bundes, 2 vols., with supplement, Berlin 1848-55; translated by Edersheim and Martin, 3 vols. 8vo, Edin. 1859-61. Of great value are the works of the learned Jews: Jost (Gesch. der Israeliten seit der Maccabäer, 9 vols.); Gesch. des Judenthums und Seiner Sekten, 3 vols., 1857-59); Herzfeld (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel vom Vollendung des Zweiten Tempels bis zur Einsetzung des Maccabäers Schimon, 2 vols. 8vo, 1854-57); Graetz (Gesch. der Juden, 6 vols. 8vo). Dr. Stanley, in his Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, has presented the results of the most recent research in his usual vivid and graphic style.]

precise value of these sources in a critical point of view would require a volume instead of an article. Whatever hypothesis, however, may eventually be held touching the exact time when these books, or any of them, were put into their actual shape, as also touching the materials out of which they were formed, one thing appears very certain, that (to take an instance) Genesis, the earliest book (probably), contains most indubitable as well as most interesting historical facts; for though the age, the mode of life, and the state of culture differ so widely from our own, we cannot do otherwise than feel that it is among men and women, parents and children—beings of like passions with ourselves—and not with mere creations of fancy or fraud, that we converse when we peruse the narratives which this composition has so long preserved. The conviction is much strengthened in the minds of those who, by personal acquaintance with the early profane writers, are able to compare their productions with those of the Hebrews, which were long anterior, and must, had they been of an equally earthly origin, have been at least equally deformed by fable. The sole comparison of the account given in Genesis of the creation of the world with the Cosmogonies of heathen writers, whether Hindoo, Greek, or Latin, is enough to assure the impartial reader that a purer, if not a higher influence, presided over the composition of Genesis, than that whence proceeded the legends or the philosophies of heathenism; nor is the conclusion in the slightest degree weakened in the writer's mind by any discrepancy which modern science may seem to shew as between its own discoveries and the statements in Genesis. The Biblical history, as found in its Biblical sources, has a decided peculiarity and a great recommendation in the fact that we can trace in the Bible more clearly and fully than in connection with any other history, the first crude elements and the early materials out of which all history must be constructed. How far the literature supplied in the Bible may be only a relic of a literary cyclüs called into being by the felicitous circumstances and favourable constitution of the great Shemitic family, but which has perished in the lapse of ages, it is now impossible to determine; but had the other portions of this imagined literature been of equal religious value with what the Bible offers, there is little risk in affirming that mankind would scarcely have allowed it to be lost. The Bible, however, bears traces that there were other books current in the time and country to which it relates; for writing, writers, and books are mentioned without the emphasis and distinction which always accompany new discoveries or peculiar local possessions, and as ordinary, well-known, and matter-of-course things. And it is certain that we do not possess all the works which were known in the early periods of Israelite history, since in Num. xxi. 14 we read of 'the book of the wars of the Lord,' and in Josh. x. 13, of 'the book of Jasher.' Without writing, history, properly so called, can have no existence. Under the head Writing we shall trace the early rudiments and progress of that important art: here we merely remark that an acquaintance with it was possessed by the Hebrews at least as early as their Exodus from Egypt—a fact which shews at least the possibility that the age of the Biblical records stands some thousand years or more prior to the earliest Greek historian, Herodotus.

There is another fact which has an important bearing on the worth and credibility of the Biblical narratives, namely, that the people of which they speak were a commemorative race, were, in other words, given to create and preserve memorials of important events. Even in the patriarchal times we find monuments set up in order to commemorate events. Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 18) 'set up a pillar' to perpetuate the memory of the divine promise; and that these monuments had a religious import and sanction appears from the statement that 'he poured oil upon the top of the pillar' (see Gen. xxxi. 45; Josh. iv. 9; 1 Sam. vii. 12; Judg. ix. 6). Long-lived trees, such as oak and terebinth, were made use of as remembrancers (Gen. xxxv. 4; Josh. xxiv. 26). Commemorative names, also, were given to persons, places, and things; and from the earliest periods it was usual to substitute a new and descriptive for an old name, which may in its origin have been descriptive too (Exod. ii. 10; Gen. ii. 23; iv. 1). Genealogical tables appear, moreover, to have had a very early existence among the people of whom the Bible speaks, being carefully preserved first memoriter, afterwards by writing, among family treasures, and thus transmitted from age to age. These, indeed, as might be expected, appear to have been the first beginnings of history—a fact which is illustrated and confirmed by the way in which what we should term a narrative or historical sketch is spoken of in the Bible, that is, as 'the book of the generation' ('of Adam,' Gen. v. 1): a mode of speaking which is applied even to the account of the creation (Gen. ii. 4), 'these are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created.' The genealogical tables in the Bible (speaking generally) are not only of a very early date, but are free from the mixtures of a theogonical and cosmogonical kind which are found in the early literature of other primitive nations, wearing the appearance of being, so far at least as they go, true and complete lists of individual and family descent (Gen. v. 1). But, perhaps, the most remarkable fact connected with this subject is the employment of poetry at a very early period to perpetuate a knowledge of historical events. Even in Gen. iv. 23, in the case of Lamech, we find poetry thus employed, that is, by the sixth in descent from Adam. Other instances may be found in Exod. xv.; Josh. x. 13; Judg. v.; 2 Sam. i. 18, etc. This early use of poetry, which must be regarded as a considerable step in civilization, implies a still earlier pre-existent culture; confutes the notion that human society began with a period of barbarism; looks favourably on the hypothesis that language had an immediately divine origin; explodes the position that the Hebrews were at first an ignorant, untutored, and unlettered race; and creates a presumption on behalf of their historical literature. Poetry is a good vehicle for the transmission of great leading facts; for, though it may throw over fact a colouring borrowed from the imagination, yet the form in which it appears gives warning that such hues are upon its details, which hues, besides being themselves a species of history, are then easily removed, while the form shuts up and holds in the facts intrusted to the custody of verse, and so transmits them to posterity without addition and without loss. By means of these several forms of commemoration much knowledge would be preserved from generation to generation, and to their existence from the first may we ascribe the brief, but still valuable, notices which the Bible presents of the primitive ages and condition of the world.

Other sources for at least the early Biblical history are comparatively of small value. Josephus has gone over the same periods as the Bible treats of, but obviously had no sources of consequence relating to primitive times which are not open to us, and in regard to those times does little more than add here and there a patch of a legendary or traditional hue which could have been well spared. His Greek and Roman predilections and his apologetical aims detract from his value, while in relation to the early history of his country he can be regarded in no other light than a sort of philosophical interpreter; nor is it till he comes to his own age that he has the value of an independent (not even then an impartial) eye-witness or well-informed reporter. In historical criticism and linguistic knowledge he was very insufficiently furnished. The use of both Josephus and Philo is far more safe for the student of the N. T. than for the expounder of the old.

The Talmud and the Rabbins afford very little assistance for the early periods, but might probably be made to render more service in behalf of the times of the Saviour than has been generally allowed. The illustrations which Lightfoot and Weststein have drawn from these sources are of great value; and Gfrörer, in his Jahrhundert der Heils (Stuttgart 1838), has made an ample use of the materials they supply in order to draw a picture of the 1st century, a use which the learned author is at no small pains to justify. The compilations of the Jewish doctors, however, require to be employed with the greatest caution, since the Rabbins were the depositaries, the expounders, and the apologists of that corrupt form of the primitive faith and the Mosaic institutions which has been called by the distinctive name of Judaism, which comprised an heterogeneous mass of false and true things, the colluvies of the east as well as light from the Bible, and which, to a great extent, lies under the express condemnation of Christ himself. How easy it is to propagate fables on their authority, and to do a disservice to the Gospel records, may be learnt from the fact that older writers, in their undue trust of Rabbinical authority, went so far as to maintain that no cock was allowed to be kept in Jerusalem because fowls scratched unclean things out of the earth, though the authority of Scripture (which in the case they refused to admit) is most express and decided (Matt. xxvi. 34; Mark xiv. 30, 68, 72). On the credibility of the Rabbins see Ravii Diss. Phil. Theol. de eo quod Fidei merentur, etc., in Oelrich's Collect. Opusc. Hist. Phil. Theol.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. ii. 1095; Fabricius, Bibliog. Antiq. i. 3, 4; Brunsmann, Diss. de Judaica levitate, Hafniæ 1705.

The classic authors betray the grossest ignorance almost in all cases where they treat of the origin and history of the Hebrew people; and even the most serious and generally philosophic writers fall into vulgar errors and unaccountable mistakes as soon as they speak on the subject. What, for instance, can be worse than the blunder or prejudice of Tacitus, under the influence of which he declared that the Jews derived their origin from Mount Ida in Crete; that by the advice of an oracle they had been driven out of Egypt; and that they set up in their temple at Jerusalem as an object of worship the figure of an ass, since an animal of that species had directed them in the wilderness and discovered to them a fountain (Tacit. Hist. v. 1, 2). Dion Cassius (xxxv. 17) relates similar fables. Plutarch (Quaest. Sympos. iv. 5) makes the Hebrews pay divine honours to swine, as being their instructors in agriculture, and affirms that they kept the Sabbath and the Feast of Tabernacles in honour of Bacchus. A collection of these gross misrepresentations, together with a profound and successful inquiry into their origin, and a full exposure of their falsehood, may be found in a paper by Dr. J. G. Müller, recently published in the Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1843, Viertes Heft. p. 893).—J. R. B.

HITTITES, or CHILDREN OF HETH, a nation descended from Heth (חֶת, LXX. Xét; gent.

n. חֶתִי; LXX. Xettaioi; חֶת, בְּנֵי חֶת, f. בְּנֵי חֶתִי;

LXX. υἱοὶ Xét, Θυγατέρες τῶν υἱῶν Xét, son of Canaan. The meaning of Heth is supposed to be 'fear' or 'terror,' but it seems more probable that it has a signification like Sidon, 'fishing,' the Amorite, 'the mountaineer,' etc.

In the list of the descendants of Noah, Heth occupies the second place among the children of Canaan. It is to be observed that the first and second names, Sidon and Heth, are not gentile nouns, and that all the names following are gentile nouns in the sing. Sidon is called the first-born of Canaan, though the name of the town is probably put for that of its founder, or eponym, 'the fisherman,' Ἀλιεύς, of Philo of Byblus. It is therefore probable, as we find no city Heth, that this is the name of the ancestor of the nation, and the gentile noun, children of Heth, makes this almost certain. After the enumeration of the nations sprung from Canaan, it is added: 'And afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad' (Gen. x. 18). This passage will be illustrated by the evidence that there were Hittites and Amorites beyond Canaan, and also beyond the wider territory that must be allowed for the placing of the Hamathites, who, it may be added, perhaps had not migrated from Canaan at the date to which the list of Noah's descendants mainly refers (see ver. 19).

In the time of Abraham, the Hittites are mentioned among the inhabitants of the Promised Land (xv. 20). At Kirjath-arba, or Hebron, he purchased the cave of Machpelah of Ephron the Hittite, and it is evident that at this time the people of that city were Hittites (Gen. xxiii. 3-7, 10, 18). The city was, however, founded by one Arba of the Anakim, whence its earlier name, and had inhabitants of that giant race as late as Joshua's time. It is also connected with Zoan in Egypt, where it is said to have been built seven years before that city (Num. xiii. 22). Zoan or Avaris was built or rebuilt, and no doubt received its Hebrew or Semitic name, Zoan, the translation of its Egyptian name HA-AWAR, in the time of the first Shepherd-king of Egypt, who was of Phœnician or kindred race. It is also to be noted that, in Abraham's time, the Amorites, connected with the giant race in the case of the Rephaim whom Chedorlaomer smote in Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5), where the Rephaim Og afterwards ruled, dwelt close to Hebron (ver. 13). The Hittites and Amorites we shall see to have been later settled together in the Orontes-valley. Thus at this period there was a settlement of the two nations in the south of Palestine, and the Hittites were mixed with the Rephaim Anakim. Among these Hittites Isaac lived in southernmost Palestine (xxvii. 46), and of their daughters Esau took one, if not two, to wife (xxvi. 34; xxxvi. 2, 3, 20, 24, 25).

In the enumeration of the six or seven nations of Canaan from the time of the Exodus downwards, the first names, in four forms, are the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites; in two, which make no mention of the Canaanites, the Hittites, and Amorites; and in three, the former three names with the addition of another nation. In but two forms are these three nations further separated. It is also to be remarked that the Hittites and Amorites are mentioned together in a bare majority of the forms of the enumeration, but in a great majority of passages. The importance thus given to the Hittites is perhaps equally evident in the place of Heth in the list of the descendants of Noah, in the place of the tribe in the list in the promise to Abraham, where it is first of the known descendants of Canaan (xv. 20), and certainly in the term 'all the land of the Hittites,' as a designation of the Promised Land in its full extent, from Euphrates to the Mediterranean, and from Lebanon to the desert (Josh. i. 4). The close relation of the Hittites and Amorites seems to be indicated by the prophet Ezekiel, where he speaks of Jerusalem as daughter of an Amorite father and a Hittite mother (xvi. 3, 45).

When the spies examined Canaan they found 'the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites,' dwelling 'in the mountains' (Num. xiii. 29), that is, in the high tracts that afterwards formed the refuges and rallying-points of the Israelites during the troubled period of the judges. There is, however, no distinct statement as to the exact position of the Hittites in Palestine. We may draw an inference from their connection with Jerusalem and the Amorites, and their inhabiting the mountains, and suppose that they were probably chiefly seated in the high region of the tribe of Judah. Of their territory beyond Palestine there are some indications in Scripture. The most important of these is the designation of the Promised Land in its full extent as 'all the land of the Hittites,' already mentioned, with which the notices of Hittite kings out of Canaan must be compared. In Solomon's time 'all the kings of the Hittites' are spoken of with 'the kings of Syria,' in connection with the traffic with Egypt in chariots and horses (1 Kings x. 28, 29). So, too, when the Syrians, who were besieging Samaria in the time of Jehoram, fled, the cause is thus stated:—'For the LORD had made the host of the Syrians to hear a noise of chariots, and a noise of horses, the noise of a great host: and they said one to another, Lo, the king of Israel hath hired against us the kings of the Hittites, and the kings of the Egyptians, to come upon us' (2 Kings vii. 6). The latter two passages indicate that, at the periods to which they refer, there was a Hittite settlement beyond Canaan, governed by kings, and powerful from its use of chariots and horses, and the warlike disposition of its people.

The Egyptian monuments give us much information as to a Hittite nation that can only be that

indicated in the two passages just noticed. The kings of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties made extensive conquests in Syria and Mesopotamia. They were opposed by many small states, which probably always formed one or more confederacies. In the time of Thothmes III. (B.C. cir. 1450), the leading nation was that of the RUTEN (or LUTEN), which appears to have once headed a confederacy defeated by that king before Megiddo (De Rouge Revue Archéolog., n. s., iv. p. 346, seqq.) The KHETA were conquered by or tributary to Thothmes III. (Birch, Annals of Thothmes III., p. 21); but it is not until the time of Ramesses II. (B.C. cir. 1360), second king (according to Manetho) of the 19th dynasty, that we find them occupying the most important place among the eastern enemies of the Egyptians, the place before held by the RUTEN. The name is generally written KHET, and sometimes KHETA, and was probably in both cases pronounced KHAT. It is not easy to determine whether it properly denotes the people or the country; perhaps it denotes the latter, as it rarely has a plural termination; but it is often used for the former. This name is identical in radicals with that of the Hittites, and that it designates them is clear from its being connected with a name equally representing that of the Amorites, and from the correspondence of this warlike people, strong in chariots, with the non-Palestinian Hittites mentioned in the Bible. The chief or strongest city of the KHETA, or at least of the territory subject to, or confederate with, the king of the KHETA, was KETESH, on the river ARNUT, ANURTA, or ARUNATA. KETESH was evidently a Kadesh, 'a sacred city,' 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎷𐎵, but no city of that name, which could correspond to this, is known to us in Biblical geography. It is represented in the Egyptian sculptures as on or near a lake, which Dr. Brugsch has traced in the modern lake of Kedes, fed by the Orontes, southward of Hems (Emesa). The Orontes, it must be observed, well corresponds to the ARUNATA. The town is also stated to have been in the land of AMAR (or AMARA), that is, of the Amorites. The position of this Amorite territory is further defined by Carchemish being placed in it, as we shall shew in a later part of this article. The territory of these Hittites, therefore, lay in the valley of the Orontes. It probably extended towards the Euphrates, for the KHETA are also connected with NEHARENA, or Mesopotamia, not the NAHIRI of the cuneiform inscriptions, but it is not clear that they ruled that country. Probably they drew confederates thence, as was done by the Syrians in David's time.

The greatest achievement of Ramesses II. was the defeat of the KHETA and their allies near KETESH, in the fifth year of his reign. This event is commemorated in a papyrus and by several inscriptions and sculptures. The nations confederate with the KHETA were the ARATU, Aradus? MAJUSU, Mash? PAATSA or PATASA, KESHKESH, ARUNU, KATAWATANA, KHEERABU, Helbon? AKATERA, KETESH, REKA, Arkites? TENTENEE (or TRATENUEE) and KARAKAMASHA, Carchemish. These names are difficult to identify save the seventh and the last, but it is evident that they do not belong to Palestine. The Hittites are represented as having a regular army, which was strong in chariots, a particular which we should expect from the Biblical notices of them and of the Canaanites, where the latter name seems applied to the tribe so called. Each chariot was drawn by two horses, and held three men, a charioteer and two warriors. They had also cavalry and disciplined infantry. In the great battle with Ramesses they had 2500 horses, that is, chariots. The representations of the KHETA in the sculptures relating to this campaign probably shew that their forces were composed of men of two different races. Sir Gardner Wilkinson thinks that both belonged to the KHETA nation, and it seems hardly possible to form any other conclusion. 'The nation of Sheta [the initial character is sometimes read 'sh'] seems to have been composed of two distinct tribes, both comprehended under the same name, uniting in one common cause, and probably subject to the same government.' These supposed tribes differed in dress and arms, and one was sometimes bearded, the other was beardless (Ancient Egyptians, i. pp. 383-384, woodcut p. 385). They are rather fair than yellow, and the beardless warriors are probably of a different race from the people of Palestine generally. In some cases they remind us of the Tatars, and it is impossible to forget that the Egyptians of the Greek period evidently took the KHETA for Scythians or Bactrians. The name Scythian is not remote, nor is that of the Kittas, or warrior-Tatars in the Chinese garrisons, but mere word-resemblances are dangerous, and the circumstance that the Scythians appear in history when the Hittites have just disappeared is not of much value. But it is worthy of remark that in the time of Moses there was a Rephaite ruling the Amorites in Palestine, as the sons of Anak had apparently long ruled the Hittites in Hebron, so that we need not be surprised to find two races under the same government in the case of the Hittites of Syria.

In the twenty-first year of Ramesses II., the great king of the Hittites, KHETSEERA, came to Egypt to make a treaty of peace. A copy of the treaty is preserved in a hieroglyphic inscription. From this it appears that KHETSEERA had been preceded by his grandfather SAPRARA, his father MAURASARA, and his brother MAUTNURA, and that in the reigns of SAPRARA and MAUTNURA peace had been made upon the same conditions. The information the inscription affords as to the religion of the Hittites will be noticed later. In a tablet of the thirty-fourth year of the same king, one of his wives, a Hittite princess with the Egyptian name RA-MA-UR-NEFRU, is represented as well as her father, the king (or a king) of the KHETA. Solomon also, as Dr. Brugsch remarks, took Hittite women into his harem (1 Kings xi. 1). Ramesses III. (B.C. cir. 1280) had a war with the KHETA, mentioned in one of his inscriptions with KETEE (KETESH) KARA[K]JAMSA (Carchemish), ARATU (Aradus?), and ARASA, all described as in the land AMARA.

The religion of the Hittites is only known from the treaty with Ramesses II., though it is probable that additional information may be derived from an examination of proper names. In this act the divinities of both the land of KHETA and of Egypt are mentioned, probably because they were invoked to see that the compact was duly kept. They are described from a Hittite point of view, a circumstance which is curious as shewing how carefully the Egyptian scribe had kept to the document before him. They are the gods of war and the gods of women of the land of KHETA and of Egypt, the SUTEKH of the land of KHETA, the SUTEKH of several forts, the ASHTERAT (written ANTERAT) of the land of KHETA, several unnamed gods and goddesses of places or countries, and of a fortress, the mountains and rivers of the land of KHETA, and of Egypt, Amen, SUTEKH, and the winds. SUTEKH, or SET, was the chief god of the Shepherd-kings of Egypt, one of whom appears to have abolished all other worship in his dominions, and is also called BAR, or Baal. SUTEKH is perhaps a foreign form, SET seems certainly of foreign origin. ASHTERAT is of course Ashtoreth, the consort of Baal in Palestine. They were the principal divinities of the KHETA, as they are mentioned by name and as worshipped in the whole land. The worship of the mountains and rivers is remarkably indicative of the character of the religion, and the mention of the gods of special cities points in the same direction. The former is low nature-worship, the latter is entirely consistent with it, and indeed is never found but in connection with it.

The following names of Hittites occur in the Bible:—Ephron, Zohar, Adah, daughter of Elon, Bashemath (Basmath), the same? Judith, daughter of Beeri, Ahimelech, Uriah, Sibbechai?

The Egyptian monuments furnish us with the following:—SAPRARA, MAURASARA, MAUTNURA, KHETSEERA, TAKANUNUNASA, KAMAEET, TARKATATASA (an ally?) KHEERAPSARA, scribe of books of the KHETA, PEESA, TEETARA, KRABETUSA, AKMA (an ally?) SA.MARUS, TATARA, MATREEMA, brother of [the king of] the KHETA, RABSUNUNA, (an ally?) TUATASA (an ally?)

The former names are evidently pure Hebrew, though the significations of some (Ephron, Elon, Beeri) may point to primitive nature-worship. If not they are indicative of a strong love of nature, and of the degree of mental refinement which it necessarily implies. Adah is remarkable as being also an antediluvian name.

The latter names are evidently Semitic, but not Hebrew, a circumstance that need not surprise us when we know that Aramaic was separate from Hebrew in Jacob's time. The syllables SEERA in KHET-SEERA, and RAB in RAB-SUNUNA, seem to correspond to the SAR and RAB of Assyrian and Babylonian names. TEETARA may be the same name as the Tidal of Scripture. But the most remarkable of all these names is MATREEMA, which corresponds as closely as possible to Mizraim. The third letter is a hard T, and the final syllable is constantly used for the Hebrew dual. In the Egyptian name of Mesopotamia, NEHARENA, we find the Chaldee and Arabic dual. It would therefore appear that the language of the KHETA was nearer to the Hebrew than to the Chaldee. TARKATATASA probably commences with the name of the goddess Derketo or Atargatis.

The principal source of information on the Egyptian bearings of this subject is Brugsch's Geographische Inschriften, ii. p. 20, seqq. The documents to which he mainly refers are the inscriptions of Rameses II., the poem of PENTAUR, and the treaty. The first are given by Lepsius (Denkmäler, Abth. iii. bl. 153-161, 164-166, 187, 196; see also 130, 209), and translated by M. Chabas (Rev. Arch., 1859); see also Brugsch, Histoire d'Égypte (i. p. 137, seqq.); the second is translated by M. de Rougé (Revue Contemporaine, No. 106, p. 389, seqq.), Dr. Brugsch (ll. cc.), Mr. Goodwin, Cambridge Essays, 1858, and in Bunsen's Egypt's Place (iv. p. 675, seqq.); and the third is translated by Dr. Brugsch (ll. cc.), and Mr. Goodwin (Parchemon, 1862).—R. S. P.

HIVITES (חִוִּי, only found in the sing. and with the article; LXX. ὁ Ἰβυαῖος), a nation descended from Canaan. Gesenius suggests that the name may signify 'villagers,' from חָוִי [unused] = חָוִי, 'a village of nomades, a village' (Lex. s. v.)

In the list of the descendants of Canaan, 'the Hivite' is followed by tribes most, if not all, of which dwelt to the north of the Israelite territory out of the tract actually conquered. No name of the same region occurs before, save Sidon, if it should be assigned to it, mentioned at the head of the list as the first-born of Canaan (Gen. x. 15-18; 1 Chron. i. 13-16). With this placing agree the mention of 'the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh' (Josh. xi. 3), and of 'the Hivite that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baalhermon unto the entering in of Hamath' (Judg. iii. 3). The Hivite prince Hamor in Jacob's time ruled in the heart of Palestine. We also find a Hivite confederacy, at the time of the conquest, consisting of Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xi. 17).

It is remarkable that the Hivites, although mentioned in the list of Gen. x., and afterwards as settled in the Land of Promise, are not found, in the Hebrew text, in the list of nations whose territories were promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 19-21). In the LXX. and Samaritan they occur (ver. 21). The omission in the Hebrew has led to the startling conjecture that they are the same as the Kadmonites. It is indeed by no means impossible that a Canaanite tribe should be called by different names, when we find such cases of various names as that of Hermon, but we cannot attempt an identification of two names when the significations are neither the same nor similar, and when there seems nothing appropriate in the supposed second name. In this passage, the position of the Hivites, if represented by the Kadmonites, would be at the head of the nations usually assigned to the Land of Promise, and this is most unlikely, unless the order be geographical. A more ingenious conjecture has been put forward by Mr. Grove, who suggests the identity of the Hivites and the Avites, or Avim, on the grounds, (a) that at a later time the Galileans confounded the gutturals; (b) that the LXX. and Jerome do not distinguish the two names; (c) that the town of ha-Avvim ('Avim,' A. V.) was in the same district as the Hivites of Gibeon; (d) and that the Avim disappear before the Hivites appear; (e) to which we may add, that if Gesenius's etymology be sound it is remarkable that the Avim are described as dwelling 'in villages' (see Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, AVIM, HIVITES). On the other hand, (a) it is unlikely that a dialectic difference would be recorded, and it seems too slight to be anything else; (b) the LXX. and Jerome are not very careful as to exact transcriptions of proper names; (c) the presence of Avim in a district does not prove them to be the same as other inhabitants of that district; (d) and the narrative in Deut. ii. speaks only of the overthrow, before the coming of the Israelites, by later settlers, of certain tribes or peoples, not mentioned in the list of Gen. x., which were, as far as stated, Rephaim, or of Rephaite stock. The probability that the Avim were of this stock is strengthened by the circumstance that there was a remnant of the Rephaim among the Philistines in David's time, as there was among other nations when the Israelites conquered the country. Therefore, it seems to us very unlikely that the Avim were the same as the Hivites.

The Hivites first appear in the history of the Hebrews as a settled race, resembling the Hittites of Hebron. The narrative of the transaction of Jacob, when he bought the 'parcel of a field,' closely resembles that of Abraham's purchase of the field of Machpelah. The people subject to 'Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country,' were dwellers in a city, and given to trade, as well as having flocks and herds. They seem to have been unused to war, and no match for the energy of Simeon and Levi. In the matter that led to the overthrow of this Hivite city we see an indication of the corruption that afterwards became characteristic of the Canaanite tribes (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20; xxxiv.) Jacob's reproof of his sons seems to imply that the more powerful inhabitants of at least this part of the Promised Land were Canaanites and Perizzites, these only being mentioned as likely to attack him in revenge (xxxiv. 30). It is possible, but not certain, that there is a reference to this matter where Jacob speaks of a portion he gave to Joseph as having been taken by him in war from the Amorite (xlviii. 22), for his land at Shechem was given to Joseph, but it had been bought, and what Simeon and Levi seized was probably never claimed by Jacob, unless, indeed, the Hivites, who might possibly be spoken of as Amorites (but comp. xxxiv. 30), attempted to recover it by force. Perhaps the reference is to some other occurrence. It seems clear, however, from the first of the passages just noticed (xxxiv. 30), that the Hivites ruled by Hamor were a small settlement. Soon after this it is mentioned that Esau took to wife a Hivite (xxxvi. 2), but the proposed reading Horite seems preferable (see ver. 25). In the enumerations of the nations of Canaan in the part of the Bible relating to the Exodus and to the conquest, the Hivites are not mentioned in an early position, and seem, therefore, to have been one of the less important tribes. At the time of the conquest, the Hivites of Gibeon, and three other cities in the neighbourhood, Chephirah, Beeroh, and Kirjath-jearim, forming a confederacy, deceived the Israelites by means of travel-worn ambassadors, who feigned to have come from a great distance, and so secured a treaty. For their deceit they were required to become servants for the altar. Their cities seem to have been given for the same service, for the Ark long remained at Kirjath-jearim, and the Tabernacle, after the Ark had been removed to Jerusalem, was raised at Gibeon, where was 'the great high place.' Saul attempted to destroy the Gibeonites, and in consequence David gave up to them seven of his sons and grandsons to be put to death. If we hear of the Hivites again it is only as the Nethinim, or people 'given' to the temple-service. The settlement in the south does not seem to have been large, though Gibeon was an important city (Josh. x. i, 2). It is also to be noticed that this city was apparently not governed by a king (l. c.), but by elders (ix. 11), and that the confederacy seems to have been of the nature of a primitive federal republic, such as is not unfrequently found in Arabia (l. c.) In Joshua's time the Hivite dwelt under Hermon and in Mount Lebanon (xi. 3; Judg. iii. 3), and when Joab numbered Israel, 'all the cities of the Hivite' seem to have been situate in the north of Palestine (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). This appears to have been the chief Hivite territory. If we may hazard a conjecture, the Hermonites may perhaps be a later name for the Hivites; we recognize them in the Egyptian REMENEN, and look in vain for any other trace of the Hivites in the conquests of the Pharaohs who passed through this tract.

There are few Hivite names recorded in Scripture. Hamor, 'the he-ass,' was probably an honourable name. Shechem, 'shoulder,' 'back,' may also be indicative of strength. Such names are suitable to a primitive people, but they are not sufficiently numerous or characteristic for us to be able to draw any sure inference. It is, indeed, possible that they may be connected, as the similar Hittite names seem to be, with low nature-worship. [HITTITES.] The names of the Hivite towns do not help us. Gibeon merely indicates lofty position; Kirjath-jearim, 'the city of the woods,' is interesting from the use of the word Kirjah, which we take to be probably a Canaanitish form: the other names present no special indications.

In the worship of Baal-berith, or 'Baal of the covenant,' at Shechem, in the time of the Judges, we more probably see a trace of the head-city of a Hivite confederacy than of an alliance between the Israelites and the Hivites.—R. S. P.

HOBAB. [JETHRO.]

HOBAB (חֹבָב; Χοβά; Hoba), a place only mentioned in Gen. xiv. 15. Abraham having defeated the kings of the east at Dan, pursued them unto Hobab, 'which is on the left hand of Damascus.' The word חֹבָב may signify 'left hand' (Vulg. ad laevam; Sept. ἐν ἀριστερῇ), or 'on the north,' like the Arabic شمال, Shemāl. Probably the latter is the true meaning here. Eusebius and Jerome describe Hobah as one of the seats of the Ebionites; but they probably confound it with Cocaba in Bashan (Onomast., s. v. Choba). About three miles north-east of Damascus is a village called Jobar, containing a Jewish synagogue dedicated to Elijah; this some have identified with Hobah (Ritter, Pal. und Syr., iv. 312; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 331). At Burzeh, another village a short distance north of Damascus, is a very ancient sanctuary of Abraham, which might perhaps mark the site of Hobah, as is stated by the Arab historian Ibn 'Asāker (see Porter's Damascus, i. 82; Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, p. 481, sq.)—J. L. P.

HOBNIM (חֹבְנִים) occurs only in one passage of Scripture, where the prophet Ezekiel (xxvii. 15), referring to the commerce of Tyre, says, 'The men of Dedan were thy merchants; many isles were the merchandise of thine hand: they brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony (hobnim).' The Hebrew word is translated 'Ebony' in all the European versions; but, as Bochart states (Hierozoicon, i. 20, pars ii.), the Chaldee version, followed by R. Selomo and other Jews, as well as the Greek and Arabic versions, render hobnim by pavonum (pavones): 'Itaque soli veterum Symmachus et Hieronymus viderunt (חֹבְנִים) hobnim esse hebenum.' Some of the Hebrew critics, however, as Kimchius, also acknowledge this: 'Hobnim lignum interpretantur, quod Arabicè vocatur abenus.' Of the correctness of this opinion there can now be no doubt. In the first place, we may allude to Dedan being considered one of the ports of Arabia on the Persian Gulf, or at least to the south of the Red Sea; and secondly, as observed by Bochart, 'hobnim et hebenus sunt voces non absimiles,' the latter word being variously written by ancient authors, as ἔβην, ἔβενος, ἔβενος, ebenus and hebenus. The last form is used by Jerome in his Latin, and ἔβενος by Symmachus, in his Greek version. The Arabs have ابنوس, which they apply to Ebony, and by that name it is known in northern India at the present day. Forskål mentions abnoos as one of the kinds of wood imported in his time from India into Arabia. Whether the Arabic name be a corruption of the Greek, or the Greek a modification, as is most likely, of some Eastern name, we require some other evidence, besides the occurrence of the word in Arabic works on Materia Medica, to determine; since in these, Greek words are sometimes employed as the principal terms for substances with which they are not well acquainted. Bardust is, however, given by some as the Arabic name; abnoos as the Persian. We found the latter applied to ebony in North-west India, as did Forskål in the Red Sea.

Ebony wood was highly esteemed by the ancients, and employed by them for a variety of purposes. It is very appropriately placed in juxta-position with ivory, 'quamvis unum ex animali, alterum ex arbore petatur; quippe, ut notat Fullerus (Miscell. vi. 14) utrique est extremus color eodem excellentiæ gradu. Ebori videlicet pulcherrimi candoris, hebeno speciosissimi nigroris. Utrumque politissimum, nitidissimum, et incomparabili lævore conspicuum. Unde est, quod in eosdem usus fere adhibentur, et ex utroque arcus fiunt, pectines, tabulæ lusoriæ, cultroꝝ manubria,' etc. (Bochart, l. c.) Ivory and Ebony are probably, however, also mentioned together because both were obtained from the same countries—Ethiopia and India; and, among the comparatively few articles of ancient commerce, must, from this cause, always have been associated together, while their contrast of colour and joint employment in inlaid work, would contribute as additional reasons for their being adduced as articles characteristic of a distinct commerce.

But it is not in Ezekiel only that ebony and ivory are mentioned together. For Diodorus, as quoted by Bochart, tells us that an ancient king of Egypt imposed on the Ethiopians the payment of a tribute of ebony, gold, and elephants' teeth. So Herodotus (iii. 97), as translated by Bochart, says, 'Æthiopes Persis pro trienniali tributo vehunt duos choenices auri apyri (id est, ignem nondum experti), et ducentas ebeni phalangas, et magnos elephantentes viginti.' Pliny, referring to this passage, remarks, 'But Herodotus assigneth it rather to Ethiopia, and saith, that every three years the Ethiopians were wont to pay, by way of tribute, unto the kings of Persia, 100 billets of the timber of that tree (that is, Ebene), together with gold and yvorie;' and, again, from Syene (which confineth and boundeth the lands of our empire and dominion) as farre as to the island Meroë, for the space of 996 miles, there is little ebene found: and that in all those parts betweene there be few other trees to be found, but date trees, which peradventure may be a cause that Ebene was counted a rich tribute and deserved the third place, after gold and ivory' (Holland's Pliny, xii. 4).

It is sometimes stated that the ancients supposed ebony to come only from India. This arose probably from the passage of Virgil (Georg. ii. 116, 17):—

'_____ sola India nigrum
Fert ebenum _____.'

But the term 'India' had often a very wide signification, and included even Ethiopia. Several of the ancients, however, mention both Indian and Ethiopian ebony, as Dioscorides and Pliny; while some mention the Indian, and others the Ethiopian only, as Lucan (Phars. x. 304).

—'nigris Meroë fecunda colonis, Læta comis ebeni.'

The only objection to the above conclusion of any weight is, that hobnim is in the plural form. To this Bochart and others have replied, that there were two kinds of ebony, as mentioned by Theophrastus, Dioscorides, etc., one Ethiopian, the other Indian. Fuller and others maintain that the plural form is employed because the ebony was in pieces: 'refert ad ebeni palangas, quæ ex India et Æthiopia magno numero afferebantur. Φάλαγγας vocant Herodotus et Arrianus in Periplo. Plinius palangas, aut phalangas, variante scriptura, id est, fustes teretes, et qui navibus supponuntur, aut quibus idem onus plures bajulant' (Bochart, l. c.) But the names of other valued foreign woods, as SHITTIM and ALMUGGIM, are also used in the plural form. Besides abnoos, Arab authors, as stated by Bochart (l. c.), mention other woods as similar to and substituted for ebony: one of these is called shees, sheeze; also sasem and semsem, in the plural form semasim; described as nigrum lignum ad patinas conficiendas. Hence in the Koran, 'de iis, qui in gehenna torquentur,' it is said, 'Exibunt ex igne post aliquam in eo moram; exhibunt, inquam, tanquam ligna semasim;' that is, black, from being burnt in the fire. That such a wood was known we have the testimony of Dioscorides—Ἐνιοὶ δὲ τὰ σησάμυνα ἢ ἀκανθίνα ξύλα, ἐμπερὴ ὄντα, ἀντὶ ἐβένου ᾠλοῦσι; 'Nonnulli sesamina aut acanthina ligna, quod consimilia sunt, pro ebeno vendunt.' Some critics, and even Sprengel, in his late edition of Dioscorides, read σηκάμυνα, instead of σησάμυνα, for no reason apparently but because σηκάμυνα denotes a tree with which European scholars are acquainted, while sesamina is only known to those who consult Oriental writers, or who are acquainted with the products of the East. Bochart rightly observes, 'Cave igitur ne quidquam mutes. Aliud enim hic sesamina quam vulgo. Nempe ligna illius arboris quæ Arabicè sasim et semsem appellatur, et ita plurali sesasim. Itaque Dioscoridis Arabs interpretis hic recte habet, etc. سمسام sesama; and so also 'Arrianus in Periplo meminit φαλάγγων σησαμίνων καὶ ἐβενίνων, palangarum sesaminarum et ebeninarum, quæ ex Indiæ urbe Barygasis in Persidem afferuntur' (Bochart, l. c.) The above word is by Dr. Vincent translated sesamum: but this is an herbaceous oil plant.—J. F. R.

HODGES, WALTER, D.D., a divine of the Hutchinsonian school, provost of Oriel College, Oxford. He is the author of a book entitled Elihu; or an Inquiry into the principal Scope and Design of the Book of Job, Lond. 1756, 12mo, 3d edition. In this curious work the author endeavours to shew that Elihu is intended to represent the Son of God. The discovery is one on which he lays great stress, and when the Biblical student is made aware that Hodges has interpreted the whole book in accordance with such a supposition, he will have some notion of the kind of criticism the work contains. Another curious work by the same author is the following, entitled The Christian Plan, 2d edit.; with additions, with other theological pieces, 8vo. The whole meaning and extent of the Christian plan, the author represents as embodied, according to his interpretation, in the Hebrew Elohim. The other theological pieces consist of remarks on the historical account of the life of David, and on Sheol; on the latter, his remarks are described as a dissertation concerning the place of departed souls between the time of their dissolution and the general resurrection. Also, Oratio habita in domo convocationis.—W. J. C.

HODGSON, BERNARD, LL.D., principal of Hertford College. He is the author of Solomon's Song, translated from the Hebrew, Oxford 1785, 4to. Hodgson's chief design in this translation has been to give as literal a rendering of the original as possible. He has done something also towards illustrating the poetical beauties of this Song of songs. He considers it an epithalamium. In chap. viii. 2 he interprets Talmadin to mean the bride's mother; and the 'chariots of Amminadib' (chap. vi. 12) he renders 'the chariots of my loyal people.' He is the author also of The Proverbs of Solomon, translated from the Hebrew, with Notes, Oxford 1788, 4to; Ecclesiastes, a new translation from the original Hebrew, Oxford 1791, 4to. Both translations are directed to the literal rendering of the original, and considering the many and great difficulties to be encountered in such an undertaking, more especially when helps were fewer than they are now, Dr. Hodgson's success is deserving of commendation. He rarely deviates from the common version, and when he does, assigns reasons which in most instances are convincing and satisfactory. The notes, of which there are not many, are principally devoted to verbal criticism.—W. J. C.

HODIAH (הֹדִיָּה). The wife of Ezra (Sept. Ἡδοῖα; Alex. Ἰουδαία) and the mother of Jered, and Heber, and Jekuthiel (1 Chron. iv. 18, 19), the same who is called Jehudijah (הַיְהוּדִיָּה, the Jewess, i. e., his Jewish wife, as distinguished from Bithiah, who was an Egyptian) in the preceding verse.—W. L. A.

HODIJAH (הֹדִיָּה), and hence the same as HODIAH; LXX. Ἡδοῖα, Ἰουδαία, Ἰδοῖμ; 1 Esd. Αὐτάλας; Vulg. Odia, Odaia.

1. One of the Levites who explained the law to the people on the memorable occasion when Ezra solemnly read it in the congregation (Neh. viii. 7; 1 Esd. ix. 48). It is probably the same who is referred to (Neh. ix. 5; x. 10, Heb. 11).

2. Another Levite mentioned (Neh. x. 13, Heb. 14) in the list of those who sealed the covenant.

3. One of the chiefs of the people mentioned in the same list (Neh. x. 18, Heb. 19).—S. N.

HODY, HUMPHREY, D.D., an eminent English divine was born Jan. 1, 1659, at Oldcombe, Somersetshire. Educated at Oxford University, he took his degree of M.A. there in 1682, and was elected fellow of Wadham College in 1684. He became greatly distinguished in the Nonjuring controversy, in which he published several works on the adverse side. For his services in this cause he was rewarded by being made domestic chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson, presented to a living in London, and appointed regius professor of Greek in the university of Oxford, 1698, and archdeacon of Oxford in 1704. He evinced his liberal and generous spirit by founding ten scholarships in Wadham College to promote the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages. He died Jan. 20, 1706. His principal works are:—1. Dissertatio contra Historiam Aristæ de LXX. Interpretibus, 1684, designed to prove that Aristæas' history is a Jewish fable concocted to gain credit for the Septuagint. 2. De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus, Versionibus Græcis, et Latinâ Vulgata, Libri Quatuor, Oxonii 1704. The former of these works, published when the author was only twenty-two years of age, was rudely assailed by Isaac Vossius. Hody, instead of replying to his antagonist, applied himself to his great work, De Textibus, which occupied him nearly twenty years. It is divided into four books. The first contains his dissertation against Aristæas, with improvements, strengthening his former positions. The second treats of the true authors of the Septuagint version—of the time when, and the reasons why, it was undertaken, and of the manner in which it was performed. The third book contains a history of the original Hebrew text, of the Septuagint, and of the Vulgate Latin version, shewing the authority of each in different ages, and that the Hebrew text has always been most esteemed and valued. The fourth book gives an account of the versions of Symmachus, Aquila, and Theodotion, and of Origin's Hexapla and other ancient editions, with lists of the books of the Bible made at different times bearing on the history of the canon. It still maintains its high rank as the 'classical work on the Septuagint' (see Horne's Introd. ii., Bibliog. App., and Jebb's Account of the Life and Writings of Hody, prefixed to the author's posthumous work, De Græcis Illustribus, etc.)—L. J.

HOFFMANN, IMMANUEL, was born at Tübingen, April 16, 1710. In 1741 he was appointed to the Archidiaconate of Tübingen, and in 1756 professor of Greek in the university of that city. He died in 1772. Of his various dissertations published during his lifetime, the following are the most important: Diss. in oraculum Ram. x. 5-8, Tübing. 1752, 4to; Diss. de stilo Apostoli Pauli, 1757; Diss. in loca parallela, 2 Pet. ii. 4-17, Jud. 5-13, 1762, 4to; Commentatio in 1 Cor. i. 19-21, 1766, 4to. He was also the author of a posthumous work entitled Demonstratio Evangelica per ipsum scripturarum consensum in oraculis ex Velere Testamento in Novo allegatis declarata, Partes iii., Tübing. 1773-82, 4to. Of this work T. G. Hegelmaier was editor, who prefixed to it an excursus on the method of interpreting the quotations made from the O. T. in the New. It is described by Orme as 'full of learning, and in general very judicious.'—S. N.

HOFMANN, KARL GOTTLÖB, D.D., was born at Schneeberg, 1st October 1703, and died at Wittenberg, where he was professor of theology and general superintendent, 19th Sept. 1774. Besides editing and greatly enlarging the Introductio in Lectionem N. T. of J. G. Pritius, Lips. 1737, he wrote Introductio Theol.-Crit. in Lectionem epist. Pauli ad Galat. et Coloss., 4to, Lips. 1750, and a volume of Opuscula, under the title of Varia Sacra, 4to, Wittenb. et Lips. 1751.—W. L. A.

HOLIDAYS. [FESTIVALS; PASSOVER.]

HOLMES, ROBERT, D.D., a learned divine and elegant scholar, was a native of Hampshire, born 1749, and educated at Winchester School, from which he was chosen to New College, Oxford. In 1790 he succeeded Thomas Warton as professor of poetry in that University. He became rector of Staunton, canon of Salisbury, canon of Christ Church, and in 1804 dean of Winchester. He died in 1805 at Oxford. In addition to the great work on which his reputation depends, he published in 1777 in quarto a very ingenious discourse, entitled 'The resurrection of the body deduced from the resurrection of Christ;' the year after, 'Alfred, an Ode,' etc., in imitation of Gray's style; in 1783 the Bampton Lectures, 'On the prophecies and testimony of John the Baptist, and the parallel prophecies of Jesus Christ;' in 1788 four tracts on the principles of religion as a test of divine authority; on the principles of redemption; on the angelical message of the Virgin Mary, and on the resurrection of the body, with a discourse on humility. In 1793 he composed an ode for the Encænica at the installation of the Duke of Portland as Chancellor of the University of Oxford. In the same year he published, what was in fact the precursor of his great critical work, a Latin letter to Shute Barrington, Bishop of Durham, on his collation of the Septuagint, with a specimen of the text and various readings which he was on the point of publishing. As early as 1788 he had published at Oxford proposals for a collation of all the known MSS. of the Septuagint—a labour which had never yet been undertaken on an extensive scale, and the want of which had long been felt among Biblical scholars. Dr. Holmes' undertaking was promoted by the delegates of the Clarendon Press, to the liberality of which body sacred literature owes much, for besides the present instance, Grabe's edition of the Septuagint in four folio volumes, and Dr. Mill's critical Greek Testament, emanated from the press of this University, at different periods in the last century. In addition to the learned editor's own labours, literary men were engaged in different parts of the continent for the business of collation, and Dr. Holmes annually published an account of the progress which was made. In 1798 he published at Oxford the Book of Genesis, which was successively followed by the other books of the Pentateuch, making together one folio volume, with one title page and one general preface. From this preface it appears that 11 Greek MSS. in uncial letters, and more than 100 MSS. in cursive writing (containing either the whole or parts of the Pentateuch) were collated for this edition. The text of this edition being a copy of the Roman edition of 1587 [that of Sixtus V.], the deviations from it which occur in three other cardinal editions (the Complutensian, the Aldine, and Grabe's) are constantly noted. The quotations found in the works of the Greek Fathers are likewise alleged, and finally the various readings of the ancient versions which were made from the Septuagint. The plan of this edition thus bore a close resemblance to what had been already applied by Mill, Wetstein, and Griesbach to the criticism of the Greek Testament, and the execution of it has been highly commended as displaying uncommon industry and apparently great accuracy. The learned editor died in the midst of his honourable labour in the year 1806; but shortly before his death he published the book of Daniel, both according to the LXX. version and that of Theodotion, the latter only having been printed in former editions because the Septuagint translation of this book is not contained in the common MSS., and was unknown till it was printed in 1772 from a MS. belonging to Cardinal Chigi. After Dr. Holmes' death the work was continued by the Rev. J. Parsons, B.D., and eventually completed, on the original editor's plan, in five splendid folio volumes, in the year 1827. For favourable notices of this elaborate work the reader is referred to Bishop Marsh's Lectures on the Criticism of the Bible [Lecture x.], where Dr. Holmes' portion is described, and Horne's Introduction [ed. 9], vol. v. pp. 57, 58, where sundry Reviews of the earlier volumes as they appeared are also mentioned. The high opinion, however, which the partiality of contemporary critics induced them to form of this handsome and expensive edition of the Septuagint has not been always endorsed since—Tischendorf, one of the most recent editors of the Alexandrian Version, complains bitterly of the carelessness and inaccuracy of the work—'tam negligenter tamque male factæ sunt [collationes] ut etiam atque etiam dolendum sit tantos numos raro liberalitate per Angliam suppeditatos criticæ sacræ parum profuisse.' (For his entire review and strictures the reader is referred to his edition of the Sept. [1856], Prolegomena, pp. lii.-lvi.)—P. H.

HOLOFERNES (Ὁλοφέρνης). This name occurs only in the Apocrypha (Judith ii. 4, & al.) Nebuchadnezzar 'king of Nineveh,' having resolved to 'avenge himself on all the earth,' appointed Holofernes general of the expedition intended for this purpose, consisting of 120,000 foot and 12,000 horse. Holofernes marched westward and southward, carrying devastation everywhere he came, destroying harvests, and flocks, and cities, as well as men, old and young; making even the 'cities of the sea-coast,' which had submitted to him, feel the weight of his arm. Having reached Esdraelon, he encamped 'between Geba and Scythopolis' a whole month to collect his forces. The Jews, however, resolved to resist him, and fortified all the mountain passes. Dissuaded by Achior, 'captain of the sons of Ammon,' from attacking the Jews, he resented the advice, and delivered Achior into the hands of the Jews in Bethulia, from whom, however, he met with a kind reception. Holofernes proceeded against Bethulia (which see), where he was brought to bay; and, instead of attacking it, seized upon two wells, on which the city depended for water, and sat down before it to take it by siege. While here he fell a victim to the treachery of Judith, a beautiful Jewish widow, who artfully managed to be brought into his presence, and who, by playing the hypocrite, secured his favour and confidence. Having invited her to a banquet, he drank freely, and having fallen asleep, fell beneath the arm of his fair guest, who cut off his head with his own sword, and escaped with her bloody trophy to her own people in Bethulia. The Jews immediately fell on their enemies, who, finding their general dead in his tent, fled in confusion. Such is the story. It is scarcely necessary to add that it is wholly unhistorical (see JUDITH). 'The name (Holofernes) occurs twice in Cappadocian history, as borne by Ariathes I. (cir. B.C. 350), and afterwards by a pretender to the Cappadocian throne, who was at first supported, and afterwards imprisoned, by Demetrius Soter (cir. B.C. 130). The termination (Tisaphernes, etc.) points to a Persian origin, but the meaning of the word is uncertain' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible).—I. J.

HOLON (חֹלֹן; Sept. Χαλού, Χιλουών; Alex. Ὡλῶν), a town, the name of which occurs in the enumeration of the places set apart as 'the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families' (Josh. xv. 20), and one of a number of towns in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). In 1 Chron. vi. 58 the name is written Hilen. Also (חֹלִין; Sept. Χελών) one of a number of cities in 'the plain country' or level districts of Moab, east of the Jordan. Jeremiah mentions it as one of the cities on which judgment had come (Jer. xlviii. 21). Both localities are now unknown.—W. J. C.

HOMAM (חֹמָה; Sept. Ἀμόν), an Edomite chief (1 Chron. i. 39), whose name appears in the form חֹמָה, Hemam, Gen. xxxvi. 22. There is a town bearing the name of El-Homaimah south from Petra, and on the hill Sherah, which the Arabic geographers describe as the native place of the Abassides (Robinson, Bib. Res., ii. 572). With this Knobel compares Homam (Gen., in loc.)—W. L. A.

HOMBERGK ZU VACH, JOHANN FRIED-

RICH, a learned jurist, born at Marburg, April 15, 1673. After prosecuting his studies for several years in the University of Utrecht, he visited England, and stayed for some time in London, Oxford, and Cambridge. During this visit he became acquainted with Richard Bentley. He died April 20, 1748. In addition to a large number of works on professional topics, he published in 1708, as the result of his private study of the N. T., a work entitled Parerga Sacra seu interpretatio succincta et nova quorundam textuum Novi Testamenti, Ultraj. 1708, 8vo. Of this an enlarged and improved edition was subsequently issued under the title Parerga Sacra seu observationes quadam ad Novum Testamentum, Ultraj. 1712, 4to. The criticisms contained in this work were attacked by Elsnor, and defended by the author's son Æmilius Ludwig. Hombergk takes a medium position between the Hebraists and the Purists.—S. N.

HOMER. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.]

HONEY. In the Scripture there are three words denoting different sweet substances, all of which are rendered by 'honey' in the A.V. These it is necessary to distinguish.

1. עֵצַר yaar, which only occurs in 1 Sam. xiv. 25, 27, 29; Cant. v. 1; and denotes the honey of bees and that only.

2. נֶפֶחַ nopheth, honey that drops, usually associated with the comb, and therefore bee-honey. This occurs in Ps. xix. 10; Prov. v. 3; xxiv. 13; xxvii. 7; Cant. iv. 11.

3. דְּבַשׁ debesh. This is the most frequent word. It sometimes denotes bee-honey, as in Judg. xiv. 8, but more commonly a vegetable honey distilled from trees, and called manna by chemists; also the syrup of dates, and even dates themselves. It appears also sometimes to stand as a general term for all kinds of honey.

We shall here confine our remarks to honey in general, and that of bees in particular, referring for the vegetable honey to MANNA, and for the date-honey to SHECHAR.

It is very evident that the land of Canaan abounded in honey. It is indeed described as 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Exod. iii. 8, etc.); which we apprehend to refer to all the sweet substances which the different Hebrew words indicate, as the phrase seems too large to be confined to the honey of bees alone. Yet the great number of bees in Palestine has been noticed by many travellers; and they were doubtless still more common in ancient times when the soil was under more general cultivation. A recent traveller, in a sketch of the natural history of Palestine, names bees, beetles, and mosquitoes, as the insects which are most common in the country (Schubert, Reise ins Morgenlande, ii. 120).

The natural history of the bee, with illustrations of the passages of Scripture in which its name occurs, has been given under a distinct head [DEBORAH]; and the use of honey in food, under another [FOOD]. The principal use of the present notice is therefore that of an index to the other articles in which the different parts of this large subject are separately investigated.

The 'wild honey' (μέλι ἄγριον) which, with locusts, formed the diet of John the Baptist, was probably the vegetable honey, which we refer to MANNA.

No travellers in the East have given us much information respecting the treatment of bees, or any peculiar modes of preparing the honey.

Honey was not permitted to be offered on the altar (Lev. ii. 11). As it is coupled with leaven in this prohibition, it would seem to amount to an interdiction of things sour and sweet. Aben Ezra and others allege that it was because honey partook of the fermenting nature of leaven, and when burnt yielded an unpleasant smell—qualities incompatible with offerings made by fire of a sweet savour unto the Lord. But Maimonides and others think it was for the purpose of making the difference between the religious customs of the Jews and the heathen, in whose offerings honey was much employed. The first-fruits of honey were, however, to be presented, as these were destined for the support of the priests, and not to be offered upon the altar.

Under the different heads to which we have referred, the passages of Scripture relating to honey are explained. The remarkable incident related in 1 Sam. xiv. 24-32, requires, however, to be here noticed. Jonathan and his party coming to the wood, find honey dropping from the trees to the ground, and the prince extends his rod to the honeycomb to taste the honey. On this the present writer is unable to add anything to what he has stated elsewhere (Pictorial Bible, in loc.), which is to the following effect:—First, we are told that the honey was on the ground, then that it dropped, and lastly, that Jonathan put his rod into the honeycomb. From all this it is clear that the honey was bee-honey, and that honey-combs were above in the trees, from which honey dropped upon the ground; but it is not clear whether Jonathan put his rod into a honeycomb that was in the trees or shrubs, or into one that had fallen to the ground, or that had been formed there.

Where wild bees are abundant they form their combs in any convenient place that offers, particularly in cavities or even on the branches of trees; nor are they so nice as is commonly supposed in the choice of situations. In India particularly, and in the Indian islands, the forests often swarm with bees. 'The forests,' says Mr. Roberts, 'literally flow with honey; large combs may be seen hanging on the trees, as you pass along, full of honey' (Oriental Illustrations). We have had good reason to conclude, from many allusions in Scripture, that this was also, to a considerable extent, the case formerly in Palestine. Rabbi Ben Gershom and others indeed fancy that there were bee-hives placed 'all of a row' by the wayside. If we must needs have bee-hives, why not suppose that they were placed in the trees, or suspended from the boughs? This is a practice in different parts where bees abound, and the people pay much attention to realise the advantages which their wax and honey offer. The woods on the western coast of Africa, between Cape Blanco and Sierra Leone, and particularly near the Gambia, are full of bees, to which the negroes formerly, if they do not now, paid considerable attention for the sake of the wax. They had bee-hives, like baskets, made of reeds and sedge, and hung on the out-boughs of the trees, which the bees easily appropriated for the purpose of forming their combs in them. In some parts these hives were so thickly placed that at a distance they looked like fruit. There was also much wild honey in the cavities of the trees (Jobson's Golden Trade, p. 30, in Astley's Collection). Moore confirms this account, and adds, that when he was there, the Mandingoes suspended in this way straw bee-hives not unlike our own, boarded at the bottom, and with a hole for the bees to go in and out (Travels into the inland parts of Africa, Drake's Collection). As to the other supposition, that the honeycomb had been formed on the ground, we think the context rather bears against it; but the circumstance is not in itself unlikely, or incompatible with the habits of wild bees. For want of a better resource they sometimes form their honey in any tolerably convenient spot they can find in the ground, such as small hollows, or even holes formed by animals. Mr. Burchel, in his Travels in South Africa, mentions an instance in which his party (Hottentots) obtained about three pounds of good honey from a hole which had formerly belonged to the weazel kind. The natives treated this as a usual circumstance, and indeed their experience in such affairs was demonstrated by the facility with which they managed to obtain the honey without being injured by the bees.—J. HOOK, HOOKS. The following Hebrew words are so rendered in the A. V.: חֹכָה חֹך, אֶמְנָן, סִיר, צֶנֶה, שְׁפָתַיִם, מִמְרָה, מִלֵּן, וּן. The idea of a thorn enters into the etymology of several of them, probably because a thorn, hooked or straight, was the earliest instrument of this kind. Tacitus thus describes the dress of the ancient Germans, Sagum, fibula, aut si desit, spina consertum; a 'loose mantle, fastened with a clasp, or, when that cannot be had, with a thorn' (Germ. 17).

1. חֹך; 2 Kings xix. 28; Sept. τὰ ἀγκίστρα; Vulg. circulum. In the parallel passage (Is. xxxvii. 29) the Sept. reads, φμὸν, muzzle, halter, or noose, etc. Jehovah here intimates his absolute control over Sennacherib, by an allusion to the practice of leading buffaloes, camels, dromedaries, etc., by means of a cord, or of a cord attached to a ring, passed through the nostrils (Shaw's Travels, pp. 167-68, 2d ed.); Job xli. 1 [xl. 25], 'Canst thou draw out Leviathan with a hook? (חֹךְ) occurs Is. xix. 8, and Hab. i. 15; ἀγκίστρον, hamus) or his tongue with a cord which thou testest down?' Sept. ἀγκίστρον; Vulg. hamo. Assuming that by Leviathan the crocodile is intended, Herodotus (ii. 70) is quoted to show that in his time the Egyptians captured the crocodile with a hook (ἀγκίστρον), with which (ἐξελκύσθῃ ἐς γῆν) he was drawn ashore; and accounts are certainly given by modern travellers of the continuance of this practice (Maillet, Descrip. d'Egypte, tom. ii. p. 127, ed. Hag. 1740). But does not the entire description go upon the supposition of the impossibility of so treating Leviathan? Supposing the allusions to be correctly interpreted, is it not as much as to say, 'Canst thou treat him as thou canst treat the crocodile and other fierce creatures?' Dr. Lee has, indeed, given reasons which render it doubtful, at least, whether the leviathan does mean the crocodile in this passage; or whether it does not mean some species of whale, as was formerly supposed; the Delphinus orca communis, or common grampus, found in the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and also in the Nile. (See his examination of Bochart's reasonings, etc., in Translation and Notes on Job, pp. 197 and 529-539, Lond. 1837) [LEVIATHAN]. Ezek. xxix. 4 (חֹחִי; Sept. πᾶγιδας; Vulg. frantum), where the prophlet foretells the destruction of Pharaoh king of Egypt, by allusions to the destruction, possibly, of a crocodile, the symbol of Egypt. Thus Pliny (Hist. Nat. viii. 25) states, that the Tentyritæ (inhabitants of Egypt) followed the crocodile, swimming after it in the river, sprung upon its back, thrust a bar into its mouth, which, being held by its two extremities, serves—ut franis in terram agant—as a bit, enables them to force it on shore (comp. Ezek. xxix. 3, 4). Strabo relates that the Tentyritæ displayed their feats before the Romans (xvii. p. 560, ed. Casaub.) But see Dr. Lee on this passage, ut supra.

2. וִיִּים (Exod. xxvii. 32, 37; xxxviii. 19), 'hooks,' αἱ κεφαλίδες, capita, capita columnarum; where the Sept. and Jerome seem to have understood the capitals of the pillars; and it has been urged that this is more likely to be the meaning than hooks, especially as 1775 shekels of silver were used in making these וִיִּים for the pillars, overlaying the chapters, and filleting them (cli. xxxviii. 28); and that the hooks are really the קְרָסִים, taches (Exod. xxvi. 6, 11, 33, 37; xxxix. 33). Yet the Sept. also renders וִיִּים, κρίκοι, 'rings,' or 'clasps' (Exod. xxvii. 10, 11, and ἀγκύλαι, Exod. xxxviii. 17, 19); and from a comparison of these two latter passages, it would seem that these hooks, or rather tenters, rose out of the chapters or heads of the pillars.

3. סִזְלוֹן (1 Sam. ii. 13, 14), 'flesh-hook,' κρέδ-γχα, fuscina, and the סִזְלוֹנוֹת, 'the flesh-hooks' (Exod. xxvii. 3, and elsewhere). This was evidently, in the first passage, a trident, a kind of fork, 'of three teeth,' for turning the sacrifices on the fire, and for collecting fragments, etc.

4. סִזְמוֹרוֹת (Is. ii. 4, and elsewhere), 'beat their spears into pruning-hooks' (δρέπανα, falces). The Roman poets have the same metaphor (Martial, xiv. 34, 'Falx ex ense'). In Mic. iv. 3, in ligones, weeding-hooks, or shovels, spades, etc. Joel reverses the metaphor 'pruning-hooks' into spears (iii. 10, ligones); and so Ovid (Fasti, i. 697, in pila ligones).

5. שְׁטִיִּים (Ezek. xl. 43), 'hooks,' which Gesenius explains stalls in the courts of the Temple, where the sacrificial victims were fastened: our translators give in the margin 'endirons, or the two hearth-stones.' The Sept. seems equally at a loss, καὶ παλαιστήν ἐξουσι γείσος; as also Jerome, who renders it labia. Schleusner pronounces γείσος to be a barbarous word formed from יָץ, and understands epistylum, a little pillar set on another, and capitellum, columned. The Chaldee renders שְׁנִינְלִין, short posts in the house of the slaughterers on which to suspend the sacrifices. Dr. Lightfoot, in his chapter 'on the altar, the rings, and the laver,' observes, 'On the north side of the altar were six orders of rings, each of which contained six, at which they killed the sacrifices. Near by were low pillars set up, upon which were laid overthwart beams of cedar; on these were fastened rows of hooks, on which the sacrifices were hung; and they were flayed on marble tables, which were between these pillars' (see vers. 41, 42; Works, vol. 11, ch. xxxiv., Lond. 1684-5-6).

6. צִנֵּה (Amos iv. 2), 'take you away with hooks,' σπῆλαι, contis, 'poles' or 'spears.' In the same verse—

7. סִירֹת דָּוְנָה, 'fish-hooks,' ἐῖς λέβητας ὑποκαίον- VOL. II.

μένους ἐμβαλοῦσιν, ἑμπυροὶ λομοί, et reliquias ventis in ollis ferventibus, where both Sept. and Vulg. seem to have taken סִיר in the sense of a pot or caldron instead of a fish-hook. [CALDRON.]

8. אֲגֻמִּין. [AGMON.]—J. F. D.

HOPHNI AND PHINEAS, the sons of Eli, whose misconduct in the priesthood (as described in 1 Sam. ii. 12-17) brought down that doom of ruin and degradation upon the house of Eli which formed the first divine communication through the young Samuel (1 Sam. iii.) Hophni and Phineas were slain in the battle in which the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, B.C. 1141 (1 Sam. iv. 11). [ELL.]—J. K.

HOPHRA (חֹפְרָא; Sept. Ούαφρη, or PHARAOH-HOPHRA), king of Egypt in the time of Zedekiah king of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. He formed alliance with the former against the latter, and his advance with an Egyptian army constrained the Chaldeans to raise the siege of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvii. 5); but they soon returned and took and destroyed the city. This momentary aid, and the danger of placing reliance on the protection of Hophra, led Ezekiel to compare the Egyptians to a broken reed, which was to pierce the hand of him that leaned upon it (Ezek. xxix. 6, 7). This alliance was disapproved by God; and Jeremiah was authorised to deliver the prophecy contained in his 44th chapter, which concludes with a prediction of Hophra's death and the subjugation of his country by the Chaldeans [comp. EGYPT].

This Pharaoh-hophra is identified with the Apries or Vaphres of ancient authors, and he may be the Psamatik III. of the monuments. Under this identification we may conclude that his wars with the Syrians and Cyrenæans prevented him from affording any great assistance to Zedekiah. Apries is described by Herodotus (ii. 169) as a monarch who, in the zenith of his glory, felt persuaded that it was not in the power even of a deity to dispossess him of his kingdom, or to shake the stability of his sway; and this account of his arrogance fully accords with that contained in the Bible. Ezekiel (xxix. 3) speaks of this king as 'the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.' His overthrow and subsequent captivity and death are foretold with remarkable precision by Jeremiah (xlii. 30); 'I will give Pharaoh-hophra, king of Egypt, into the hands of his enemies, and into the hands of them that seek his life.' This was brought about by a revolt of the troops, who placed Amasis at their head, and after various conflicts took Apries prisoner. He was for a time kept in easy captivity by Amasis, who wished to spare his life; but he was at length constrained to give him up to the vengeance of his enemies, by whom he was strangled (Herod. ii. 169; Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, i. 168-182).

HOR (הֹר, הָר; Sept. ὄρ), a mountain of Arabia Petræa, on the confines of Idumæa, and forming part of the mountain of Seir or Edom. It is only mentioned in Scripture in connection with the circumstances recorded in Num. xx. 22-29. The Israelites were encamped before it, when Aaron was summoned to its top to die there, in the presence of his brother and son, who alone witnessed his final departure. [AARON.]

The mountain now identified with Mount Hor is the most conspicuous in the whole range of Mount Seir, and at this day bears the name of Mount Aaron (Jebel Haroun). It is in N. lat. 30° 18' E. long. 35° 33' about mid-way between the Dead Sea and the Ælanitic Gulf. It may be open to question if this is really the Mount Hor on which Aaron died, seeing that the whole range of Seir was anciently called by that name; yet, from its height and the conspicuous manner in which it rises among the surrounding rocks, it seems not unlikely to have been the chosen scene of the high-priest's death (Kinnear, p. 127). To this may be added that Josephus affirms Mount Hor to have been near Petra; and near that place there is certainly no mountain which can contest the distinction with the one now in view. The base of the highest pinnacle of this mountain is in fact but a little removed from the skirts of the city to the westward. The account of it given twenty years since by Captains Irby and Mangles, in their then unpublished volume of Travels, is the best we yet possess, and we therefore present the substance of their description in their own words.

'We engaged an Arab shepherd as our guide, and leaving Abou Raschid with our servants and horses where the steepness of the ascent commences, we began to mount the track, which is extremely steep and toilsome, and affords but an indifferent footing. In some parts the pilgrim must pick his way as he can, and frequently on his hands and knees. Where by nature it would have been impassable, there are flights of rude steps or inclined planes, constructed of stones laid together, and here and there are niches to receive the footsteps, cut in the live rock: the impressions of pilgrims' feet are scratched in the rock in many places, but without inscriptions. Much juniper grows on the mountain, almost to the very summit, and many flowering plants which we had not observed elsewhere; some of these are very beautiful; most of them are thorny. On the top there is an overhanging shelf in the rock which forms a sort of cavern: here we found a skin of extremely bad water suspended for drinking, and a pallet of straw, with the pitcher and other poor utensils of the sheikh who resides here. He is a decrepit old man, who has lived here during the space of forty years, and occasionally endured the fatigue of descending and re-ascending the mountain. The tomb itself is enclosed in a small building, differing not at all in external form and appearance from those of Mohammedan saints common throughout every province of Turkey. It has probably been rebuilt at no remote period: some small columns are bedded in the walls, and some fragments of granite and slabs of white marble are lying about. The door is near the south-west angle, within which a constructed tomb, with a pall thrown over it, presents itself immediately upon entering: it is patched together out of fragments of stone and marble that have made part of other fabrics. Upon one of these are several short lines in the Hebrew character, cut in a slovenly manner: we had them interpreted at Acre, and they proved to be merely the names of a Jew and his family who had scratched this record. It is not probable that any professed Jew has visited the spot for ages past, probably not since the period of the Mohammedan conquest; it may lay claim, therefore, to some antiquity, and in any case is a curious appendage to the testimony of Josephus on the subject. There are rags and shreds of yarn, with glass beads and paras, left as votive offerings by the Arabs.

'Not far from the north-west angle is a passage, descending by steps, to a vault or grotto beneath, for we were uncertain which of the two to call it, being covered with so thick a coat of whitewash that it is difficult to distinguish whether it is built or hollowed out. It appeared, in great part at least, a grotto; the roof is covered, but the whole is rude, ill-fashioned, and quite dark. The sheikh, who was not informed that we were Christians, furnished us with a lump of butter. Towards the further end of this dark vault lie the two corresponding leaves of an iron grating, which formerly prevented all nearer approach to the tomb; they have, however, been thrown down, and we advanced so as to touch it; it was covered by a ragged pall. We were obliged to descend barefoot, and were not without some apprehension of treading on scorpions or other reptiles in such a place.

It is highly interesting to know what view it was which last greeted the eyes of the dying high-priest from this lofty eminence; and it is the more so from the fact that the region over which the view extends is that in which the Israelites wandered for forty years. Our travellers supply this information:—

‘The view from the summit of the edifice is extremely extensive in every direction, and the eye rests on few objects which it can clearly distinguish to give a name to, although an excellent idea is obtained of the general face and features of the country. The chain of Idumæan mountains, which form the western shore of the Dead Sea, seem to run on to the southward, though losing considerably in their height. They appear in this point of view barren and desolate. Below them is spread out a white sandy plain, seamed with the beds of occasional torrents, and presenting much the same features as the most desert parts of the Ghor. Where this desert expanse approaches the foot of Mount Hor, there arise out of it, like islands, several lower peaks and ridges, of a purple colour, probably composed of the same kind of sandstone as that of Mount Hor itself, which, variegated as it is in its hues, presents in the distance one uniform mass of dark purple. Towards the Egyptian side there is an expanse of country without features or limit, and lost in the distance. The lofty district, which we had quitted in our descent to Wady Mousa, shuts up the prospect on the south-east side; but there is no part of the landscape which the eye wanders over with more curiosity and delight than the crags of Mount Hor itself, which stand up on every side in the most rugged and fantastic forms, sometimes strangely piled one on the other, and sometimes as strangely yawning in cliffs of a frightful depth. . . . An artist who would study rock-scenery in all its wildest and most extravagant forms would find himself rewarded should he resort to Mount Hor for that sole purpose’ [comp. Stanley, Sin. and Pal., p. 86].—J. K.

HOREB. [SINAI.]

HOREM (חֹרֵם; Ὁρέμ, and in Vat. Text Μεγαλαρίμ, by annexing to the previous word). One of the fenced cities of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38). Van de Velde says that it is ‘possibly the same with Hūrah, a low tell with ruins at the entrance of Wady el-Ain’ (Memoir, 322), in the midst of the mountains west of Lake Merom. J. L. P.

IIOR-HAGIDGAD, an encampment of the Israelites during their wandering (Num. xxxiii. 32, 33) [WANDERING].

HORI (חֹרִי). 1. (Sept. Χορρί; Alex. Χορρί) A son of Lotan the Horite, who received the general designation of his race as his name (Gen. xxxvi. 22, 30; 1 Chron. i. 39). 2. (Sept. Σοφρὶ) A man of the tribe of Simeon, father of Shaphet, who was one of the heads of the children of Israel sent by Moses to search the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 5).—W. L. A.

HORITES or HORIM (חֹרִי; Sept. Χορρίαι), a people who seem to have been the aboriginal occupants of Mount Seir in Edom (Gen. xiv. 6), and of the stripe of land between the Dead Sea and the Ælantic Gulf. They were subdued and nearly extirpated by Esau and his descendants, who took possession of their territory, and made those that remained of them tributary, as did the Israelites the people of Canaan whom they subdued but did not utterly destroy (Deut. ii. 12, 22; comp. Gen. xxxvi. 20, ff., where the chiefs of the Horites are enumerated along with the Edomites). It is generally supposed that the Horites took their name from חֹרִי, a hole or cave, and that they were Troglodytes; but they were no more so than the Edomites who succeeded them, and made use of the rock-hewn dwellings of Petra, and they were never regarded as Troglodytes. That the Horites betook themselves to the natural caves of the mountains after their subjugation by Esau and his followers is probable enough (comp. Job xxx. 6, where the writer probably describes what he saw before his eyes in the district where he lived); but they had the name Horites before this, as is evident from the notices in Genesis. Knobel (Volkerthatel) holds that they formed part of the great race of the Ludim, to which also the Rephaim, the Emim, and the Amorites belonged. In this case the Horites were of Semitic descent. According to the account in Gen. xxxvi. 20, ff., they were divided into seven tribes.—W. L. A.

HORN (קֶרֶן; Gr. κέρας; Lat. cornu). [The term is used literally in Scripture to denote—1. The horn of an animal (Gen. xxii. 13; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Ps. xxii. 22); 2. A trumpet, originally probably a simple horn with the tip cut off, but afterwards composed of metal or other materials (Josh. vi. 4, 5; comp. Lat. cornu); 3. The elephant's tusk (Ezek. xxvii. 15); 4. A vessel, made probably of a horn, for holding oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 Kings i. 39; comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 2, 61); 5. A vessel for containing the pigment used by women in the East to anoint the eyelashes (Job xlii. 14)]. From its primary use for defence in the case of horned animals it came to acquire several derivative meanings, some of which are connected with the illustration and right understanding of holy writ. As horns are hollow and easily polished, they have in ancient and modern times been used for drinking-vessels and for military purposes; and as they are the chief source of strength for attack and defence with the animals to which God has given them, they serve in Scripture as emblems of power, dominion, glory, and fierceness (Dan. viii. 5, 9; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 Kings i. 39; Josh. vi. 4, 5; 1 Sam. ii. 1; Ps. lxxv. 5, 10; Jer. xlviii. 25; Ezek. xxix. 21; Amos vi. 13). Hence to defile the horn in the dust (Job. xvi. 15), is to lower and degrade oneself, and, on the contrary, to lift up, to exalt the horn (Ps. lxxv. 4; lxxix. 17; cxlviii. 14), is poetically to raise oneself to eminent honour or prosperity, to bear oneself proudly. Something like this is found in classic authors; comp. Hor., Carm. iii. 21, 18. In the East, at present, horns are used as an ornament for the head, and as a token of eminent rank (Rosenmüller, Morg. iv. 85). The women among the Druses on Mount Lebanon wear on their heads silver horns of native make, 'which are the distinguishing badge of wifehood' (Bowring's Report on Syria, p. 8; comp. Thomson, Land and Book, i. 101).

By an easy transition, horn came to denote an elevation or hill (Is. v. 1); in Switzerland mountains still bear this name, thus, Schreckhorn, Buchhorn. The altar of burnt-offerings (Exod. xxvii. 2) and the altar of incense (Exod. xxx. 2) had each at the four corners four horns of shittim-wood, the first being overlaid with brass, the second with gold (Exod. xxxvii. 25; xxxviii. 2; Jer. xvii. 1; Amos iii. 14). Upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings was to be smeared with the finger the blood of the slain bullock (Exod. xxix. 12; Lev. iv. 7-18; viii. 15; ix. 9; xvi. 18; Ezek. xliii. 20). By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt-offering the criminal found an asylum and safety (1 Kings i. 50; ii. 28). These horns [according to the rendering of the A. V.] served for binding the animal destined for sacrifice (Ps. cxviii. 27); but this use Winer (Handwörterb.) denies, asserting that they did not, and could not, answer for such a purpose. [See Hengstenberg, in loc.]

The old painters represented the head of Moses as having two horns proceeding from his temples, one on either side. This practice arose from a mistranslation on the part of the Vulgate of the words found in Exod. xxxiv. 29—cornuta esset facies sua, where it is said in the Common Version 'the skin of his face shone.' The Septuagint seems to have given a good rendering—δέδοξασται ἡ ὄψις τοῦ χρώματος τοῦ προσώπου, 'the appearance of his face wore a glory,' or 'nimbus,' that is, rays parting from his head as from a centre, as the Saviour, and, in the Roman Catholic Church, the saints, are often painted—an appearance derived from Moses' interview with God, and designed to convince the Israelites (Rosenmüller, in loc.) In a somewhat similar manner the Deity is said (Habak. iii. 4) to have 'had horns coming out of his hands,' that is to say, he was made manifest by lightning and thunder (fulmina).—J. HORNE, GEORGE, D.D., bishop of Norwich, was born at Otham, near Maidstone, Kent, Nov. 1, 1730, and died Jan. 17, 1792, in the 62d year of his age. He was sent to school at Maidstone in his thirteenth year, and in his fifteenth entered University College, Oxford. He was afterwards elected fellow of Magdalen College, of which he was appointed principal in 1768. He became vice-chancellor in 1776, dean of Canterbury in 1781, and bishop of Norwich in 1789. He earnestly devoted himself to the study of Hebrew and sacred literature, adopting and applying the peculiar principles of Hutchinsonianism in his investigations. His works, which are very numerous, consist principally of sermons and pamphlets, many of which have long since lost their interest. His best and most popular work, on which, too, his reputation chiefly rests, is his Commentary on the Book of Psalms, 2 vols. 4to., Oxford 1776 (often since reprinted in many forms)—a work which, making no pretensions to depth or learning, is a most delightful closet companion, containing a much larger amount of genuine exposition than many a work bristling formidably with Hebrew and Arabic words, and pretending to lofty achievements. His collected works, with a Memoir, were published by Jones in 6 vols. 8vo, 1795.—L. J.

HORNE, THOMAS HARTWELL, was born of humble parentage in 1780. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, where he was a contemporary of Coleridge, who taught him his Greek alphabet, and assisted him in his work. He began life as a barrister's clerk on £20 a year, and took to such literary work as he could find, with the view of increasing his income. In 1801 he sketched the first plan of his well-known 'Introduction,' which was published in 1818, after 'seventeen years solitary, prayerful, unassisted labour.' Bishop Howley, satisfied with the fitness for holy orders which this book demonstrated, ordained him in 1819. In 1824 he was appointed to superintend a classed catalogue of the books in the British Museum Library. In 1831, Bishop Blomfield collated him to a prebendal stall worth £11 a year, but did not expect it to be 'quite so small.' In 1833 Dr Howley, then archbishop, gave him the rectories of St. Edmund and St. Nicholas, in the city of London, with £300 a year. In this post he died, Jan. 27, 1862, at the age of 82.

Mr. Horne was a man of immense industry, and the list of his works comprises more than fifty books, sermons, and pamphlets. Of these, the only one of any theological importance is, An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, which has now reached the 11th edition. It consists of a summary of evidences for the genuineness of the Bible; an introduction to the criticism of the O. and N. T., and a summary of Biblical geography and antiquities. It contains a large amount of useful information on the subjects of which it treats, and does the highest credit to Mr. Horne's patient research and wide reading. It must, however, be admitted that the book is defaced by dogmatism and want of liberality, and though it was almost invaluable at the time when it appeared, it is not, as a whole, in any way worthy of the present more advanced position of English theology.—F. HORNET, WASP. [TSAR'AH.]

HORONAIM (חֹרֶנַיִם; Ὁρωναιμ and Ὁρωναιμ; Oronaim), a place in Moab, mentioned by Isaiah in connection with Nimrim (xv. 5), and by Jeremiah with Heshbon and Luhith (xlviii. 3). It appears to have been situated on a declivity, as Jeremiah speaks of the 'going down of Horonaim' (ver. 5), and beside a noted road (Is. l. c.) The word signifies 'two caves.' The place was probably situated on some one of the great roads which lead down from the plateau of Moab to the Jordan valley.—J. L. P.

HORONITE, THE (חֹרֶנַיִת; Sept. ὁ Ὁρωνίτης), a designation of Sanballat, the enemy of the Jews (Neh. ii. 10, 19; xiii. 28). It is probably derived from the town Beth-Horon, which lay in the district occupied by the Samaritans in the time of Nehemiah.

HORSLEY, SAMUEL, was born in London 1733, his father being curate of St. Martins-in-the-Fields. From Westminster school he entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He took orders in 1759, was, in 1767, elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1768 he obtained the degree of LL.D. during his residence in Christchurch, Oxford. His earliest attention was given to mathematical science, and he edited the works of Sir Isaac Newton. He first held the living of Newington-Butts in Surrey; then, in succession, those of Aldbury, Thorley, and South Weald in Kent. He became archdeacon of St. Albans in 1781; in 1788 bishop of St. David's; was translated to the see of Rochester 1793, and to that of St. Asaph in 1802. He died at Brighton 4th Oct. 1806. Bishop Horsley's contributions to Biblical literature are of no mean order. His volumes of charges, sermons, and tracts bear directly on Biblical topics. The 'Charges' in defence of Trinitarian doctrine are masterly and skilful, though often defiant in tone and impetuous in assault. The sermons are, in thought and style, among the best in the language. The volumes on Biblical criticism, ranging over many of the books of the O. T., contain many ingenious and many unsound notes, and abound with textual conjectures and emendations, unwarranted either by evidence or demanded by any necessities of exegesis. The Book of the Psalms, translated from the Hebrew, with Notes, is of a higher order, though it is not a thorough and sustained commentary. His Hosea is more elaborate and erudite, and still repays perusal, for it was the product of anxious thought and labour. Bishop Horsley's learning was neither very minute nor profound, but his reasonings are always powerful and trenchant, and now and then haughty and scornful. He throws down difficulties, tears up objections, and arrays arguments with a wonderful force and directness. In his latest charge he avowed his belief in the Calvinism of the articles of the Church of England, and he was the last of her great polemical giants.—J. E.

HOSANNA (הוֹשַׁעְיָה; N. T. Ὡσαννά), a form of acclamatory blessing or wishing well, which signifies, Save now! Succour now! Be now propitious! It occurs in Matt. xxi. 9 (also Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13)—'Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest.' This was on the occasion of our Saviour's public entry into Jerusalem, and, fairly construed, would mean, 'Lord, preserve this Son of David; heap favours and blessings on him!' It is further to be observed that Hosanna was a customary form of acclamation at the Feast of Tabernacles. This feast was celebrated in September, just before the commencement of the civil year; on which occasion the people carried in their hands bundles of boughs of palms, myrtles, etc. (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 13. 5; iii. 10. 4; Lightfoot, Temple Service, xvi. 2). They then repeated the 25th and 26th verses of Ps. cxviii., which commence with the word Hosanna; and from this circumstance they gave the boughs, and the prayers, and the feast itself, the name of Hosanna. They observed the same forms also at the Encenia (1 Maccab. x. 6, 7; 2 Maccab. xiii. 51; Rev. vii. 9) and the Passover. And as they celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles with great joy and gladness, in like manner, on this occasion, did they hail the coming of the Messiah, whose advent they believed to be represented in all the feasts [HALLEL].

HOSEA (הוֹשֵׁעַ), the first in order of the minor prophets in the common editions of the Hebrew Scriptures, as well as of the Alexandrian and Vulgate translations. The arrangement of the other writers in the Δωδεκαπρόβητον of the Greek version differs considerably from that of the Hebrew copies. Jerome (Præf. in XII. Prophetas) says, 'Non idem est ordo duodecim prophetarum apud Hebræos qui est apud nos.' Both, however, place Hosea first in the catalogue; yet the reasons often assigned for the priority of place which this prophet enjoys are by no means satisfactory. They are founded on a misinterpretation of the first clause of the second verse of his oracles, חֲתַלְתָּ דְּבַר יְהוָה, 'the beginning of the word of the Lord.' Hengstenberg (Christologie, iii. 31, E. T. [Clark] i. 192), taking דְּבַר to be the praeiterate of piel, renders the clause, 'the beginning of the Lord hath spoken'; the status constructus of חֲתַלְתָּ, according to him, being explained by the fact 'that the whole following proposition is treated as one substantive idea.' But the phrase has reference not to priority of time in Hosea's commission as compared with other prophets, but to the period of the predictions to which it is the introduction. It is merely an intimation that they were the first divine communications which the son of Beeri enjoyed. Neither did Hosea flourish earlier than all the other minor prophets: the very early era assigned to him by the Jewish writers and other expositors of former times is altogether extravagant. By the best computation he seems to have been preceded by Joel, Amos, and Jonah. The prophets are thus arranged by De Wette (Einleitung, sec. 225):—

Hebrew Text.	Greek Text.
1. Hosea.	1. Hosea.
2. Joel.	2. Amos.
3. Amos.	3. Micah.
4. Obadiah.	4. Joel.

Chronological Order.

1. Joel, about 810 B.C.
2. Jonah „ 810 B.C.
3. Amos „ 790 B.C.
4. Hosea „ 785 B.C.

The table given by Rosenmüller (Scholia in Min. Proph., p. 7) differs from this only in placing Jonah before Joel in chronological order. Compare Newcome (Preface to Minor Prophets, p. 45). The probable causes of this location of Hosea may be the thoroughly national character of his oracles, their length, their earnest tone and vivid representations. That his priority of position may be ascribed to the notion that he discharged the duties of his office for a longer period than any of his prophetic associates, is the less natural conjecture of Rosenmüller.

The name of this prophet has been variously interpreted. Jerome renders it 'Salvator.' But it is the infinitive absolute, 'Salvando,' not the imperative, 'Salva' (O Deus). It is ordinarily written in Greek, Ὠσηέ, and once with the rough initial aspirate, Ὠσηέ (Rom. ix. 25). The figments of Jewish writers regarding Hosea's parentage need scarcely be mentioned. His father, Ὠση, has been confounded with Ὠσηר, a prince of the Reubenites, 1 Chron. v. 6. So, too, Beeri has been reckoned a prophet himself, according to the rabbinical notion that the mention of a prophet's father in the introduction to his prophecies is a proof that sire as well as son was endowed with the prophetic spirit.

Whether Hosea was a citizen of Israel or Judah has been disputed. The pseudo-Epiphanius and Dorotheus of Tyre speak of him as being born at Belemoth, in the tribe of Issachar (Epiph. De Vitis Proph. cap. xi.; Doroth. De Proph. cap. i.). Drusius (Critici Sacri, in loc., tom. v.) prefers the reading 'Beth-semes,' and quotes Jerome, who says, 'Osee de tribu Issachar fuit ortus in Beth-semes.' Conflicting traditions are also told of the place of his death and burial (Burckhardt, Reisen in Syrien, ii. 206). But Maurer contends strenuously that he belonged to the kingdom of Judah (Comment. Theol., ed. Rosenmüller, vol. ii., p. 391); while Jahn supposes that he exercised his office, not, as Amos did, in Israel, but in the principality of Judah. Maurer appeals to the superscription in Amos as a proof that prophets of Jewish origin were sometimes commissioned to labour in the kingdom of Israel (against the appeal to Amos, see Credner, Joel, p. 66, and Hitzig, Kurz. exeget. Handb. zum A. T. in loc.) But with the exception of the case recorded in 1 Kings xiii. 1 (a case altogether too singular and mysterious to serve as an argument), the instance of Amos is a solitary one, and seems to have been regarded as anomalous by his contemporaries (Amos vii. 12). Neither can we assent to the other hypothesis of Maurer, that the mention of the Jewish kings Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, by Hosea in his superscription, is a proof that the seer regarded them as his rightful sovereigns, the monarchs of that territory which gave him birth. Hengstenberg has well replied, that Maurer forgets 'the relation in which the pious in Israel generally, and the prophets in particular, stood to the kingdom of Judah. They considered the whole separation, not only the religious, but also the civil, as an apostacy from God. The dominion of the theocracy was promised to be the throne of David.' The lofty Elijah, on a memorable occasion, when a direct and solemn appeal was made to the Head of the theocracy, took twelve stones, one for each tribe—a proof that he regarded the nation as one in religious confederation. It was also necessary, for correct chronology, that the kings of both nations should be noted. Jeroboam of Israel is mentioned as a means of ascertaining at what period in the long reign of Uzziah Hosea began to prophesy, and Uzziah's successors are named in particular, because the confusion and anarchy of the several interregna in the kingdom of Israel rendered computation by the names of Jeroboam's successors difficult and uncertain. The other argument of Maurer for Hosea's being a Jew, and not an Israelite, viz., because his own people are so severely threatened in his reproofs and denunciations, is evidence of the prophet's patriotic fidelity, but not of his specific nationality. At the same time, the prophetic warnings and promises meant for the southern kingdom of Judah may, along with the Israelitish oracles in which they are embedded, be easily supposed to have reached it, and through such a circulation may have been preserved and placed in the canon after the return from Babylon. But the proofs adduced to shew that Isaiah was acquainted with Hosea's oracles are very precarious. So that we accede to the opinion of De Wette, Rosenmüller, Hengstenberg, Eichhorn, Manger, Kuinoel, Hitzig, and Simson, that Hosea was an Israelite, a native of that kingdom with whose sins and fates his book is specially and primarily occupied. Thus he calls, in vii. 5, the king of Israel 'our king.'

There is no reason with De Wette, Maurer, and Hitzig, to doubt the genuineness of the present superscription, or, with Rosenmüller and Jahn, to suppose that it may have been added by a later hand—though the two last writers uphold its authenticity. The first and second verses of the prophecy are so closely connected in structure and style that the second verse itself would become suspicious, if the first were reckoned a spurious addition. The first is a general, and the second a special introduction. The superscription determines the length of time during which Hosea prophesied. That period was both long and eventful, commencing in the later days of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, extending through the lives of Uzziah, Jotham, and Ahaz, and concluding in the reign of Hezekiah. Uzziah and Jeroboam were contemporary sovereigns for a certain length of time. If we compute from the first year of Uzziah to the last of Hezekiah, we find a period of 113 years. Such a period appears evidently to be too long, and the most probable calculation is to reckon from the last years of Jeroboam to the first of Hezekiah.

We have then at least of Uzziah's reign 26 years.

"	"	Jotham	"	16	"
"	"	Ahaz	"	16	"

This calculation is as close an approximation as it is now possible to obtain. At some point within the last years of Jeroboam II. Hosea began to prophesy. From the death of Jeroboam to the beginning of Hezekiah, at an ordinary calculation, are fifty-seven or fifty-eight years. Bishop Horsley extends the period considerably longer (Commentary on Hosea; Works, vol. iii. p. 234). We do not understand the principle of Rosenmüller's computation, which reduces the time between Jeroboam's death and Hezekiah's accession to a period of about forty years. We agree with Maurer's remark (Comment. Gram. Hist. Crit. in Prophetas Minores, Lipsiæ 1840), 'Alii annos quadraginta numerant nescio quem computandi modum secuti.' This long duration of office is not improbable, and the book itself furnishes strong presumptive evidence in support of this chronology. The first prophecy of Hosea foretells the overthrow of Jehu's house; and the menace was fulfilled on the death of Jeroboam, his great-grandson (2 Kings xv. 12). A prediction of the ruin which was to overthrow Jehu's house at Jeroboam's death must have been uttered during Jeroboam's life. This fact defines the period of Hosea's commencement of his labours, and verifies the inscription, which states that the word of the Lord came to him in the reign of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel. Again in ch. x. 14, allusion is made to an expedition of Shalman-ezer against Israel; and if it was the first inroad against king Hoshea, who began to reign in the twelfth year of Ahaz, the event referred to by the prophet as past must have happened close upon the beginning of Hezekiah's reign (2 Kings xvii. 5). The extended duration indicated in the superscription thus seems borne out by the contents of the prophecy.

The years of Hosea's public life were dark and melancholy. The vials of the wrath of heaven were poured out on his apostate people. The nation suffered under the evils of that schism which was effected under him who has been branded with the indelible stigma—'who made Israel to sin.' The obligations of law had been relaxed, and the claims of religion disregarded; Baal became the rival of Jehovah, and in the dark recesses of the groves were practised the impure and murderous rites of heathen deities. Peace and prosperity fled the land which was harassed by foreign invasion and domestic broils. Might and murder became the twin sentinels of the throne; alliances were formed with other nations, which brought with them seductions to paganism; the land was defiled by bloodshed and adultery, falsehood and debauchery—all classes being guilty; and the nation was so thoroughly debased that but a fraction of its population maintained their spiritual allegiance (2 Kings xix. 18). The death of Jeroboam II. was followed by an interregnum of ten years, an interregnum which Ewald and Thénien deny without any just chronological foundation (Bleek, Einleitung, p. 520, 1860). At the expiry of this period, his son Zechariah assumed the sovereignty, and was slain by Shallum, after the short space of six months (2 Kings xv. 10). In four weeks Shallum was assassinated by Menahem. The assassin, during a disturbed reign of ten years, became tributary to the Assyrian Pul. His successor, Pekahiah, wore the crown but two years, when he was murdered by Pekah. Pekah, after swaying his bloody sceptre for twenty years, met a similar fate in the conspiracy of Hoshea; Hoshea, the last of the usurpers, after another interregnum of eight years, ascended the throne, and his administration of nine years ended in the overthrow of his kingdom and the expatriation of his people (2 Kings xvii. 18, 23).

The prophecies of Hosea were directed especially against the country whose sin was bringing upon it such disasters—periodical anarchy and final captivity. Israel, or Ephraim, is the people especially addressed. Their homicides and fornications, their perjury and theft, their idolatry and impiety, are censured with a faithful severity. Judah is sometimes, indeed, introduced, warned, and admonished. Bishop Horsley (Works, iii. 236) reckons it a mistake to suppose 'that Hosea's prophecies are almost wholly directed against the kingdom of Israel.' But any one reading Hosea will at once discover that the oracles having relation to Israel are primary, while the references to Judah are only incidental. In ch. i. 7, Judah is mentioned in contrast with Israel, to whose condition the symbolic name of the prophet's son is specially applicable. In ver. 11 the future union of the two nations is predicted. The long oracle in ch. ii. has no relation to Judah, nor the symbolic representation in ch. iii. Ch. iv. is severe upon Ephraim, and ends with a very brief exhortation to Judah not to follow his example. In the succeeding chapters allusions to Judah do indeed occasionally occur, when similar sins can be predicated of both branches of the nation. The prophet's mind was intensely occupied with the destinies of his own people. The nations around him are unheeded: his prophetic eye beholds the crisis approaching his own country, and sees its cantons ravaged, its tribes murdered or enslaved. No wonder that his rebukes are so terrible, and his menaces so alarming; yet invitations replete with tenderness are interspersed with his startling expostulations. Now we have a vision of the throne, at first shrouded in darkness, and sending forth lightnings, thunders, and voices; but while we gaze, it becomes encircled with a rainbow, which gradually expands till it loses itself in the brilliancy which itself had originated (ch. xi. and xiv.).

The peculiar mode of instruction which the prophet details in the first and third chapters has given rise to many theories. We refer to the command expressed in ch. i. 2—'And the Lord said unto Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms,' etc.; ch. iii. 1, 'Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress,' etc. What was the precise nature of the transactions here recorded? Were they real events, the result of divine injunctions literally understood, and as literally fulfilled? or were these intimations to the prophet only intended to be pictorial illustrations of the apostacy and spiritual folly and unfaithfulness of Israel? The former view, viz., that the prophet actually and literally entered into this revolting connubial alliance, was advocated in ancient times by Cyril, Theodoret, Basil, and Augustine; and more recently has been maintained by Mercer, Grotius, Houbigant, Manger, Horsley, Stuck, Drake, Henderson, Pusey, Hofmann (Weissag. u. Erfül. p. 200), and by Kurtz in a separate tractate, Die Ehe des propheten Hosea, nach Hosea i.-iii., Dorpat, 1859. Fanciful theories are also rife on this subject. Luther supposed the prophet to perform a kind of drama in view of the people, giving his lawful wife and children these mystical appellations, and the opinion of Calvin is not very different. Newcome (Min. Prophets) thinks that a wife of fornication means merely an Israelite, a woman of apostate and adulterous Israel. So Jac. Capellus (In Hoseam; Opera, p. 683). Hengstenberg supposes the prophet to relate actions which happened, indeed, actually, but not outwardly—a needless refinement. Some, with Maimonides (Moreh Nevochim, part ii.), imagine it to be a nocturnal vision; while others make it wholly an allegory, as the Chaldee Paraphrast, Jerome, Drusus, Bauer, Witsius, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Lowth. The view of Hengstenberg, and such as have held his theory (Markii Distributio de uxore fornicationum accipienda, etc., Lugd. Batav. 1696) is not materially different from the last to which we have referred. Both agree in condemning the first opinion, which Horsley so strenuously maintained. Hengstenberg, at great length and with much force, has argued against this hypothesis (Christology), and Stähelin, Einleitung, p. 212, 1862. Besides other arguments resting on the impurity and loathsomeness of the supposed nuptial contract, it may be maintained against the external reality of the event, that it must have required several years for its completion, and that the impressiveness of the symbol would therefore be weakened and obliterated. Other prophetic transactions of a similar nature might be referred to. Jerome (Comment. in loc.) has referred to Ezek. iv. 4. It is not to be supposed, with Thomas Aquinas, that the prophet was commanded to commit fornication. The divine injunction was to marry—'Scortum aliquis ducere potest sine peccato, scortari non item.' Drusus (Comm. in loc. ap. Crit. Sac. tom. v.) Whichever way this question may be solved; whether these occurrences be regarded as a real and external transaction, or as a piece of spiritual scenery, or only (Witsii Miscell. Sac. p. 90) as a pictorial description, it is agreed on all hands that the actions are typical; that they are, as Jerome calls them, sacramenta futurorum.

Expositors are not at all agreed as to the meaning of the phrase 'wife of whoredoms,' אִשֶּׁת זְנוּנִים; whether the phrase refers to harlotry before marriage, or unfaithfulness after it. It may afford a solution of the difficulty if we look at the antitype in its history and character. Adultery is the appellation of idolatrous apostasy. The Jewish nation was espoused to God. The contract was formed at Sinai; but the Jewish people had prior to this period gone a-whoring. Comp. Lev. xvii. 7, in which it is implied that idolatrous propensities had developed themselves during the abode in Egypt: so that אִשֶּׁת זְנוּנִים may signify one impure prior to her marriage. יְלִדֵי זְנוּנִים, children of whoredoms, may either mean children born by the 'wife' before her marriage, or the two sons and daughter afterwards to be born. According to some, they were not the prophet's own, and they followed the pernicious example of the mother. Spiritual adultery was the debasing sin of Israel. 'Non dicitor,' observes Manger, 'cognovit uxorem, sed simpliciter concepit et peperit.' It is said, indeed, in verse 3, 'She bare him a son.' The word לֹא is wanting in some MSS. and in some copies of the Septuagint, but may have been omitted to conform the clause to verses 6, 8, and 9. According to Kurtz, the prophet's children born after the marriage are the witnesses and rebuke against the 'children of whoredoms' adopted and brought into the house along with their mother, and also against their mother in her renewed infidelities; while Hosea himself occupies the same position, yet more palpably and compassionately, towards his unfaithful and incorrigible spouse. Dr. Henderson affirms, on the other hand, that the phrase 'wife of whoredoms' has reference only to adulterous courses after marriage. He says, too, that the words, 'go take unto thee a wife,' are so plain and precise that they must refer to an actual event. Now, the reply is obvious, that prophetic figure or allegory is usually stated in diction implying reality, and that upon this verbal correspondence depend the truth and vividness of the description. In whatever way the transaction be taken, the lesson, at all events, is very apparent. The Israelites, who had been taken into nuptial covenant, very soon fell from their first love, and were characterized by insatiable spiritual wantonness: yet their Maker, their husband, did not at once divorce them, but exhibited a marvellous long-suffering toward them.

The names of the children being symbolical, the name of the mother has probably a similar signification. בְּתִרְבִּלִים may have the symbolic sense of 'one thoroughly abandoned to sensual delights'; נֹמֵר, completion (Ewald, Gram. 228);

בְּתִרְבִּלִים, 'daughter of grape-cakes,' the dual form being expressive of the mode in which these dainties were baked in double layers. The Greek form, παλάθη, is apparently a corruption of the Hebrew רְבֵלָה. The names of the children, יֶזְרַעֵל, יֶזְרַעֵל, לֹא רַחֲמָה, לֹא עַמִּי, Lo-ruhamah, Lo-ammi, are explained. It is generally supposed that the names refer to three successive generations of the Israelitish people. Hengstenberg, on the other hand, argues that 'wife and children both are the people of Israel: the three names must not be considered separately, but taken together.' But as the marriage is first mentioned, and the births of the children are detailed in order, some time elapsing between the events, we rather adhere to the ordinary exposition.

The first child, Jezreel, may refer to the first dynasty of Jeroboam I. and his successors, which terminated in the blood of Ahab's house which Jehu shed at Jezreel. The name suggests also the cruel and fraudulent possession of the vineyard of Naboth, 'which was in Jezreel,' where, also, Jerebel was slain so ignominiously (1 Kings xvi. 1; 2 Kings ix. 21). But as Jehu and his family had become as corrupt as their predecessors, the scenes of Jezreel were again to be enacted, and Jehu's race must perish. Jezreel, the spot referred to by the prophet, is also, according to Jerome, the place where the Assyrian army routed the Israelites. The name of this child associates the past and future, symbolizes past sins, intermediate punishments, and final overthrow. The name of the second child, Loruhamah, 'not-pitied,' the appellation of a degraded daughter, may refer to the feeble, effeminate period which followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel became weak and helpless, as well as sunk and abandoned. The favour of God was not exhibited to the nation: they were as abject as impious. But the reign of Jeroboam II. was prosperous; new energy was infused into the government, and gleams of its former prosperity shone upon it. This revival of strength in that generation may be typified by the birth of a third child, a son, Lo-ammi, 'not-my-people' (2 Kings xiv. 25). For prosperity did not bring with it a revival of piety; still, although their vigour was recruited, the structure of any dwelling was by no means required; much less were regular arrangement and the other requisites of a well-ordered dwelling matters of consideration. Under such circumstances as these, no improvement in the habitation takes place. The tents in which the Arabs now dwell are in all probability the same as those in which the Hebrew patriarchs spent their lives. It is not likely that what the Hebrews observed in Egypt, during their long sojourn in that country, had in this respect any direct influence upon their own subsequent practice in Palestine. The reasons for this have been given under ARCHITECTURE.

Nevertheless, the information which may be derived from the figures of houses and parts of houses in the Egyptian tombs, is not to be overlooked or slighted. We have in them the only representations of ancient houses in that part of the world which now exist; and however different may have been the state architecture of Egypt and Palestine, we have every reason to conclude that there was considerable resemblance in the private dwellings of these neighbouring countries. Such a resemblance now exists, and the causes which produce it equally existed in ancient times: and, which is more to the purpose, the representations to which we refer have almost the same amount of agreement and of difference with the present houses of Syria as with those of modern Egypt. On these and other grounds we shall not decline to avail ourselves of this interesting source of illustration; but before turning to its details, we shall give a general statement, which may render them more intelligible.

On entering Palestine, the Israelites occupied the dwellings of the dispossessed inhabitants; and for a long time no new buildings would be needed. The generation which began to build new houses must have been born and bred in the country, and would naturally erect buildings like those which already existed in the land. Their mode of building was, therefore, that of the Canaanites, whom they had dispossessed. Of their style of building we are not required to form any exalted notions. In all the history of the conquest of the country by the Israelites, there is no account of any large or conspicuous building being taken or destroyed by them. It would seem also as if there had been no temples; for we read not that any were destroyed by the conquerors; and the command that the monuments of idolatry should be overthrown, specifies only altars, groves, and high places—which seems to lead to the same conclusion; since, if there had been temples existing in the land of Canaan, they would doubtless have been included. It is also manifest from the history that the towns which the Hebrews found in Palestine were mostly small, and that the largest were distinguished rather by their number than by the size or magnificence of their buildings.

It is impossible to say to what extent Solomon's improvements in state architecture operated to the advancement of domestic architecture. He built different palaces, and it is reasonable to conclude that his nobles and great officers followed more or less the models which these palaces presented. In the East, however, the domestic architecture of the bulk of the people is little affected by the improvements in state buildings. Men go on building from age to age as their forefathers built; and in all probability the houses which we now see in Palestine are such as those in which the Jews, and the Canaanites before them, dwelt—the mosques, the Christian churches, and the monasteries, being the only new features in the scene.

There is no reason to suppose that many houses in Palestine were constructed with wood. A great part of that country was always very poor in timber, and the middle part of it had scarcely any wood at all. But of stone there was no want; and it was consequently much used in the building of houses. The law of Moses respecting leprosy in houses (Lev. xiv. 33-40) clearly proves this, as the characteristics there enumerated could only occur in the case of stone walls. Still, when the Hebrews intended to build a house in the most splendid style and in accordance with the taste of the age, as much wood as possible was used. Having premised this, the principal building materials mentioned in Scripture may be enumerated with reference to their place in the three kingdoms of nature.

I. VEGETABLE SUBSTANCES:—

1. Shittim, or the timber of the acacia tree, which grows abundantly in the valleys of Arabia Petraea, and was therefore employed in the construction of the tabernacle. Not being, however, a tree of Palestine, the wood was not subsequently used in building.

2. Shakemim; that is, the wood of the sycamore fig-tree, mentioned in Is. ix. 10 as a building timber in more common use than cedar, or perhaps than any other wood known in Palestine.

3. Eres, or cedar. As this was a wood imported from Lebanon, it would only be used in the higher class of buildings. For its quality as a building timber, and respecting the question of its being really what we call the cedar, see ERES.

4. Algum-wood, which, being imported from the Eastern seas, must have been valued at a high price. It was used by Solomon for pillars for his own palace, and for the Temple (1 Kings x. 11, 12).

5. Berosh, or cypress-wood. Boards of this were used for the floor of the Temple, which may suggest the use to which it was ordinarily applied (1 Kings vi. 15; 2 Chron. iii. 5).

Particular accounts of all these woods, and of the trees which afforded them, may be seen under the respective words.

II. MINERAL SUBSTANCES:—

1. Marble. We find the court of the king of Persia's palace covered with marble of various colours (Esth. i. 6). David is recorded to have possessed abundance of marble (1 Chron. xxx. [xxix.] 2; comp. Cant. v. 15), and it was used by Solomon for his palace, as well as for the Temple.

2. Porphry and Granite are supposed to be 'the glistering stones, and stones of divers colours,' named in 1 Chron. xxix. 2. If so, the mountains of Arabia Petraea furnished the nearest source of supply, as these stones do not exist in Palestine or Lebanon.

3. Bricks. Bricks hardened by fire were employed in the construction of the tower of Babel (Gen. xi. 3), and the hard bondage of the Israelites in Egypt consisted in the manufacture of sun-dried bricks (Exod. v. 7, 10-13). This important building-material has been noticed under another head [BRICKS]; and it only remains to remark that no subsequent notice of bricks as being used by the Hebrews occurs after they had entered Palestine. Yet, judging from existing analogies, it is more than probable that bricks were to a considerable extent employed in their buildings. From the expense and labour of quarrying and conveying stone, bricks are often extensively used in Eastern countries even where stone is abundant; and it is not unusual to see the foundations and lower parts of the house of stone, while the superstructure is of brick.

4. Chalk and Gypsum, which the Hebrews appear to have comprehended under the general name of שֵׁשׁ sid. That the Hebrews were acquainted with these materials appears from Deut. xxvii. 2: and from Dan. v. 5; Acts xxiii. 3, it further appears that walls were covered with them. A highly instructive and curious account of the plaster used in the East may be seen in tome iv. of Langley's edition of Chardin's Voyages.

5. Mortar, a cement made of lime, ashes, and chopped straw, or of gypsum and chopped straw. This is probably meant in Jer. xliii. 9; Ezek. xiii. 10-15.

6. Asphaltum, or Bitumen, which is mentioned as being used for a cement by the builders of Babel. This must have been in the want of lime-mortar, the country being a stoneless plain. But the Israelites, who had no lack of the usual cements, did not employ asphaltum [CHEMAR.]

7. The metals also must be, to a certain extent, regarded as building materials: lead, iron, and copper are mentioned; and even silver and gold were used in combination with wood, for various kinds of solid, plated, and inlaid work (Exod. xxxvi. 34, 36, 38).

III. ANIMAL SUBSTANCES:—

Such substances can be but in a small degree applicable to building. Ivory houses are mentioned in 1 Kings xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15; most likely from certain parts of the wood-work, probably about the doors and windows, being inlaid with this valuable substance. Solomon obtained ivory in great quantities from Tyre (1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21). [IVORY].

In describing the houses of ancient Palestine, there is no way of arriving at distinct notions but by taking the texts of Scripture and illustrating them by the existing houses of those parts of Western Asia which have been the least exposed to the changes of time, and in which the manners of ancient days have been the best preserved. Writers on the subject have seen this, and have brought together the descriptions of travellers bearing on the subject; but these descriptions have generally been applied with very little judgment, from the want of that distinct knowledge of the matter which only actual observation can give. Travellers have seldom been students of Scripture, and students of Scripture have seldom been travellers. The present writer, having resided for a considerable time in Turkish Arabia, where the type of Scriptural usages has been better preserved than in Egypt, or even in Palestine itself, is enabled to speak on this matter with somewhat more precision. Of four houses in which he there resided, two were first-rate, and two were second-rate. One of the latter has always seemed to him to suggest a more satisfactory idea of a Scriptural house than any of the others, or than any that he ever saw in other Eastern countries. That one has therefore formed the basis of all his ideas on this subject; and where it seemed to fail, the others have usually supplied the illustration he required. This course he has found so beneficial, that he will endeavour to impart a clear view of the subject to the reader by giving a general notion of the house referred to, explaining any points in which the others differed from it, and producing the passages of Scripture which seem to be illustrated in the process.

We may premise that the houses present little more than a dead wall to the street. The privacy of Oriental domestic habits would render our plan of throwing the front of the houses towards the street most repulsive. On coming to a house, one finds a lofty wall, which would be blank but for the low door of entrance [GATE]; over which is usually the kiosk, or latticed window (sometimes projecting like the huge bay windows of Elizabethan houses), or screened balcony of the 'summer parlour.' Besides this, there may be a small latticed window or two high up the wall, giving light and air to upper chambers. This seems, from the annexed engraving (No. 269), to have been the character of the fronts of ancient Egyptian houses.

The buildings which form the house front towards an inner square or court. Small houses have one of these courts, but superior houses have two, and first-rate houses three, communicating with each other; for the Orientals dislike ascending stairs or steps, and prefer to gain room rather by the extent than height of their habitations. It is only when the building-ground is confined by nature or by fortifications, that they build high houses. None of our four houses had more than one story; but, from the loftiness of the rooms, they were as high as houses of three stories among ourselves. If there are three or more courts, all except the outer one are much alike in size and appearance; but the outer one, being devoted to the more public life of the occupant, and to his intercourse with society, is materially different from all the others. If there are more than two, the second is devoted chiefly to the use of the master, who is there attended only by his eunuchs, children, and females, and sees only such persons as he calls from the third or interior court in which they reside. In the history of Esther, she incurs danger by going from her interior court to that of the king, to invite him to visit her part of the palace; but she would not on any account have gone to the outermost court, in which the king held his public audiences. When there are only two courts, the innermost is the harem, in which the women and children live, and which is the true domicile of the master, to which he withdraws when the claims of business, of society, and of friends have been satisfied, and where no man but himself ever enters, or could be induced to enter, even by strong persuasions.

Entering at the street-door, a passage, usually sloping downward, conducts to the outer court; the opening from the passage to this is not opposite the gate of entrance, but by a side turn, to preclude any view from the street into the court when the gate is opened. On entering the outer court through this passage, we find opposite to us the public room, in which the master receives and gives audience to his friends and clients. This is entirely open in front, and being richly fitted up, has a splendid appearance when the first view of it is obtained. A refreshing coolness is sometimes given to this apartment by a fountain throwing up a jet of water in front of it. Some idea of the apartment may be formed from the annexed cut (No. 270).

This is the 'guest-chamber' of Luke xxii. 11. A large portion of the other side of the court is occupied with a frontage of lattice-work filled with coloured glass, belonging to a room as large as the guest-chamber, and which in winter is used for the same purpose, or serves as the apartment of any visitor of distinction, who cannot of course be admitted into the interior parts of the house. The other apartments in this outer court are comparatively small, and are used for the accommodation of visitors, retainers, and servants. These various apartments are usually upon what we should call the first floor, or at least upon an elevated terrace.

The ground floor is in that case occupied by various store-rooms and servants' offices. In all cases the upper floor, containing the principal rooms, is fronted by a gallery or terrace, protected from the sun by a sort of penthouse roof supported by pillars of wood.

In houses having but one court, the reception-room is on the ground floor, and the domestic establishment in the upper part of the house. This arrangement is shown in the annexed engraving (No. 271), which is also interesting from its shewing the use of the 'pillars' so often mentioned in Scripture, particularly 'the pillars on which the house stood, and by which it was borne up' (Judg. xvi. 29). Some other of the cuts which we introduce will exhibit pillars of similar importance to the support of the house.

The kiosk, which has been mentioned above as fronting the street, over the gateway, is connected with one of the larger rooms already described, or forms a separate apartment, which is the summer parlour of Scripture. Here, in the heat of the afternoon, the master lounges or doses listlessly, refreshed by the air which circulates between the openings of the lattice-work; and here he can, if he pleases, notice unobserved what passes in the street. In this we are to seek the summer parlour in which Ehud smote the king of Moab (Judg. iii. 20), and the 'chamber on the wall,' which the Shunamite prepared for the prophet (2 Kings iv. 10). The projecting construction over the reception chamber in No. 271 is, like the kiosk, towards the street of a summer parlour; but there it belongs to the women's apartments, and looks into the court and not the street.

It is now time to proceed to the inner court, which we enter by a passage and door similar to those by which we entered from the street. This passage and door are usually at one of the inner-most corners of the outer court. Here a much more extended prospect opens to us, the inner court being generally much larger than the former. The annexed cut (No. 272) will convey some notion of it ; but being a Persian house, it somewhat differs from that which we have more particularly in view. It is lower, the principal apartments standing upon a terrace or bank of earth, and not upon a basement story of offices ; and it also wants the veranda or covered gallery in front, which we find in Syro-Arabian houses. The court is for the most part paved, excepting a portion in the middle, which is planted with trees (usually two) and shrubs, with a basin of water in the midst. In our Arabian house the two trees were palm-trees, in which a number of wild doves built their nests. In the second cut (No. 269), shewing an ancient Egyptian house, we see the same arrangement ; two palm-trees growing in the court extend their tops above, and, as it were, out of the house—a curious effect frequently noticed in the towns of south-western Asia. That the Jews had the like arrangement of trees in the courts of their houses, and that the birds nested in them, appears from Ps. lxxxiv. 2, 3 ; comp. Mic. iv. 4 ; Zech. iii. 10, etc. They had also the basin of water in the inner court, or harem ; and among them it was used for bathing, as is shewn by David's discovering Bathsheba bathing as he walked on the roof of his palace. The use of the reservoir has now been superseded by the establishment of public warm baths in every town and in private mansions. Cold bathing has all but ceased in western Asia.

The arrangement of the inner court is very similar to that of the outer ; but the whole is more open and airy. The buildings usually occupy two sides of the square, of which the one opposite the entrance contains the principal apartments. They are upon what we should call the first floor, and open into a wide gallery or verandah, which in good houses is nine or ten feet deep, and covered by a wooden penthouse supported by a row of wooden columns. This terrace, or gallery, is furnished with a strong wooden balustrade, and is usually paved with squared stones, or else floored with boards. In the centre of the principal front is the usual open drawing-room, on which the best art of the Eastern decorator is expended (No. 273). Much of one of the sides of the court front is usu-

lattice-front covered with coloured glass, similar to

that in the outer court. The other rooms of smaller size, are the more private apartments of the mansion. The interior of one of these is shewn in the previous cut (No. 274). There are usually no doors to the sitting or drawing-rooms of Eastern houses: they are closed by curtains, at least in summer, the opening and shutting of doors being odious to most Orientals. The same seems to have been the case among the Hebrews, as far as we may judge from the curtains which served instead of doors to the tabernacle, and which separated the inner and outer chambers of the temple. The curtained entrances to our Westminster courts of law supply a familiar example of the same practice.

Some ideas respecting the arrangements and architecture of the interior parts of the dwelling may be formed from the annexed cut (No. 275), although the house in this case, being modern Egyptian, differs in some points of arrangement from those on which our description is chiefly based.

These observations apply to the principal story. The basement is occupied by various offices, stores of corn and fuel, places for the water-jars to stand in, places for grinding corn, baths, kitchens, etc. The kitchens are always in this inner court, as the cooking is performed by women, and the ladies of the family superintend or actually assist in the process. The kitchen, open in front, is on the same side as the entrance from the outer court; and the top of it forms a terrace, which affords a communication between the first floor of both courts by a private door, seldom used but by the master of the house and attendant eunuchs.

The kitchen, of which the annexed cut (No. 276) is the only existing representation, is surrounded by a brick terrace, on the top of which are the fireplaces formed in compartments, and separated by little walls of fire-brick or tile. In these different compartments the various dishes of an Eastern feast may be at once prepared at charcoal fires. This place being wholly open in front, the half-tame doves, which have their nests in the trees of the court, often visit it, in the absence of the servants, in search of crumbs, etc. As they sometimes blacken themselves, this perhaps explains the obscure passage in Ps. lxxviii. 13, 'Though ye have lien among the pots, ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver,' etc. In Turkish Arabia most of the houses have underground cellars or vaults, to which the inhabitants retreat

during the mid-day heat of summer, and there enjoy a refreshing coolness. We do not discover any notice of this usage in Scripture. But at Acre the substructions of very ancient houses were some years ago discovered, having such cellars, which were very probably subservient to this use. In the rest of the year these cellars, or serdaubs, as they are called, are abandoned to the bats, which swarm in them in scarcely credible numbers (Is. ii. 20).

From the court a flight of stone steps, usually at the corner, conducts to the gallery, from which a plainer stair leads to the house-top. If the house be large, there are two or three sets of steps to the different sides of the quadrangle, but seldom more than one flight from the terrace to the house-top, of any one court. There is, however, a separate stair from the outer court to the roof, and it is usually near the entrance. This will bring to mind the case of the paralytic, whose friends, finding they could not get access to Jesus through the people who crowded the court of the house in which he was preaching, took him up to the roof, and let him down in his bed through the tiling, to the place where Jesus stood (Luke v. 17-26). If the house in which our Lord then was had more than one court, he and the auditors were certainly in the outer one; and it is reasonable to conclude that he stood in the veranda addressing the crowd below. The men bearing the paralytic therefore, perhaps went up the steps near the door; and finding they could not even then get near the person of Jesus, the gallery being also crowded, continued their course to the roof of the house, and removing the boards over the covering of the gallery, at the place where Jesus stood, lowered the sick man to his feet. But if they could not get access to the steps near the door, as is likely, from the door being much crowded, their alternative was to take him to the roof of the next house, and there hoist him over the parapet to the roof of the house which they desired to enter.

The roof of the house is, of course, flat. It is formed by layers of branches, twigs, matting, and earth, laid over the rafters and trodden down; after which it is covered with a compost which acquires considerable hardness when dry. Such roofs would not, however, endure the heavy and continuous rains of our climate; and in those parts of Asia where the climate is more than usually moist, a stone roller is usually kept on every roof, and after a shower a great part of the population is engaged in drawing these rollers over the roofs. It is now very common, in countries where timber is scarce, to have domed roofs; but in that case, the flat roof, which is indispensable to Eastern habits, is obtained by filling up the hollow intervals between the several domes, so as to form a flat surface at the top. These flat roofs are often alluded to in Scripture; and the allusions shew that they were made to serve the same uses as at present. In fine weather the inhabitants resorted much to them to breathe the fresh air, to enjoy a fine prospect, or to witness any event that occurred in the neighbourhood (2 Sam. xi. 2; Is. xxii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 17; Mark xiii. 15). The dryness of the summer atmosphere enabled them, without injury to health, to enjoy the bracing coolness of the night-air by sleeping on the house-tops; and in order to have the benefit of the air and prospect in the daytime, without inconvenience from the sun, sheds, booths, and tents, were sometimes erected on the house-tops (2 Sam. xvi. 22).

The roofs of the houses are well protected by walls and parapets. Towards the street and neighbouring houses is a high wall, and towards the interior court-yard usually a parapet or wooden rail. 'Battlements' of this kind, for the prevention of accidents, are strictly enjoined in the Law (Deut. xxii. 8); and the form of the battlements of the Egyptian houses, as shewn in the annexed engravings, suggest some interesting analogies, when we consider how recently the Israelites had quitted Egypt when that law was delivered. These cuts, with the one before given (No. 269), are highly interesting, not only with reference to this particular point, but as elevations of different styles of houses existing in a neighbouring country in the early ages of the Hebrew history. One of them (Nos. 277, 278) exhibits different forms of a peculiarity which we have not observed in any modern example. The top of the house is covered with a roof or awning, supported by columns, whereby the sun was excluded, and a refreshing stream of air passed through. Other Egyptian houses had merely a parapet wall, sometimes surmounted with a row of battlements, as in the cut here given (No. 279).

Of the inferior kinds of Oriental dwellings, such as are met with in villages and very small towns, the subjoined is not an unfavourable specimen. In these there is no central court, but there is generally a yard attached, either on one side or at the rear. The shaded platform in front is such as is usually seen attached to coffee-houses, which is, in fact, the character of the house represented in No. 279. Here the customers sit and smoke their pipes, and

sip their coffee. The village cabins and abodes of the peasantry are, of course, of a still inferior description; and, being the abodes of people who live much in the open air, will not bear comparison with the houses of the same class in Northern Europe, where the cottage is the home of the owner.

No ancient houses had chimneys. The word so translated in Hos. xiii. 3, means a hole through which the smoke escaped; and this existed only in the lower class of dwellings, where raw wood was employed for fuel or cooking, and where there was an opening immediately over the hearth to let out the smoke. In the better sort of houses the rooms were warmed in winter by charcoal in braziers, as is still the practice (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Mark xiv. 54; John xviii. 18).

The windows had no glass. They were only latticed, and thus gave free passage to the air and admitted light, while birds and bats were excluded. In winter the cold air was kept out by veils over the windows (see cut 274), or by shutters with holes in them sufficient to admit light (1 Kings vii. 17; Cant. ii. 9).

In the East, where the climate allows the people to spend so much of their time out of doors, the articles of furniture and the domestic utensils have always been few and simple. They are in this work noticed under separate heads [BED; LAMPS; POTTERY; SEATS; TABLES]. The rooms, however, although comparatively vacant of movables, are far from having a naked or unfurnished appearance. This is owing to the high ornament given to the walls and ceilings. The walls are broken up into various recesses, and the ceiling into compartments. The ceiling, if of wood and flat, is of curious and complicated joinery; or, if vaulted, is wrought into numerous coves, and enriched with fret-work in stucco; and the walls are adorned with arabesques, mosaics, mirrors, painting, and gold; which, as set off by the marble-like whiteness of the stucco, has a truly brilliant and rich effect. There is much in this to remind one of such descriptions of splendid interiors as that in Is. liv. 11, 12.—J. K.

HUET, PETER DANIEL, bishop of Avranches, belonged to a family of rank, and was born at Caen in Normandy, Feb. 8, 1630. His parents were originally protestants, but became converts to popery before the birth of their son, who was left an orphan when scarcely six years old. His education began in the Jesuit's College, belonging to his native place, and for eight years he pursued his studies there with an insatiable, illimitable voracity for knowledge that was the ruling passion of a life, extended almost to a century. He cultivated the acquaintance of the most eminent contemporary scholars; one of these was his fellow-townsmen Samuel Bochart [BOCHART], whose work on sacred geography was published when Huet was in his sixteenth year, and excited his taste for Biblical studies. He accompanied Bochart in his visit to Sweden, undertaken at the express desire of Queen Christina. At Stockholm he met in the Royal Library with a manuscript of Origen's commentary on Matthew and his treatise on Prayer, which suggested to him the publication of the works of that Father, a task he partially accomplished fifteen years afterwards. In 1670 he was appointed tutor of the Dauphin in conjunction with Bossuet, and at the request of the Duke of Montausier superintended the edition of Latin authors so well known under the title of the Delphin classics. In his forty-sixth year he took orders, and was made Abbot of Aulnar; in the same year, 1685, he was nominated to the see of Soissons, which, seven years after, he exchanged for that of Avranches. In 1699, owing to the state of his health, he resigned his bishopric, and received in lieu of it the abbacy of Fontenai, two miles from Caen. He died January 26, 1721, within eleven days of the completion of his ninety-first year. Only three years before his death he wrote and published an interesting but much too brief autobiography, entitled, P. D. Huetii Commentarii de rebus ad eum pertinentibus, libri sex, Hagæ 1718. After his connection with the Court as preceptor to the Dauphin had ceased, he renewed his application to the Hebrew language, to which he added the Syriac and Arabic. For the space of thirty-one years, from 1681 to 1712, he suffered no day to pass without devoting two or three hours to Oriental literature, and during that period read through the original text of the O. T. twenty-four times. His literary sympathies were too intense to be confined within the pale of his own communion, and besides Protestant scholars on the continent, he was on terms of friendship with several of our eminent countrymen, such as Gall, Bernard, and Bishop Pearson. Of his various works the following belong to Biblical literature: 1. Origenis in sacras scripturas quacunq[ue] Græce reperiri potuerunt, etc., 2 vols. fol., Rothomagi (Rouen) 1688; 2. Traité de la situation du Paradis terrestre, à Messieurs de l'Académie Française, 1691; 3. De navigationibus Salomonis, 1698; this was published at Amsterdam, with a Latin translation of the essay on Paradise, and both were inserted in the eighth volume of the Critici Sacri; 4. Demonstratio Evangelica, fol., 1679. This work, which is the great monument of his literary reputation, was the result of various conversations with the eminent Rabbi Manasseh Ben Israel at Amsterdam. It begins with a set of definitions on the genuineness of books, history, prophecy, true religion, the Messiah, and the Christian religion. Then follow two postulates, and four axioms. Ten propositions occupy the rest of the book, and in the discussion of these the Demonstration consists. A second edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1680, with additions by the author, 2 vols. 8vo. A few minor pieces on Biblical subjects are contained in two volumes, edited by the Abbé Tilladet, Dissertations sur diverses Matières de Religion, et de Philologie, etc., Paris 1712. A translation of Huet's autobiography was published in 1810 by Dr. Aikin under the title of Memoirs of the life of Peter Daniel Huet, bishop of Avranches, written by himself, and translated from the original Latin, with copious notes, biographical and critical, by John Aikin, M.D., 2 vols. 8vo.—J. HUFNAGEL, WILHELM FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, was born at Hall, in Swabia, 15th June 1754. Having studied at the Universities of Altorf and Erlangen, he became professor extraordinary of philosophy at the latter place in 1779; and in 1782 ordinary professor of theology. In 1788 he received the pastorate of the Academi- cal Church, and was also appointed overseer of the Seminary for Preachers. In 1791 he was called to Frankfurt-on-the-Main to fill the place of coun- sellor of the Consistory and preacher in one of the old churches there. He died 7th February 1830. Hufnagel was a learned, liberal, acute theologian, versed in the Semitic languages and all branches of theology. Most of his writings are sermons, or bear upon the conduct of life. We can only men- tion here Variarum lectionum et Bibliis a Nisselio curatis excerptarum specimen, 1777; Salomos hohes Lied gepriift, uebersetzt, und erlaeutert, 1784; Biblio- theca nova theologica, vol. i., 1782-83; Bearbeitung der Schriften des alten Testaments nach ihrem Inhalt und Zweck für Leser aus allen Ständen, 1784; Hiob neu uebersetzt mit Anmerkungen, 1781; Dis- sertatio de psalmis prophetias Messian. continentibus, in 2 parts, 1783. Though of great repute in his day, Hufnagel is almost forgotten at the present time. None of his printed works had the element of permanence or immortality.—S. D.

HUG, JOHN LEONHARD, a learned Catholic theologian, was born at Constance, 1st June 1765, and educated at the Gymnasium and Lyceum of his native place; afterwards at the University of Freiburg. In 1789 he became a priest; and in 1791 he was appointed professor of theology at Frei- burg, where he remained till his death, 11th March 1846. He is the author of an Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Testaments, 1808, 2 vols., 1847, 4th edit., a work of great ability, learning, and acuteness, in which there are some liberal senti- ments, but more that are adverse to the recent results of criticism. It was translated both into French and English. He is also the author of Die Erfindung der Buchstabenschrift, 1801; Unter- suchungen ueber den Mythos der berühmtesten Völker der alten Welt, 1812; Ueber die ägyptischen Tafeln, 1835; Gelächten ueber das Leben Jesu von D. F. Strauss, 1840-1844, 2 vols. Hug contributed to the criticism of the N. T. especially in the depart- ment of ancient versions, which is his strongest side. In the region of MSS. he was less successful, though always suggestive and ingenious.—S. D.

HUGO, A. S. VICTORE, was born at Ypres in 1097, and educated in the monastery of Hammersle- ben. In 1115 he went to Paris with his uncle Hugo, archdeacon of Halberstadt, where they both entered the monastery of St. Victor. Here he succeeded the Prior Thomas as head of the school, and here he laboured with great success during the remain- ing period of a secluded but useful life. He died in 1141. His writings procured him the name of Lingua Augustini, or alter Augustinus. The aim of the illustrious school of theology to which he belonged, and of which he, with his scholar Richard and his contemporary Adam, of St. Victor, were the greatest men, was 'to unite and harmoniously to reconcile the scholastic and mystic tendencies, the light and warmth, which had ap- peared more in opposition in Abelard and Bernard . . . nor would it be easy to exaggerate the in- fluence for good which went forth from this institu- tion during the 12th and 13th centuries upon the whole church' (Trench, Sacred Lat. Poetry, p. 54).

The first volume of his works (3 vols. fol., 1526, s. l.) consists of notes on Scripture, and in the third is his Eruditio Didascalica. The latter gained him the title of Didascalus, and is intended especially as an introduction to the Scriptures. He gave precedence to the historical sense, but ad- mits, as was usual in his time, the allegorical and tropological. Peter Lombard was his greatest scholar (Maurice, Medieval Philosophy, 144-148; Schneider in Herzog's Encykl.; Liebner, Hugo von St. Victor).—F. W. F.

HUGO DE SANCTO CARO, sometimes called also H. DE S. THEODORICO, was born at St. Cher, near to Vienne in Dauphiny, towards the close of the 12th century. He studied in the uni- versity of Paris, where he subsequently held one of the chairs of theology. In 1225 he was received into the order of the Dominicans, and in 1227 was appointed Provincial of this order in France. He was made Cardinal by Innocent IV. in 1244. He died at Orvieto, March 19, 1263, and was buried at Lyons. At the request of the Chapter-General of the Dominicans, he undertook the compilation of a Correctorium, or a correction of the text of the Vulgate. The title of a copy of this work, preserved in the Library of Nuremberg, is Liber de correctionibus novis super biblia, ad sciendum qua sit verior et communior litera, Reverendissimi patris et domini D. Hugonis, sacre Rom. eccl. presbyteri cardinalis, sacre theologiae professoris et de ordine predicatorum. The authorities used by Hugo were the exegetical writings of Jerome, Augustine, Rhabanus Maurus, and Bede. He states also in the preface that they are drawn partly ex libris Hebræorum et antiquissimis exemplaribus, quæ etiam ante tempora Caroli Magna inscripta fuerant. It is, however, doubtful whether he were ac- quainted with either Greek or Hebrew, as his various references to Greek versions and the He- brew text are derived from Jerome. This work was the original of which several other correctoria were enlarged and revised editions. Roger Bacon strongly expresses his disapproval of it, and terms it 'pessima corruptio,' and says of it 'destruitur tex- tus Dei' (Hody, De Bibl. Textibus, p. 429). Hugo was also the author of a work entitled Sancorum Bibliorum Concordantie, or, as it is sometimes called, Concordantie S. Jacobi, from the Monastery of St. James, in Paris, wherein Hugo long resided. It is the earliest Scriptural Concordance, under- standing by this term an alphabetical index to the words of Scripture. The earlier work by Antony of Padua [CONCORDANCE] is rather an index of subjects. On this account Hugo is sometimes styled Pater Concordantiarum. In its earliest form the references only were given, but in a subsequent edition made three English Dominicans resident in Paris, John of Darlington, Richard of Stavensby, and Hugh of Croydon, the various passages were given in full. Both these forms of the work are called Conc. S. Jacobi, although the latter is some- times distinguished as Conc. Anglicana. In addi- tion to these works Hugo was the author of a commentary on the entire Scriptures, entitled Pos- tilla in universa Biblia juxta quadruplicem sen- sum, literalem, allegoricum, morale, anagogicum, written on the principle of discovering a fourfold sense in every passage. It has been frequently published, the principal editions being Venet. et Basil 1487, 6 vol. fol., Basil 1498, 1504; Paris 1508, 1538; Venet. 1600; Colon. Agripp. 1621; Lugd. 1645, 1669. Two other Biblical works by Hugo exist in MS. in the library of Paris: Sci- mones super epistolas et evangelia, de tempore, Processus in librum Evangelii aterni.—S. N.

HUKKOK (חֻקֹּק; Sept. Ἰκούκ and Ἰακὰνδ). 1.

A city on the southern border of Naphtali, near Aznoth-Tabor (Josh. xix. 34). Eusebius and Jerome place it on the borders of Naphtali and Asher. Robinson and Van de Velde identify it with Yakûk, a small village situated some five miles west of the site of Capernaum, between Wady Kefr 'Anân and Wady Selameh (Bib. Res., iii. 81; Memoir, 322). This is probably correct.

2. Another Hukkôk (חֻקֹּק; Alex. Ἰακὰκ) is mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 75 (60), as allotted out of the tribe of Asher to the Gershonites. There is a difficulty in this passage, because the parallel in Josh. xxi. 31 has Helkath instead of Hukkôk. The probability is that the two names were given to the same place, a thing not unusual in Syria at the present day (see Keil, ad loc.) There is no ground for identifying this Hukkôk with the preceding.

J. L. P.

HUL (חֹל; Sept. Οὐλ), a name which occurs among the generations of the sons of Noah, and is the name of the second of the sons of Aram, the son of Shem (Gen. x. 23). The district of country possessed by his descendants is believed to have been a large flat district in the north of Palestine, known to this day as the land of Hûleh. The river Jordan runs through part of it. The lake Hûleh, anciently Merom, is situate in the same district (see Dr. Robinson's Researches, iii. 339-357).—W. J. C.

HULDAH (חֻלְדָּה; Sept. Ὀλδα; Vulg. Olda), a prophetess who lived in the time of Josiah. She was the wife of Shallum, the keeper of the (probably royal) wardrobe, and dwelt at Jerusalem, in what may be described as the lower or inferior part of the city (חֻלְדָּה, rendered by Gesenius, The.

1451, pars urbis secundaria or suburb; in the A. V. it is improperly translated 'college'), the part probably which Josephus designates the other city, ἡ ἄλλη πόλις (Antiq. xv. 11. 5), and the lower city, ἡ κάτω πόλις (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1). It was to this prophetess that Josiah sent a deputation consisting of the high-priest and other distinguished persons of his court, to inquire the Divine will, if by any means he might avert the punishment to which, as he had learnt from the book of the law read to him by Shaphan the scribe, the nation was exposed because of its transgressions (2 Kings xxii. 14-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22-28; Joseph. Antiq. x. 4. 2). This circumstance shews the high reputation in which Huldah was then held, and especially as Jeremiah had already, five years before, begun to deliver his prophecies (Jer. i. 2).—S. N.

HUMTAH (חֻמְטָה; Sept. Εὐμά; Alex. Χαμμάτ), a town of Judah in the hill country mentioned between Apeka and Hebron (Josh. xv. 54). Eusebius and Jerome simply mention it under the name Ἀμαρά or Ammata, as in the tribe of Judah. It has not been identified.—W. L. A.

HUNT, THOMAS, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S., was born in 1696, and educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He was first elected to be Regius professor of Hebrew, next Laudian professor of Arabic, and canon of Christ Church in 1747. He died 1774. He is noticed here for his work entitled Observations on several Passages in the Book of Proverbs, with two Sermons, Oxford 1775, 4to. This work, part of which only was printed before his death, and the rest edited by Dr. Kennicott, embraces, in the observations it contains, some twenty-six passages of the Book of Proverbs. Most of the observations are valuable, and discover the extensive and equally sound learning of their author. His proposed emendations of the translation are generally important, and throw much light on some of the more difficult passages of the book. Dr. Hunt was the author also of two Latin dissertations, the first entitled De Antiquitate elegantia et utilitate linguae Arabicae Oratio, 4to, Oxon. 1739; the other, De usu dialectorum Orientalium, 4to, Oxon. 1748. Both are treatises of some importance, especially the latter, as showing the use of the Oriental dialects, and in particular the Arabic, in the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. Some, however, are of opinion that Dr. Hunt's ideas on this subject are carried sufficiently far (Orme's Biblioth. Bib.)—W. J. C.

HUNTING. The pursuit and capture of beasts of the field was the first means of sustenance which the human race had recourse to, this mode of gaining a livelihood having naturally preceded the engagements of agriculture, as it presented food already provided, requiring only to be taken and slaughtered; whereas tillage must have been an afterthought, and a later resource, since it implies accumulated knowledge, skill, and such provision beforehand of subsistence as would enable a clan or a family to wait till the fruits of the earth were matured. Hunting was, therefore, a business long ere it was a sport. And originally, before man had established his empire on the earth, it must have been not only a serious but a dangerous pursuit. In process of time, however, when civilization had made some progress, when cities were built and lands cultivated, hunting was carried on not so much for the food which it brought as for the recreation it gave and its conduciveness to health.

The East—the cradle of civilization—presents us with hunting in both the characters now spoken of, originally as a means of support, then as a manly amusement. In the early records of history we find hunting held in high repute, partly, no doubt, from its costliness, its dangers, its similitude to war, its capability of combining the energies of many, and also from the relief which it afforded to the stagnant monotony of a court, in the high and bounding spirits that it called forth. Hunting has always borne somewhat of a regal character, and down to the present hour has worn an aristocratic air. In Babylon and Persia this attribute is presented in bold relief. Immense parks (παράδεισοι) were enclosed for nurturing and preserving beasts of the chase. The monarch himself led the way to the sport, not only in these preserves, but also over the wide surface of the country, being attended by his nobles, especially by the younger aspirants to fame and warlike renown (Xen., Cyr. viii. 1. 38).

In the Bible—our chief storehouse of primitive history and customs—we find hunting connected with royalty so early as in Gen. x. The great founder of Babel was in general repute as 'a mighty hunter before the Lord.' The patriarchs, however, are to be regarded rather as herdsmen than hunters, if respect is had to their habitual mode of life. The condition of the herdsman ensues next to that of the hunter in the early stages of civilization; and so we find that even Cain was a keeper of sheep. This and the fact that Abel is designated 'a tiller of the ground,' would seem to indicate a very rapid progress in the arts and pursuits of social life. The same contrast and similar hostility we find somewhat later, in the case of Jacob and Esau; the first, 'a plain man dwelling in tents;' the second, 'a cunning hunter, a man of the field' (Gen. xxv. 27). The account given of Esau in connection with his father seems to show that hunting was, conjointly with tillage, pursued at that time as a means of subsistence, and that hunting had not then passed into its secondary state, and become an amusement.

In Egypt the children of Israel would be spectators of hunting carried on extensively and pursued in different manners, but chiefly, as appears probable, with a view rather to recreation than subsistence (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt., vol. iii.) That the land of promise into which the Hebrews were conducted on leaving Egypt was plentifully supplied with beasts of the chase, appears clear from Exod. xxiii. 29, 'I will not drive them out in one year, lest the land become desolate and the beast of the field multiply against thee' (comp. Deut. vii. 22). And from the regulation given in Lev. xvii. 15, it is manifest that hunting was practised after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food. Prov. xii. 27 proves that hunting animals for their flesh was an established custom among the Hebrews, though the turn of the passage may serve to show that at the time it was penned sport was the chief aim. If hunting was not forbidden in the 'year of rest,' special provision was made that not only the cattle, but 'the beast of the field' should be allowed to enjoy and flourish on the uncropped spontaneous produce of the land (Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 7). Harmer (iv. 357) says, 'there are various sorts of creatures in the Holy Land proper for hunting; wild boars, antelopes, hares, etc., are in considerable numbers there, and one of the Christian kings of Jerusalem lost his life (Gesta Dei, p. 887) in pursuing a hare.' That the lion and other ravenous beasts of prey were not wanting in Palestine, many passages of the Bible make obvious (1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Kings xiii. 24; Harris, Natural History of the Bible; Kitto's Pictorial Palestine). The lion was even made use of to catch other animals (Ezek. xix. 3), and Harmer long ago remarked that as in the vicinity of Gaza, so also in Judæa, leopards were trained and used for the same purpose (Harmer, iv. 358; Hab. i. 8). That lions were taken by pitfalls as well as by nets appears from Ezek. xix. 4, 8 (Shaw, p. 172). In the latter verse the words of the prophet, 'and spread their net over him,' allude to the custom of enclosing a wide extent of country with nets, into which the animals were driven by hunters (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., iii. 4). The spots thus enclosed were usually in a hilly country and in the vicinity of water brooks; whence the propriety and force of the language of Ps. xlii. 1, 'As the (hunted) hart panteth after the water brooks.' These places were selected because they were those to which the animals were in the habit of repairing in the morning and evening. Scenes like the one now supposed are found portrayed in the Egyptian paintings (Wilkinson). Hounds were used for hunting in Egypt, and, if the passage in Josephus (Antiq. iv. 8. 9) may be considered decisive, in Palestine as well. From Gen. xxvii. 3, 'Now take thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow,' we learn what arms were employed at least in capturing game. Bulls, after being taken, were kept at least for a time in a net (Is. li. 20). Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (Ps. xci. 3; Amos iii. 5; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20). That hunting continued to be followed till towards the end of the Jewish state appears from Josephus (De Bell. Jud. i. 21. 13) [FOWLING; FISHING].—J. R. B.

HUPPIM (חֻפִּים; Sept. Cod. Alex. Ὀφύμιν, Gen. xli. 21; Ἀφύμιν, Alex. Ἀφύμιν, 1 Chron. vii. 12), the head of one of the Benjamite families. In Num. xxvi. 39 he is called HUPHAM (חֻפָּם), and his clan the Huphamites. [BECHER.]—†

HUR (חֹר). 1. (LXX. Ὁρ; Joseph. Ὀρῶν) A man whose name upon two important occasions is associated with those of Moses and Aaron in such a way as to forcibly suggest that he was probably related to them either by birth or marriage. When, during the engagement of Joshua with the Amalekites, Moses stood on the hill with the rod of God in his hand, it was Aaron and Hur who accompanied him, and 'stayed up his hands' (Exod. xvii. 10-12), and again when Moses went up into Mount Sinai, it was to Aaron and Hur that he entrusted the chief authority during his absence (Exod. xxiv. 14). According to Jewish tradition, as preserved by Josephus, he was the husband of Miriam (Antiq. iii. 2. 4), and also identical with 3 (Antiq. iii. 6. 1).

2. (LXX. Ὁρ; Joseph. Ὀρῶν) One of the princes or petty kings of Midian (מְלִכֵי מִדְיָן), who, along with four other Midianite chieftains, was defeated and slain, shortly before the death of Moses, by the Israelites, under the leadership of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar (Num. xxxi. 8; Joseph. Antiq. iv. 7. 1). In Josh. xiii. 21 these five Midianites are termed נְסִיכֵי סִיחֹן, 'the princes or vassals of Sihon,' and are also described as יֹשְׁבֵי הָאָרֶץ, 'dwellers in the land,' which Keil explains as meaning that they had for a long time dwelt in the land of Canaan with the Moabites, whereas the Amorites had only recently effected an entrance. After the defeat of Sihon, these chieftains appear to have made common cause with Balak the king of Moab (Num. xxii. 4, 7), and to have joined with him in urging Balaam to curse the Israelites. The evil counsel of Balaam having been followed, and the Israelites in consequence seduced into transgression (Num. xxxi. 16), Moses was directed to make war upon the Midianites. The latter were utterly defeated, and 'Balaam also, the son of Beor, they slew with the sword.'

3. (LXX. Ὁρ) The grandfather of Bezaleel, the architect of the tabernacle (Exod. xxxi. 2; xxxv. 30; xxxviii. 22). He was the son of Caleb (or Chelubai), the son of Hezron, the grandson of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 19, 20, cf. 9; iv. 1). His mother's name was Ephrath or Ephrathah, and he was her first-born son (1 Chron. ii. 50). His descendants occupied the towns of Bethlehem, Kirjath-jearim, and Bethgader (1 Chron. ii. 50, 51).

4. The 'son of Hur' is mentioned (1 Kings iv. 8) as one of the twelve officers appointed by Solomon to superintend the supply of provisions for the royal household. Mount Ephraim was the district assigned to him. The Vulgate has Benhur, regarding the two words as forming a compound proper name, and not as a patronymic. The LXX. is ambiguous, reading Βεὴρ υἱὸς Ὁρ. Josephus gives Ὀδρῆς as the name of the officer, Antiq. viii. 2. 3.

5. (LXX. Σοφρ) The father of Rephaiah, one of the builders of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 9).—S. N.

HURAM (הֲרָמ; Sept. Οὐράμ; Alex. Ἰωῤῥα).

1. A Benjamite first-born of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 5). 2. [HIRAM].

HURD, RICHARD, D.D., who was born at Congreve in Staffordshire, in 1720, rose from a comparatively humble rank in life, his parents being (to use his own words) 'plain, honest, and good people, farmers, but of a turn of mind that might have honoured any rank.' They were wise enough to give their son a good education, first at Brewood Grammar School, and eventually at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which society he was elected fellow in 1742. The result of this education was honourable to Hurd, who became one of the most elegant classical scholars of his time. The first public proof of this accomplishment he gave in the year 1749, when he published his Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica; this publication introduced him to Bishop Warburton, on whose recommendation Sherlock, Bishop of London, appointed Hurd, Whitehall preacher, in 1750. Among other results of the sincere friendship which long existed between Warburton and Hurd was the promotion of the latter by his friend to the archdeaconry of Gloucester in 1767. The next year he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was appointed to open the lecture founded by Warburton for the illustration of the prophetic Scriptures; his twelve discourses he published in 1772, under the title of 'An Introduction to the study of the Prophecies concerning the Christian Church, and in particular concerning the church of Papal Rome.' This was the first of the Warburtonian Lectures. Notwithstanding the polemical cast of some of these sermons, the clear exposition of the general principles of prophecy and of the claims which this portion of the sacred Scriptures has on the serious and unprejudiced attention of thoughtful readers, conveyed in perspicuous and even elegant language, has secured a large amount of popularity for the work even up to recent times. The last edition of these discourses was edited by the Rev. Ed. Bickersteth, who in his 'prefatory remarks' mentions many reasons 'which make this work both seasonable and profitable in the present day.' Hurd, who was promoted to the see of Lichfield and Coventry in 1775, and six years afterwards was translated to the bishopric of Worcester, on the death of Archbishop Cornwallis in 1783, was pressed by the king to accept the primacy; but 'he humbly begged leave to decline, as a charge not suited to his temper and talents, and much too heavy for him to sustain.' He died in the year 1808, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. Besides the productions of his pen which we have already mentioned, Bishop Hurd wrote various works on the infidelity of the age, including 'Remarks on Hume's Essay on the Natural History of Religion,' in 1759; and some volumes of sermons. He also edited Cowley's select works in 1769; Warburton's works in seven quarto vols. in 1788, with the life of his right reverend friend and patron in 1794; and Addison's works, with notes, in six vols. 8vo. Warburton commended Hurd as 'one of the best scholars in the kingdom, and of parts and genius equal to his learning, and a moral character that adorned both.' Hallam, Lit. History of Europe [ed. 4], vol. iii., p. 475, note, with greater discrimination praises Hurd as 'having perhaps the merit of being the first who in this country aimed at philosophic criticism; as having had great ingenuity, a good deal of reading, and great facility in applying it; but [he adds] he did not feel very deeply . . . assumed a dogmatic arrogance, which as it always offends the reader for the most part also stands in the way of the author's own search for truth.' Hurd's works were collected, and, three years after his death, published in eight volumes, 8vo.—P. H.

HURDIS, JAMES, D.D., was more a poet, perhaps, than a divine. He was born at Bishopstone, Sussex, 1763, and entered a commoner of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, 1780. He was elected a fellow of Magdalene College, 1782, and presented to the living of Bishopstone in 1791. In 1793 he was elected to the professorship of poetry in the University of Oxford. He died 1801. His works of Biblical interest are the following:—Select Critical Remarks upon the English Version of the First Ten Chapters of Genesis, Lond. 1793, 8vo. These remarks are on the whole judicious, and may be consulted with advantage; also A short Critical Disquisition upon the true meaning of the word תַּנִּינִים, found in Genesis i. 21, Lond. 1790, 8vo.

The author contends that the above word, wherever it occurs, signifies crocodile. His remarks on the various passages in which it is found are, to say the least, very ingenious. Dr. Hurdis is the author also of a work entitled Twelve Dissertations on the Nature and Occasion of Psalm and Prophecy, 1800, 8vo. He also wrote and published several small volumes of poetry, of which, however, no further mention can be made here.—W. J. C.

HUSHAI. [HUSHATHITE.]

HUSHAI (חֻשַׁי; Sept. Xowai; Vulg. Chusai) appears as a prominent actor in the history of Absalom's rebellion. When David fled from his capital Hushai joined his mournful train at the top of Mount Olivet, and seems to have been the means of first raising the forlorn monarch from the dejection into which he was thrown by the tidings of the desertion of his ablest counsellor Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 32). At his royal master's suggestion Hushai returned to the city for the purpose of serving his cause as occasion might offer (vv. 33-37). One of the prince's first acts was to convene a meeting, which Dr. Kitto mentions as 'the first cabinet council to which history admits us' (Bible Illustr. iii. 420): Hushai was invited to attend rather as an amicus curiæ than as a recognised member. After Ahithophel had tendered his sage but fiendish counsel, Hushai, called on by Absalom himself to offer his opinion, availed himself of his opportunity with an adroitness which reminds us of the artfulness of a Ulysses or a Themistocles. In winged words of florid eloquence he portrayed the martial spirit of the king, and, true to his object of defeating Ahithophel's fatal counsel, he urged the prince to delay his pursuit of the 'chafed' monarch until he had effected an ampler preparation (xvii. 7-13). The earnestness of his manner recommended his specious advice to Absalom as preferable to that of the rival counsellor (xvii. 14). The immediate result was the suicide (the first on record, Kitto, l. c.) of the vexed and disappointed Ahithophel, and the ultimate consequence was the crushing out of the formidable rebellion. Much curious and vain discussion has been raised as to the conduct of Hushai in his service of David; all through he seems to have closely followed the suggestions of his royal master (xv. 34); so that whatever censure is passed on him belongs equally to the king. Peter Martyr combines them both in his extraordinary conclusion (in loc.), 'Si ex instinctu Dei hoc fecerunt non peccarunt; si humano impulsu, peccarunt, et non sunt excusandi.' We are not called upon to justify every act in the conduct of the best of men, when we read the simple and unadorned narrative of it in Holy Scripture. In all the excitement of that sad history of filial impiety, human counsel and human passion it was which ordered the means for accomplishing what was an undoubtedly Divine appointment (see 2 Sam. xvii. 14). In justifying the ways of God to men, and admiring the issues of His will, we are in no case obliged to approve actions which have nothing but their success to commend them. Whatever was Hushai's general character (and there is no ground for supposing it to be other than good, and worthy of David's highest friendship) in the cabinet council of the rebellious prince, he seems to have been at least a match for the astutest diplomacy, and by the boldness of his prevarication to have been the means of 'disappointing the devices of the crafty, so that their hands could not perform their enterprise' (Job v. 12). Hushai is called the 'friend' and 'companion' of David (2 Sam. xv. 37; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33); but Holy Scripture does not assign him these honourable titles in acknowledgment of his service to his master during the rebellion; he was well known for these valuable characteristics long before Absalom put them to so severe a test (see 2 Sam. xvi. 16, 17, compared with xv. 37). It saw, no doubt, the greater earnestness and devotion of his character, as compared with the cold and calculating Gilonite (comp. the epithets applied to the two men, in 1 Chron.

xxvii. 33; where the לִפְנֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ, the mere genitive of possession, seems to indicate a looser relation to the king than the רֵעַ הַמֶּלֶךְ, which, being a phrase of the 'construct state,' probably expresses the closest connection that the words will bear; see also Gesen. Gram. [by Rödiger], p. 208) which induced Absalom to pay greater deference to Hushai, as if he felt that in him he had a more trustworthy man to lean on.

But besides his advice at the council, Hushai promoted David's cause by keeping up a communication with him afterwards, and especially by the promptitude with which he despatched messengers to urge the king to flee for his life (2 Sam. xvii. 15-22). Hushai is called 'the Archite' in five of the fourteen passages where his name occurs. This gentile designation is very probably the same as is mentioned in Josh. xvi. 2, in the description of the southern border of the tribe of Ephraim, where the בְּנֵי הָאֲרָכִי (A. V. 'the borders of Archi,' more properly 'the borders of the Archite') lay near Bethel or Luz towards Ataroth,* about midway between the Jordan and the Mediterranean. The city which originated this gentile designation was no doubt called Erech (אֶרֶךְ), of the same form with the Babylonian city mentioned in Gen. x. 10, with which of course it is not to be confounded. The gentile of this Eastern city is 'Archevites,' אֲרַכְוִי, mentioned in Ezra iv. 9.

In the next generation and next reign the distinguished honour of being 'the king's friend' was enjoyed by a son of Nathan the prophet (1 Kings iv. 5); contemporary with him was BAANAH, the son of Hushai, who served Solomon as one of his twelve officers or prefects appointed to levy the royal revenues. There is no reason to doubt that this functionary was the son of our Hushai; the absence of the designation 'Archite' is immaterial, for it does not invariably accompany Hushai's name in the passages of his history; it is for instance absent in 2 Sam. xv. 37, though found in ver. 32; in the next chap. it is only once mentioned in the four occurrences of Hushai's name; while in xvii. chap. the name occurs six times, but the gentile epithet only twice.—P. H.

HUSHATHITE, THE, is an epithet applied to SIBBECHAI, one of David's 'mighty men,' in 2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 29; xx. 4, and xxvii. 11; and to MEBUNNAI, in 2 Sam. xxiii. 27. As this latter name is found among David's heroes also, it has been conjectured to be nothing more than another form for Sibbechai—probably by corruption of the text (see Thenius and Houbigant, in loc., the latter of whom juxtaposes מְבַנִּי and מְבַנִּי, as if to exhibit their similarity and liability to be confounded by copyists. Whether 'The Hushathite' (הַחֻשְׁתִּי, or more correctly הַחֻשְׁתִּי with dagesh, as in the last two places in Chronicles) is a patronymic, indicating the family of Sibbechai, or a gentile noun referring to his native city, is uncertain. No doubt either way the reference is to the name HUSHAH (חֻשָּׁה), mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 4—

* The Sept. renders 'the borders of Archi' by τὰ ὅρια τοῦ Ἀρχιαραῖος, which of course is nothing less than the coalition of 'Archi' and 'Ataroth,' next mentioned. The Vulg. is very like it in its 'Terminum Archi, Ataroth.' It is curious that the LXX. has, in 2 Sam. xv. 37, and xvi. 16, made another coalition between two adjoining words, by rendering רֵעַ הַחֻשְׁתִּי ('the Archite, friend') by the single compound epithet Ἀρχιαραῖος, 'chief friend.' Is. Vossius, de Sept. Intt. p. 58, defends this, on the ground that the LXX. renders the same phrase in 1 Chron. xxvii. 33 by the equivalent πρῶτος φίλος, 'prime friend'; while Josephus similarly calls Hushai Ἀρχιφίλος [Hudson conjectures Ἀρχαῖος φίλος], Antiq. vii. 9. Fuller, however, in Miscell. Sacr. ii. 10, supposes that two words have grown, in fact, into one, and is for separating them into ὁ Ἀρχι [it should rather be ὁ Ἀραχί, as the LXX. has it in 2 Sam. xvii. 5, and other places], ἑταῖρος Δαβὶδ, like the original and our A. V.

among the genealogies of the tribe of Judah—thus Ezer, father of Hushah.' The first impression that Hushah must needs be a man's name is soon corrected by two phrases of the same verse—'Father of Gedor,' 'Father of Bethlehem,' where the two names in italics designate cities. Hushah, therefore, may reasonably be taken for a city also; a conclusion which is quite confirmed by 1 Chron. xxvii. 11, where the fullest information we have is given respecting Sibbechai in these words סִבְכַּי הַחֻשָּׁתִי לָזָרְחִי, which are well rendered in the Vulgate, Sobachai Hushathites de stirpe Zarahi (A. V. 'S. the Hushathite, of the Zarhites'). The second of these epithets undoubtedly marks the man's family as belonging to the Zarhite clan of Judah (Num. xxvi. 20, not to be confounded with the Simeonite clan of the same name, in verse 13), leaving 'Hushathite' to indicate his birth-place, or else residence—somewhere in the territory of the tribe of Judah. The Vulgate gives the name of the city as 'Husati;' and in two of the five passages in which our epithet Hushathite occurs, renders it 'de Husati' (see Dutripon's note, Concord. p. 626), the other three passages having 'Husathites.' The LXX. version, in the only passage of Samuel where the word occurs [for 2 Sam. xxiii. 27 does not mention 'Mebunnai the Hushathite'], renders it by ὁ Ἀσραῦσι: in all the passages in Chronicles it has ὁ Οὐσαῖ, for although in the second passage the Vatican text reads Σωσαῖ (which is unintelligible [unless the Σ represent the aspirate]), the Cod. Alex. conforms to the other reading ὁ Οὐσαῖ, which is our very word Hushathite shorn of its aspirate.—P. H.

HUSHIM (חֻשִּׁים; Sept. Ἀσδμ; Ἀσδμ), a name which occurs first in the catalogue of the descendants of Jacob, and is used to designate the children of Dan (Gen. xlv. 23). The form of the word being plural, it is understood to mean, as obviously intended, not an individual member of the family or tribe, but the tribe itself. In the corresponding catalogue in Num. xxvi. 26 the name is Shuham. We meet with the same name in the genealogy of Benjamin; first, as above, in the plural form, used to designate the sons of Aher (1 Chron. vii. 12); second, as the name of one of the two wives of Shaharim (1 Chron. viii. 8). The name of the wife was Baara. Hushim was the mother of his two sons Abitub and Elpaul.—W. J. C.

HUSKS. [CERATIA.]

HUTCHESON, GEORGE. Very few facts can be ascertained in regard to the personal history of this able expositor. He was minister of Colmonell, from which he was translated to Edinburgh. In early life he held Arminian views, which he afterwards saw reason to abandon. In 1650 he was one of the Scotch commissioners sent to treat with Charles II. at Breda. He was ejected from his charge in Edinburgh for nonconformity, and, although he was noted for his steady refusal to comply with the Episcopal liturgy, he availed himself of one of the indulgences, and accepted a charge in Irvine in 1669. He married the widow of the celebrated Andrew Gray—sister of Baillie of Jerviswood. His death took place from apoplexy in 1678. He is described in Wodrow's Analecta as 'a great and a good man above many,' and, according to the testimony of Principal Violant, was

'of a sweet, amiable, loving, and compassionate disposition.'

The works which he has left behind him are all of an expository character—A brief exposition of the twelve small prophets, Lond. 1655; An Exposition of the Gospel of Jesus Christ according to John, 1657; An exposition upon Job, being the sum of three hundred and sixteen lectures, 1669; and Forty-five sermons upon the 130th Psalm, 1691. A treatise on the Confession of Faith was never published.

Hutcheson was one of the divines who laboured in concert to produce expositions extending over the whole of Scripture. Considering his associates in the work, Dickson, Ferguson, Nisbet, and others, it is no small praise if we rank him at the head of them. Perhaps the circumstance that he so far conformed as to accept an indulgence, though he still held to the intrinsic jurisdiction of the church so firmly as to have been summoned before the council for his conduct, may have diminished his popularity as an author. At all events, his works, with the exception of his Commentary on John recently published by Ward, have not been reprinted, though some of them in the author's lifetime ran through three editions. His method is much the same in all his works. He has what he terms 'a resolution of the context,' followed by 'an explication of particular sentences,' after which, when needed, there is a general view of the doctrine or principle urged in the passage, on which he comments. His thinking is invariably clear and definite, with a gracefulness of expression at times quite remarkable for that age. There is no great fervency in his composition, at least in his strictly expository works, probably from his habits of strict adherence to the task of exposition. Edmund Calamy speaks strongly in commendation of his labours, and yet not more strongly than his merits as an expositor warrant, when, in a preface to one of Hutcheson's works, that eminent divine remarks, 'His observations are so excellent and suitable, and sometimes so unexpected and yet so natural, that I verily believe they will be very acceptable not only to private Christians, but also and especially to ministers.' With equal justice Calamy gives him credit for a quality which few authors of that day possessed; his book, while it 'breathes out much of God and godliness,' at the same time 'comprehends much in little.'—W. H. G.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN, author of 'A Mystical and Cabalistic Interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures,' was born at Spennithorne, Yorkshire, in 1674, and died Aug. 28, 1737. He received a good education, and became, at the age of nineteen, steward to Mr. Bathurst, and afterwards to the Duke of Somerset. Fond of the study of mineralogy and botany, he devoted his leisure to the cultivation of these branches of learning. A valuable collection of fossils made by him, was bequeathed to the university of Cambridge. He is best known as the originator of the peculiar system of Biblical interpretation usually denominated, from its author, Hutchinsonianism, which he expounded at large in a series of philosophico-theological works, published from time to time. He maintained that the Hebrew language was formed by God, and is, therefore, perfect; that the Scriptures were 'not writ ad captum humanum, but philosophically, beyond imitation;' that Moses was inspired to reveal a complete system of philosophy as well as theology, beyond which the human mind can never get; that Newton's principles are antiscriptural and false, and Newton himself no philosopher; that each Hebrew word embodies a great theological or philosophical truth, but that the points are a 'corrupt invention of the Rabbis,' and the Arabic language 'a forgery;' that the whole of Christianity is contained in the O. T., so that the Jews understood it as well as we; and that a knowledge of Hebrew is essential to a right understanding of the N. T., because the latter is written in the language of the Gentiles. These and kindred principles parade all his writings.

His works were published in twelve vols. 8vo, in 1749, the principal of which are:—Moses' Principia, part i.; An Essay towards a Natural History of the Bible—Moses' Principia, part ii. The Principia embodies the fundamental principles of the 'inspired' philosophy in opposition to those of Sir I. Newton. Moses' Sine Principio, or 'the meaning of the names and titles of God,' with an introduction to shew 'the nature of the fall, of Paradise, and of the body and soul.' A New Account of the Confusion of Tongues, etc., with the names and attributes of the Trinity of the Gentiles, treating of the 'origin of idolatry' and the 'loss of philosophy in the Gentile world.' Glory or Gravity, etc., in which the hieroglyphical import of the Cherubim is exhibited. The Covenant in the Cherubim, etc., setting forth the various ways, by Cherubim, Urim, etc., in which 'it pleased God to reveal himself and the Covenant of grace.' The Religion of Satan, or Antichrist delineated; the Use of Reason recovered in the data of Christianity (parts i. and ii.), 'which are shewn to be the only subjects reason can exercise itself upon.'

Hutchinson had many followers, although he formed no sect. His style is loose, rambling, and obscure; his dogmatism unbounded; and his language towards opponents often rude and offensive. He was learned, but not 'truly learned.' His works are worth examining, although the task of reading them is difficult. There is an autobiographical sketch of him in the 5th vol. of his collected works.—L. J.

HUTTER, ELIAS, the editor of several Polyglott Bibles, was born in 1554, and died in 1605. He was a zealous student and teacher of Hebrew and the cognate languages, the former of which he taught to Prince August of Saxony. Having formed the scheme of an edition of the Hebrew text on a peculiar plan, accompanied with a series of translations in different tongues, he procured a printing press for the purpose, and devoted himself to this object. In 1596 he brought out at Hamburg his Opus quadripartitum Script. Sac., in which the Hebrew text of the O. T. appears with three versions. In 1599 he issued at Nurnberg the N. T. in twelve different languages—Syriac, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Danish, and Polish; and in 1602 appeared his Nov. Test. Harmonicum Ebr., Gr., Lat. et Germ. These works are now more curious than useful. Hutter aimed at more than he could accomplish, and ruined himself in the attempt. His idea, however, was noble, and he is entitled at least to Phœthón's eulogy:—Quem si non tenuit magnis tamen excidit ausis.—W. L. A.

HUZZAB (חֲזָב), a word of very doubtful interpretation, occurring Nahum ii. 7. Commentators are not agreed as to whether it is a proper name. The Jews appear generally to have understood by it the queen of Nineveh, who was living at the date of this prophecy, an opinion which is followed by the A. V. and by Ewald: otherwise it is the Hophal of חָזַב; if so taken, however, it will perhaps be desirable to alter the punctuation in order to join the word to the former verse, as Dr. Henderson has done, who renders thus, 'And the palace is dissolved, though firmly established.' The LXX. and the Vulgate seem to have translated the word: one has ἡ ὑβέρασις, and the other miles captivus. The Peshito also translates it. Mr. Rawlinson would read חֲזָב, and very ingeniously supposes it to be a geographical designation of Assyria, as the country between the Upper and Lower Zab (Herod. i. 570, n. 7, and Dict. Bib., s. v.) It may be questioned, however, if in that case it would be spelt with ז.—S. L.

HYACINTH. [LESHEM.]

HYÆNA. [TSEBOA.]

HYDASPES. A river only once mentioned in the Bible, Judith i. 6. It is doubtful whether we may identify it with the river of the same name mentioned by Arrian, Ind. 4, and Strabo, 15. 697, which flowed westwards into the Indus, is now called Jelum, and is one of the five streams which give the name of Panjab to the district, Rawlinson, Herod. i. 558. Some suppose it more probable that the Choaspes or Euleus is meant, which was called Hydaspes by the Romans (Voss ad Justin. ii. 14).—S. L.

HYMENÆUS (Ἵμηναιος), a professor of Christianity at Ephesus, who, with Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20) and Philetus (2 Tim. ii. 18), had departed from the truth both in principle and practice, and led others into apostasy. The chief doctrinal error of these persons consisted in maintaining that 'the resurrection was past already.' The precise meaning of this expression is by no means clearly ascertained: the most general and perhaps best founded opinion is, that they understood the resurrection in a figurative sense of the great change produced by the Gospel dispensation. Some have suggested that they attempted to support their views by the Apostle's language in his Epistle to the Ephesians (νεκρῶν—οὐκ ἐσθωλῶν—οὐκ ἔμελλεν, etc., ii. 1-5): but this is very improbable; for if such misconception of his language had arisen, it might easily have been corrected; not to say that one of them appears to have been personally inimical to St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 14), and would scarcely have appealed to him as an authority. Most critics suppose that the same person is referred to in both the epistles to Timothy by the name of Hymenæus. Dr. Mosheim, however, contends that there were two. He seems to lay great stress on the Apostle's declaration in 1 Tim. i. 20, 'whom I have delivered unto Satan that they may learn not to blaspheme.' But whatever may be the meaning of this expression, the infliction was evidently designed for the benefit and restoration of the parties (comp. 1 Cor. v. 5), and was therefore far from indicating their hopeless and abandoned wickedness. Nor do the terms employed in the second Epistle import a less flagrant violation of the Christian profession than those in the first. If in the one the individuals alluded to are charged with having 'discarded a good conscience' and 'made shipwreck of faith,' in the other they are described as indulging 'in vain and profane babblings, which would increase to more ungodliness,' as 'having erred concerning the truth,' and 'overthrowing the faith' of others. These can hardly be said to be 'two distinct characters having nothing in common but the name' (Mosheim's Commentaries, i. 304-306). For other interpretations of 2 Tim. ii. 18, see Gill's Commentary, in loc., and Walchii Miscellanea Sacra, i. 4; de Hymenaeo Phileto, Amstel. 1774 [ANATHEMA].—J. E. R.

HYMN (ὕμνος). This term as used by the Greeks primarily signified simply a song (comp. Hom. Od. viii. 429; Hes. Op. d. D. 659; Pindar Ol. i. 170; xi. 74; Isthm. iv. 74; Pyth. x. 82; Aesch. Eum. 331; Soph. Antig. 809; Plat. Rep. v. p. 459, E, etc.); we find instances even in which the cognate verb ὑμνεῖν is used in a bad sense (φάλας ἐκλαμβάνεται, Eustath. p. 634, comp. Soph. Elect. 382; Oed. Tyr. 1275; Eurip. Med. 425); but usage ultimately appropriated the term to songs in praise of the gods. We know that among the Greeks, as among most of the nations of antiquity, the chanting of songs in praise of their gods was an approved part of their worship (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 633, ed. Sylburg.; Porphyry. de Abst. iv. sec. 8; Phurnutius de Nat. Deor. c. 14; Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dies iv. c. 17, s. f.; Spanheim in not. ad Callimachum, p. 2; comp. Meiners, Geschichte aller Religionen, c. 13); and even at their festive entertainments such songs were sometimes sung (Athen. Deipnos. xiv., xv. 14; Polyb. Hist. iv. 20, ed. Ernesti). Besides those hymns to different deities which have come down to us as the composition of Callimachus, Orpheus, Homer, Linus, Cleanthes, Sappho, and others, we may with confidence refer to the choral odes of the tragedians as affording specimens of these sacred songs, such of them at least as were of a lyric character (Snedorf, De Hymnis Vet. Græc. p. 19). Such songs were properly called hymns. Hence Arrian says distinctly (De Exped. Alex. iv. 11, 2), ὕμνοι μὲν ἐς τοὺς θεοὺς ποιοῦνται, ᾠαὶ δὲ ἐς ἀνθρώπους. So also Phavorinus; ὕμνος, ἡ πρὸς θεὸν ᾠδή. Augustine (in Ps. lxxii.) thus fully states the meaning of the term: 'Hymni laudes sunt Dei cum cantico. Hymni cantus sunt, continenter laudes Dei. Si sit laus, et non sit Dei non est hymnus. Si sit laus et Dei laus, et non cantatur, non est hymnus. Oportet ergo ut si sit hymnus, habeat hæc tria et laudem et Dei et canticum.'

In the LXX. the word ὕμνος and its cognates are used as representing several Hebrew words; but in almost every case the reference is to songs of praise or thanksgiving to God. In the N. T. this is the invariable usage of the terms.

Our Lord and his disciples after the institution of the Supper 'sang an hymn' (ὑμνοῦσαντες) before they went out to the Mount of Olives (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26). There is every reason to believe that what was sung on this occasion was the latter part of the Hallel, Ps. cxv.-cxviii. [HALLEL]. When Paul and Silas were imprisoned at Philippi 'at midnight they prayed and sang praises unto God' (ὕμνουσαν τὸν θεόν, Acts xvi. 25). Whether they sang were some of the ancient psalms or spontaneous utterances of adoration and worship, we have no means of determining. In writing to the Ephesians (v. 19), and again to the Colossians (iii. 16), the apostle enjoins the use of hymns in the social worship of Christians, classing them with psalms and spiritual songs (ψαλμοὶ καὶ ὕμνοι καὶ ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί). In what relation these stood to each other is a question which has occasioned considerable differences of opinion. According to some, the distinction between them was one of subject; according to others it was merely one of form, having respect to the manner in which they were sung; whilst others contend that the source whence they were derived, and the general character of the composition, determined the difference between them. Under these leading opinions, endless differences of minor opinion have been advocated. Of those who adopt the first opinion is St. Jerome, who thinks that the hymn was devoted to the celebration of the divine majesty and goodness, that the psalm was occupied with themes of an ethical nature, and that the spiritual ode was occupied with things above, and the subtle discussion of the concert of the world, and the order and concord of creation (Comment. in Eph. v. 19). Others, again, who hold the same general view, state the difference thus:—The psalm belongs to ethics; the hymn, as setting forth the praises of God for redemption, to theology; and the ode, as celebrating the works of God in creation and providence, to natural science (Thomasius, in Praefationibus, p. 525). All this, however, is purely arbitrary. The second opinion was held by Augustine, Basil, Hilary, and others of the Christian Fathers, and has been adopted by several in more recent times. By some who take this view, the distinction is supposed to lie in this, that the ψαλμοὶ were compositions which were chanted to the accompaniment of an instrument, the ψαλτήριον, the ὕμνοι songs of adoration uttered by the voice alone, and the ᾠδαὶ, short chants uttered also only by the voice (Aug. Enarrat. in Ps. iii.; Bas. Mag. in Ps. xxxix.; Greg. Nyss, Tr. ii. in Psalmos, cli. iii., etc.); while others think that the distinction is to be determined by reference to the Hebrew terminology שְׁמִיחָה, שִׁמְשׁוּרִים, שְׁמִיחָה, which is in fact determining nothing, as the distinction between these is itself entirely uncertain. The third opinion is that of Beza (Nov. Test., in loc.), and Grotius (Comment. ad Matt. xxvi. 30, et h. l.); they think that by Psalmos are designated the sacred songs bearing that name collectively in the O. T. canon; by hymns such extemporary songs of praise as we have in the song of Deborah, Hannah, Zachariah, and Mary, and such as the apostle and his companion sang in the prison at Philippi; and by odes premeditated compositions of a more elaborate nature and stricter form than hymns. To this in the general most subsequent inquirers have given their consent; only, some think that the term 'psalms' should not be restricted to the compositions bearing that name in the O. T., but should be extended to all of a similar character which might be composed for the use of the Church in later times; and that by 'spiritual odes' are to be understood specifically all sacred songs, of whatever kind, composed by special inspiration of the Holy Ghost (θεοπνευστοί). The former of these modifications is rendered almost imperative by 1 Cor. xiv. 26; and the latter by the general sense of the adjective πνευματικός in the N. T. Not a few de-pairing of satisfactorily discriminating these three kinds of sacred song, have contended that the Apostle merely accumulates terms for the sake of force, and that no distinction between them is to be sought (Clem. Alex., Pædag. ii. 4, p. 565; Clericus, in not. apud Hammondii annot., in loc., etc.); but this otiose method of disposing of the difficulty has been repudiated by most.

As to the form in which these early hymns of the Church were composed, we have no means of even approaching a certain conclusion. Among the Jewish Christians the chanting of the Psalms was familiar, and it would be easy for them to compose hymns that could be sung to their accustomed tunes; but with the Gentile converts it would be somewhat different. Among the Greeks and Romans poetry had fixed metrical forms, to which the tunes of the Hebrews could not be adapted. There is no reason, however, to believe that the early Gentile Christians followed these metrical forms in their sacred poetry. The earliest specimens of Christian song extant; the hymn to Christ, preserved by Clemens of Alexandria; the evening hymn, referred to by Basil as in his time very ancient, handed down from the Fathers (De Spir. Sanct., c. 29); and the morning hymn, which has been incorporated with the Liturgy of the Church of England; have no traces of a metrical character, but are, like the Biblical hymns, adapted only for being chanted in recitative with a few and simple cadences.* Such singing would no doubt be new to the Gentile converts, but it would be speedily learned; and as they probably had very little sacred music of their own, they would hail with delight this accession to their sources of enjoyment, which served at the same time as a vehicle of the devotional feeling which had been kindled within them. It has been suggested that in 1 Cor. xiii. we have an apostolic hymn, and in Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16; James i. 17; Rev. i. 5, 6; xv. 3, etc., fragments of hymns sung in the Apostolic churches; but this is mere conjecture, though not without some probability (Deyling, Hymni a Christianis decantandi, Obs. Sac. iii. 430; Walch, De Hymnis Eccl. Apostol., 1737; Hilliger, De Psal. Hymn. atque Odar. sac. discrimine, Viteb. 1720; Gerbert, De cantu et musica a primo Eccl. statu usque ad præsens tempus, Bamb. et Frib. 1774, 2 tom. 4to; Bingham, Antiquities, Bk. xiv. ch. 2, Works, vol. iv. p. 447, ff.; Rheinwald, *Christl. HYPERBOLE. Any one who carefully examines the Bible must be surprised at the very few hyperbolic expressions which it contains, considering that it is an Oriental book. Some of these few have occasioned so much difficulty to sincere men, that we have reason to bless God that the scene of those great events which comprise the history of man's salvation was laid in Western, and not in Eastern Asia, where the genius of hyperbole reigns without limit or control. In Eastern Asia the tone of composition is pitched so high as to be scarcely intelligible to the sober intellect of Europe; while in Western Asia a medium seems to have been struck between the ultra-extravagance of the far east, and the frigid exactness of the far west.

But even regarded as a book of Western Asia, the Bible is, as compared with almost any other Western Asiatic book, so singularly free from hyperbolic expressions as might well excite our surprise, did not our knowledge of its divine origin permit us to suppose that even the style and mode of expression of the writers were so far controlled as to exclude from their writings what, in other ages and countries, might excite pain and offence, and prove an obstacle to the reception of divine truth. Nor is it to be said that the usage of hyperbole is of modern growth. We find it in the oldest eastern writings which now exist; and the earlier rabbinical writings attest that, in times approaching near to those in which the writers of the N. T. flourished, the Jewish imagination had run riot in this direction, and has left hyperboles as frequent and outrageous as any which Persia or India can produce.

These things being considered, we shall certainly have more cause to admire the rarity of hyperbolic expressions in the Bible than to marvel at those which do occur.

The strongest hyperbole in all Scripture is that with which the Gospel of St. John concludes:—'There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that the world itself could not contain all the books that should be written.' This has so much pained many commentators, that they have been disposed to regard it as an unauthorized addition to the sacred text, and to reject it accordingly. Now this is always a dangerous process, and not to be adopted but on such overwhelming authority of collated manuscripts as does not exist in the present case. How much more natural and becoming is it to regard the verse simply as a hyperbole, so perfectly conformable to Oriental modes of expression, and to some other hyperboles which may be found interspersed in the sacred books, that the sole wonder really is that this one should be rare enough to afford ground for objection and remark.

This view of the matter might be illustrated by many examples, in which we find sacred and profane authors using hyperboles of the like kind and signification. In Num. xiii. 33, the spies who had returned from searching the land of Canaan, say that they saw 'giants there, of such a prodigious size, that they were in their own sight as grasshoppers.' In Deut. i. 28, cities with high walls about them are said to be 'walled up to heaven.' In Dan. iv. 7, mention is made of a tree whereof 'the height reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof unto the end of all the earth;' and the author of Ecclesiasticus (xlvii. 15), speaking of Solomon's wisdom, says, 'Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou fillest it with parables.' As the world is here said to be filled with Solomon's parables; so in John xxi. 25, by one degree more of hyperbole, it is said that the world could not contain all the books that should be written concerning Jesus's miracles, if a particular account of every one of them were given. In Josephus (Antiq. xiv. 22) God is mentioned as promising to Jacob that he would give the land of Canaan to him and his seed; and then it is added, 'they shall fill the whole sea and land which the sun shines upon.' Wetstein, in his note on the text in John, and Basnage, in his Histoire des Juifs (iii. 1-9; v. 7), have cited from the ancient rabbinical writers such passages as the following:—'If all the seas were ink, and every reed was a pen, and the whole heaven and earth were parchment, and all the sons of men were writers, they would not be sufficient to write all the lessons which Jochanan composed; and concerning one Eliezer it is said, that 'if the heavens were parchment, and all the sons of men writers, and all the trees of the forest pens, they would not be sufficient for writing all the wisdom which he was possessed of.'

Hyperboles not less strong than that under review find their way into our own poetry, without shocking our judgment or offending our taste, thus:—

'And I as rich in having such a jewel
As fifty seas, if all their sands were pearl,
Their rivers nectar, and their rocks pure gold.'

Homer, who if not born in Asia Minor had undoubtedly lived there, has sometimes followed the hyperbolic manner of speaking which prevailed so much in the East: thus, in Iliad xx. 246, 247, he makes Æneas say to Achilles, 'Let us have done with reproaching one another; for we may throw out so many reproachful words on one another, that a ship of a hundred oars would not be able to carry the load.' Few instances of this are to be found in Occidental writers; yet it is observed that Cicero (Phil. ii. 44) has 'præsertim quum illi eam gloriam consecuti sint, quæ vix cælo capi posse videatur,' and that Livy (vii. 25) says, 'hæ vires populi Romani, quas vix terrarum capit orbis.' See Bishop Pearce's Commentary on the four Evangelists, 1777, etc.—J. K.

HYPERIUS, ANDREW GERHARD; the name Hyperius, taken from his birth-place Yperu, was used in his published writings in preference to that of his family. He was born May 16, 1511. In 1528 he commenced his studies in that city under Joachim Ringelberg, an eminent teacher, whose favourite maxim was, Quicquid dedideris, confestim doccas. In 1532 he began to attend a course of theology; but dissatisfied with the dry scholasticism of the Sorbonne, he read in private the Fathers, especially Augustine, and made himself well acquainted with church history and the canon law; at the same time he attended the lectures of the classical scholars who had been invited to the new college founded by Francis I. in 1529, some of whom were warm friends of the Reformation, and propagated its principles among their students. During his theological triennium he travelled through all France and north Italy; at the conclusion of his studies in 1535 he went through the Netherlands and the north of Germany; and in 1537 he visited Hesse and Saxony, and made the acquaintance of the Protestant theologians in Marburg, Erfurt, Wittenberg, and Leipsic. Soon after he openly joined the Reformers, and declined a lucrative post in the Papal Court which his friends, without his knowledge, had obtained for him. He ultimately became professor of theology at Marburg, where he died 1st Feb. 1564. Besides several works in theology, he prepared a commentary on the Epistles of Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was published after his death by Mylius, in 4 vols. fol., Zür. 1582-84. This, though comparatively but little known,* is one of the most valuable of the exegetical remains of the Reformers. Hyperius pursues the grammatico-historical method of interpretation, examining the meaning of the words, carefully tracing the connection of the passage, taking note of the analogy of Scripture, and so arriving at the true sense of the place. Not until he has thus done justice to the exegesis, does he proceed to the dogmatical or practical use of the passage. He also frequently gives citations from the Fathers to shew the agreement of his conclusions with the understanding of the ancient church. In his Opuscula are to be found also some exegetical treatises.—J. E. R.

IBHAR (יְבָר); Sept. Vat. 'Εβάρ, 'Εβαρ, Βάρ; Alex. 'Ιεβάρ, 'Ιεβαρ; Vulg. Iebahar, Jebaar. A son of David born in Jerusalem whose name occurs in 2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 6; xiv. 5. His mother's name is not mentioned; but from 1 Chron. iii. 9 it appears that she was one of David's wives of the first order as distinguished from his concubines. [CONCUBINE].—J. E. R.

IBLEAM (יְבֵלֵאם); LXX. 'Ιεβλαάμ; Onom. 'Ιεβλαάμ; Vulg. Jeblaam. One of the six towns which, together with their adjoining villages, were assigned to the tribe of Manasseh within the borders of Issachar and Asher (Josh. xvii. 11). It was in the neighbourhood of this town that Ahaziah, king of Judah, received his death wound from the servants, and at the command, of Jehu (2 Kings ix. 27). Its exact position is unknown, but we may infer from the passage just quoted that it was on or near the road from Jezreel to Megiddo. According to Judg. i. 27, Ibleam was one of the towns from which the Manassites failed to expel the Canaanites, and the same thing seems to be affirmed in Josh. xvii. 11. For an explanation of the grammatical difficulty connected with the last-mentioned passage, and a reply to the objection which would find a contradiction between the two passages, the reader is referred to Keil on Joshua, in loc. Ibleam, which is mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 70 as one of the Levitical cities, is perhaps the same as Ibleam. The reading, however, is somewhat doubtful, see Josh. xxi. 25, where the city is termed Gath-Rimmon [GATH-RIMMON].—S. N.

IBN ADONIA. [JACOB B. CHAJEM.]

IBN AKNIN (אֲבִן עֲקִינִי or עֲקִינִי) JOSEPH B. JEHUDAH, called in Arabic by the long name of Abulhag'ag' Jussuff Ibn Fahja Ibn Shimun Alsabti

* Bloomfield refers frequently to Hyperius in the notes to his Greek N. T., but with this exception, one hardly ever sees a recognition of him by British scholars.

Almaghribi, a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, astronomer, physician, poet, and commentator, who was born at Ceuta, Arab. Sebtā (Septum), about 1160. He fled from his native place about 1185, in consequence of the great sufferings which the Jews had to endure in it, and for a time settled in Alexandria, where he became a disciple and intimate friend of the immortal Maimonides, and, by his sceptical expressions about religion and philosophy, caused this great luminary to write the celebrated More Nebuchim (מורה נבוכים) Doctor perplexorum. Ibn Aknin then went to Syria (circa 1190) and thence to Bagdad (1192), where he founded a Rabbinic college, and shortly after became physician to the Emir Faris ed Din Meimun el Kasri. Passing by his poetical, ethical, medical, and metaphysical writings, we notice his Commentary on the Song of Songs, written in Arabic, which is to be found in the Bodleian Library, Oxford (Pococke, 189). He espouses the notion of the Talmud, that the Song of Songs is the most sacred of all the twenty-four canonical books of the O. T. [SOLOMON'S SONG], and accordingly explains it allegorically as representing the relationship of God to his people Israel. 'There are,' he says, 'three different modes of explaining this book; 1. The literal (על אלפסוט), which is to be found in the philologists or grammarians, ex. gr., Saadia, Abu Sacharia Jahja ben David el Fasi [CHAJUG], Abulwalid Ibn Ganach of Saragossa [IBN GANACH], the Nagid R. Samuel Ha-Levi ben Nagdilah, Abn Ibrahim ben Baran [ISAAC b. JOSEPH], Jehudah ben Balaam [IBN BALAAH], and Moses Ibn Gikatilla Ha-Cohen [GIKATELLA]. 2. The allegorical, to be found in the Midrash Chasit, the Talmud, and in some of the ancient interpretations; and 3. The philosophical interpretation, which regards this book as referring to the active intellect [voûs actif], here worked out for the first time, and which, though the last in point of time, is the first of all in point of merit (נוטל שכל כנדר כלם). These three different explanations correspond, in reverse order, to the three different natures of man, namely, to his physical (טבעי), vital (חיוני), and spiritual (נפסאני) natures. Ibn Aknin always gives the first and second explanations first, and then the philosophical interpretation. The commentary is invaluable to the history of Biblical literature and exegesis, inasmuch as all the interpreters therein enumerated have, with the exception of Saadia, hitherto not been known as commentators of the Song of Songs. These expositors form an important addition to the history of interpretation given by Ginsburg (Historical and Critical Commentary of the Song of Songs, Longman 1857). Ibn Aknin died about 1226. Comp. also the masterly monograph of Munk, Notice sur Joseph b. Jehuda, Par. 1842; and the very elaborate article of Steinschneider, in Ersch und Gruber's Allgemeine Encyclopädie, s. v. Joseph Ibn Aknin.—C. D. G.

IBN ALI. [JESHUAH B. JEHUDAH.]

IBN BALAAH JEHUDAH (יהודה בן בלעם), called in Arabic Abu-Zakaria Jahja, and by Ibn Ezra יהודה המדקדק הראשון, R. Jehudah, the first grammarian, בן בלעם הספרדי, Ben Balaam the Spaniard, one of the most distinguished philologists and commentators of the Spanish school, who lived in Seville between A.D. 1050 and 1090. He wrote (1) ספר טעמי המקרא, a work on the accents of the Bible, which was first edited by Jo. Mercer under the title De accentibus scripturae pro saicus, Par., Rob. Stephanus, 1565. Some portions of this book have been incorporated by Heidenheim in his excellent work called משפטי הטעמים [HEIDENHEIM.] (2) שער טעמי נ' ספרים אמ"ח, on the Poetical accents of Job, Proverbs, and the Psalms, first published by Mercer, Paris 1556, and recently re-edited with the remarks of the most ancient grammarians upon these peculiar accents, as well as notes and an introduction, by G. J. Polak,

Amsterdam 1858. (3) ספר הפעלים שנמצאו מנורות, השמות, on the denominative verbs in the Hebrew language. These denominatives are arranged in alphabetical order, and commented upon in Arabic. This work has not yet been published, but specimens of it in Hebrew have been printed by Leopold Dukes in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, No. 42. (4) ספר אותות הענינים, a treatise on the Hebrew particles, in alphabetical order. This work, too, has not as yet been printed, but specimens of it have been published both by Dukes and Fürst in Literaturblatt des Orients, Nos. 29 and 42. (5) ספר הוהננים, a treatise on the Hebrew homonyms, in alphabetical order, extracts of which have been published by Dukes in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, No. 4. (6) A Commentary on the Pentateuch, written in Arabic: though this work has long been known through Ibn Ezra, who quotes it in his commentary on Gen. xlix. 6; Exod. v. 19; yet it is only lately (1851) that the indefatigable Dr. Steinschneider has discovered a MS. in the Bodleian Library containing the commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy. Ibn Balaam always gives the grammatical explanation of the words first, he then enters into a minute disquisition on Saadia's translation and exposition of the Pentateuch, which he generally rejects, then explains the passage according to its context, and finally sets forth the Halachic and the judicial interpretation of the Talmud. A specimen of this commentary, which is extremely important to the Hebrew text and the Massora, has been communicated by Adolph Neubauer in the Journal Asiatique of December 1861. It is on Deut. v. 6, upon which Ibn Balaam remarks, 'As to the different readings of the two Decalogue (i.e., Exod. xx. 2-17, and Deut. v. 6-21), Saadia is of opinion that they contain two different revelations. He entertains the same view respecting those Psalms which occur twice with some verbal variations [ex. gr., Ps. xiv. and liii.], and respecting the different readings of the Babylonian and Palestinian codices. Thus, for example, when the Babylonians omit the words ביום ההוא in Zech. xiv. 4, which the Palestinians insert, he takes this as a proof that this prophecy was revealed in two different forms. He, in like manner, adheres to both readings in every other prophecy in which similar verbal variations are found, because both have been revealed. I, however, find it more probable that tradition is the cause of these different readings, inasmuch as some have undoubtedly heard the prophet use such expressions on one occasion, and others heard from him other expressions on another occasion, and both traditions have been followed. This, I am also of opinion, is the cause of the differences between Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali [BEN ASHER; BEN NAPHTALI], each of them found a copy, according to one such tradition, which he followed without any regard to the deviations. And this is the case with all the difference between the Westerns and the Easterns which the ancients have fixed.' From this important passage we get to know a remarkable variation between the Western and Eastern codices which is not mentioned elsewhere, namely, that the words בְּיוֹם הַהוּא (Zech. xiv. 2) are omitted in the latter; we also get to know why the Syriac version has not these words; and we, moreover, see in what light Saadia and others regarded the various readings. (7) A Commentary on the Psalms, quoted by Ibn Ezra on Ps. iv. 8; vii. 6, 7; x. 14; xxiv. 2; liv. 7; lxxxi. 17; lxxxiv. 4; lxxxv. 2; lxxxviii. 5; cvii. 28; cxv. 7; cxix. 8; cxliv. 8. (8) A Commentary on the Song of Songs, which, according to Ibn Aknin, who quotes it, gives a literal exposition of this book [IBN AKNIN]. (9) A Commentary on Isaiah, quoted by Joseph Albo (Ikarim, sec. i. 1), from which it appears that Ibn Balaam, contrary to the generally received opinion, explained away the Messianic prophecies, and interprets Is. xi. as referring to Hezekiah. From Ibn Ezra's quotation on Zech. ix. 7 and Dan. x. 1, it seems as if he had also written commentaries on these books. Ibn Balaam is one of the most liberal interpreters, and quotes Christian commentators and the Koran in his expositions. Comp. Steinschneider, *Catalogus Libr. IBN BARUCH, BARUCH, a distinguished Jewish philosopher and commentator, flourished in the 16th century at Venice. He published a twofold commentary on Ecclesiastes, called by the double name of קהלת יעקב, the Congregation of Jacob, and קדוש ישראל, Holy Israel (Venice 1599), the first of which is discursive and diffuse, and the second exegetical and brief. Based upon the first verse, 'the words of Coheleth, son of David, king in Jerusalem,' he maintains that two persons are speaking in its book, a sceptic named Coheleth, and a believer called Ben David, and accordingly treats the whole as a dialogue, in which these two characters are shown to discuss the most important problems of moral philosophy, and the philosophic systems of Greece and Arabia are made to furnish the two heroes of the dialogue with the necessary philosophic materials. The remarkable part of it is that the Quæstiones disputatæ de Anima of Thomas Aquinas, which were translated into Hebrew by Ali Xabillo, are used, both to put objections into the mouth of the sceptic, and to supply the believer with replies. Thus, when the sceptical Coheleth questions the immortality of the soul (Ecc. ii. 15, a), he uses the same objections which Thomas Aquinas uses with regard to the soul in question xiv. of his work on the soul; and the believing Ben David, in refuting these objections, employs the arguments of Aquinas (comp. also Commentary, 65, a; 71, b; 96, a; 97, c; 117, a; 118, b; 119, a). This commentary is most important to the understanding of the Jewish philosophy, and must be added to the history of the interpretation of Ecclesiastes given by Ginsburg, Historical and Critical Commentary on Ecclesiastes; comp. Jellinek, Thomas von Aquino in der jüdischen Literatur, Leipzig 1853, p. ii. 13 and vii.—C. D. G.

IBN CASPI OR CASPE (אִבְנֵי כַסְפִּי), JOSEPH B. ABBA MARI B. JOSEPH B. JACOB. This remarkable philosopher, poet, lexicographer, and commentator, who was born about A.D. 1280, is supposed to have derived his name from his native place L'Argentierre, in Languedoc, now in the department of L'Ardeche, ten miles from Privas, of which כַּסְפִּי is a Hebrew translation. His brilliant powers and fondness for Biblical exegesis he evinced at the early age of seventeen, when he published the masterly commentaries upon Ibn Ezra's exposition of the Pentateuch, and upon Ibn Ganach's celebrated grammatical work, called ספר הרקמה [IBN GANACH]. In his thirtieth year (circa 1310) he devoted himself to the study of logic and the speculative sciences, as well as to the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures, in accordance with the rules of these sciences. Passing by the philosophical and ethical productions of this voluminous writer, we shall give a list of his grammatical, lexical, and exegetical works, and state the principles of interpretation by which he was guided. He wrote (1) a commentary (פְּרִישָׁה) on Ibn Ganach's grammatical work. (2) An etymological work, called כַּסְפִּי בְּרִחוּקוֹת, silver chains, containing general remarks on the roots (שְׁרָשִׁים) of the Hebrew language, in which he shows that in Hebrew more than in any other language things derive their names from certain accidents. (3) A Hebrew lexicon called כַּסְפִּי בְּשֵׁרָשׁוֹת or שְׁרָשׁוֹת, small silver chains or roots, which is one of his most interesting and important works. He starts from the principle that every root has only one general idea as its basis, and logically deduces from it all the other shades of meaning. A copy of this work in MS., 2 vols. 4to, is in the Paris library, and another in the Angelica at Rome. Abravanel frequently quotes it in his commentary on the Pentateuch (comp. p. 7), on Isaiah (comp. xlv. 3; lxvi. 17), etc.; Wolf gives a specimen of it (Bibliotheca Hebraea i. 1543); Richard Simon used the Paris MS. (Hist. Crit., lib. i. cap. xxxi.), and Leopold Dukes printed extracts from it (Literaturblatt des Orients, 1847, p. 486). (4) A commentary on Ibn Ezra's exposition of the Pentateuch called פְּרִישָׁה הַכַּסְפִּי, the silver summary. (5) Rules about most of the mysteries of the Pentateuch (סִתְרֵי תוֹרָה), and explanations of its apparently superfluous statements, called טִירַת כַּסְפִּי, a silver castle. (6) A supplement to the preceding work, entitled עֲמֻדֵי כַּסְפִּי, silver pillars. (7) A commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled לְכַסְפִּי, a refining-pot for silver, in the introduction to which he gives an analysis of its tendency and parts. Abravanel gives an extract from it in his commentary on the Pentateuch (comp. Levit. xx. 10-21, p. 205, ed. Hanau). (8) A collection of those expositions of the Pentateuch, in which Ibn Caspi differs from Maimonides and Ibn Ezra, called כַּסְפִּי בְּבַסּוֹן, silver basons. (9) A commentary on eight prophets, called מטות כסף, silver staves—on Isaiah (lii. liv.), which is one of these prophets, Ibn Caspi is very severe upon those who explain these prophecies as referring to the Messiah [IBN DANAN]. (10) An exposition of the Psalms, called מזמורת כסף, silver snuffers, an extract of which has been published by Leopold Dukes (comp. Literaturblatt des Orients, 1849, pp. 11, 14). (11) A commentary on Proverbs, the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. Of the commentary on Proverbs, which is one of Ibn Caspi's most valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis, the beginning and end have been published by Werblumer (comp. קבוצת כסף, 1846, p. 19, etc.); an analysis of the commentary on Ecclesiastes is given by Ginsburg (comp. Historical and Critical Commentary on Ecclesiastes, Longman, 1861, p. 60, etc.), and the brief commentary on, or rather introduction to, the Song of Songs, which was published in 1577, but which is rarer than the MSS., has been reprinted with an English translation by Ginsburg (comp. Historical and Critical Commentary on the Song of Songs, Longman, 1857, p. 47, etc.). (12) A commentary on Job, called שולחן כסף, a silver table. (13) An exposition of Ruth and Lamentations, entitled כפות כסף, silver censers. (14) A commentary on Esther, called גלילי כסף, silver rings. (15) A commentary on Daniel, called קערה כסף, silver dishes. (16) An exposition of Ezra and Chronicles, entitled חגורת כסף, a silver girdle; (17) A commentary on all the passages found in the Pentateuch and in the Prophets which refer to the creation, called מזרק כסף, a silver vase. (18) A commentary on the miracles and other mysteries found in the Pentateuch, Prophets, and Hagiography, called גביע כסף, a silver cup. (19) One hundred profound questions in connection with the Pentateuch and Prophets, called כסף סינים, dross silver.

* The word כַּסְפִּי, silver, which is found in the titles of Ibn Caspi's works, is in allusion to his name כַּסְפִּי.

As to the principles of interpretation by which Ibn Caspi was guided in explaining the Bible, we cannot do better than give them in his own words. 'The Sacred Scriptures,' says he in his exposition of the Proverbs, 'must be explained according to their plain and literal sense; and a recondite meaning can as little be introduced into them as into Aristotle's writings on logic and natural history. Only where the literal meaning is not sufficient, and reason rejects it, a deeper sense must be resorted to. If we once attempt to allegorise a simple and intelligible passage, then we might just as well do it with the whole contents of the Bible.' . . . 'The logical division of sentences is the most indispensable and best auxiliary to the right understanding of the Bible, and the criterion to the proper order of the words are the Massora and the accents.' We see from this extract that this writer of the middle ages anticipated the hermeneutical rules of modern criticism at a time when the schoolmen and the depositaries of Christian learning were engaged in hair-splitting and in allegorizing every fact of the Bible. It is greatly to be regretted that nearly all the exegetical works of Ibn Caspi are still unpublished. Comp. IBN CHAJIM, AARON, was born at Fez about 1570. He wrote (1) a Commentary on Joshua and (2) another on Judges, giving first the verbal ביאור explanation, and then an exposition (סדרש) of the text, which were published in Venice 1608-1609. A selection of these commentaries has been published in Frankfurter's Great Rabbinic Bible, under the title of לב אהרן, the heart of Aaron [FRANKFURTER]. (3) A Commentary on Sifra (ספרא), or the traditional explanation of Leviticus, which Ibn Chajim published in Venice, 1609-1611, under the title of קרבן אהרן, the oblation of Aaron. (4) A treatise on R. Ishmael's thirteen rules for interpreting the Scriptures [R. ISHMAEL], called מדות אהרן, the rules of Aaron, Venice 1609, and Dessau 1712.—C. D. G.

IBN DANAN, SAADIA B. MAIMON, a Jewish poet, lexicographer, and commentator of the Spanish school, born about A.D. 1450. His works which bear upon the interpretation of the Bible and the elucidation of its language, are (1) A Commentary on Isaiah lii. 13 in MS. (cod. MS. Michael 412), in which he tells us that Ibn Caspi regards those who interpret this of the Messiah to be as greatly in error as those who refer it to Jesus of Nazareth, but Ibn Saadia adds to this remark, 'May God have mercy upon him!' i.e., upon Ibn Caspi. And (2) A Hebrew Lexicon, written in Arabic. This work, too, is still in MS.; but Pinsker has given an extract from it in his Lickute Kadmonoth, Vienna 1860, p. 74. Comp. IBN DAUD, JEHUDAH. [CHAJUG.]

IBN DJANAH. [IBN GANACH.]

IBN EZRA, ABRAHAM B. MEIER, also called by the Jews ראב"ע (רא'בע), from the initials of Rabbi Abraham ben Ezra (אברהם בן עזרא), and by the scholastics Ebenare or Evenare, one of the most remarkable of the Jewish literati of the middle ages, who commanded the whole cycle of knowledge of his time, was born in Toledo in 1088-1089, and very soon distinguished himself as a mathematician, astronomer, philosopher, poet, physician, traveller, theologian, grammarian, and commentator. It is, however, with his labours as a Biblical commentator and grammarian, to which he consecrated his varied learning, that we have to deal. Upon those labours he first entered in the eternal city, where he published, in his fiftieth year (1140), Commentaries on the Five Megilloth (חמשה מגילות), viz., The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Coheleth, and Esther, which were immediately followed by an Exposition of Job, and two grammatical treatises on the language of the Sacred Scriptures, one being a Hebrew translation of Chajug's Arabic work [CHAJUG], and the other an original production called מאזנים, the balance. These were succeeded by another Hebrew Grammar entitled צחות, on the purity of the Hebrew style, which he published whilst in Mantua, in 1145.

From Mantua this erratic genius emigrated to Lucca, where he wrote in 1154 and 1155 his masterly commentaries on Isaiah and the Pentateuch, as well as two grammatical treatises—one independent, called ספר, and the other polemic, entitled שפת הטר, being a rejoinder to Ibn Librat's attack on Saadia [IBN LIBRAT; SAADIA]. We then find him in 1155-1157 issuing commentaries on Daniel, the Psalms, and the Minor Prophets, in Rhodes, then in 1159 publishing an energetic defence of the Sabbath in London, and then again in Rhodes, where he issued in 1166 a second edition of his commentary on the Pentateuch, and another grammatical work called שפת ברורה. He now determined to return to Spain, at the advanced age of seventy-eight; but died on his journey when he arrived at Calahorra, on the borders of Navarre and Arragon, in 1166.

2. His principles of interpretation and the merits of his commentaries.—The contradictions of which human nature is composed appear more glaringly in the commentaries of Ibn Ezra than in the writings of the majority of great men. His keen and daring researches brought him to the very verge of Pantheism, yet his faith in revelation was at times perfectly fanatical. He questioned the genuineness of many portions of the Pentateuch, as well as the latter part of Isaiah, regarded the history of Jonah as a dream, and charged the chronicles with a blunder (Exod. xxv. 29); yet he anathematized Itzhaki for doing the same thing (comp. Gen. xxxvi. 30), and denounced free inquiry as heretical. His confidence in God, and resignation to the gracious dealings of Providence, were almost unbounded, yet he fully believed in the irresistible influence of the stars on human actions. He traced every phenomenon in the Bible to a natural origin, yet he propounded a mystical theory, according to which all things are wrapped up in profound darkness, and execrated Chavi El Balchi for doing similar things (comp. Exod. xiv. 27; xvi. 3; xxxiv. 29)—he was a rigid literalist yet a great mystic. Notwithstanding these contradictions, Ibn Ezra was born a commentator, and was the first who raised Biblical exegesis to a science, interpreting the text according to the laws of language. In his commentary on the Song of Songs, which, as we have seen, was one of his earliest exegetical productions, he already laid down the principle that in the interpretation of unique expressions in the Hebrew Scriptures we may derive great help from cognate languages: 'As the Bible,' says he, 'is all the Hebrew we possess containing the limited vocabulary used by the inspired men to express their wants, and as the Arabic very much resembles the Hebrew, the conjugations, vowel (אותיות), and servile letters, the Niphal and the Hithpaal, the construct state and the numerals being alike in both languages, and more than half of the Arabic vocabulary being found in the Hebrew, therefore every ἀπαξ λεγόμεν in the Hebrew which occurs in Arabic may be supposed to have the same sense in the former which it has in the latter; still you cannot always rely upon it' (Comment. on Song of Songs, viii. 11). Hence we find him constantly illustrating peculiar forms in the Hebrew Bible by examples from the Arabic (comp. on Gen. xi. 3; xx. 16; xxxvi. 20; Exod. ii. 3; iii. 3; ix. 31; xli. 9; xlv. 4; xlii. 17; xv. 2; xvi. 1; xxi. 18; xxiv. 6; xxv. 4; xxxviii. 20; xxix. 2; xxxi. 2; xxxvi. 8; Levit. ii. 1; vi. VOL. II.

26; xi. 12, 15, 21, 44; xii. 2; xiii. 32; xxvii. 19; Num. x. 31; xl. 15, 25; xxxii. 29; Deut. xxviii. 22, 27) and the Chaldee (comp. on Gen. ix. 27; xii. 9; xix. 8; xxxvii. 3; xli. 45; Exod. xxvii. 8; xxviii. 20; xxxvi. 8; Deut. i. 37). His ingenious criticisms of the text deserve the greatest attention of the Biblical student and Hebrew grammarian. He denies the existence of diminutives in Hebrew (see Comment. on Eccl. xii. 5), which is taken for granted by Gesenius (Hebrew Grammar, sec. 86, 2, 4) and Ewald (Lehrbuch, sec. 167), and most ingeniously accounts for the four letters אלהי constituting the original vowels (see Comment. on Eccl. vii. 19). Having travelled in Italy, Provence, England, Rhodes, Palestine, Africa, and India, this shrewd observer and profound scholar frequently illustrates the manners and customs mentioned in the Bible by those of other nations with whom he mixed (comp. Comment. on Gen. iii. 20; xxx. 24; xxxviii. 8; Num. xii. 1), and also makes some valuable remarks on Biblical geography, viz., on Egypt (see Comment. on Gen. ii. 11; Exod. vii. 15; xiii. 8, 31; xx. 8; Num. xiii. 8); Gadomes (Exod. xxv. 5); Arabia (Gen. xxxi. 4; Exod. xvi. 3), Palestine (Exod. x. 19); Persia and India (Esther vii. 8). His knowledge of the Hebrew Bible was truly wonderful. Though living at a time when no concordances existed, yet he knew whether a word or a certain form of a word was unique or not (comp. Comment. on Gen. vi. 14; xli. 23; Exod. ix. 27; Levit. i. 15; vi. 14; xl. 20; xiii. 55; Num. xii. 5; xxii. 22; xxiv. 3; Deut. vi. 8). Equal to this marvellous knowledge of the Scriptures was his extensive acquaintance with the best grammatical, lexical, and exegetical works of his predecessors and contemporaries, which he constantly quotes. Aaron Ha-Cohen (Gen. xxxiv. 30; xlix. 6; Levit. xviii. 6); Abraham Ha-Nassi (Dan. xi. 3); Ben Ha-Jotzer (Dan. x. 25); Ibn Sita (Exod. ii. 2; xxi. 24; xxii. 5, 28); Ben Ephraim (Exod. xix. 16); Chajug (Gen. xli. 48; Exod. vii. 5; x. 8; xxi. 8; Num. x. 36; xxxiii. 13; Deut. xxix. 29; Is. xiv. 20; xxvi. 20; xlix. 5; lxxv. 10; Habak. ii. 19; iii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 14; lxxxvii. 7; cii. 28; cxxxvii. 2; cl. 6; Job xxxviii. 5; Ruth i. 20; Eccl. ix. 12; xii. 5); Chavi El Balchi (Exod. xiv. 27; xvi. 13; xxxiv. 29); Dunash b. Gorion (Gen. xxxvii. 25; Is. ii. 2; Hos. xiv. 2; Hag. ii. 9; Ps. xlix. 20; cxx. 5; Dan. ii. 39; xi. 3); R. Joshua (Gen. xxxviii. 11; Exod. iii. 3; Levit. xvi. 1, al.); Judah Ha-Levi (Exod. iv. 10; Num. xxvii. 3; Deut. xiv. 21, al.); R. Levi (Ps. vii. 10; xxxv. 13); Menachem b. Saruk (Exod. vi. 3; Deut. xxii. 9; Is. lix. 16; Hag. ii. 12); Moses b. Amram Ha-

Parsi (Exod. xii. 5; Amos vii. 14); Moses Ha-Nagid (Is. lvii. 9); Saadia (Gen. i. 1; Exod. ii. 8; Levit. ii. 9; Num. xix. 2; Deut. vii. 21, et.); Samuel b. Chofni (Gen. iii. 1; xxxviii. 11; Exod. iv. 24, 25; viii. 5; Levit. xvi. 10; Num. xxii. 28), are cited alternately for approbation and disapprobation. Some of the works of these distinguished writers would not have been known but for the quotations preserved by Ibn Ezra. Hence his commentaries may be regarded as furnishing most valuable materials for the construction of a history of O. T. exegesis. No wonder that his commentaries were a complete triumph over the allegorical and trifling manner in which the Bible was expounded both by the synagogue and the church, and that even the great luminary Maimonides charged his son, in his last will and testament, not to study any other commentaries but those of Ibn Ezra, 'which are exceedingly good, and cannot be consulted without profit, and which, for beauty of thought, clearness of wisdom, and clearness of perception, are unlike any other writings.' Ibn Ezra's style is very concise and sometimes very obscure, which is to be ascribed to the fact that he formed a technical phraseology of his own, that the good humour with which he exposes the expositions of his opponents is often expressed in plays upon words, and that he not unfrequently veiled his scepticism about the Mosaic authorship of certain portions of the Pentateuch in ambiguous and laconic phrases. Thus, for instance, upon

Gen. xii. 6 he remarks (יש לו סוד ומשכיל ידום), 'there is a mystery here, but the wise man will be quiet.' Another way in which he expresses his scepticism may be seen in Gen. xxii. 14, where he remarks 'the meaning of the words יראה יראה is to be found in the section אלה הדברים', i.e., at the beginning of his commentary on Deuteronomy, and on turning to the place we simply find an enumeration of all the post Mosaic passages in the Pentateuch. Or he merely says, 'this passage belongs to the mystery of the twelve verses,' i.e., it is not written by Moses, just as the last twelve verses of the Pentateuch, which narrate the death and burial of Moses, were not written by him.

3. The best editions and translations of his commentaries according to the order of the Hebrew Bible, etc. (1) Commentary on the Pentateuch, פרש על התורה, the best edition of which is the one edited by Jekuthiel Lasi b. Nachum, Amsterdam 1721, under the title of מרגליות טובה, the pearl of great price, with square letters, and the super commentaries of Joseph b. Eleazar Sefardi (אהל יוסף), Samuel Motot (פ' המוטוט וסגולת סתרים), and Samuel Zarza (ספר מקור חיים). The commentary is also given in the Rabbinic Bibles of Bomberg, Buxtorf, and Frankfurter. The introduction of this valuable commentary has been translated into Latin by Voisin, Disputa. R. Israelis de Anima, Paris 1635, p. 151-167, and I. Galle, Upsala 1711. Richard Simon gives an analysis of it in his Historia Critique, lib. iii., cap. 5; and the Comment. on the Decalogue was translated into Latin by Seb. Münster, Froben 1527. (2) The Commentary on the Earlier Prophets (i.e., Joshua, Judg., Sam., and Kings) has not as yet been published. (3) Of the Commentary on the Later Prophets (i.e., Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel), Isaiah only is given in the Rabbinic Bibles of Bomberg, Buxtorf, and Frankfurter. (4) The Commentary on the Minor Prophets is given entire in the Rabbinic Bibles. Of these we have a Latin translation of Hosea by Mercer, Leyden 1621; a Latin translation of Joel and Obadaja, by Leusden, Utrecht 1657; of Jonah by Leusden, Utrecht 1656; of Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, and Haggai, by Don. Lund, Upsala 1705-1708; and of Malachi, by And. Borgwall, Upsala 1707. (5) The Commentary on the Hagiographa (i.e., Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the Five Megilloth, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles) is, with the exception of Chronicles, given in the great Rabbinic Bibles. There are Latin versions of the 119th Psalm by Ph. Aquinas, Lib. Vetr. Rabb., etc., ed. 1620; of the Song of Songs, by Gilbert Gereboard, Paris 1585; an English version of the first chapter is given by Ginsburg, Commentary on the Song of Songs, Longman, 1857, p. 45. Latin of Ruth by Jo. Carpov, 1722, ed. 3; English of the first chapter of Ecclesiastes by Ginsburg, Commentary on Ecclesiastes, Longman, 1861, p. 46; and Latin of Lamentations by Fr. Taylor, London 1615. Zedner of the British Museum has published the commentary on Esther after another recension (London 1850). As to his grammatical works the best edition of (1) ספרי, Rudiments of Hebrew Grammar, is by Wolf Heidenheim, Offenbach 1794; (2) ספר צומת, Critical Grammar of the Hebrew Language, by H. Lippman, Fürth 1827; (3) שפה ברורה, on diverse points of Hebrew Grammar, by H. Lippmann, Fürth 1839; (4) שפת יתר, on difficult words in the Old Testament, in defence of Saadia, by G. H. Lippmann, Frankfurt on Main. 1843; (5) חידה על

חידה על, Grammatical enigma in poetry on the quiescent letters, is given at the beginning of Ibn Ezra's Commentary on the Pentateuch in the great Rabbinic Bibles, and has been translated into Latin by De Lara, Leyden 1658; (6) חידה על מן, Grammatical enigma in Prose on the two liquids ו and נ is given in Lippmann's edition of Ibn Ezra's ספה ברורה. Ibn Ezra's translations of Chajug's grammatical works are noticed in the article CHAJUG. Comp. IBN GANACH, or DJANAH JONAH, or ABUL-VALID MERVAN, as he is called in Arabic. This famous grammarian and lexicographer, who is alternately quoted in Jewish writings by the names of ר' יונה, R. Jonah; ר' יונה המדקדק, R. Jonah the Grammarian; ר' יונה הספרי, R. Jonah the Spaniard; ר' יונה הרופא, R. Jonah the Physician; ר' יונה הרופא אבן ננאח, R. Jonah the Physician, Ibn Ganach; and מרינוס, R. Merinus (derived from מרון = Mervan),* was born at

* That Iona Ibn Ganach and Merinus designate the same person has already been remarked by David Kimchi, who most plainly declared in his

Cordova about A.D. 995, and died about 1050. When quite a youth Ibn Ganach evinced his skill in the sacred language by writing Hebrew poetry. This, however, he soon gave up for the more solid and arduous studies of Hebrew grammar and lexicography under the guidance of Isaac Ibn Gikatilla [GIKATILLA], and of medicine, in the academy which was called into existence by the literary tastes of the Caliph Al-Hakem II. But his studies and domestic peace were soon interrupted, as he, like many of his co-religionists, had to quit Cordova in consequence of the sufferings which were inflicted upon the inhabitants of that devoted city in the year 1013, after it was taken by Al-Mostain Suleiman. He went to Saragossa, where he settled down when about twenty years of age (1014-1015), practised medicine for a maintenance, and devoted all his spare time to the prosecution of his researches in sacred philology and hermeneutics, which were the chief aim of his life; and his achievements in these departments are truly marvellous. Independent in his researches, and sincerely believing that whatever tends to evolve the true sense of the inspired text ought to be publicly made known, though it might be contrary to venerated opinions and against one's own interests, Ibn Ganach published (1) the first instalment of his labours in Arabic, in the form of additions to and correction of Chajug's grammatical treatise on the quiescent letters [ספר אותיות חנוך] (CHAJUG), under the title of אמסחלחוק Hebrew ספר הדשנה, Supplement or Strictures, which is a very important contribution to Biblical exegesis. But notwithstanding the excellency of his criticisms, and the meek and gentle spirit of their author, and in spite of his acknowledgment 'that he, in common with many others, had sucked at Chajug's breast of wisdom,' but that he must say with Aristotle, 'his love for truth is greater even than his love for Plato'; these strictures upon so celebrated a man provoked the disciples of Chajug, and Samuel Ha-Nagid issued a rejoinder to Ibn Ganach's animadversions [SAMUEL HA-NAGID]. To this Ibn Ganach replied in a treatise, (2) entitled ספר התכלמה Hebrew ספר התכמה, the book of reproach or correction, which, like its predecessor, contains very valuable grammatical and exegetical remarks. He then published (3) a polemical work called ספר רסאלה Hebrew ספר רסאלה, the book of recollections; (4) another called ספר אלתקריב and ואלתסחיל Hebrew ספר אלתקריב, the book of approximation and rectification; and (5) another entitled רסאלה אלתסחיל Hebrew ספר ההשואה, the book of reconciliation.

Michlol, 'And the teacher Ben Ganach, the same who is constantly called in this book R. Jonah, and whom people generally call R. Marinus' (ed. Venice, 13, a). The celebrated Orientalist, Edward Pococke, also remarks, 'Abu Valid, whom he [i.e., David Kimchi] often cites by the name of Rabbi Jonah, as Aben Ezra doth by the name of R. Marinus, his name at length being Abu Valid Marum Ebn Janachi Cordubensis' (Preface to the Commentary on Micha, vol. i., p. 10, ed. Twell's, London 1740). It is, therefore, all the more remarkable that Wolf should make R. Marinus to be the father of R. Jonah (Bibliotheca Hebraea, i. p. 486).

He also wrote (6) a Commentary on the Song of Song, which, according to Ibn Akinin, who quotes it, gives a literal exposition of this book [IBN AKININ]. Whilst engaged in these polemical works, all of which are valuable contributions to Hebrew lexicography and Biblical exegesis, Ibn Ganach prepared himself for his chef d'œuvre, called אלתנקיח, the critic, which he finished in his advanced age, and divided into two parts; the one (7) being a treatise on grammar as connected with exegesis, entitled כתאב אללמע Hebrew ספר הרקמה, the book of embroidery; and the other (8) a Lexicon, entitled כתאב אלאצול Hebrew ספר השרשים, the book of roots. This gigantic work is the most important philological production in the Jewish literature of the middle ages. The mastery of the science of the Hebrew language in all its delicate points which Ibn Ganach therein displays, the lucid manner in which he explains every grammatical difficulty, and the sound exegetical rules which he therein propounds, have few parallels up to the present day. He was not only the creator of the Hebrew syntax, but almost brought it to perfection. He was the first who pointed out the ellipses and the transposition of letters, words, and verses in the Hebrew Bible. He explained in a simple and natural manner more than two hundred obscure passages in the Bible, which had up to his time greatly perplexed all interpreters, by showing that the sacred writers used abnormal for normal expressions (comp. his ספר הרקמה, chap. xxviii.; Ibn Ezra's Commentary on Daniel i. 1, and ספר צלות, ed. Lippmann, p. 72, note). Though his faith in the inspiration of the Hebrew Scriptures was absolute, yet he maintained that, being addressed to men, they are subject to the laws of language, and hence urged that the abnormal expressions and forms in the Bible are not to be ascribed to the ignorance of transcribers and punctuators, nor to wilful corruption, but are owing to the fact that the sacred writers being human paid the tribute of humanity. The meek and gentle spirit which he manifested in the midst of his sufferings for his independent researches may be seen from his beautiful and touching combination of the servile letters into the voces memoriales, שלומי אך תבנה, O that my peace were established! But notwithstanding the opposition he met with during his life, no philologist has exercised directly and indirectly such an influence both upon Jewish and Christian grammarians and commentators as Ibn Ganach, as may be seen from Ibn Ezra's numerous references to him, as well as from the fact that the Lexicons of Parchi and David Kimchi are to a great extent translations of his Lexicon [PARCHON; KIMCHI]. All his works were written in Arabic. Analysis of the first, third, and fourth treatises are given in Ewald's Beiträge, i. p. 127-140; the sixth treatise, i.e., the grammar, entitled Sefer Ha-Rikma, which was translated into Hebrew by Ibn Tibbon, was published by Goldberg, Frankfurt on Main, 1856; of the seventh treatise, i.e., the Lexicon, a hundred and twenty-three fragments, which were found as marginal glosses in Ibn Ezra's and Ralbag's Commentary on the Pentateuch, have been published by S. D. Luzzatto in the Hebrew annual entitled Kerem Chemed, v. p. 34-47, Prag. 1841. Specimens of it have also been published by Gesenius

Jehudah Minz, and after he had finished his education he returned to Imola, where he spent the remainder of his life and wrote his commentaries. At the age of thirty-three (January 20, 1527) he issued his first exegetical work, which is (1) A Commentary on the Five Megilloth, viz., the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. This was followed by (2) A Commentary on the Psalms, which he published July 12; and (3) A Commentary on Proverbs, published on September 26 of the same year; and (4) A Commentary on Daniel, on 7th July 1529. The most important books, especially the Psalms, are preceded by very extensive introductions. Ibn Jachja died at Imola in 1539, having undermined his constitution with excessive literary labour; his remains were conveyed ten years after his death (1549) to Safet, where Joseph Caro had them deposited with great honour. The merits of his commentaries chiefly consist in the fact that they give a digest of the traditional interpretation of the Bible, and that the student of historico-critical exegesis finds in them ready at hand the Midrashic lore for which he would otherwise have to search in many an ancient volume. All the commentaries of Ibn Jachja are given in Frankfurter's Rabbinic Bible [FRANKFURTER]. The commentary on Daniel has been translated into Latin by Constantin L'Empereur, and published at Amsterdam, 1633, with the Hebrew text and a refutation of the anti-Christian passages. Comp. IBN JAISH (אִבְנֵי יַעֲשִׁי), BARUCH, b. Issac, b. Salomon, b. Isaac, b. Baruch of Cordova, flourished in the 15th century, wrote commentaries (1) on the Song of Songs, entitled מקור ברך על שיר השירים, the blessed fountain, etc., published at Constantinople 1576; and (2) on Ecclesiastes and Job, called מקור ברך על איוב וקהלת, the blessed fountain on Job and Ecclesiastes, Constantinople 1576. He generally gives the literal explanation of every passage according to the context, and tries to solve the grammatical difficulties of the text.—C. D. G.

IBN KASTOR. [ITZCHAKI.]

IBN KOREISH JEHUDAH, one of the earliest Jewish lexicographers, who flourished about A. D. 870 to 900 in Tahart (תַּחֲרִית) or Tahort in Africa, and may be regarded as the first who wrote on comparative philology. So little is known about his life, and so thoroughly have all the endeavours to ascertain his history been baffled, that it still remains a doubtful question whether he was a Karaite or a Rabbinic Jew. He wrote (1) a Hebrew Lexicon, to which Ibn Koreish himself refers in his רמב"ם, p. 45, and which has not as yet come to light. (2) ספר דקדוק, a Hebrew Grammar, which has also not been found yet; and (3) רמב"ם, an Epistle addressed to the Jewish community at Fez, in which he rebukes his brethren for neglecting to study the Chaldee paraphrases of the O. T., and tries to show that it is impossible to understand some portions of the Bible without the help of the cognate Semitic idioms. The treatise is divided into three parts.

In the first part Ibn Koreish arranges in alphabetical order all the Hebrew words which can only be explained with the help of the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uziel; in the second part he explains in alphabetical order those Biblical words which also occur in the Mishna and the Talmud; and in the third part he most minutely and carefully collects all the Hebrew roots, forms of expressions, prefixes, and suffixes, which have their analogy in the Arabic. In his illustrations and parallels Ibn Koreish shews that he had not only an intimate acquaintance with the Targumim and the Talmudic works, but also with the Koran and the Arabian poets (comp. pp. 80, 81, 82), and that he had sound judgment and fine grammatical tact. The work is an important contribution to Hebrew grammar and lexicography, and it is only to be regretted that it has not come down to us entire, since the first part breaks up with letter כ and does not begin again till letter פ. It has lately been published in the Arabic under the title R. Jehuda ben Koreish Tiharentensis Africani ad Synagogam Judaeorum civitatis Fez epistola de studiis Targum utilitate et de lingua chaldaica, misnica, talmudica, arabica, vocabulorum item nonnullorum barbaricorum convenientia cum hebraea; ediderunt J. J. L. Barges et D. B. Goldberg, Lutetiae Parisiorum 1857. The introduction, with specimens from the work, have been published in Arabic, with a German translation by Schnur, in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek der Biblischen Literatur, Leipzig 1790, vol. iii. p. 951-980; the introduction has also been published with a German translation by Wetzstein in Literaturblatt des Orients 1845, vol. iii. No. 2; and extracts are given by Ewald and Dukes, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ältesten Auslegung und Sprachklärung des Alten Testaments, Stuttgart 1844, i. 116-123; ii. 117, 118. The influence which Ibn Koreish exercised upon the development of Biblical exegesis and lexicography must have been very great, judging from the fact that he is quoted by the best grammarians and interpreters, ex. gr., Menachem b. Saruk (Lexicon under אֵלֶּיךָ, אֵינִי, אִכָּח, אִשָּׁה), Dunash (אֵלֶּיךָ), Raschi (comment. on Jer. xii. 10), Ibn Ezra (comment. on Amos vi. 10), Kimchi (Lexicon, art. שָׁנָה), etc. As for the so-called work אִבְנֵי יַעֲשִׁי, which Ibn Ezra quotes in the preface to his מנחת יצחק, and which has been taken by many to describe a distinct lingual treatise, this is nothing else than the third part of the רמב"ם, as has rightly been remarked by Graetz. Comp. Pinsker, Likutei Kadmonioth, Vienna 1860, p. 107, etc.; and additions to this work, p. 179, etc.—C. D. G.

IBN SARUK. [MENACHEM.]

IBN SERGADAH (אִבְנֵי סֶרְגָּדָה), AARON, also called Aaron Ha-Cohen (אֶהְרֹן כֹּהֵן) b. Joseph, a rich and learned merchant of Bagdad, who was an opponent of Saadia and was elected spiritual head (נָאֵר) of the academy at Pumbadita, A. D. 943. Whilst holding this high office he devoted himself to the exposition of the Hebrew Bible, and published a Commentary on the Pentateuch (פֶּרֶשׁ עַל הַתּוֹרָה), which has not as yet come to light.

From the fragments of it preserved by Ibn Ezra we see that Ibn Sergadah, though abiding by the traditional explanation of the Hebrew Scriptures, was by no means a slavish follower of ancient opinions. Fragments of his commentary are given by Ibn Ezra, on Gen. xviii. 28; xxxiv. 30; xlix. 6, 7; Exod. x. 12; Levit. xviii. 6; comp. Geiger, Jüdische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Leben, 1862, p. 297; Zunz, in Geiger's Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift, vol. iv., Stuttgart 1839, p. 389, etc.—C. D. G.

IBN SHOEIB (אִבְנֵי שְׂעִיב), JOEL, flourished about A.D. 1430-1490 at Tudela. He wrote (1) A Commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled עֲלֵת שֶׁבַת, the holocaust of Sabbath, which he finished in the year 1469, and was published in Venice 1577; (2) A Commentary on the Psalms, called נֹרָא תְהִלָּת, fearful in praises, published at Salonaica 1568-1569; (3) A Commentary on the Song of Songs, called בִּיאוֹר קֶצֶת, a brief exposition, published together with Abraham Levi's exposition, Sabionneta 1558; and (4) An Exposition of Lamentation, called בִּיאוֹר, which was published at Venice 1589. His liberality of mind in expounding the Hebrew Scriptures may be judged of from the fact that at the very time when his co-religionists were suffering most bitterly from the Christian nations of those days, Ibn Schreib maintained in his Commentary on the Psalms (fol. 12, b) that pious Gentiles will have a portion in the world to come (חֵלֶק לְעוֹלָם הַבָּא), and corroborated his opinion by references to the Tosifta, the Talmud, and the Midrashim. Comp. Zunz, Zur Geschichte und Literatur, Berlin 1845, p. 384; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 1400.—C. D. G.

IBN SITTA (בֶּן יִצְחָק), a distinguished Karaite Jew who lived at Irak about A.D. 900. His conscientious desire to explain the Scriptures made him exclude from his exposition all the points of controversy between the Rabbinic and Karaite Jews [KARAITES], and restrict his explanation to the grammatical forms and etymological significations of the words, as well as to tracing the logical sequence of every passage. Worthy of notice is his peculiar translation of Exod. xx. 26 by, 'and thou shalt not ascend my altar in sin,' deriving בַּמַּעֲלָת from מַעַל, to be treacherous, faithless. Other fragments of this commentary, which has not as yet come to light, are given by Ibn Ezra on Exod. xxi. 24, 35; xxii. 28. Saadia Gaon thought Ibn Sitta of sufficient importance to refute his interpretation, whilst Ibn Ezra exercises his withering sarcasm upon him. Comp. Pinsker, Likkute Kadmoniuth, Vienna 1860, p. 43; Fürst, Geschichte des Karäerthums, Leipzig 1862, pp. 100, 173.—C. D. G.

IBN TIBBON, JEHUDAH. B. SAUL, was born at Lunel about A.D. 1120, and had early to quit his native place for Provence in consequence of persecution. He was chiefly distinguished as a translator into Hebrew of some of the most valuable Jewish works which were written in Arabic, and is therefore denominated רֹאשׁ הַמַּעֲרָכִים, the prince of translators. He translated between 1161 duties of heart, of Joseph b. Bechai; (2) the ethics of Ibn Gebirol; (3) the renowned Kusari of Jehudah Ha-Levi; (4) the moral philosophy of Saadia Gaon; and (5) the famous grammatical and lexicographical work of Ibn Ganach. He also wrote (6) a work on the purity of the Hebrew language (סֹד צְהוּת), which is lost. Ibn Tibbon died about 1190. Comp. Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 1374-1376; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, Leipzig 1861, vol. vi., p. 241, etc.—C. D. G.

IBN TIBBON, SAMUEL, son of the preceding writer, was born about 1160, and died 1230. Besides the philosophical works both of heathen and Jewish authors which he translated, Samuel Ibn Tibbon wrote—(1) A Commentary on Ecclesiastes (פִּירוּשׁ קְהֵלֶת), which exists in MS. in several of the European libraries; and (2) A Commentary on Gen. i. 1-9, entitled מֵאֲמַר יְקוֹ הַמַּיִם, being a dissertation on the creation, published at Presburg 1837.—C. IBZAN (אִבְזָן, illustrious; Sept. Ἰβζαν), the tenth 'judge of Israel.' He was of Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem of Zebulun and not of Judah. He governed seven years. The prosperity of Ibzán is marked by the great number of his children (thirty sons and thirty daughters), and his wealth, by their marriages—for they were all married. Some have held, but without the least probability, that Ibzán was the same with Boaz: B.C. 1182 (Judg. xii. 8).—J. K.

I-CHABOD (אִי־כָבוֹד, where is the glory; Sept. Ὀυαβαχαβώθ, Ὀυαχαβώθ), son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. He is only known from the unhappy circumstances of his birth, which occasioned this name to be given to him. The pains of labour came upon his mother when she heard that the ark of God was taken, that her husband was slain in battle, and that these tidings had proved fatal to his father Eli. They were death-pains to her; and when those around sought to cheer her, saying, 'Fear not, for thou hast borne a son,' she only answered by giving him the name of I-chabod, adding, 'The glory is departed from Israel' (1 Sam. iv. 19-22): B.C. 1141. The name again occurs in 1 Sam. xiv. 3 [Eli].—J. K.

ICONIUM (Ἰκόνιον), a large inland city of Asia Minor, situated in the province of Lycaonia, on the military road between Antioch of Pisidia and Derbe. Strabo describes it as a small town, well peopled, and encompassed by a fertile region (xii. 6. 1). According to Cicero, it was the capital of Lycaonia (ad Fam. iii. 6. 8); but Xenophon places it on the eastern border of Phrygia (Anab. i. 2. 19), Ammianus Marcellinus reckoned it to Pisidia (xiv. 2), and Pliny states that in his time it was the capital of a distinct territory, governed by a tetrarch (H. N. v. 25). This may be the reason why the sacred writers do not speak of it as belonging to any of the great provinces of Asia Minor. Paul and Barnabas went from Antioch of Pisidia to Iconium, thus approaching it from the west by the military road which crosses the mountain chain (Acts xiii. 51). The population, like that of the other great cities of Asia Minor, was then mixed, consisting of play-loving and novelty-seeking Greeks, an old established and influential colony of Jews, who exercised their trades during the week, and met in their synagogue to read the Law on the Sabbath, some dignified Roman officials and soldiers, and probably a few of the ancient inhabitants of the country (Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, i. 196, 1st ed.) This explains the nature of the apostles' reception, and the cause of the events which followed. They went first to the synagogue as was their custom. Their preaching was successful, for 'a great multitude both of Jews and also of the Greeks believed' (Acts xiv. 1). The unbelieving Jews stirred up opposition, and a riot followed—part of the people holding with the Jews, and part with the apostles. This became at length so serious, that the lives of Paul and Barnabas were endangered, and they retired to Lystra, about twenty miles southward (ver. 6). The bitter hostility of the Jews followed them thither; they were attacked and stoned, and Paul was left for dead. Restored by a miracle, he soon returned to Iconium, 'confirming the souls of the disciples' (verses 7-21). Some years afterwards it appears that Paul paid another visit to Iconium, accompanied by Silas, travelling from Cilicia through Derbe and Lystra (xvi. 1-3). No particulars are given, and we cannot tell whether the 'persecutions and afflictions' of which he writes to Timothy came upon him partly in this latter tour or altogether during the former (2 Tim. iii. 11).

Iconium was the scene of the apocryphal story of Paul and Thecla, so often mentioned by Jerome, Augustine, and others of the early Fathers (see Jones On the Canon, where the Acts of Paul and Thecla are given in Greek and English, ii. 299, seq.; an abridgment of the legend is given in a note in Conybeare and Howson, i. 197). The church planted by the apostles continued to flourish, and the city itself to increase in importance under the Byzantine monarchs (Hierocles, p. 675). Iconium having been captured by the Seljukian Turks, became the capital of one of their dynasties, and may be regarded as the cradle of the Ottoman empire. It is one of the few towns of Asia Minor which have retained to the present day something of their ancient prosperity. Konieh, as it is now called, is a large city, the residence of a pasha, and head of a province. It is surrounded by a wall said to have been erected by the Seljukian sultans, but out of the ruins of older structures, as pieces of marble columns, capitals, and carved cornices appear everywhere in the masonry. Some of its mosques, minarets, palaces, and gateways, are beautiful specimens of Saracenic architecture. There are few remains of the Greek and Roman Iconium, besides the fragments of columns, and Greek inscriptions in the walls.

The situation of Konieh is very fine. It stands on a fertile plain, which towards the east stretches away to the horizon, while immediately behind the city, on the west, it is shut in by a semicircle of snow-capped mountains. Rich gardens and orchards, abundantly stocked with fruit trees, and watered by numerous streams from the neighbouring mountains, encircle the old city. The suburbs extend far beyond the walls, and, like those of Damascus, have a gay and picturesque appearance at a distance, but do not bear close inspection. The population is still mixed; and as it contains the tomb of one of the most venerated of Mohammedan saints, it is swarming with fanatical Dervishes. (Descriptions of Konieh are given by Kinneir, Travels in Asia Minor; Leake, Geog. of Asia Minor; Hamilton, Researches; Chesney, Euphrates Expedition.)—J. L. P.

IDALAH (יְדֻלָּה, Yia'alah; Sept. Ἰερύχῳ; Alex. Ἰαδῆλα), a town of Zebulun, apparently lying between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. xix. 15). It is only once mentioned in Scripture, and does not occur in any other writer. Bethlehem is situated about six miles west of Nazareth, and Idalah could not have been far distant from it. Its site is unknown.—J. L. P.

IDDO. 1. (יִדְדוֹ; Sept. Σαδδῶ; Alex. Σαδῶκ) The father of one of Solomon's purveyors.

2. (יִדְדוֹ; Sept. Ἀδδῖ) A descendant of Gershom

(1 Chron. vi. 21), called Adaiah, and placed among the ancestors of Asaph (ver. 41).

3. (יִדְדוֹ; Sept. Ἰαδαῖ; Alex. Ἰαδδαῖ) Son of Zechariah, prince of east Manasseh in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 21).

4. (יִדְדוֹ, K'ri יִדְדוֹ; Sept. Ἀδδῶ, Ἰωῆλ) A seer who wrote visions against Jeroboam, in which the deeds of Solomon were noticed (2 Chron. ix. 29); he also wrote the history of Rehoboam and Abijah; or rather perhaps, in conjunction with Seraiah, kept the public rolls during their reigns. It seems from 2 Chron. xiii. 22 that he named his book מִדְרָשׁ, Midrash, or 'Exposition.' Josephus (Antiq. viii. 9. 1) states that this Iddo was the prophet who was sent to Jeroboam at Bethel, and consequently the same that was slain by a lion for disobedience to his instructions (1 Kings xiii.); and many commentators have followed this statement.

5. (יִדְדוֹ, יִדְדוֹ; Sept. Ἀδδῶ, Ἀδαδαῖ, Ἀδδαῖ) Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1; Ezra v. 1; vi. 14; Neh. xii. 26).

6. (יִדְדוֹ; Sept.) Chief of the Jews of the captivity established at Casiphia, a place of which it is difficult to determine the position. It was to him that Ezra sent a requisition for Levites and Nethinim, none of whom had yet joined his caravan. Thirty-eight Levites and 220 Nethinim responded to his call (Ezra viii. 17-20), B.C. 457. It would seem from this that Iddo was a chief person of the Nethinim, descended from those Gibeonites who were charged with the servile labours of the tabernacle and temple. This is one of several circumstances which indicate that the Jews in their several colonies under the Exile were still ruled by the heads of their nation, and allowed the free exercise of their worship.

IDOLATRY. Introduction.—Idolatry is the worship of anything instead of God. The term, therefore, includes all the kinds of false and corrupt worship mentioned in the Bible. There is no exactly-corresponding general term in Hebrew, but there are some general terms that seem to have the same range but a less precise signification, such as תִּפְלוּת, 'vanity' in the N. T. εἰδωλολατρεία, idolatry, appears to be employed in its widest sense, as we may judge from the tropical use in Col. iii. 5, 'covetousness, which is idolatry.' It is to be remarked that the corruption of true religion is spoken of in the Bible in the same terms as paganism, as a sin of the same kind if not of the same degree.

The main subjects to be considered in this article are the origin of idolatry, the classification of different kinds of idolatry, the history of idolatry, so far as it is necessary for the illustration of the passages in the Bible relating to this matter, an examination of which will be interwoven with this historical outline, and the Hebrew terms for idolatry and idols.

i. Origin of Idolatry.—In the primæval period man appears to have had not alone a revelation but also an implanted natural law. Adam and some of his descendants, as late as the time of the Flood, certainly lived under a revealed system, now usually spoken of as the patriarchal dispensation, and St. Paul tells us that the nations were under a natural law. 'Man in his natural state must always have had a knowledge of God sufficient for the condition in which he had been placed. Although God 'in times past suffered all nations [or rather 'all the Gentiles,' παντα τα εθνη] to walk in their own ways, nevertheless He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.' 'For the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, [even] his eternal power and godhead.' But the people of whom we are speaking 'changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things,' 'and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever.' Thus arose that strange superstition which is known by the term Fetichism [or low nature-worship], consisting in the worship of animals, trees, rivers, hills, and stones' (Genesis of the Earth and of Man, 2d ed., pp. 160, 161). St. Paul speaks of those who invented this idolatry as therefore forsaken of God and suffered to sink into the deepest moral corruption. It is remarkable that among highly-civilized nations the converse obtains; moral corruption being very frequently the cause of the abandoning of true religion for infidelity.

St. Paul thus shews us what was the earliest kind of idolatry, but he does not state what mental condition gave rise to it. We can only trace this condition by examining those nations which still practice this lowest system, but we shall not enter upon this subject in the present article, and it is probable that it cannot be satisfactorily exhausted, as we can scarcely understand, however we may define, the mental condition of the races which practise fetichism.

ii. Classification of Idolatry.—All unmixed systems of idolatry may be classified under the following heads; all mixed systems may be resolved into two or more of them.

1. Low nature-worship or fetichism, the worship of animals, trees, rivers, hills, and stones. The fetichism of the Negroes is thought to admit of a belief in a supreme intelligence: if this be true such a belief is either a relic of a higher religion or else is derived from the Muslim tribes of Africa. Fetichism is closely connected with magic, and the Nigritian priests are universally magicians.

2. Shamanism, or the magical side of fetichism, the religion of the Mongolian tribes, and apparently the primitive religion of China.

3. High nature-worship, the worship of the sun, moon, and stars, and of the supposed powers of nature.

4. Hero-worship, the worship of deceased ancestors or leaders of a nation.

5. Idealism, the worship of abstractions or mental qualities, such as justice, a system never found unmixed.

Fetichism and Shamanism appear to be the only systems of idolatry which certainly have obtained and still obtain unmixed with any other. But it is easy to detect and detach the other systems, as will be seen in the next section.

iii. History of Idolatry.—Nothing is distinctly stated in the Bible as to any antediluvian idolatry. It is, however, a reasonable supposition that in the general corruption before the Flood idolatry was practised. And that such was the case may indeed be inferred on other evidence. There is no trace of the names of heathen divinities in the names of the antediluvians; but there are indications of ancestral worship in the postdiluvian worship of some of the antediluvian patriarchs. It can scarcely be doubted that the SET or SUTEKH of the Egyptian Pantheon is the Hebrew Seth. The Cainite Enoch was probably commemorated as Annacus or Nannacus at Iconium, though, this name being identified with Enoch, the reference may be to Enoch of the line of Seth [ARK, NOAH'S]. It is reasonable to suppose that the worship of these antediluvians originated before the Flood, for it is unlikely that it would have been instituted after it.

The earliest idolatry mentioned in the Bible is noticed in the last address of Joshua to the assembled tribes, where he says, speaking by Divine commission, 'Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, [even] Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor: and they served other gods' (xxiv. 2). Was this idolatry a worship of false gods, or a corruption of true religion? The passage seems to necessitate the former supposition. We must, therefore, inquire what the idolatry of the Babylonians and Chaldees of that period is likely to have been, and whether there are any traces of it among the Hebrews.

It will be best to give a summary of the main facts of Sir Henry Rawlinson's 'Essay' on the religion of the Babylonians and Assyrians in the Rev. George Rawlinson's Herodotus, as the most authoritative statement of the results of recent research. The Pantheons of Babylon and Nineveh, though originally dissimilar in the names of the divinities, cannot as yet be treated separately. The principal god of the Assyrians was Asshur, replaced in Babylonia by a god whose name is read Il or Ra. The special attributes of Asshur were sovereignty and power, and he was regarded as the especial patron of the Assyrians and their kings. It is the Semitic equivalent of the Hamitic or Scythic Ra, which suggests a connection with Egypt, although it is to be noticed that the same root may perhaps be traced in the probably Canaanite Heres. Next to Asshur or Il was a triad, consisting of Anu, who appears to have corresponded to Pluto, a divinity whose name is doubtful, corresponding to Jupiter, and Hea or Hoa, corresponding in position and partly in character to Neptune. The supreme goddess Mulita or Bilita (Mylitta or Beltis) was the wife of the Babylonian Jupiter. This triad was followed by another, consisting of Æther (Iva?), the sun, and the moon. Next in order, are 'the five minor gods, who, if not of astronomical origin, were at any rate identified with the five planets of the Chaldean system.' In addition, Sir H. Rawlinson enumerates several other divinities of less importance, and mentions that there are 'a vast number of other names,' adding this remarkable observation: 'Every town and village indeed throughout Babylonia and Assyria appears to have had its own particular deity, many of these no doubt being the great gods of the Pantheon disguised under rustic names, but others being distinct local divinities.' Sir H. Rawlinson contents himself with stating the facts discoverable from the inscriptions, and does not theorize upon the subject further than to point out the strong resemblances between this Oriental system and that of Greece and Rome, not indeed in the Aryan ground-work of the latter, but in its general superstructure. If we analyze the Babylonian and Assyrian system, we discover that in its present form it is mainly cosmic, or a system of high nature-worship. The supreme divinity appears to have been regarded as the ruler of the universe, the first triad was of powers of nature, the second triad and the remaining chief divinities were distinctly cosmic. But beneath this system were two others, evidently distinct in origin, and too deep-seated to be obliterated, the worship of ancestors and low nature-worship. Asshur, at the very head of the Pantheon, is the deified ancestor of the Assyrian race; and, notwithstanding a system of great gods, each city had its own special idolatry, either openly reverencing its primitive idol, or concealing a deviation from the fixed belief by making that idol another form of one of the national divinities. In this separation into its first elements of this ancient religion, we discover the superstitions of those races which, mixed but never completely fused, formed the population of Babylonia and Assyria, three races whose three languages were yet distinct in the inscribed records as late as the time of Darius Hystaspis. These races were the primitive Chaldeans, called Hamites by Sir H. Rawlinson, who undoubtedly had strong affinities with the ancient Egyptians, the Shemite Assyrians, and the Aryan Persians. It is not difficult to assign to these races their respective shares in the composition of the mythology of the countries in which they successively ruled. The ancestral worship is here distinctly Semitic: the name of Asshur proves this. It may be objected that such worship never characterized any other Semitic stock: that we find it among Turanians and Aryans: but we reply, that the Shemites borrowed their idolatry, and a Turanian or Aryan influence may have given it this peculiar form. The low nature-worship must be due to the Turanians. It is never discerned except where there is a strong Turanian or Nigritian element, and when once established it seems always to have been very hard to remove. The high nature-worship, as the last element, remains for the Aryan race. The primitive Aryan belief in its different forms was a reverence for the sun, moon, and stars, and the powers of nature, combined with a belief in one supreme being, a religion that, though varying at different times, and deeply influenced by ethnic causes, was never deprived of its essentially-cosmic characteristics.

The family of Abraham, as Shemites, would have naturally followed the ancestral worship of their people in Babylonia, were it still separately practised, unless the influence of neighbouring idolaters of another race had imbued them with a tendency to some other system. In the family-names there is no trace of any idolatry, nor does their later history furnish any clue but that of Laban's teraphim, for the time of Job is too distant and his position too different to afford us any aid. Laban's idolatry being the next mentioned in Scripture, we may pass on to consider it for the illustration of our present subject.

When Jacob left Padan-aram, Rachel stole and carried away her father Laban's teraphim. These teraphim Laban greatly valued, as we may judge from his determined search. He called them his gods (Gen. xxxi. 30, 32), though he was not without a belief in the true God (24, 49-53). It has indeed been thought that the passage rendered 'The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their fathers, judge betwixt us. And Jacob sware by the fear of his father Isaac' (53)—might be read so as to illustrate Laban's idolatry; but the seeming difference between Laban's oath and Jacob's disappears if we compare the passage with that earlier one, where Jacob says, 'Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty' (42). There is, therefore, no warrant for reading the word rendered God in any occurrence or all occurrences in the passage first cited as a plural. Evidently, therefore, Laban's teraphim were not images of false gods, but were idols corruptly used by believers in the patriarchal religion. Yet it is probable on other grounds than any theories advanced in this article that these images were connected with ancestral worship: if so, they may have been relics of the Shemite idolatry from the midst of which Abraham was called away. And here it may be remarked that these corruptions clung to the families or retainers of the Hebrew patriarchs, for Jacob, at a later time, commanded his household, and those that were with him, to put away strange gods (xxxv. 2).

We purposely reserve the discussion of the idolatry of Canaan for that later period when the iniquity of its people was full, and when the Divine warnings, as well as the sacred history, give us a more complete view of the idol-worship of the seven doomed nations. But it must be here observed, that already in Abraham's time such a name as Ashteroth Karnaim (Ashteroth of the two horns) shows the existence of pagan worship. On the other hand, the mysterious Melchizedek, seemingly a Canaanite, if not a Rephaite (like Adonizedek of Joshua's time), is a witness that the true patriarchal belief was not yet overwhelmed by the corruptions of Canaan.

The sojourn in Egypt brings us again in contact with one of the great idolatrous systems of antiquity. There is some little evidence, but that little very curious and valuable, as to the adoption of a false religion by many of the Israelites in Egypt. At that time Egypt was not wholly in the hands of the Egyptians, not wholly even Egyptian. The Shepherd-strangers, if they did not rule the country for the whole period of their stay, were certainly long firmly planted in its north-eastern provinces. From the Pathmetic, now the Damietta, branch to the eastern border, dwelt a Shemite or quasi-Shemite population. The marshes that skirt the Mediteranean and the great lakes that feed them, afterwards the last homes of Egyptian freedom, were then the haunts of the eastern enemies of Egypt, whose traits of person and character are still to be discerned, as they were long ago by Achilles Tatius, in the sturdy fishermen of Lake Menzeleh. Southward, the pasture-lands of a long valley, the land of Goshen, through which a prudent ruler, whose name has perished through the lapse of ages, had cut a canal, more to water this fertile tract than to open a way from the Nile to the Erythrean Sea, this long valley was the home of settled Arabs, the Israelites, and the mixed multitude, or Erebs, spoken of in Scripture. The names of several of the towns of north-eastern Egypt are either Hebrew, or known to us both in Hebrew and Egyptian forms of the same signification. So marked is the distinction between true Egypt and Shemite Egypt, that the monuments of the great Shepherd-city Zoan, executed under the foreign rule, though Egyptian, have a distinctive character of their own. Thus we may expect to find two pagan religions prevailing in Egypt, one the religion of the Egyptians, the other that of such of the Shemite colonists as were idolaters. We would not deny that constant waves of Shemite immigration had produced their effect on the religion and physical characteristics of the Egyptians from that very first which gave the strong Shemite side to their moral and physical nature, but in the Shepherd-period foreign influence could no longer affect the essential part of the native religion, and any distinct system must have had a separate growth.

When we come to speak of the ancient Egyptian religion, we are at last on safe ground. The interpretation of hieroglyphics has laid before us a mass of documents, acquainting us almost as fully with its tenets as do the classical writings with those of pagan Greece and Rome. The result is, that we are compelled to discard, at least for the present, the philosophical theories which we had been accustomed to regard as the very mainsprings of Egyptian belief, but which are probably for the most part fabrications constructed in the attempt to fortify the ancient religion against the shocks of a new and vital faith. We are indeed compelled finally to put aside all ideas that the Egyptian religion formed one philosophical whole, and to admit that it consists of several distinct elements, which were never fused, because their nature forbade so complete a union.

The strongest and most remarkable peculiarity of the Egyptian religion is the worship of animals, trees, and like objects, which was universal in the country, and was even connected with the belief in the future state. No theory of the usefulness of certain animals can explain the worship of others that were utterly useless, nor can a theory of some strange analogy find even as wide an application. The explanation is to be discovered in every town, every village, every hut, of the Negroes, whose fetishism corresponds perfectly with this low nature-worship of the ancient Egyptians.

Connected with fetishism, was the local character of the religion. Each nome, city, town, and probably village, had its divinities, and the position of many gods in the Pantheon was due rather to the importance of their cities than any powers or qualities they were supposed to have.

The Egyptian Pantheon shows three distinct elements. Certain of the gods are only personifications connected with low nature-worship. Others, the great gods, are of Shemite origin, and are connected with high nature-worship, though showing traces of the worship of ancestors. In addition, there are certain personifications of abstract ideas. The first of these classes is evidently the result of an attempt to connect the old low nature-worship with some higher system. The second is no doubt the religion of the Shemite settlers. It is essentially the same in character as the Babylonian and Assyrian religion, and as the belief of a dominant race took the most important place in the intricate system of which it ultimately formed a part. The last class appears to be of later invention, and to have had its origin in an endeavour to construct a philosophical system.

In addition to these particulars of the Egyptian religion, it is important to notice that it comprised very remarkable doctrines. Man was held to be a responsible being, whose future after death depended upon his actions done while on earth. He was to be judged by Osiris, ruler of the West, or unseen world, and either rewarded with felicity or punished with torment. Whether these future states of happiness and misery were held to be of eternal duration is not certain, but there is little doubt that the Egyptians believed in the immortality of the soul.

The religion of the Shepherds is not as distinctly known to us. It is, however, clear from the monuments that their chief god was SET or SUTEKH, and we learn from a papyrus that one of the Shepherd-kings, APEEE, probably Manetho's 'Apophis,' established the worship of SET in his dominions, and revered no other god, raising a great temple to him in Zoan, or Avaris. SET continued to be worshipped by the Egyptians until the time of the 22d dynasty, when we first find no trace of him on the monuments. At this period or afterwards his figure was effaced in the inscriptions. The change took place long after the expulsion of the Shepherds, and was effected by the 22d dynasty, which was probably of Assyrian or Babylonian origin: it is, therefore, rather to be considered as a result of the influence of the Median doctrine of Ormazd and Ahriman, than as due to the Egyptian hatred of the foreigners and all that concerned them. Besides SET, other foreign divinities were worshipped in Egypt, the god KENPU, the goddesses KEN or KETESH, ANTA, and ASTARTA. All these divinities, except ASTARTA, as to whom we have no particular information, are treated by the Egyptians as powers of destruction and war, as SET was considered the personification of physical evil. SET was always identified by the Egyptians with Baal: we do not know whether he was worshipped in Egypt before the Shepherd-period, but this is almost certain.

This foreign worship in Egypt was probably never reduced to a system. What we know of it shews no regularity, and it is not unlike the imitations of the Egyptian idols made by Phœnician artists, probably as representations of Phœnician divinities. The gods of the Hycsos are foreign objects of worship in an Egyptian dress.

Before speaking of the partial or general falling away of the Israelites in Egypt, we may notice the other kinds of idolatry which influenced them at the same period, or that immediately succeeding it, the idolatry of the Abrahamite tribes, of Canaan, of Phœnicia, of the Philistines, and of Syria, which they encountered on their journey, or after they reached the Land of Promise.

The centre of the idolatry of the Palestinian races is to be sought for in the religion of the Rephaites and the Canaanites. We can distinctly connect the worship of Baal and Ashtoreth with the earliest kind of idolatry, and having thus established a centre, we can understand how, for instance, the same infernal rites were celebrated to the Ammonite Molech and the Carthaginian Baal. The most important document for the idolatry of the Hittites is the treaty concluded between the branch of that people seated on the Orontes and Rameses II. From this we learn that SUTEKH (or SET) and ASTERAT were the chief divinities of these Hittites, and that they also worshipped the mountains and rivers, and the winds. The SUTEKHS of several forts are also specified [HITTITES]. SET is known from the Egyptian inscriptions to have corresponded to Baal, so that in the two chief divinities we discover Baal and Ashtoreth, the only Canaanite divinities known to be mentioned in Scripture. The local worship of different forms of Baal well agrees with the low nature-worship with which it is found to have prevailed. Both are equally mentioned in the Bible history. Thus the people of Shechem worshipped Baal-berith, and Mount Hermon itself seems to have been worshipped as Baal-Hermon, while the low nature-worship may be traced in the reverence for groves, and the connection of the Canaanite religion with hills and trees. The worst feature of this system was the sacrifice of children by their parents; a feature that shews the origin of at least two of its offshoots.

The Bible does not give a very clear description of Canaanite idolatry. As an abominable thing to be rooted out and cast into oblivion nothing is needlessly said of it. The appellation Baal, ruler, or possessor, implies supremacy, and connects the chief Canaanite divinity with the Syrian Adonis. He was the god of the Canaanite city Zidon or Sidon, where 'Ashtoreth, the abomination of the Zidonians,' was also specially worshipped. In the Judge-period we read of Baalim and Ashteroth in the plural, probably indicating various local forms of these divinities, but perhaps merely the worship of many images. The worship of Baal was connected with that of the groves, which we take to have been representations of trees or other vegetable products [HIGH PLACES AND GROVES]. In Ahab's time a temple was built for Baal, where there was an image. His worshippers sacrificed in garments provided by the priests; and his prophets, seeking to propitiate him, were wont to cry and cut themselves with swords and lances. Respecting Ashtoreth we know less from Scripture. Her name is not derivable from any Semitic root. It is equivalent to the Ishtar of the cuneiform inscriptions, the name of the Assyrian or Babylonian Venus, the goddess of the planet. The identity of the Canaanite, and the Assyrian or Babylonian goddess, is further shown by the connection of the former with star-worship. In the Iranian languages we find a close radical resemblance to Ashtoreth and Ishtar in the Pers.

ستاره, Zend stara, Sansk. stra, stāra, stern, all equivalent to our 'star.' This derivation confirms our opinion that the high nature-worship of the Babylonians and Assyrians was of Aryan origin.

As no other Canaanite divinities are noticed in Scripture, it seems probable that Baal and Ashtoreth were alone worshipped by the nations of Canaan. Among the neighbouring tribes we find, besides these, other names of idols, and we have to inquire whether they apply to different idols or are merely different appellations.

Beginning with the Abrahamite tribes, we find Molech, Malcham, or Milcom (מלכם, מלכ, מלחם), spoken of as the idol of the Ammonites. This name, in the first form, always has the article, and undoubtedly signifies the 'king' (המלך), equivalent to (המלך), for it is indifferently used as a proper name and as an appellative with a suffix (comp. Jer. xlix. 1, 3, with Amos i. 15). Milcom is from Molech or its root, with מ formative, and Malcham is probably a dialectic variation, if the points are to be relied upon. Molech was regarded by the Ammonites as their king. When David captured Rabbah we are told that 'he took Malcham's crown from off his head, the weight whereof [was] a talent of gold with the precious stones: and it was [set] on David's head' (2 Sam. xii. 30, comp. 1 Chron. xx. 2).^{*} The prophets speak of this idol as ruler of the children of Ammon, and to go into captivity with his priests and princes (Jer. xlix. 1, 3; Amos i. 15). The worship of Molech was performed at high places, and children were sacrificed to him by their parents, being cast into fires. This horrible practice prevailed at Carthage, where children were sacrificed to the chief divinity Baal, called at Tyre 'Melcarth, lord (Baal) of Tyre' מלקרת בעל צר (Inscr. Melit. Biling., ap. Gesen., Lex. s.v. בעל), the first of which words signifies 'king of the city,' מלך קרת. There can therefore be no doubt that Molech was a local form of the chief idol of Canaan, and it is by no means certain that this name was limited to the Ammonite worship, as we shall see in speaking of the idolatry of the Israelites in the Desert.

We know for certain of but one Moabite divinity as of but one Ammonite. Chemosh appears to have held the same place as Molech, although our information respecting him is less full. Moab was the 'people of Chemosh' (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46), and Chemosh was doomed to captivity with his priests and princes (Jer. xlviii. 7). In one place Chemosh is spoken of as the god of the king of the children of Ammon, whom Jephthah conquered (Judg. xi. 24); but it is to be remarked that the cities held by this king, which Jephthah took, were not originally Ammonite, and were apparently claimed as once held by the Moabites (21-26; comp. Num. xxi. 23-30), so that at this time Moab and Ammon were probably united, or the Ammonites ruled by a Moabite chief. The etymology of Chemosh is doubtful, but it is clear that he was distinct from Molech. There is no positive trace of the cruel rites of the idol of the Ammonites, and it is unlikely that the settled Moabites should have had the same savage disposition as their wild brethren on the north. There is, however, a general resemblance in the regal character assigned to both idols and their solitary position. Chemosh, therefore, like Molech, was probably a form of Baal. Both tribes appear to have had other idols, for we read of the worship, by the Israelites, of 'the gods of Moab, and the gods of the children of Ammon' (Judg. x. 6); but as there are other plurals in the passage, it is possible that this may be a general expression. Yet in saying this we do not mean to suggest that there was any monotheistic form of Canaanite idolatry. There is some difficulty in ascertaining whether Baal-Peor, or Peor, was a Moabite idol. The Israelites, while encamped at Shittim, were seduced by the women of Moab and Midian, and joined them in the worship of Baal-Peor. There is no notice of any later instance of this idolatry. It seems, therefore, not to have been national to Moab, and if so, it may have been borrowed, and Midianite, or else local, and Canaanite. The former idea is supported by the apparent connection of prostitution, even of women of rank, with the worship of Baal-Peor, which would not have been repugnant to the pagan Arabs; the latter finds some support in the name Shittim, 'the acacias,' as though the place had its name from some acacias sacred to Baal, and, moreover, we have no certain instance of the application of the name of Baal to any non-Canaanite divinity. Had such vile worship as was probably that of Baal-Peor been national in Moab, it is most unlikely that David would have been on very friendly terms with a Moabite king.

The Philistine idolatry is connected with that of Canaan, although it has peculiarities of its own, which are indeed so strong that it may be questioned whether it is entirely or even mainly derived from the Canaanite source. At Ekron, Baal-zebub was worshipped, and had a temple, to which Ahaziah, the wicked son of Ahab, sent to inquire. This name means either 'the lord of the fly,' or 'Baal the fly.' It is generally held that he was worshipped as a driver away of flies, but we think it more probable that some venomous fly was sacred to him. The use of the term Baal is indicative of a connection with the Canaanite system. The national divinity of the Philistines seems, however, to have been Dagon, to whom there were temples at Gaza and at Ashdod, and the general character of whose worship is evident in such traces as we observe in the names Caphar-Dagon, near Jamnia, and Beth-Dagon, the latter applied to two places, one in Judah and the other in Asher. The derivation of the name Dagon, דָּגוֹן, as that of a fish-god, is from דָּג, 'a fish.' Gesenius considers it a diminutive, 'little fish,' used by way of endearment and honour (Thes. s. v.), but this is surely hazardous. Dagon was represented as a man with the tail of a fish. There can be no doubt that he was connected with the Canaanite system, as Derceto or Atargatis, the same as Ashtoreth, was worshipped under a like mixed shape at Ashkelon (αὐτὴ δὲ τὸ μὲν πρόσωπον ἔχει γυναικὸς, τὸ δ' ἄλλο σῶμα πᾶν ἰχθύος, Diod. Sic. ii. 4). In form he is the same as the Assyrian god supposed to correspond to the planet Saturn. The house of Dagon at Gaza, which Samson overthrew, must have been very large, for about 3000 men and women then assembled on its roof. It had two principal, if not only, pillars, in the midst, between which Samson was placed and was seen by the people on the roof. The inner portion of some of the ancient Egyptian temples consisted of a hypæthral hall, supported by two or more pillars, and inner chambers. The overthrow of these pillars would bring down the stone roof of the hall, and destroy all persons beneath or upon it, without necessarily overthrowing the side-walls.

The idolatry of the Phœnicians is not spoken of in the Bible. From their inscriptions and the statements of profane authors, we learn that this nation worshipped Baal and Ashtoreth. The details of their worship will be spoken of in the art. PHœNICIA.

Syrian idols are mentioned in a few places in Scripture. Tammuz, whom the women of Israel lamented, is no doubt Adonis, whose worship implies that of Astarte or Ashtoreth. Rimmon, who appears to have been the chief divinity of the Syrian kings ruling at Damascus, may, if his name signifies 'high' (from מַרְמָר), be a local form of Baal, who, as the sun-god, had a temple at the great Syrian city Heliopolis, now called Baalabekk.

The book of Job, which, whatever its date, represents a primitive state of society, speaks of cosmic worship as though it was practised in his country, Idumæa or northern Arabia. 'If I beheld a sun when it shined, or a splendid moon progressing, and my heart were secretly enticed, and my hand touched my mouth, surely this [were] a depravity of judgment, for I should have denied God above' (xxx. 26-28). See the Genesis of the Earth and of Man, 2d ed., p. 184. This evidence is important in connection with that of the ancient prevalence of cosmic worship in Arabia, and that of its practice by some of the later kings of Judah.

If we take a retrospect of this evidence as to the ancient idolatries of the Canaanites and the nations immediately surrounding them, we perceive the correctness of the principle with which we commenced this part of the inquiry, that the centre of Palestinian idolatry is to be sought for in the religion of the Rephaite and Canaanite races. Local influences may have affected the varieties of this system; the Philistines, as a people of the sea-coast, may have preferred an inferior sea-god for their chief divinity, the softer races may have chosen the corrupt rites of the consort of Baal for their main worship, the more savage may have sought only to please Baal with the cruel sacrifice of children, yet throughout the region we find nothing distinctly separate and different, neither bare fetishism on the one hand, nor unmixed cosmic worship on the other. If we might venture to resolve this religion into its primitive elements, we should assign the fetishism to the Rephaite races, and the other element, mainly high nature-worship, to the Canaanites. This may seem fatal to our theory that high nature-worship in the religion of Babylonia and Assyria is the Aryan element, but it must be recollected that we do not know at what time and through what conflict or mixture of races, the second element of Palestinian idolatry was introduced. There are points of resemblance between the idolatry of Palestine and that of Assyria and Babylonia, which prove a common origin in their cosmic element; but, on the other hand, there are differences, which show either that the contact was extremely remote, or that in Palestine a complex system was greatly modified.

We may now speak of the idolatrous practices into which the Israelites fell at various times from the period of the sojourn in Egypt downwards.

The Israelites in Egypt yielded to the temptations of the polytheistic population among which they dwelt. In Joshua's last address he counselled the people to put away the gods which their fathers served beyond Euphrates and in Egypt (Josh. xxiv. 14), that is, if we compare the context, not to return to these forms of idolatry (15, 16). The same is stated (Ezek. xx. 6, 7, 8) and alluded to (xxiii. 3) by Ezekiel. The only other notices of this idolatry are the account of the golden calf, and the passage in Amos, cited by St. Stephen in the Acts, respecting the worship of Chiun or Remphan.

Let us take a glance at the condition of the Israelites in Egypt. We have seen that they were in a country where two pagan religions obtained, the Egyptian and that of the Shepherd-strangers. The Israelites, as dwellers in the most outlying and separate tract of the Shemite part of Lower Egypt are more likely to have followed the corruptions of the strangers than those of the Egyptians, more especially as, saving Joseph, Moses, and not improbably Aaron and Miriam, they seem to have almost universally preserved the manners of their former wandering life. There is scarcely a trace of Egyptian influence beyond that seen in the names of Moses and Miriam, and perhaps of Aaron also, for the only other name besides the former two that is certainly Egyptian, and may be reasonably referred to this period, that of Harnepher, evidently the Egyptian HAR-NEFRU, 'Horus the good,' in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36), probably marks an Egyptian taken by marriage into the tribe of Asher, whether a proselyte or not we cannot attempt to decide.

The only glimpse we have of the manners of the tribes after their settlement in Goshen shows us that they led a pastoral if not a freebooting life. The calamity that deprived Ephraim of his sons was, however we read the passage, an event of wild desert-warfare (1 Chron. vii. 21). If the Israelites left Egypt tainted with idolatry, they certainly left it uncorrupted by the evils of civilized and settled life. It is to be supposed, therefore, that whatever false worship they practised would have been adopted rather from the Shepherds than the Egyptians. The little evidence we have precisely confirms this supposition. The Hebrew idolatry in the Desert was like that of the Shepherds, partly borrowed from the Egyptian system, partly showing a separate source.

The golden calf, or, more accurately, 'bull-calf,' was, we suppose, not a representation of any Egyptian god, but made to represent God Himself. There has been a difference of opinion as to the golden calf, some holding the view we have expressed, others maintaining that it was only an imitation of an Egyptian idol. We first observe that this and Jeroboam's golden calves are shown to have been identical in the intention with which they were made, by the circumstance that the Israelites addressed the former as the God who had brought them out of Egypt (Exod. xxxii. 4, 8), and that Jeroboam proclaimed the same of his idols (1 Kings xii. 28). We next remark, that Aaron called the calf not only god but the LORD (Exod. xxxii. 5), that in the Psalms it is said 'they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth hay' (cvi. 20), that no one of the calf-worshipping kings and princes of Israel bears any name connected with idolatry, while many have names compounded with the most sacred name of God, and that in no place is any foreign divinity connected with calf-worship in the slightest degree.

The adoption of such an image as the golden calf shows the strength of Egyptian associations, else how would Aaron have fixed upon so ignoble a form as that of the God who had brought Israel out of Egypt? Only a mind thoroughly accustomed to the profound respect paid in Egypt to the sacred bulls, and especially to Apis and Mnevis, could have hit upon so strange a representation; nor could any people who had not witnessed the Egyptian practices have found, as readily as did the Israelites, the fulfilment of their wishes in such an image. The feast that Aaron celebrated, when, after eating and drinking, the people arose, sang, and danced naked before the idol, is strikingly like the festival of the finding of Apis, which was celebrated with feasting and dancing, and also, apparently, though this custom does not seem to have been part of the public festivity, with indecent gestures. [MOSCHOIATRY.]

The golden calf was not the only idol which the Israelites worshipped in the Desert. The prophet Amos speaks of others. In the Masoretic text the passage is as follows, 'But ye bare the tent [or 'tabernacle'] of your king and Chiun your images, the star of your gods [or 'your god'], which ye made for yourselves' (v. 26). The LXX. has Μολόχ for 'your king,' as though their original Heb. had been מלכֶם, instead of מלִכְכֶם, and Παῖφον for Chiun, besides a transposition. In the Acts the reading is almost the same as that of the LXX., 'Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them' (vii. 43). We cannot here discuss the probable causes of these differences except of the more important ones, the substitution of Moloch for 'your king,' and Raiphan or Remphan for Chiun. It should be observed, that if the passage related to Ammonite worship, nothing would be more likely than that Molech should have been spoken of by an appellative, in which case a strict rendering of the Masoretic text would read as does the A. V.; a freer could follow the LXX. and Acts; but, as there is no reference to the Ammonites or even the Canaanites, it is more reasonable to suppose that the LXX. followed a text in which, as above suggested, the reading was מלִכְכֶם, Malcham, or 'your king.' The likelihood of this being the true reading must depend upon the rest of the passage. Remphan and Chiun are at once recognised as two foreign divinities worshipped together in Egypt, RENPU, probably pronounced REMPU, and KEN, the former a god represented as of the type of the Shemites and apparently connected with war, the latter a goddess represented naked standing upon a lion. They were worshipped with KHEM, the Egyptian god of productivity, and the foreign war-goddess ANATA. Excluding KHEM, who is probably associated with KEN from her being connected, as we shall see, with productivity, these names, RENPU,* KEN, and ANATA, are clearly not, except in orthography, Egyptian. We can suggest no origin for the name of RENPU. The goddess KEN, as naked, would be connected with the Babylonian Mylitta, and as standing on a lion, with a goddess so represented in rock-sculptures at Malthaiyyeh near Nineveh. The former similarity connects her with generation; the latter perhaps does so likewise. If we adopt this supposition, the name KEN may be traced to a root connected with generation found in many varieties in the Iranian family, and not out of that family. It may be sufficient to cite the Greek γεν-ουαι, γεν-η: she would thus be the goddess of productiveness. ANATA is the Persian Anaitis. We have shown earlier that the Babylonian high nature-worship seems to have been of Aryan origin. In the present case we trace an Aryan idolatry connected, from the mention of a star, with high nature-worship. If we accept this explanation, it becomes doubtful that Molech is mentioned in the passage, and we may rather suppose that some other idol, to whom a kingly character was attributed, is intended. Here we must leave this difficult point of our inquiry, only summing up that this false worship was evidently derived from the Shepherds in Egypt, and may possibly indicate the Aryan origin of at least one of these tribes, almost certainly its own origin, directly or indirectly, from an Aryan source. The worship of Baal-Peor was next followed; but this was a temporary apostasy: we have already spoken of it.

It is probable that during the wanderings, and under the strong rule of Joshua, the idolatry learnt in Egypt was so destroyed as to be afterwards utterly forgotten by the people. But in entering Palestine they found themselves among the monuments and associations of another false religion, less attractive indeed to the reason than that of Egypt, which still taught, notwithstanding the wretched fetishism that it supported, some great truths of man's present and future, but of a religion which, in its deification of nature, had a strong hold on the imagination. The genial sun, the refreshing moon, the stars, at whose risings or settings fell the longed-for rains, were naturally revered in that land of green hills and valleys, which were fed by the water of heaven. A nation thrown in the scene of such a religion and mixed with those who professed it, at that period of national life when impressions are most readily made, such a nation, albeit living while the recollection of the deliverance from Egypt and the wonders with which the Law was given was yet fresh, soon fell away into the practices that it was strictly enjoined to root out. In the first and second laws of the Decalogue, the Israelites were commanded to worship but one God, and not to make any image whatever to worship it, lest they and their children should fall under God's heavy displeasure. The commands were explicit enough. But not alone was idolatry thus clearly condemned: the Israelites were charged to destroy all objects connected with the religion of the inhabitants of Canaan. They were to destroy utterly all the heathen places of worship, 'upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree.' They were to 'overthrow' the 'altars' of the heathen, 'break their pillars,' 'burn their groves, hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place' (Deut. xii. 2, 3), a passage we cite on account of the fulness of the enumeration. Had the conquered nations been utterly extirpated their idolatry might have been annihilated at once. But soon after the lands had been apportioned, that separate life of the tribes began which was never interrupted, as far as history tells us, until the time of the kings. Divided, the tribes were unable to cope with the remnant of the Canaanites, and either dwelt with them on equal terms, reduced them to tribute, or became tributaries themselves. The Israelites were thus surrounded by the idolatry of Canaan; and since they were for the most part confined to the mountain and hilly districts, where its associations were strongest, they had but to learn from their neighbours how they had worshipped upon the high hills and under every green tree. It is related how, by the generation that followed Joshua and those who outlived him, true religion was forgotten, and the people fell into the worship of Baalim, Ashtaroah, and the groves. From the use of plural forms in the case of the first and second idols, it is probable that the Baals and Ashtoreths of several towns or tribes were worshipped by the Israelites, as Baal-Peor had been, and Baal-berith afterwards was. It does not seem, however, that the people at once fell into heathen worship: the first step appears to have been adopting a corruption of the true religion. Practices like the worship of the golden calf are again mentioned as obtaining at this time, and we are astonished to read in the history of Micah that this spurious worship was already systematized. 'In those days [there was] no king in Israel, every man did [that which was] right in his own eyes' (Judg. xvii. 6). Thus Micah, a man of Mount Ephraim, having first stolen the large sum of 1100 shekels of silver from his mother (42 lbs. 80 grs. troy, taking the shekel at 220 grs.), restored it to her, and she, although professing to have dedicated the whole of it to the Lord, yet gave but 200 shekels of silver (7 lbs. 7 oz. 320 grs.), to a founder, who made 'a graven image and a molten image,' which, unless merely overlaid with precious metal, must have been small. Not content with these, Micah had a house of god or of gods, an ephod, and teraphim, here, as in Laban's case, associated with spurious worship, and made one of his sons priest, consecrating him by some old patriarchal, perhaps heathenish, right of the master of the house. But still greater good fortune befell Micah, when a young Levite, coming from Bethlehem-Judah in search of a place where he might settle, was persuaded by him to stay, and be to him 'a father and a priest.' So he hired the Levite for 'ten [shekels] of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel,' and his food. Micah exercised his right of consecration, and in full satisfaction exclaimed, 'Now know I that the LORD will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to [my] priest.' But the priest speedily gave a fresh instance of his mercenary character. Certain Danites, from the two warlike cities Zorah and Eshtaol, six hundred armed men, seeking an inheritance, heard of Micah's 'house of gods,' and coming as friends, stole the contents of the place, and carried away, he nothing loth, the priest to be 'a father and a priest' to them, asking him, '[Is it] better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel.' The Danites smote Laish, and called it Dan, and there set up the graven image: the priest and his sons continued to be priests to the tribe of Dan until the captivity: the graven image remained at Dan 'all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh,' being probably suppressed for a time under Saul, David, and Solomon, and superseded by Jeroboam's golden calf. The priest was Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses, a wonderful instance of the rapid corruption of those days (Judg. xvii., xviii.) It is noteworthy that throughout this remarkable narrative, which is told with a simplicity that would vouch for its antiquity and authenticity were there no other evidence, idolatrous practices are associated with deceit and dishonesty. Wealthy and at ease, the tribes would not be at the trouble of going to Shiloh to worship, but, like their ancestors two or three generations before, who demanded a calf of Aaron because they knew not what had become of Moses, each man would have his house of gods, with images, a priest, and, perhaps, for teraphim are mentioned, magical practices also. This declension would have easily led the way to the adoption not only of the forms, but of the realities of the heathenism around. An illegal worship of the true God would soon give place to the flexible religion of the heathen.

The history contained in the Book of Judges and the early part of the First Book of Samuel is a narrative of the successive declensions and reformations of the Israelites in the period of the Judges. It is noticeable that they do not seem during this period to have generally adopted the religions of any but the Canaanites, although in one remarkable passage they are said, between the time of Jair and that of Jephthah, to have forsaken the Lord, and served Baalim, and Ashtaroth, and the gods of Syria, Zidon, Moab, the children of Ammon, and the Philistines (Judg. x. 6), as though there had then been an utter and profligate apostasy. The cause no doubt was that the Canaanite worship was borrowed in a time of amity, and that but one Canaanite oppressor is spoken of, whereas the Abrahamites of the east of Palestine, and the Philistines, were almost always enemies of the Israelites. Each time of idolatry was punished by a servitude, each reformation followed by a deliverance. Speedily as the nation returned to idolatry its heart was fresher than that of the ten tribes which followed Jeroboam, and never seem to have had one thorough national repentance. There are some curious traces of the special customs of this time. Gideon, though he commenced his judgeship by casting down Joash his father's altar of Baal and grove, which seem to have been set up more for custom than from a belief in this false god (Judg. vi. 30-32), yet after his defeat of the confederate Arabs, and pious refusal to be made king, was a cause of idolatry to his people. He asked of the Israelites the golden earrings (?) or rings (?) they had taken, of which the weight was 1700 shekels of gold, according to our calculation 38 lbs. 11 oz. 240 grs. troy, and made of them an ephod in his city Ophrah, to the idolatrous worship of which all Israel was attracted, 'a which thing became a snare unto Gideon and to his house' (viii. 24-27). An ephod was a priestly and Levitical vestment. The ephod of the Law was the high-priest's garment, to which was attached the breast-plate, and, even including the breast-plate, cannot have contained anything like the amount of gold used by Gideon (Exod. xxviii. 4-35). It has, therefore, been supposed that an idol covered with an ephod was made by the judge. This idea involves a great improbability; we cannot suppose

Gideon to have been guilty of more than some mistaken following of corrupt religion, not of its extreme or of heathen worship. Perhaps he made the ephod for the priest of the altar he had built at his town, and it came to be treated with superstitious reverence, or else he may have framed the gold into the form of an ephod as a kind of trophy, and the same may have occurred. It is needless to cite the sacred veil of Carthage, which, did we think Gideon had gone back to Baal-worship, would be an apt illustration.

In the next generation, the Israelites, led no doubt by Abimelech, the son of Gideon and a concubine of Shechem, probably a Hivite, adopted the worship of Baal-berith, or Baal of the covenant (that is, probably, god of the head-city of a Hivite confederation rather than of an alliance between the Hivites and the Israelites [HIVITES]), who had at Shechem a temple either fortified or in a fort like the Atargation at Ashteroth Karnaim in the Maccabæan period. But Abimelech seems only to have adopted this idol for his own purposes, as he had no scruple in burning the hold when the revolted Shechemites took refuge there.

The notices of their great wars show that the enmity between the Philistines and the Israelites was too great for any idolatry to be then borrowed of the former by the latter, though at an earlier time this was not the case. Once more under Samuel there was a reformation, and Baalim and Ashtaroth were put away, probably for more than a century. Saul's family were, however, tainted as it seems with idolatry, for the names of Ishbosheth or Eshbaal, and Mephibosheth or Merib-baal, can scarcely have been given but in honour of Baal. From the circumstances of Michal's stratagem to save David, it seems not only that Saul's family kept teraphim, but, apparently, that they used them for purposes of divination, the LXX. having 'liver' for 'pillow,' as if the Hebr. had been פֶּכֶל instead of the present פֶּכֶר. The circumstance of having teraphim, more especially if they were used for divination, lends especial force to Samuel's reproof of Saul (1 Sam. xv. 23). During the reign of David and the earlier part of that of Solomon, idolatry in Israel is unmentioned, and no doubt was almost unknown.

The earlier days of Solomon were the happiest of the kingdom of Israel. The temple-worship was fully established, with the highest magnificence, and there was no excuse for that worship of God at high places, which seems to have been before permitted on account of the constant distractions of the country. But the close of that reign was marked by an apostasy of which we read with wonder. Hitherto the people had been the sinners, their leaders, reformers; this time the king, led astray by his many strange wives, perverted the people, and raised high places on the mount of Corruption, opposite God's temple. He worshipped Ashteroth, goddess of the Zidonians, Chemosh, the god of the Moabites, and Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites, for the latter two building high places, as well as for all the gods of his strange wives. Solomon no doubt was very tolerant, and would not prevent these women from following their native superstitions, even if they felt it a duty to burn their and his children before Molech. Calamity speedily followed this great apostasy: the latter years of Solomon were troubled, and ten tribes were wrenched from the weak hands of his half-Ammonite son.

Jeroboam, newly come from the court of Shishak, as soon as he had been made king by the turbulent house of Joseph, set himself to devise some national religion that should keep his subjects from going to worship at Jerusalem, and so returning to their allegiance to the house of David. He could hit upon nothing better than the golden calf, and after the lapse of centuries restored Aaron's idol, calling it as before a symbol of the God that brought Israel out of Egypt. He made two calves: the one he set up at Dan, on the northern boundary of his kingdom, where there was already an idolatrous priesthood, the other at the ancient high place of Bethel, as though to lead aside journeyers to the temple at Jerusalem. He established a spurious priesthood of the lowest of the people, and himself ministered at the altar at Bethel. He fixed an annual feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, in imitation rather of the passover than, as usually supposed, of the feast of tabernacles.*

From the time of Jeroboam to that of Ahab no further progress in idolatry seems to have been made. The system set up by the Israelite king, notwithstanding the warning miracle wrought by the prophet that came out of Judah, does not appear to have been abandoned by Jeroboam or his successors. There were, no doubt, many true believers in the Israelite kingdom, and as their going to Jerusalem even in time of peace was probably forbidden by the kings, it seems likely that worship at high places was not unlawful to them. In Judah the temple-worship was maintained, but an unlawful worship at high places, perhaps sometimes or at some places connected with idolatrous rites, seems to have generally continued.

Ahab, making a worldly-wise marriage with Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, introduced the worship of Baal, the god of Zidon, as the national religion. Jeroboam's sin naturally paved the way for this worse apostasy, as the worship of the golden calf was followed by that of Baal-Peor, and the corruptions that were practised after the death of those who outlived Joshua immediately led to the adoption of the paganism of Canaan. But never had there been such a national apostasy. A temple of Baal was raised, apparently near Samaria, and an image and a grove there set up; there were four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and four hundred of the groves, all of whom, it seems, sat at Jezebel's table. For the first time we read that a persecution of true religion was raised, and Jezebel attempted to slay all the prophets of the Lord. Although Baal-worship received a signal check when, at Carmel, before Ahab and all Israel, the false prophets were miraculously shown to be impostors, and were slain by Elijah, yet that only remaining true prophet who had dared to show himself in the Israelite kingdom fled for his life from Jezebel, and lamenting the forsaken covenant, overthrown altars, and slain prophets of the Lord, complained that he alone was left. But God made known to him that there were still left in Israel seven thousand that had neither bowed to Baal nor kissed his image. The miracle at Carmel had no lasting effect on Ahab's mind. Not only did he allow his wife to seek the life of Elijah, but a staff of four hundred false prophets was formed, by whose prediction he was led to the fatal battle of Ramoth-gilead. Ahab's son Ahaziah followed his parents' iniquities, and sent to inquire of Baal-zebub; but his brother and successor, Jehoram, put away the image of Baal, and was contented with Jeroboam's sin, though the image was afterwards restored, no doubt through Jezebel's influence.

Jehu aimed at the destruction of the house of Ahab and the overthrow of the worship of Baal: both objects he thoroughly accomplished, so far as the northern kingdom was concerned, perhaps with some selfish ambition, and probably with some needless bloodshed, but certainly with a vigour that marks him as one of the most resolute of the Israelite kings. The worshippers of Baal were collected and slain, the house of Baal overthrown, his image and other images broken and burnt, and the house permanently polluted. It is to be observed that a city of the house of Baal is mentioned, as though a city, probably a suburb of Samaria, had grown up around the idol temple. Yet Jehu, with a foolish policy, was afraid to abandon the corruptions of Jeroboam, and thenceforward the golden calves at Bethel and Dan were worshipped by the ten tribes until the overthrow of the kingdom.

Baal-worship, though destroyed in Israel, was untouched in Judah. The good king Jehoshaphat had allied himself with the powerful house of Ahab, and this piece of political wisdom nearly extinguished the line of David. Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, had become the wife of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat. Jehoram, and Ahaziah his son, under the strong influence of Athaliah, had walked in the way of the house of Ahab. When Ahaziah had been slain by Jehu, Athaliah outdid Jezebel, and slew all the male seed royal, but one child, Jehoash, being saved. During the six years' reign of Athaliah, he remained hidden in the temple, until a priestly revolution overthrew at once the usurper and her religion. The wicked queen was slain, the house of Baal broken down, the altars and images broken in pieces thoroughly, and Mattan the priest slain before the altars. We thus learn in this history of its overthrow how completely Baal-worship had been set up in Jerusalem.

From the time of the second Jeroboam, the prophets furnish us with most interesting details of idol-worship in both kingdoms. The use of the word Israel is not in every case to be undoubtedly restricted to the northern kingdom, but there is no difficulty in the most important pas-

* The difference of time is suggestive of a curious chronological computation. We suppose that at the time of the Exodus, Moses fixed the Egyptian movable Vague year by making the first day of its seventh month the first of the Hebrew year, and, therefore, the fifteenth day the first of the Feast of Unleavened Bread; and, from the characteristics of the Hebrew year, we suppose this one to have been commenced B.C. 1652. If Jeroboam had taken the same day of the seventh Egyptian month as that of his feast, it would have almost fallen on the fifteenth day of the Hebrew eighth month; for during the interval from the Exodus to Jeroboam, if the long period be the true one, the Egyptian Vague year must have fallen back in the Hebrew year about the number of days indicated. Five months imply a difference of 620 years, but as the Hebrew months commenced on the days of new moons, the period may have been somewhat greater or less.

sages. In the time of Amos, Jeroboam, notwithstanding his prosperity, gave the same support as his namesake to the calf-worship. Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, complained to the king of the prophesying of Amos, and told him not to prophesy again at that place, 'it [is] the king's sanctuary, and it [is] the house of the kingdom' (vii. 10-13). It must be noticed that Amos was accused by Amaziah of predicting the king's death by the sword, but it does not follow that he did so, and his prediction against the Israelite line as preserved is, 'I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword' (ver. 9), a passage immediately followed by the account of Amaziah's complaint: 'Then Amaziah,' etc. (ver. 10). We are, therefore, surprised that Canon Stanley should say, 'The prediction of Amos was not fulfilled as regarded the king himself' (Smith's Bible Dictionary, i., p. 981, a). Amos speaks of oaths by the gods of Samaria, Dan, and Beersheba (viii. 14), and of worship or sacrifice at Bethel, Gilgal, and Beersheba (iv. 4; v. 5). Hosea warns Judah against the Israelite sin in these remarkable words: 'Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, [yet] let not Judah offend; and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, the LORD liveth' (iv.-15): whence it seems, if the Masoretic text be correct, that the Israelites dared to apply God's most sacred revealed name to their idols. This prophet speaks of worship not only at Bethel, but also at Gilgal, and Gilead, the latter probably Jacob's stone at Mizpah (xii. 11; ix. 15; vi. 8; v. 1). Amos speaks of 'the high places of Isaac,' and 'the sanctuaries of Israel' (vii. 9), no doubt intending Beersheba and Bethel. From these passages it is evident that the Israelites sought to fortify their spurious worship by paying especial honour to the early high places. Hosea mentions the 'calf of Samaria' (viii. 5, 6), but the reference is probably to the calf-worship of the kingdom generally. It seems to have been customary for sacrificers to 'kiss the calves' (xiii. 2). The mention of 'the calves of Beth-aven' (x. 5), a name of reproach for Bethel, probably shows that there were small images there besides the chief one set up by Jeroboam, for 'the high places' 'of Aven' (ver. 8) are similarly spoken of, and we know there was one principal high place there. The abundance of high places is shown by the remarkable expression, after mention of Gilead and Gilgal, 'yea, their altars [are] as heaps in the furrows of the field' (xii. 11, Heb. 12). The Danite worship in the north seems meant in the prediction—'the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod and teraphim: afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the LORD their God, and David their king' (iii. 4, 5). The spurious worship and separate royal line were alike to be taken from the Israelites, and afterwards they were to repent, a prophecy perhaps fulfilled after the capture of Samaria. A modern writer has most uncritically suggested that the meaning is, that the people were to be deprived even of 'their mild household superstitions.' How does he know that these corruptions were either mild or household? The worship of Baal and Baalim seems to be spoken of as a thing of the past (ii. 8, 16, 17; xi. 2; esp. xiii. 1, 2), at last exceeded by the calf-worship (see last citation); but sacrificing and burning incense 'upon the tops of the mountains,' 'upon the hills,' under shadowing trees, was still prevalent (iv. 13). With the overthrow of the northern kingdom the calf-worship evidently ended: the costly golden calves were no doubt carried away, according to the custom of the Assyrians, as had been predicted, but the idolatrous high places were not yet destroyed. The priesthood of Dan came to an end at this time (Judg. xviii. 30): that of Bethel seems to have been overthrown by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 15-20). There is no evidence of any subsequent practice of calf-worship: it may have been adopted by the people transported to the Israelite cities by the king of Assyria, but it had no attraction for the people of Judah, whose idolatry was the adoption of wholly foreign systems, not the corruption of true religion.

Under many of the later kings of Judah apostasy was carried to an astonishing extent. Not content with a single kind of idolatry, they borrowed the abominations of all the nations around. It is scarcely possible to ascertain the dates and occasions of the various introductions of pagan religions or practices, but some main particulars may be reasonably inferred. It is, however, observable that Baal-worship after its great overthrow never seems to have risen to any prominence in Judah, and that star-worship appears to have been the chief form of idolatry during the subsequent period. It might be supposed that Solomon's high places were the origin of this various idolatry, but much of it is unmentioned before the time of the later kings of Judah. Were the supposed later idolatry alone spoken of in the writings of the prophets, we might conjecture that it was earlier practised, but in the historical books it is only noticed in the later period.

Ahaz seems to have been, before Manasseh, the chief innovator who led Judah astray. Amaziah had, indeed, after a successful campaign in Edom, 'brought the gods of the children of Seir,' apparently here the Edomites, and worshipped them (2 Chron. xxv. 14, 15); but it is probable that this idolatry was abolished by Uzziah: the mention of it is important, as indicating that Arab paganism was at least once introduced into Judah. Ahaz ordered a fresh altar to be made, after the pattern of some idol-altar at Damascus, and to be placed in the temple, and offered upon it, otherwise also usurping the priestly office (2 Kings xvi. 10-16). He introduced the worship of the gods of Damascus, raised altars throughout Jerusalem, idol high places in every city of Judah, made his son pass through the fire, and closed the temple (2 Chron. xxviii. 22-25; 2 Kings xvi. 3, 4).

Under the subsequent kings there were two great reforms; and between them a long period, which appears to have been mainly of apostasy. Hezekiah suppressed idolatry, which did not break out afresh during his reign. Manasseh introduced Baal-worship again, caused his son or children to pass through the fire, used witchcraft, and set up an idol and altars for the host of heaven in the temple itself (2 Kings xxi. 3-7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3-7). Manasseh's repentance did not lead to an effectual removal of idolatry, and Amon returned to his father's sins. But Josiah set himself to overthrow false worship throughout his dominions, and by defiling the idol altars prevented their after-use. The main varieties of the idolatry of this period we now notice.

a. Sun-worship, though mentioned with other kinds of high nature-worship, as in the enumeration of those suppressed by Josiah, seems to have been practised alone as well as with the adoration of other heavenly bodies. In Ezekiel's remarkable vision of the idolatries of Jerusalem, he saw about four and twenty men between the porch and the altar of the temple, with their backs to the temple and their faces to the east, worshipping the sun (Ezek. viii. 16). Josiah had before this taken away 'the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the LORD,' and had 'burned the chariots of the sun with fire' (2 Kings xxiii. 11). The same part of the temple is perhaps here meant. There is nothing to show whether these were images or living horses. The horse was sacred to the sun among the Carthaginians, but the worship of the visible sun instead of an image looks rather like a Persian or an Arab custom.

6. In the account of Josiah's reform we read of the abolition of the worship of Baal, the sun, the moon, Mazzaloth, also called Mazzaroth (Job xxxviii. 32), which we hold to be the mansions of the moon (ASTRONOMY), and all the host of heaven (2 Kings xxiii. 5). Manasseh is related to have served 'all the host of heaven' (xxi. 3). Jeremiah speaks of 'the houses of Jerusalem, and the houses of the kings of Judah,' as to be defiled, 'because of all the houses upon whose roofs they have burned incense unto all the host of heaven, and have poured out drink-offerings unto other gods' (Jer. xix. 13). In this prophet's time the people of Judah and Jerusalem, among other abominations, made cakes for 'the queen of heaven,' or 'the worship of heaven;' a different form justifying the latter reading. The usual reading is מַלְכֵּת, 'queen,' which the LXX. once follows, the Vulg. always; some copies give מַלְאָכֵת, 'worship,' that is 'a deity or goddess.' The former reading seems preferable, and the context in two passages in Jeremiah shows that an abstract sense is not admissible (xliv. 17, 18, 19, 25). In Egypt, the remnant that fled after the murder of Gedaliah were warned by this prophet to abandon those idolatrous practices for which their country and cities had been desolated. The men, conscious that their wives had burned incense to false gods in Egypt, declared that they would certainly burn incense and pour out drink-offerings to the queen of heaven, as they, their fathers, their kings, and their princes had done in a time of plenty, asserting that since they had left off these practices they had been consumed by the sword and by famine: for this a fresh doom was pronounced upon them (xliv.). It is very difficult to conjecture what goddess can be here meant: Ashtoreth would suit, but is never mentioned interchangeably; the moon must be rejected for the same reason.—Here we certainly see a strong resemblance to Arab idolatry, which was wholly composed of cosmic worship and of fetishism, and in which the mansions of the moon were revered on account of their connection with seasons of rain. This system of cosmic worship may have been introduced from the Nabathæans or Edomites of Petra, from the Sabians, or from other Arabs or Chaldæans.

c. Two idols, Gad גַּד or Fortune, and Menee מְנֵי or Fate, from מָנָה, 'he or it divided, assigned, numbered,' are spoken of in a single passage in the later part of Isaiah (lxv. 11). Gesenius, depending upon the theory of the post-Isaian authorship of the later chapters of the prophet, makes these idols worshipped by the Jews in Babylonia, but it must be remarked that their names are not traceable in Babylonian and Assyrian mythology. Gesenius has, however, following Pococke (Syr. Hist. Arabum, p. 93), compared Menee with Manāḥ מְנָה, a goddess of the pagan Arabs, worshipped in the form of a stone between Mekkeh and El-Medeeneh by the tribes of Hudheyl and Khuza'ah. But El-Beydāwee, though deriving the name of this idol from the root manā

מָנָה, 'he cut,' supposes it was thus called because victims were slain upon it (Com. in Coran. ed. Fleischer, p. 293). This meaning certainly seems to disturb the idea that the two idols were identical, but the mention of the sword and slaughter as punishments of the idolaters who worshipped Gad and Menee is not to be forgotten. Gad may have been a Canaanite form of Baal, if we are to judge from the geographical name Baalgad of a place at the foot of Mount Hermon (Josh. xi. 17; xii. 7; xiii. 5). Perhaps the grammatical form of Menee may throw some light upon the origin of this idolatry. The worship of both idols resembles that of the cosmic divinities of the later kings of Judah.

d. In Ezekiel's vision of the idolatries of Jerusalem, he beheld a chamber of imagery in the temple itself, having 'every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and [or 'even'] all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed upon the wall round about, and seventy Israelite elders offering incense (Ezek. viii. 7-12). This is so exact a description of an Egyptian sanctuary, with the idols depicted upon its walls, dimly-lighted, and filled with incense-offering priests, that we cannot for a moment doubt that these Jews derived from Egypt their fetishism, for such this special worship appears mainly if not wholly to have been.

e. In the same vision the prophet saw women weeping for Tammuz (ver. 13, 14), known to be the same as Adonis, and from whom the fourth month of the Syrian year was named. This worship was probably introduced by Ahaz from Syria.

f. The 'image of jealousy,' כְּסֵל הַקִּנְיָה, spoken of in the same passage, which was placed in the temple, has not been satisfactorily explained. The meaning may only be that it was an image of a false god, or there may be a play in the second part of the appellation upon the proper name. We cannot, however, suggest any name that might be thus intended.

g. The brazen serpent, having become an object of idolatrous worship, was destroyed by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 4).

h. Molech-worship was not only celebrated at the high place Solomon had made, but at Topheth, in the Valley of the sons of Hinnom, where children were made to pass through the fire to the Ammonite abomination. This place, as well as Solomon's altars, Josiah defiled, and we read of no later worship of Molech, Chemosh, and Ashtoreth.

The new population placed by the king of Assyria in the cities of Samaria adopted a strange mixture of religions. Terrified at the destruction by lions of some of their number, they petitioned the king of Assyria, and an Israelite priest was sent to them. They then adopted the old worship at high places, and still served their own idols. The people of Babylon made Succoth-benoth, the Cuthites, Nergal, the Hamathites, Ashima, the Avites, Nibhaz and Tartak, and the people of Sepharvaim burnt their children to their native gods, Adrammelech and Anammelech. Nergal is a well-known Babylonian idol, and the occurrence of the element 'melech' (king) in the names of the Molechs of Sepharvaim is very remarkable (2 Kings xvii. 24-41).

The Babylonian Exile seems to have purified the Jews from their idolatrous tendencies. The people that returned did indeed in many cases marry strange wives, and so were in danger of falling into idolatry. The post-exilian prophets speak of it as an evil of the past, Zechariah foretelling the time when the very names of the false gods will be forgotten (xiii. 2). In Malachi we see that a cold formalism was already the national sin. How this great change was wrought does not appear. Partly no doubt it was due to the pious examples of Ezra and Nehemiah, partly perhaps to the Persian contempt for the lower kinds of idolatry, which insured a respect for the Hebrew religion on the part of the government, partly to the sight of the fulfilment of God's predicted judgments upon the idolatrous nations which the Jews had either sought as allies or feared as enemies.

Years passed by and the names of the idols of Canaan had been forgotten, when the Hebrews were assailed by a new danger. Greek idolatry under Alexander and his successors was practised throughout the civilized world. Some place-hunting Jews were base enough to adopt it. At first the Greek princes who ruled Palestine wisely forbore to interfere with the Hebrew religion. The politic earlier Ptolemies even encouraged it, but when the country had fallen into the hands of the Seleucidae, Antiochus Epiphanes, reversing his father's policy of toleration, seized Jerusalem, set up an idol-altar to Jupiter in the Temple itself, and forbade the observance of the Law. Weakly supported by a miserable faction, he had to depend wholly upon his military power. The Maccabæan revolt, small in its beginning, had the national heart on its side, and after a long and varied struggle achieved more than the nation had ever before effected since the days of the Judges. Thenceforward idolatry was to the Jew the religion of his enemies, and naturally made no perversers.

The early Christians were brought into contact with idolaters when the Gospel was preached among the Gentiles, and it became necessary to enact regulations for preventing scandal by their being involved in Pagan practices, when joining in the private meals and festivities of the heathen. But the Gentile converts do not seem to have been in any danger of reverting to idolatry, and the cruel persecutions they underwent did not tend to lead them back to a religion which its more refined votaries despised. It is, however, not impossible that many who had been originally educated as idolaters did not, on professing Christianity, really abandon all their former superstitions, and that we may thus explain the very early outbreak of many customs and opinions not sanctioned in the N. T.

Two subjects remain to be noticed; the different Hebrew terms used for idols, and the idolatrous practices mentioned in the O. T. which cannot certainly be restricted to a single kind of false worship.

It would be unsuitable to the present article to give a lexicographical examination of every separate term connected with idolatry. Our main objects are to show how these terms indicate the feeling of the believing Hebrews towards idolaters, and what particulars they afford as to the forms and materials of idols.

1. General terms of doubtful signification :—

a. עליל, eelel, derived from the unused root עלל, and so meaning vain or empty; or from the negative אל, but this is very doubtful; or else as a diminutive, a meaning we are disposed to prefer, from אל, 'god.' The difference between אלהים

and אלילים suggests that the Hebrews may have adopted the latter term in place of the former when speaking of false gods. The Arabs have formed the name Allah for the true God by a slight change from the general term Ilâh, 'a god' or 'idol' (Lane's Arabic Lexicon, bk. i. pp. 82, 83).

b. גללים, comes from a root גלל, signifying 'he or it rolled,' from which are derived words meaning anything circular, dung, etc. The Vulg. renders it sordes, sordes idolorum. It occurs in the Pentateuch, there and elsewhere with words expressing contempt. In Ezekiel it is thus used of the idols of Egypt: 'Thus saith the Lord God; I will also destroy the idols (גללים), and cause the little idols (גללים) to cease out of Noph' (xxx.

13). May not גללים mean scarabæi, the commonest of Egyptian idols? The sense of dung is appropriate to the dung-beetle; that of rolling is doubtful, for, if the meaning of the verb be retained, we should, in this form, rather expect a passive sense, 'a thing rolled;' but it may be observed that these grammatical rules of the sense of derivatives are not always to be strictly insisted on, for צידון, though held to signify 'the place of fishing,' is, in the list of the Noachians, the name of a man, 'the fisherman,' Ἀλλεύς, of Philo of Byblus. That a specially-applicable word is used, may perhaps be conjectured from the occurrence of אלילים, which, if meaning little gods, would aptly describe the pigmy PTEH-SEKER-HESAR, Pth-Sokari-Osiris, of Memphis. Ezekiel uses the term גללים of the idols of Egypt which the Israelites were commanded to put away at or about the time of the Exodus, but did not, and seem to have carried into the Desert, for the same word is used, unqualified by the mention of any country, of those worshipped by them in the Desert (xx. 7, 8, 16, 18, 24); it is, however, apparently, employed also for all the idols worshipped in Canaan by the Israelites (ver. 31; xxiii. 37). Scarabæi were so abundant among the Egyptians and Phœnicians, that there is no reason why they may not have been employed also in the worship of the Canaanite false gods; but it cannot be safely supposed, without further evidence, that the idols of Canaan were virtually termed scarabæi.

2. General terms of known signification:—

a. אָן, 'emptiness,' or 'vanity,' used with other terms of like signification for idols and idolatry in general. Heliopolis in Egypt, or On, אֹן, is punctuated אָן in Ezek. xxx. 17, if we may depend upon the Masoretic pointing, on account of its idolatry, and Beth-el is called Beth-aven in Hosea (iv. 15; x. 5), which passages could not be cited by those who derive the golden calves from Heliopolis, as that city, though called in Egyptian AN, for its civil name, has as its sacred name, derived as usual from that of the local idol, 'the abode of the sun,' HA-RA, or, as some read, PA-RA.

b. שָׁקֶר, 'an abomination,' used of idols in both sing. and pl. The form is the same as that of גִּלְגָל.

c. בִּשְׁת, 'shame,' hence 'an idol,' as a shameful thing, or as making the worshippers ashamed, or as connected with shameful worship.

d. מַפְלֵצַת, probably meaning a fearful or horrible thing, is a term by which the idol of Maachah, Asa's grandmother, or mother, is designated (1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16). It was made for 'a grove,' and there is therefore some reason in the idea that it was a Priapic image [HIGH PLACES AND GROVES]; but it is not impossible that the Vulg. translation, in the second place, simulacrum Priapi, was influenced by the sound of the Hebrew.

e. אִימָה, 'a terror,' is a like term, used in the pl. אִימִים, for idols (Jer. l. 38), and it is noticeable that, in the pl., it is also the name of a primitive Palestinian people destroyed by the Moabites (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 11). As idols are apparently spoken of as 'the dead' (Ps. cvi. 28), this connection is worth noticing.

3. Terms indicating the form of idols:—

a. מַסְכָּל, or מַסְכָּל, 'an image' or 'idol,' of unknown derivation. Gesenius compares מַסְכָּל; it may be cognate to נָלַם. It is impossible to assign any more special signification to it.

b. צֶלֶם, literally 'a shadow,' signifies 'a likeness,' 'an image,' and hence an 'idol.' It is probably represented in Arabic by صَمَم, 'an idol,' unless this is related to מַסְכָּל.

c. עֲצָב, עֲצָב, עֲצָב, the second in pl. only, 'an idol' or 'idols,' from the root עֲצָב, 'he or it laboured, formed, fashioned, toiled with pain.' Gesenius supposes these appellations to indicate that idols were cut or carved.

d. צִיר, 'an idol,' from the root צִיר, in its sense of forming, or possibly from צִיר, 'a stone,' but we have found no evidence in favour of the idea that sacred stones were thus designated.

e. מַצֵּבָה, 'a pillar' or 'statue,' from נָצַב, 'he or it set, placed,' used of the stone Jacob set up at Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 18, 22), of the twelve pillars set up by Moses at Sinai (Exod. xxiv. 4), but also used of idolatrous statues, as, for instance, of the image of Baal (2 Kings iii. 2, cf. x. 26). In Jer. xliii. 13, 'the pillars [or 'statues'] of Bethshemesh,' or Heliopolis, in Egypt, which were to be broken by Nebuchadnezzar, have been not unreasonably conjectured to be the obelisks which were numerous at that ancient city. As obelisks, though not representing any divinity, were worshipped, this, in the sense of an idolatrous pillar, is a very fit appellation, but it might as well designate the statues of Heliopolis. It must be observed that, though originally applied to stone pillars, the term is afterwards used for wooden images, as images thus called are said to have been burnt (2 Kings x. 26).—מַצֵּבָה is applied to the sacrificial stone set up by Jacob at Bethel on his return (Gen. xxxv. 14), as well as to Absalom's memorial-pillar (2 Sam. xviii. 18).

f. הַמָּוֶן, pl. of a lost sing. הָמוֹן, images, connected with the groves, and which stood upon the altar of Baal (2 Chron. xxxiv. 4). Gesenius (Theol. s.v.) explains them to be statues of the sun, citing the Phœnician name of Baal, בעל־הַמָּוֶן; but this explanation is unsatisfactory, as we find in Hebrew geography the name הָמוֹן, which Gesenius himself considers the same as 'sacred to Jupiter Ammon,' whose name is written אֱמֹן in אֱמֹן, the name of Thebes, and referred to where (Jer. xli. 25) and הָמוֹן (Ezek. xxx. 15) are used for the 'multitude' of that city: we should, therefore, expect to find הַמָּוֶן, or אֱמֹנִים, rather than הַמָּוֶן. All that can be certainly said is that these images or upright objects were set up like 'the groves,' but it may be conjectured that their name is connected with that of KHEM, the Egyptian god of productivity, which is related to the root חָמָה, from which the word under consideration is held to be derived.

g. מַשְׁבֵּית is the term rendered 'imagery' in the A. V. in the description by Ezekiel of the חֲדָרֵי מַשְׁבֵּית, or 'chambers of imagery' (viii. 7-12). The root is unused, but found in the Chaldee שָׁבַת, 'he or it looked at,' and is traceable in related words. The exact meaning may be reasonably inferred from the description of the idols portrayed upon the walls of these chambers, and from the expression אֲבֵן מַשְׁבֵּית, Lev. xxvi. 1, 'a stone pictured,' that is, bearing idolatrous pictures. Comp. also the use of the term in Prov. xxv. 11, 'apples of gold in chased work [?] of silver,' like the inlaid silver in brazen vessels of this period (that of Hezekiah, ver. 1), brought from Nineveh, and now in the British Museum.

h. תְּרָפִים, teraphim, idolatrous images connected with magic, but not known to have been worshipped, used in the patriarchal period by those, as Laban, who, without being ignorant of true religion, yet practised corruptions, afterwards by the same class in the time of the judges and kings, and by the Babylonians in the case of Nebuchadnezzar. The derivation is doubtful, but we are disposed to think the name is not Hebrew or Semitic, but, in origin, Egyptian or so-called Turanian of Bablylonia, or both.

4. Terms indicating the workmanship of idols:—

a. סֶלֶב, and סֶלֶבִּי, or סֶלֶבִּי, the latter only found in the pl., 'a graven image,' from סֶלֶב, 'he or it cut or carved.' It properly signifies a carved wooden image, but as such images were overlaid with plates or a molten coat of precious metal, it is sometimes used for a molten image.

b. הִשָּׁךְ, הִשָּׁכָה, and הִשָּׁכָה, 'a molten image,' from הִשָּׁךְ, 'he or it poured, poured out, cast.' Undoubtedly these images were made of molten metal, and they must have been very small when of gold or silver, unless the metal were a mere coating, as suggested under the last head, or the idol were hollow. As the graven and molten images are constantly mentioned together, it may be reasonably supposed that they were usually of about the same size. This subject of the terms connected with idolatry has been carefully treated by Mr. Aldis Wright in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. IDOL, IMAGE.

We may now speak of the idolatrous practices mentioned in the Bible which cannot be certainly restricted to any one kind of false worship.

We have no minute account in the Bible of idolatrous temples. The high places were indifferently used for all kinds of false worship, except that of the stars, practised under the later kings of Judah. They were originally Canaanite, and were upon mountains and hills, and under the shade of trees. The star-worship mentioned above was rather a city-idolatry, practised upon the flat roofs of houses.

Servants or slaves of temples or idols are mentioned under the term קִרְיָה, קִרְיָה, and there can be no doubt that their service consisted in such practices as those usual in Babylonia, in honour of Mylitta, at Aphaca in the Lebanon, and at Corinth. The ancient Egyptians were apparently not guilty of this very evil phase of idolatry. The Theban priestesses who bore among the Greeks the suspicious name of concubines of Ammon, were women of royal blood, sought in marriage by kings.

The Canaanite sacrifices seem to have been mainly of living things, though libations were also customary (Jer. vii. 18; xlv. 19). The star-worshippers made cakes and poured libations, and are not known to have offered sacrifices of living things.

Some personal customs of idolaters are distinctly mentioned: others are probably referred to in prohibitory laws. The latter are, however, to be very cautiously examined, as the wide range of our information on ancient idolatry furnishes examples of almost all supposed customs: we should not, therefore, infer that any one is forbidden which we do not recognise as anciently practised in Palestine or the neighbouring countries.

The Caucasian TEMHU, apparently a Libyan nation, to the west of Egypt, are represented on the Egyptian monuments as tattooed with at least one idolatrous symbol, the spindle of Neith, the goddess of Sais. Cuttings and tattooed marks were forbidden in the Law (Lev. xix. 28), in one place as superstitions of mourning (xxi. 5). Among the Egyptians such practices were not connected with funerals, though they may have been among the Shepherds. Partial shaving of the head and beard (l. c.) was also prohibited. The Egyptians shaved the head in mourning, but as their heads were always shaven it is difficult to understand what was meant by this custom unless it was a relic of an earlier condition of society. It has been thought that the separation of clean and unclean animals was to prevent the eating of heathen sacrifices, but although unclean animals were sacrificed and eaten by idolaters (Is. lxvi. 17), clean animals were also thus sacrificed and eaten in Egypt and Palestine.

In conclusion, we may remark that idolatry, so far as it was practised by the Hebrews, seems to separate itself into three main divisions: the old corrupt worship of ancestors, connected with magical rites; the Canaanite worship of Baal and Ashtoreth, in various forms; and, apparently, star-worship, derived either from Arabia or Chaldaea, besides many systems or practices less generally followed, as that of the chambers of imagery.

The most moderate view of the various kinds of idolatry of Canaan and the neighbouring countries shows the wisdom of the strict prohibitions we read in the Law, and the strong terms of reprobation used by the prophets, who liken it to the deepest moral corruption. The debasing superstitions of the Hindoos, and the savage rites of the Dahomans and Ashantees, were outdone in the homes of ancient civilization, in Egypt and Babylonia, the parents of science, in Tyre and Sidon, the queens of primitive commerce. No wonder that the imitation of these abominations, for which so many fair cities now lie in ruins, was forbidden under penalty of God's heaviest displeasure, and that the corrupt Israelites suffered almost the doom which they had been commanded to execute upon the nations of Canaan.

The lesson taught by the Biblical condemnation of idolatry seems to be that all worship of what is not God is to be strictly avoided, and anything tending thereto unflinchingly put away. The commentary of history is that true religion cannot exist when overlaid with corruptions, and that the perversions of heathenism are surely followed by its fierce persecutions.—R. S. P.

IDUMÆA or IDUMEA (Ἰδουμαία), the Greek form of the Hebrew name אֶדֹם, EDOM, as found in the Septuagint, the N. T., and Josephus.

1. Origin of the Name.—The meaning and origin of the name Edom are given in Gen. xxv. 30: 'And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me. I pray thee, with that red red (הָאָדָם הַהוּא), for I am faint; therefore was his name called Red' (EDOM; אֶדֹם). In the East it has always been usual for a chief either to give his name to the country which he conquers, or over which he rules, or to take a name from it. Esau, during the life of his father, seized the mountainous region occupied by the Horites. He had two names; but one of them was peculiarly applicable to the newly acquired territory. The mountains of Seir were remarkable for their reddish colour; hence, doubtless, the name Edom 'red,' was given to them. Esau is called 'the father of Edom' (אָבִי אֶדֹם), giving to it his name and ruling over it (Gen. xxxvi. 43); and the country is termed שׂרָה אֶדֹם, 'the field of Edom' (Gen. xxxii. 3; Judg. v. 4); and more commonly אֶרֶץ אֶדֹם, 'the land of Edom' (Gen. xxxvi. 16, etc.). In a very few cases it is also called 'the mount of Esau,' הַר עֵשָׂו (Obad. 8, 9, 19). In the Septuagint the Hebrew phrase Ereth-Edom is commonly rendered Ἰδου- malā; and this is the word uniformly used in the Apocrypha and in classic authors, and it is likewise the name found in Mark iii. 8, the only place in which Idumæa is mentioned in the N. T. The Septuagint has occasionally 'Εδωμ instead of 'Ιδουμαία. The Gentile noun is Edomi, אֲדוֹמִי, 'an Edomite' (Deut. xxiii. 8 [7]); but the inhabitants as a whole are called Edom (Num. xx. 20), which is perhaps a figurative expression, as we say 'England conquered.' The Edomites were also called אֲדוֹמִי בְנֵי, 'children of Edom' (Ps. cxxxvii. 7), and בְּתוֹרָא, 'daughter of Edom' (Lam. iv. 21).

The original name of the country was Mount Seir, הַר שֵׁעִיר; and it was probably so called from Seir, the progenitor of the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6; xxxvi. 20-22); though the signification of this name, 'rugged,' may have been the cause of its adoption, as the mountains are singularly rough and rugged. The name Seir continued to be applied to Edom after its occupation by the descendants of Esau, and even down to the close of the O. T. history (see Josh. xi. 17; 2 Chron. xx. 10; Ezek. xxv. 8, etc.). The aborigines were called Horites (חֹרִי; Sept. Xorðaios; Gen. xiv. 6); that is, 'Troglodytes' or 'cave-dwellers,' from the nature of their habitations [HORITES]. The mountains of Edom, as all travellers know, are filled with caves and grottos hewn in the soft sandstone strata.

2. Situation and boundaries.—Edom proper, or Idumæa, is situated on the south-eastern border of Palestine, extending from it to the northern extremity of the Elanitic Gulf. It was bounded on the west by the great valley of Arabah; on the south by a line drawn due east from the modern fortress of Akabah; on the east by the desert of Arabia; and on the north by the ancient kingdom of Moab. Its length from north to south was about 100 miles, and its breadth averaged 20. These boundaries are nowhere directly defined, but we can ascertain them from various incidental references in Scripture. When the Israelites encamped at Kadesh-barnea they were close to the border of Edom (Num. xx.), and Mount Hor is said to be within its border (xxxiii. 37). Hence, as Kadesh was situated in the valley of Arabah, and as Mount Hor is a few miles to the east of it, we conclude that the Arabah is the western boundary. The Israelites asked, but were refused, a passage through either Edom or Moab, so as to get direct from Kadesh to the east side of the Jordan (Num. xx. 14-20; Judg. xi. 17, 18). In consequence of this refusal they were obliged to march south along the Arabah to Ezion-geber and thence eastward by the wilderness round the territories of Edom and Moab (Id. with Num. xxi. 4). Hence we conclude that Edom and Moab occupied the entire region along the east side of the valley of Arabah, from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf. Edom was wholly a mountainous country, as may be inferred from the names given to it in the Bible and by ancient writers (Deut. i. 2; ii. 5; Joseph. Antiq. ii. 1, 2; Euseb. Onomast. s. v. Idumæa). The foot of the mountain range therefore may be regarded as marking its eastern border. On the north it appears to have been separated from Moab by the 'brook Zered' (Deut. ii. 13, 14, 18; Num. xxi. 12), which is probably identical with the modern Wady el-Ahshy. These views are corroborated by other and independent testimony. In the Samaritan Pentateuch the word Gabla is substituted for Seir in Deut. xxxiii. 2;

and Eusebius and Jerome state that Idumæa was in their time called Gebaleu, which is a Greek corruption of the Hebrew Gebal, 'mountains' (Onomast. id. et s. v. Seir), and is retained to this day in the Arabic form Jebdl, جبال. The modern province of Jebâl is bounded on the west by the Arabah, and on the north by Wady el-Ahshy (Robinson, B. R. ii. 154; Burckhardt, Trav. in Syria, p. 410). We may safely conclude from this that the ancient province had the same boundaries as it had the same name.

The Idumæa of Josephus and the classic authors was sometimes made to include a much more extensive region, for reasons which will appear in the historical sketch. Josephus divides Idumæa into two provinces, Gobollitis and Amalekitis (Antiq. ii. 1, 2). The former embraced Idumæa proper, being identical, as the name would indicate, with 'Mount Seir'; the other embraced a portion of southern Palestine with the desert plain south of it, which was originally occupied by the Amalekites (Num. xiii. 29), and subsequently, as we shall see, by the Edomites. Pliny places Idumæa to the south of Palestine, bordering upon Egypt (H. N. v. 14). Strabo (xvi. 2. 36, p. 760) states that the Idumæans were originally Nabatheans, but being driven out thence, they joined themselves to the Jews.

3. History.—The first mention of Mount Seir is in Gen. xiv. 6, where the confederate kings are said to have smitten the 'Horites in their Mount Seir.' These Horites appear to have been a tribe of the gigantic aborigines of Western Asia, so called from their dwelling in caves (Gen. xxxvi. 20-30). They were a pastoral people, divided into tribes like the modern Bedawin, having independent chiefs called Allûf (אֱלֹף, ver. 29). Esau's marriage with the daughters of Canaan alienated him from his parents, and he then obtained a settlement among the Horites, where he had already acquired power and wealth at the time of Jacob's return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxvii. 46). Probably his close alliance with Ishmael tended to increase his influence in his adopted country (xxviii. 9; xxxii. 3, seq.). Though then established in Edom, Esau had still some part of his flocks in Western Palestine in connection with those of his father; but on the return of Jacob he removed all his property from Canaan and dwelt in Mount Seir (xxxvi. 6-8). He gradually subdued and finally exterminated the Horites (Deut. ii. 12, 22), and a distinct tribe of his descendants, the Amalekites, leaving Edom, took possession of the desert plateaus south of Canaan (Gen. xxxvi. 12; Exod. viii. 14, seq.). The earliest form of government among the Edomites was, like that of the Horites, by chiefs (in the A. V. rendered 'Dukes,' but manifestly the same as the modern Arab sheikhs), exercising independent authority over distinct tribes (Gen. xxxvi. 15-19). It appears, however, that the various tribes were, at least in times of general war, united under one leader, to whom the title of king (מֶלֶךְ) was given. The names of eight of these kings are mentioned in Gen. xxxvi. 31-39, who are said to have reigned in Edom 'before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' that is apparently before the time of Moses (see Deut. xxxiii. 5; Exod. xviii. 16-19). Most of the large nomad tribes of Arabia have now an acknowledged chief, who is styled Emir, and who takes the lead in any great emergency; while each division of the tribe enjoys independence under its own sheikh on all ordinary occasions. Such would seem to have been the case with the Edomites, and this affords an easy solution of the apparent confusion in the account given by Moses, Gen. xxxvi. 31-43; and again in Exod. xv. 15, where it is said 'The dukes of Edom shall be amazed,' and Judg. xi. 17, where Moses is represented as having sent 'messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom.'

Though the Israelites and Edomites were closely related, and though the former were commanded 'not to abhor an Edomite for he is thy brother' (Deut. xxiii. 7), yet the bitterest enmity appears to have existed between them at every period of their history. When the Israelites asked permission to pass through the territory of Edom on their way to Canaan, they were rudely refused. For 400 years after that event the history of Edom is a blank. The country was attacked by Saul with partial success (1 Sam. xiv. 47). A few years later David overthrew the Edomites in the 'valley of Salt,' at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea (Robinson, B. R. ii. 109), and put garrisons in their cities (2 Sam. viii. 14). Solomon created a naval station at Ezion-geber on the Elanitic Gulf, from whence his ships went to India and Eastern Africa (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 18). An attempt was made by a native prince called Hadad to regain the independence of Edom in the time of Solomon, but it was unsuccessful (1 Kings xi. 14, seq.) The Edomites were subject to Israel until the time of Jehoshaphat, when they joined Ammon and Moab in a warlike expedition, but were miraculously defeated in the valley of Berachah (2 Chron. xx. 21). They subsequently revolted, elected a king, and asserted their independence; and though they were defeated with terrible slaughter by Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12), the Israelites were never able afterwards completely to subdue them (xxviii. 17). Rezin, king of Syria, expelled the Jews from Elath, which was thenceforth occupied by the Edomites (2 Kings xvi. 6, where for Syrians, אֲדוֹמִים, we ought to read Edomites אֲדוֹמִים, De Rossi, Varie Lectiones, ii. 247). During the decline of the Jewish power and wars of Judah and Israel the Edomites gradually enlarged their possessions. When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem the Edomites joined him and took an active part in the plunder and slaughter which followed. Their cruelty at that time is specially referred to in Ps. cxxvii., and was the chief cause of those dreadful prophetic curses which have since been executed upon their country (Jer. xlix. 17; Lam. iv. 21; Ezek. xxv. 13, 14; Obad. 10-21). Probably as a reward for the assistance afforded by them to the Chaldeans, the Edomites were permitted to settle in southern Palestine and in the country lying between it and the borders of Egypt. The name Idumæa was now given to the whole country, from the valley of Arabah to the Mediterranean (Joseph. Antiq. v. 1, 22; Strabo xvi. 2), and from Eleutheropolis to Elath (Jerome, Comment. in Obad.) Hence arose the mistakes of Roman writers, who sometimes give the name Idumæa to all Palestine, and even call the Jews Idumæans (Virgil, Georg. iii. 12; Juven. viii. 160).

While the Edomites thus extended their conquests westward they were driven out of their own country by the Nabatheans [NABATHEANS], who, leaving the nomad habits of their ancestors, settled down amid the mountains of Edom, engaged in commerce, and founded the little kingdom of Arabia Petraea. Some of their monarchs took the name Aretas (2 Maccab. v. 8; Joseph. Antiq. xv. 1. 2). One of them was that Aretas whose daughter Herod Antipas married (Matt. xiv. 3, 4); and it was the same king of Arabia who captured Damascus, and held it at the time of Paul's conversion (Acts ix. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 32). Idumæa was taken by the Romans in A.D. 105; and under their paternal government the enterprising inhabitants increased greatly in wealth and power. A lucrative transport trade between India, Persia, and the Levant, was in their hands. Roads were constructed across the desert of Arabia, through the defiles of Edom, and westward and northward to the Mediterranean and Palestine. The magnificent rock-temples, palaces, and tombs of Petra were then constructed, which still continue to be the wonder and admiration of Eastern travellers. They are not the works of the Edomites, but of the descendants of Nebaioth, Ishmael's oldest son and Esau's brother-in-law (Gen. xxv. 13; xxxvi. 3; Joseph. Antiq. i. 12. 4; Diodor. Sic. 19).

On the revival of Jewish power under the Asmoneans, that part of southern Palestine to which the name Idumæa had been given by classic writers was seized, and the inhabitants compelled to conform to Jewish law. The country was governed by Jewish prefects, and one of these, an Idumæan by birth, became procurator of Judea, and his son was Herod the Great, 'king of the Jews' (Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 6; xiii. 9. 2; xiv. 1. 3 and 8; xv. 7. 9; xvii. 11. 4).

In the first centuries of the Christian era Edom was included in the province of Palestina Tertia, of which Petra was metropolis (S. Paulo, Geogr. Sac. p. 307; Reland, Pal. 218). After the Mohammedan conquest its commercial importance declined, its flourishing port and inland cities fell to ruin. The Mohammedans were the instruments by which the fearful predictions of Scripture were fulfilled. The Crusaders made several expeditions to Edom, penetrating it as far as to Petra, to which they gave the name 'Valley of Moses' (Gesta Dei per Francos, pp. 518, 555, etc.), a name still existing in the Arabic form, Wady Musa. On a commanding hill, some twelve miles north of Petra, they built a fortress, and called it Mons Regalis; its modern name is Shobek (Id. p. 611). The Crusaders occupied and fortified Kerak, the ancient Kir Moab, and raised it to the dignity of an episcopal see, under the impression that it was Petra (Id. pp. 812, 885, 1119). From the age of the crusaders until the present century nothing was known of Idumæa. No traveller had passed through it, and as a country it had disappeared from history. Volney heard some vague reports of its wonders from Arabs. Seetzen also heard much of it in the year 1806, but he was unable to enter it. Burckhardt was the first to traverse the country. In 1812 he travelled from Kerak south by Shobek to Petra (Trav. in Syria, pp. 377, sq.; Robinson, B. R. ii. 165).

4. Physical Geography.—Idumæa embraces a section of a broad mountain range, extending in breadth from the valley of Arabah to the desert plateau of Arabia. 'Along the base of the range on the side of the Arabah, are low calcareous hills.

To these succeed lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry; over which lies the red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs, broken by deep and wild ravines. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking features' (Handbook for S. and P., i. 44). 'The first thing that struck me,' says Stanley, 'in turning out of the Arabah up the defiles that lead to Petra was, that we had suddenly left the Desert. Instead of the absolute nakedness of the Sinaitic valleys, we found ourselves walking on grass, sprinkled with flowers, and the level platforms on each side were filled with sprouting corn; and this continues through the whole descent to Petra, and in Petra itself. The next peculiarity was when, after having left the summit of the pass, or after descending from Mount Hor, we found ourselves insensibly encircled with rocks of deepening and deepening red. Red, indeed, even from a distance, the mountains of 'red' Edom appear, but not more so than the granite of Sinai; and it is not till one is actually in the midst of them that this red becomes crimson, and that the wonder of the Petra colours fully displays itself' (S. and P., p. 88). The ravines which intersect these sandstone mountains are very remarkable. Take them as a whole, there is nothing like them in the world, especially those near Petra. 'You descend from wide downs . . . and before you opens a deep

cleft between rocks of red sandstone rising perpendicularly to the height of one, two, or three hundred feet. This is the Sik. . . Follow me then down this magnificent gorge—the most magnificent, beyond all doubt, which I have ever beheld. The rocks are almost precipitous, or rather they would be, if they did not, like their brethren in all this region, overlap, and crumble, and crack, as if they would crash over you' (Id. p. 90). Such are the ravines of Idumæa, and the dark openings of the numerous tombs and grottos which dot their sides; and the sculptured façades here and there hewn out in their gorgeously coloured cliffs, add vastly to their picturesque grandeur. The average elevation of the sandstone range is about 2000 feet. Immediately on its eastern side, and indeed so close to it as to make up part of one great range, is a parallel ridge of limestone, attaining a somewhat higher elevation, and extending unbroken far to the north and south. The latter sinks with a gentle slope into the desert of Arabia. The deep valleys, and the little terraces along the mountain sides, and the broad downs upon their summits, are covered with rich soil, in which trees, shrubs, and flowers grow luxuriantly. All this proves how minutely accurate were the statements contained in Isaac's blessing to Esau—'Thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above' (Gen. xxvii. 39).

5. Present State of the Country.—Idumæa, once so rich in its flocks, so strong in its fortresses and rock-hewn cities, so extensive in its commercial relations, so renowned for the architectural splendour of its temples and palaces—is now a deserted and desolate wilderness. Its whole population is contained in some three or four miserable villages, no merchant would now dare to enter its borders, its highways are untrodden, its cities are all in ruins. The predictions of God's word have been fulfilled to the very letter, 'Thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles, and brambles in the fortresses thereof. . . . When the whole earth rejoiceth I will make thee desolate. . . . Thou shalt be desolate, O Mount Seir, and all Idumæa, even all of it. . . . Edom shall be a desolation; every one that goeth by it shall be astonished' (Is. xxxiv. 13; Exek. xxxv. 14; Jer. xlix. 17). Idumæa is now divided into two districts, Jebel, including the northern section as far as Wady el-Ghuweir, and Esh-sheerah, embracing the southern part (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 410; Robinson, B. R. ii. 154). The site of the ancient capital Bozrah is now marked by the small village of Busaireh, and Petra, the Nabathean capital, is well known as Wady Musa.

IGAL (יגל); Sept. Vat. 'Igal; Alex. 'Iγδλ).

1. One of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan. He is described as the son of Joseph, of the tribe of Issachar, Num. xiii. 7.

2. One of David's 'mighty men,' said in 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 to be the son of Nathan of Zobah (Γδάλυδς Nabard); in the parallel passage, 1 Chron. xi. 38, we find 'Joel the brother of Nathan'; Sept. Alex. 'Iωηλ δδελφός Νάβαρ; Vat. υἱός.—J. E. R.

IGDALIAH (יגדליה); Sept. Γοδολίας), the son of Hanan, into whose chamber in the temple Jeremiah took the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv. 4). It is not quite certain whether the phrase 'man of God' in this verse applies to Hanan or Igdaliah; but analogy would lead us to assign it to the former (comp. Jer. i. 1; xxviii. 1; Zech. i. 1, etc.)—W. L. A.

IGEAL (יְגֵאֵל; 'Iwāḡ, Jegaal). The same name in the original as Igal, but belonging to a remote descendant of David, the son of Shemaiah, 1 Chron. iii. 22.—J. E. R.

IHRE, JOHANN VON, professor of rhetoric at Upsala, was born 3d March 1707 at Lund, and died at Upsala 26th November 1780. He is chiefly remarkable for his labours on the Gothic version of Ulphilas. The results of these are given in a work entitled Scripta Versionem Ulphilanam et ling. Moesogothicam illustrantia, collected and edited with the author's corrections and additions by Ant. Fr. Büsching, Berl. 1773, 4to. This collection contains the following tracts: 1. Ulphilas illustratus, a series of critical observations on the readings of the Codex argenteus, to which is prefixed a preface, in which, among other things, the author endeavours to prove that the letters of the Codex were produced by an encaustic process, the surface of the parchment having been covered with wax, on which silver-leaf was laid and the form of the letter stamped thereon with a hot iron; 2. Fragmenta versionis Ulphilanae, containing the portions of the Epistle to the Romans published by Knittel, with annotations; 3. Dissertatio de originibus Ling. Lat. et Gr. inter Moesogothos reperiundis; 4. De verbis Moesogothorum; Analecta Ulphilana, i. de Cod. Argent. et litteratura Gothica, ii. de nominibus subst. et adjunct. Moesogothorum; 5. De Lingua Cod. Arg.; 6. Specimen Glossarii Ulphilani, cum praefationibus. An Appendix contains some tracts by other writers, viz., Heupelii Diss. de Ulphila; Oelrichsii Animadu. in hanc Diss.; Esbergii et Soedermanni Diss. de Ulphila; Jo. Gordonii Specim. animadvers. critt. in priscam Evangg. vers. Gothicam; Wachteri Diss. de ling. Cod. Arg. As only 131 copies of this collection were printed for subscribers, it is now extremely rare; which has induced us to give the above list of its contents from a copy in our own possession. Besides the tracts contained in this volume, Ihre wrote several others devoted to the same department of inquiry, the titles of which are given by Zahn in the preface to his edition of Ulphilas, p. 70. Ihre's contributions to the Gothic literature are of the highest importance and value.—W. L. A.

IIM (יִימ; Sept. Βακώκ, Alex. Ἀβελμ; Yim), a town on the southern border of Judah, between Baalah and Azem, and not far from Beersheba (Josh. xv. 29). It is only once mentioned, and its site is unknown.

2. (Sept. Γατ; Ijeabarim), a name given in Num. xxxiii. 45 as a contraction of Ijeabarim.—J. L. P.

IJEABARIM (יְיַעְבָּרִים; Sept. Ἀχαλα, and Γατ; Ijeabarim), a place on the eastern frontier of Moab, where the Israelites encamped before crossing the valley of Zared (Num. xxi. 11; xxxiii. 44). The word signifies 'the heaps of Abarim,' and Abarim was the name of that mountain range which runs along the eastern side of the Dead Sea [ABARIM]. These 'heaps' of Abarim were some noted mounds, perhaps covered with ruins, which served to give a distinctive name to this spot on the edge of the wilderness. The site is unknown; and, indeed, the region in which it is situated has not as yet been explored. In Num. xxxiii. 45 the place is called simply Iim, 'the heaps.'—J. L. P.

IJON (יִזְוֹן; 'Aḡ, Alex. Ναβ and Ἀϊών; Ahion and Aion), a town of northern Palestine, mentioned in connection with Dan and Abel as taken by Benhadad, king of Syria, at the instigation of Asa (1 Kings xv. 20). At a subsequent period, when Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, invaded Israel, Ijon was the first place captured (2 Kings xv. 29). It was thus situated on the northern border of the land. Between the great ranges of Lebanon and Hermon, a few miles north-west of the site of Dan, is a little plain called Merj Aiyān, 'the meadow of the fountains,' and at its northern extremity is a large tell covered with ruins called Dibbīn. Of this Dr. Robinson says:—'Tell Dibbīn is a noble site for a city; overlooking, as it does, the whole plain of Merj, and commanding one of the great roads between the sea-coast and the interior. Unmistakeable traces likewise show that in very ancient times the place was occupied by a city. Shall we perhaps be wrong in regarding it as the site of the ancient Ijon, the name of which has been perpetuated in the Arabic 'Ayūn?' (The words יִזְוֹן and عيون, though radically the same, are different in meaning.) There can be no doubt that Tell Dibbīn is the site of the ancient border city of Ijon (Robinson, B. R. iii. 375; Ritter, Pal. und Syr. ii. 241; Handbook for S. and P. ii. 445).—J. L. P.

IKRITI, SHEMARJA B. ELIAH (שְׁמַרְיָה אִיקְרִיטִי; אִיקְרִיטִי), a distinguished Jewish philosopher, philologist, and most voluminous commentator, originally from the island of Crete, whence he derived his name (אִיקְרִיטִי), flourished about A.D. 1290-1320 at Negroponte. He was at the court of Robert king of Naples, who studied Hebrew under R. Jehudah b. Moses b. Daniel, and for whom Ikriti wrote commentaries on the whole of the O. T. with the exception of Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which the death of his son prevented him from interpreting. The first instalments of this exposition were finished in 1328, and despatched to the king, to whom they were dedicated. The chief aim of Ikriti was to reconcile in his expositions the conflicting opinions of the Rabbinic and the Karaite Jews [KARAITES], as well as to allay the contest of the followers of Maimonides with the old orthodox school [MAIMONIDES]. His commentaries are very diffuse, and contain much valuable criticism. It is to be regretted that they have not as yet been published. Comp. Carmoly in Jost's Annalen, 1839, pp. 63, 155; Geiger in He-Chaluz, Lemberg 1853, vol. ii., pp. 25, 158; Ozar Nechmad, Vienna 1857, vol. ii., p. 90, etc.; Duke's Shire Shalomo, Hanover 1858, ii., p. 4; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, Leipzig 1863, vol. vii., p. 318, etc.—C. ILAI (יְלַי; Sept. Ἰλαί). An Ahohite, one of the valiant men of David's army (1 Chron. xi. 29).

In 2 Sam. xxiii. 28, the name given is Zalmon (זלמן), which Thenius (Exeget. Hdb., in loc.) thinks passed through clerical error and obliteration into עזלי. Kennicott on the other hand decides as עזלי as the original name (Dissertation, p. 187, ff.)—W. L. A.

ILGEN, KARL DAVID, D.D., born at Burgholzhausen in 1768, died at Berlin 17th Sept. 1834; was successively rector of the burgh school at Naumberg (1790), professor of Oriental literature at Jena (1794), rector at Schulpforte and Ober-consistorial-rath (1802). In consequence of failing health he resigned this office in 1830 and retired to Berlin, where he died. Besides numerous contributions to classical literature he wrote a treatise De Jobi antiquissimi Carminis natura atque virtutibus, Leipzig 1789; Die Urkunden des I. Buch von Moses in ihrer urgestalt, etc., Halle 1798; *Die Gesch. Tobis nach drey verschied. originalen, dem Griech. dem Lat. des Hieronymi, und einer Syrisch. Uebersetzung, mit Anmerk. ILLESCAS, JACOB DE (יעקב דלסקאס), flourished in the 14th century at Illecas, not far from Madrid, whence his family derived their name. He wrote allegorical, Kabbalistic, and grammatical commentaries on the Pentateuch, entitled אמרי נעים, pleasant words. He also explains in it the obscure passages of Rashi and Ibn Ezra's expositions on this portion of the Hebrew Scriptures, and quotes Lekach Tob, Joseph, Tam, Bechor Shor, Jehudah the Pious, Isaac of Vienna, Moses de Coney, Aaron, Eljakim, the Tosafoth, etc. This commentary is given in Frankfurter's Great Rabbinic Bible [FRANKFURTER].—C. ILLYRICUM (Ἰλλυρικόν), a country lying along the eastern shore of the Adriatic Gulf, north of Epirus. The Apostle Paul, in his third great missionary journey, after traversing Asia Minor and Macedonia, tells the church of Rome, 'that round about unto Illyricum (κύκλῳ μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ) I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ' (Rom. xv. 19). The exact meaning of the passage is somewhat doubtful. The κύκλος may be joined with Jerusalem, and signify its 'neighbourhood' (as Alford, in loc.); or it may be joined with the μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ, and denote the 'circuit' of the apostle's journey 'as far as Illyricum.' The extent and boundaries of Illyricum were different at different periods. The earliest notices state that certain tribes called Ἰλλύριοι inhabited the mountainous region along the coast between Epirus and Liburnia (Scylax, ch. xix., seq.). On the invasion of the country by the Goths, these tribes were scattered eastward and northward, and gave their name to a wider region. According to Strabo, Illyria was bounded on the north by the Alps, on the south by Epirus, and on the east by the provinces of Macedonia and Moesia, and the rivers Save and Drave (vii. 5); and this was probably the geographical import of the name as used by Paul. At a later period Illyricum became one of the four great divisions of the Roman Empire, and embraced the whole country lying between the Adriatic, the Danube, the Black Sea, and Macedonia (Gibbon's Roman Empire, chap. i.) Through the southern part of Illyria proper ran the great road called Via Egnatia, which connected Italy and the East, beginning at Apollonia and Dyrrhachium, passing through Thessalonica and Philippi, and terminating at the Hellespont (Antonini Itinerarium, ed. Wessel., p. 317). Along this road Paul may have travelled on his third journey till he reached that region on the shore of the Adriatic which was called Illyricum. From Dyrrhachium he may have turned north into that district of Illyricum then called Dalmatia, and may have founded the churches subsequently visited by Titus (2 Tim. iv. 10; DALMATIA). Afterwards he may have gone southward by Nicopolis to Corinth. (But see Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, i. 389, ii. 128, 1st ed.)

Illyricum is a wild and bare mountainous region, affording a fitting home for a number of wild tribes, who now, as in ancient times, inhabit the country. The coast-line is deeply indented, and possesses some excellent harbours (Grote, History of Greece, vol. iv.; Wilkinson, Dalmatia and Montenegro).—J. L. P.

IMMANUEL (אֱמָנוּעֵל; Sept. Ἐμμανουήλ), occurring in forty-three MSS., and thirty-nine printed editions, as Dr. Henderson informs us, as two words, אֱמָנוּעֵל, is literally translated 'God with us.' As, however, the precise character and significance of the name is closely bound up with the interpretation of the principal passage in which it occurs—viz., Is. vii. 14, cited by Matthew in his Gospel, ch. i. vers. 22, 23—the latter demands our first consideration.

Perhaps there is no other portion of O. T. prophecy on which so much has been written, and in regard to which there has been, and still exists, so great a diversity of opinion, as the one we have now to do with. Following Dr. Henderson's arrangement, there are—1st, The Jewish interpreters, who of course ignore altogether the authority of the N. T., and are yet divided among themselves; the earlier rabbins explaining the passage of the queen of Ahaz, the later, as Jarchi and Aben-Ezra, of the wife of the prophet, but others, as Kimchi and Abarbanel, of a second spouse of the king. 2dly, 'The great body of Christian interpreters, who have held it to be directly and exclusively a prophecy of our Saviour, and have considered themselves fully borne out by the inspired authority of the evangelist Matthew.' 3dly, Those scholars who, not content to stop short here, have applied themselves to the study of the passage taken in its connection, in other words, to its historical exegesis, and have perceived the difficulties which in this view attach to the use made of it in the N. T. Of these (1), 'Grotius, Faber, Isenbiehl, Hezel, Bolten, Fitsche, Pluschke, Gesenius, Hitzig, suppose either the then present or a future wife of Isaiah to be meant by the עַמָּה referred to. (2) Eichhorn, Paulus, Hensler, Ammon,' to whom may be added J. D. Michaelis, 'are of opinion that the prophet had nothing more in view than an ideal virgin, and that both she and her son were purely imaginary persons, introduced for the purpose of prophetic illustration. (3) Bauer, Cube, Steudel, and some others,' including E. F. Rosenmüller in the 1st edition of his Scholia, 'think that the prophet pointed to a young woman in the presence of the king and his courtiers.'

'Richard Simon, Le Clerc, Koppe, Lowth, Oathe, Williams, Von Meyer, Olshausen, Dr. J. Fye Smith,' with Dr. S. Davidson, 'adopt the hypothesis of a double sense; one, in which the words apply primarily to some female living in the time of the prophet, and giving birth to a son according to the ordinary laws of nature, or, as Dathe holds, to some virgin who should miraculously conceive; and the other, in which they received a secondary and plenary fulfilment in the miraculous conception and birth of Christ.' Lastly, there are those who, with much learning and ability, have striven to vindicate what Gesenius calls 'the Messianic interpretation,' or the exclusive reference of the prediction to Christ; among whom may be mentioned, in addition to Dr. Henderson himself, Vitrina, Crusius, Dereser, Rosenmüller (in his Scholia in Comp. redacta), Hengstenberg, apparently Ewald, Dr. W. L. Alexander, and Dr. P. Fairbairn, who, however, are by no means agreed among themselves as to the way in which Matthew and Isaiah are to be reconciled.

One cannot avoid the suspicion that such a diversity, even among those who are at one as to fundamental principles, and most fully recognise the canon that the N. T. is to be considered as the key to the Old, has its source in something more than the idiosyncracies of different minds, and that, to use a familiar phrase, interpreters may have set out on the wrong scent. Now it is observable that it has been almost universally assumed at the outset, that the immediate and direct object of the prophet, speaking as the messenger of Jehovah, was to convince Ahaz by a striking sign that God would shortly deliver him from the enemies by whom he was threatened. 'The design of the prophet (they say) was to show to the distressed and distrustful king, that, in the extremity of his affairs, there was no reason to despair, and that the country should not be subdued' (Doederlein, in loc.) 'It seems to be as clear as words can make it,' says Dr. J. P. Smith, 'that the son promised was born within a year after the giving of the prediction; that his being so born, at the assigned period, was the sign or pledge that the political deliverance announced to Ahaz should certainly take place; and that such deliverance would arrive before this child should have reached the age in which children are commonly able to discriminate the different kinds of food' (Script. Test., vol. i. p. 237). In like manner Gesenius complains that the defenders of the immediate application of the prediction to Christ 'do not meet the numerous objections which arise out of the context, especially this, that it was necessary to give to the incredulous Ahaz a sign that was speedily fulfilled, and that lay as it were before his eyes' (Commentar über Jesaja, sur stelle). And so, some maintain that the promised child was Hezekiah; others a son of the prophet, called Immanuel; Dr. Davidson that Maher-shalal-hash-baz was primarily intended; while others, as Dr. Kennicott, refer the first part of the prediction to Messiah, and the latter (ver. 16) to Shear-Jashub: some will have it that the 'Almah was really present, and her son born shortly afterwards; others, as Hengstenberg, that the whole scene was merely beheld in vision, 'the child being ideally present, in his birth and growth to manhood, before the spiritual eye of the prophet, and constituting, as so present, the sign of a speedy deliverance of Judah from Israel and Syria;' while Rosenmüller, after an able defence of the Messianic interpretation, is constrained to admit that the prophet was mistaken about the period of the child's nativity: Dathe and others hold that the Evangelist quotes the passage as a typical prophecy; Isenbiehl, that he cites it by way of accommodation (for which sentiment the professor was cruelly subjected to chains and a dungeon); while Dr. Williams of Sydenham goes so far as to question the authenticity of the first two chapters of his gospel altogether.

But if this preliminary assumption be unfounded, there will be no room for such variety of opinion, nor any need of having resource to such desperate expedients to get over the difficulty—to which, in fact, that supposition gives rise—how Isaiah's intention in delivering the prediction and that of Matthew in quoting it are to be brought into mutual harmony. That it is so, we think, will be apparent from the following considerations: 1st, That it is inconsistent with the temper of Ahaz on the occasion. Not to insist on his habitual ungodliness, it is clear, as Dr. Fairbairn well shews, that at the time referred to he was in no mood to listen to assurances of divine protection. The whole compass of nature is, as it were, placed at his disposal, that he may exact from it a pledge of the faithfulness of Jehovah. But his earthly mind craves a more tangible dependence, his reliance must be on an arm of flesh, and his thoughts secretly turn to the King of Assyria, if indeed he was not already on terms with him (2 Kings xvi. 7; 2 Chron. xxviii. 16). His carnality and unbelief seem to have been anticipated by the prophet in the concluding words of the preceding oracle (ver. 9), and are distinctly brought out by his hypocritical reply to this second message. He 'will not tempt the Lord,' forsooth, by 'asking' what is freely offered. Would it have been, we ask, either a dignified or a salutary course, to have vouchsafed what was thus scornfully and impiously refused? Must the incredulous monarch be convinced against his will? It may indeed be doubted whether, in the circumstances, any miracle, however surprising, would have induced him to renounce 'the broken reed on which he trusted,' and rely simply on the word of God. And as we find that a disposition to question the divine veracity was always reprov'd, and often severely punished, we should rather expect, a priori, that, while the promise already given (ver. 7) would be performed, Ahaz would yet be made to feel the consequences of his unbelief, and be 'filled with his own devices;' which leads us to remark, 2dly, That this assumption is at variance with the language of the prophet in the preceding and following context. The strain of the prophet's address to the king is that of threatening rather than of encouragement. 'Hear ye now' (a formula most frequently used in menace and reproof) 'O house of David! Is it too little for you to weary men, that ye [proceed to] weary my God also?' (ver. 13); and from ver. 17 he goes on to denounce against the sovereign and his people a severe chastisement at the hands of the very power on whose aid he relied, even 'days such as had not come from the day that Ephraim departed from Judah.' 3dly, The position referred to hardly comports with what is recorded in the following chapter. We are there informed that a son, conceived about the date of the previous announcement, to be named Maher-shalal-hash-baz, was to be born to the prophet, concerning whom it is intimated that 'before the child should have knowledge to cry 'my father!' and 'my mother!' the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria should be taken away before the King of Assyria.' But, according to the view commonly taken of the prediction in chap. vii., the two signs must refer to one and the same event, viz., the invasion of Israel and Syria by Tiglath-pileser, and the contemporary destruction of their reigning sovereigns (narrated 2 Kings xv. 29, 30; xvi. 9). They are also precisely analogous in character. In both cases a child is to be born; each is to receive a significant name; and the promised deliverance is to happen when each attains a certain age. Moreover, unless we adopt the hypothesis that both children were sons of the same parents (according to Gesenius, of Isaiah, by the 'Almah of chap. vii. 14), there is nothing to indicate the lapse of any interval of moment between the two oracles, which would not equally support the idea that they refer to different future events; if therefore they refer to the same event, the births must have been as nearly as possible contemporary, and the children coetaneous. Such a tautological reiteration, if we may so speak, in the matter of signs (unless we homologate Dr. Davidson's conclusion, that the same child is spoken of under different names) would not only be without a parallel in the sacred volume, but is in itself highly improbable. The improbability will be greater if, as Dathe supposes, the first child was born miraculously, and the second in the ordinary course of nature; and still more if, as Dr. Fairbairn plausibly argues, Maher-shalal-hash-baz was conceived and brought forth in vision merely; for in either case the additional sign would be less remarkable, and therefore less convincing than that which preceded it, which is certainly reversing the natural order of things, and unlike the usual method of the divine procedure. Lastly, as the rendering in the common version of the last clause of ver. 16, which is very generally adopted by commentators, has gone a great way to foster the supposition in question, it is proper here to remark that it is unconformable to the genius and usage of the original language. The preposition מִן, 'from before,' or 'because of,' is regularly employed as the link between verbs of 'fearing'—such as יָרָא, חָתַת, and קָרַן, here translated 'abhorrest,' but which also signifies 'to fear,'—and the object dreaded (see Exod. i. 12; Numb. xxii. 3; and comp. ver. 2 of this chap.) But our translators have anomalously connected it with the verb יָנֹכַח, 'shall be forsaken,' and assigned to it a privative sense, such as it never bears. Dr. Henderson indeed refers, in support of this construction, to ch. xvii. 9, where certainly the preposition in question follows the verb יָנֹכַח, adding, that 'it appears, in such connection, to have no more force than מִן in Lev. xxvi. 43.' On turning, however, to his comment on the former passage, we find that he there explains the juxtaposition by a constructio pragnans, or by an ellipsis, which, being supplied, he renders the clause thus: 'which they left (when they fled) before the children of Israel' (comp. a like use of the preposition in Judg. ix. 21). On his own shewing, therefore, the passage quoted is not a case in point. The only sense, in fact, which could be elicited from such an arrangement of the words would be: 'the land, which thou abhorrest, shall be forsaken before,' or 'on account of its two kings.' This construction is therefore justly rejected by the most eminent scholars, as Schulzens, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, etc., who translate: 'the land, of whose two kings thou art afraid,' or, according to Schulzens, comparing ver. 6, where the same verb occurs, 'by whose two kings thou art vexed (i.e., besieged) shall be forsaken.' The idea of an express reference in these words to the slaughter of Pekah and Rezin, about two years after the delivery of the prophecy, is thus seen to be illusory.

This hypothesis then, regarding the primary intention of the oracle, being discarded, there will remain no valid excuse for either ignoring or depreciating the authority of the evangelic record, or undervaluing the explicitness of the declaration τοῦτο δὲ 'ΟΑΟΝ γέγονεν ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ρηθὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου, κ. τ. λ.: to those who admit the inspiration of the Evangelist, the question, 'Of whom speaketh the prophet this?' will, in that case, allow of but one answer, whatever may be the difficulties that present themselves on a closer examination; and the utmost that can reasonably be demanded is, that it can be shewn that the prophecy (vers. 14-16) admits of being applied to Christ throughout, and that, when so understood, it has an intelligible and appropriate bearing on the circumstances of those to whom it was originally addressed. We translate the verses thus:—

'Therefore Jehovah himself shall give you a sign:
Behold the Virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son,
And shall call his name Immanuel.
Milk and honey shall he eat
Till he know to refuse the evil, and choose the good;
For before the child (or youth) shall know
To refuse the evil and choose the good,
The land shall be forsaken,
Of whose two kings thou art afraid.'

Now, in the whole of this passage, there is at least nothing which does not tally with the Gospel history of our Saviour's infancy. (a) He was miraculously born, as we are there informed, of a virgin, betrothed, but not married. (b) He was named by his mother, according to divine direction. (c) Nor is there any real discrepancy in the names, as might at first sight appear; for 1st, there is no necessity that 'Immanuel' should be taken as an appellative, any more than 'Wonderful,' 'Counsellor,' 'Mighty God,' etc., in ch. ix. 6, which were never used as proper names of our Lord; and, 2dly, there is a close approximation in significance between the two designations (as pointed out under the article 'JESUS'), to which the Evangelist himself seems to refer: Immanuel, = 'God with us,' conveying the sense 'God is on our side,' and Jesus or Joshua, contracted for Jehoshua (Num. xiii. 16) = 'the salvation of Jehovah' (Gesen.), being apparently tantamount, as in the case of the Israelitish leader, to 'he by whom Jehovah shall save.' (d) Although we have no historical notice of the diet of the infant Saviour, there is no presumption against its having been identical with that here mentioned, but the contrary, if we consider, 1st, that 'milk and honey are frequently mentioned by ancient writers as the food of tender children,' as in Callimachus' hymn to Jupiter (48):

 Αἰγυπτοῖ Ἀμαλθεΐης, ἐπὶ δὲ γάλακός κρητὸν ἐβρωσ,

(comp. 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2; 1 Pet. ii. 1, etc.), and 'were recommended by the Greek physicians for this purpose' (Gesen.); and, 2dly, that as the land of our Saviour's birth was celebrated for the abundance of these productions, they would be easily accessible even to persons in such humble circumstances as Joseph and Mary. (c) It is scarcely necessary to add, that, in conformity with the prediction, the calamity denounced against Ephraim and Syria—that 'the land should be forsaken' of its inhabitants (the two countries being spoken of as one, on account of the alliance between them, as in ch. xvii. 1-3)—took place long before the child Jesus attained the years of discretion.

Let us next see how the passage thus translated and interpreted fits in to the connection in which it occurs. As all classes alike had been filled with alarm at the threatened invasion (ver. 2), and as the king had treated with contempt the gracious offer of Jehovah, we conceive that the direct and immediate design of the prophet in these verses was—to speak comfort to those who alone were prepared to receive it, by a sign which they at least would be able to appreciate, and which, taken in connection with what follows (ver. 17-end), might at the same time convey a tacit rebuke to the ungodly monarch. It is true the prophet was originally sent to Ahaz (ver. 3), and continues ostensibly to address him, not personally, however, so much as officially, viz., as the lineal representative of the house of David, and vicarious head of the Jewish people (whose real sovereign was Jehovah). God's long-suffering with the king was due to his regard for David, just as his forbearance towards the nation is to be explained by his promise to Abraham. Considering the character of Ahaz, it may indeed be doubted whether, apart from his adventitious position, he would have been acknowledged at all on the occasion. On the other hand, the undeniable fact that the grand aim of God's providence and the chief burden of his promises have ever been the advancement of his spiritual kingdom in the earth, and the happiness of his loyal subjects, sufficiently accounts both for the virtual change of parties addressed, and for the peculiar character of the prediction itself.

The exordium of the oracle is highly significant: 'therefore,' i. e., 'since you thus perversely refuse to make choice of a sign,' 'Jehovah shall give you a sign himself,' i. e., 'one of his own selection'; thus preparing the minds of the hearers for something different from what might have been expected, had Ahaz shewn a better spirit. Accordingly, the prophet, taking high ground, proceeds to assure the faithful that God had not forgotten his promises to the fathers, but that the predicted 'seed of the woman' should certainly be born in due time; which was primarily, and on the very face of it, an earnest of all those spiritual blessings discernible to the eye of faith through the symbols of the law, and the figurative language of prophecy, as attendant upon his coming. Moreover, there were certain advantages of an outward and temporal kind to the Jewish nation, as such, necessarily bound up with the appearance of such a Deliverer among them, and of these also this renewed assurance of his advent was secondarily, and by inference, a pledge. 1st, It is manifest that if the promised Saviour was to come out of Judah (Gen.

xlix. 10) that tribe should at least not be exterminated, and disappear from among the nations like the ten which had separated from it. 2dly, So far from this, it was distinctly foretold by Jacob himself, in the passage referred to, that the tribe of Judah should continue to enjoy that pre-eminence which was accorded to its head in consequence of the misconduct of Reuben, 'until Shiloh,' the 'peace bringer,' i. e., the Messiah (comp. Is. ix. 6; Micah v. 5; Eph. ii. 14) 'should come.' Now it is clear that the hostile kings sought, if not the annihilation of Judah, which on a former occasion they were very near effecting (2 Chron. xxviii. 5-8), at least to humble it by the destruction of its independence. This is intimated in the preceding oracle, vers. 8, 9: 'For Damascus shall be (as formerly) the head of Syria (but no more), and Rezin the head of Damascus; and Samaria shall be the head of Ephraim, and Remaliah's son the head of Samaria,' i. e., 'neither Rezin nor Pekah shall succeed in adding Judæa to his dominions, and making Damascus or Samaria its capital instead of Jerusalem.' So that we have here an important connection between the sign and the circumstances of those to whom it was vouchsafed. This, however, is not all. For, 3dly, it was already known from God's covenant with David (2 Sam. vii. 12-16; xx. ii. 2-5; compared with Acts ii. 30), that the Messiah was to be in the direct line of that prince; a promise which could not be redeemed if his family should become extinct. And, 4thly, as in that covenant it is expressly affirmed that David's 'throne,' as well as 'house,' should be 'established for ever' (comp. Ps. lxxxix. 34-37) it follows that his posterity should reign in his stead in uninterrupted succession, unless by their own misconduct they forfeited the privilege, which was held immediately and conditionally from God as the real Head of the Theocracy (1 Kings ii. 4; viii. 25; Ps. lxxxix. 30, 31, 32; cxxxii. 11, 12); while the Messiah, although about to inaugurate an entirely new order of things, appears, according to this representation, as the last of the series, who should sit down on the throne of his father David, never to rise from it (see Dr. Alexander's Connection of O. and N. T., p. 220). But the confederacy of Rezin and Pekah (whether or not they meant to extirpate the royal family) was, as Dr. Fairbairn points out, a direct contravention of this divine decree; and, although on a less important occasion, as much an instance of the 'kings of the earth setting themselves, and the rulers taking counsel together, against the Lord and against his anointed,' as was the later confederacy of Pilate and Herod. For, as we are informed in vers. 5, 6, their 'counsel' was not only to 'go up against Judah, and make it afraid' by beleaguering its capital, but to displace the existing dynasty, and 'set a king' of their own nomination 'in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal,' who should of course hold sway as their satrap or viceroy, ready at all times to do their bidding. The promise now given, however, taken in connection with the emphatic declaration of ver. 7, was a token that 'the Lord held them in derision,' and that their attempt should prove abortive; while in ver. 16 'he speaks to them,' as it were, 'in his wrath,' and threatens them with merited punishment for their presumption. However remote such considerations might be from the thoughts of the worldly-minded king and his courtiers, they would readily suggest themselves to those whose 'hope was in the Lord their God,' and who 'made his testimonies their meditation.'

To Ahaz, on the other hand, the prophetic announcement wore a very different aspect. Unlike the promises to the patriarchs and to David, no mention is made of any bond of union betwixt him and his illustrious successor. 'In this divine purpose and provision for a better state of things, the existing royal house is entirely overleapt; silently passed by on account of their unfaithfulness and corruption' (Dr. Fairbairn's Hermeneutical Manual, p. 423). And if we take into view the entire communication, which is continuous to the end of the chapter, there is evidently, as the same writer observes, an intended contrast between the child Immanuel and the degenerate king. The very name of the former was a tower of strength, and a beacon of hope. He was to be born in a time of peace, if not of prosperity, which we consider to be indicated by the allusion to his being fed on 'milk and honey;' because the supply of these articles, common as they were, depended on freedom of access to the fields and forests from which they were respectively procured. Accordingly, ere he attained the years of discretion (διακρίσεως) expressed by the phrase, 'Know to refuse the evil, and choose the good' (the proper parallel to which is to be found in Heb. v. 13, 14), and so should be of an age to think and act for himself, and to take an interest in public affairs, these deadly foes of his nation and throne should have utterly disappeared, both king and people. Ahaz, on the contrary, is specially marked out (ver. 17) as an object of divine displeasure. He had already been sorely harassed by the kings of Syria and Israel, and might still, for anything that is here said, suffer from them. But no sooner should he escape from one enemy than he should fall into the hands of another (comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20). And, as a necessary consequence, the people of his rule would suffer with him (quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi); and so great should be the devastation of the country, and its inhabitants so reduced in number, that at the return of peace, for want of hands to cultivate the fields, men would be glad to subsist on the food of children: 'for milk and honey shall every one eat that is left in the land' (vers. 21, 22; comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 19).

We have hitherto looked at the prediction chiefly as a pledge of certain things which its fulfilment necessarily ensured and presupposed. Besides this, however, the event was a 'sign' in the more usual sense of the term, not only on account of the child's miraculous birth, but also by reason of his significant name. This latter circumstance, which we think has not received the attention it deserves, might be inferred from the parallel instances in ch. viii. 1-4; Hosea i. 4, 6, 9; and is clearly established by the use made of the designation in the following chapter (vers. 8, 10), where it is employed, like many of the watchwords of the Greeks and Romans, as well as of modern nations (comp. in particular that of Cyrus' army at the battle of Cunaxa, Ζεὺς Σωτήρ καὶ Νίκη, and that of the Lutherans in the Thirty Years' War, Gott mit uns) as an incentive to courage in the hour of danger; and, as given by Jehovah himself, was an attestation to his people that, whatever mischief their enemies might do, their fury would be restrained within due bounds.

It will be seen that the view we have given of the passage, which is mainly that of Dr. Fairbairn, though differing from his in some minor particulars, is in a great measure free from the difficulty arising from 'the circumstance of time,' which has been so unduly magnified by many. Still, as the desolation of Syria and Ephraim actually took place some seven centuries before the birth of Christ (the inhabitants of Damascus having been carried captive by Tiglath-pileser about two years after the date of the prediction (2 Kings xvi. 9), and the removal of the Israelites completed by Esarhaddon sixty-three years later (see v. 8, and comp. 2 Kings xvii. 23, 24)), it may be thought strange that Isaiah should seem to connect the two events chronologically together (ver. 16). The anachronism, however, is only inferential and apparent; for what is said was strictly true. And so far as there is any ambiguity, it is quite in accordance with the enigmatical character and studied obscurity of prophecy in general. The prophet might have been commissioned to say '700 years before,' or 'long before.' For wise reasons, however, it was not deemed expedient that the precise period of Messiah's coming should yet be made known; the language on this point, therefore, is purposely vague. As Dr. Henderson has well observed, 'the uncertainty in regard to time was calculated to exert a salutary influence upon the minds of believers, by keeping up in them a constant expectation of the event; just as the uncertainty of the time of our Lord's second advent has always been found to operate favourably upon the minds of his people.' We meet with the same commingling of times indeed in reference to the second coming of Christ, which is connected in a similar manner in the N. T. with events that were to precede it by even much greater intervals. Thus our Lord himself (Matt. xxiv. 29) speaks of his coming to judgment as if it were shortly to follow (εὐθὺς μετὰ) the destruction of Jerusalem. So the Apostle Paul, correcting the error into which the Thessalonians had been led as to 'the day of Christ' being then 'at hand,' assures them that that day should not come 'except there should come a falling away first, and the man of sin be revealed;' yet (assuming with the majority of expositors that the reference is to the Papacy) fifteen centuries have already elapsed since 'he that let' was 'taken out of the way,' and not less than eight centuries since 'the mystery of iniquity' was fully 'revealed,' and the pretensions of its head reached their climax.

The limits of this article preclude a more minute criticism of the passage, and refutation of the various opinions from which we dissent. We can only remark upon one or two words in conclusion:—

That one future event was sometimes made the 'sign' (σημεῖον) of another anterior to it in point of time, is shown by Dr. Henderson from Exod. iii. 12; Jer. xlv. 29, 30. An example still more appropriate, as occurring in the same author, and relating to a parallel case, will be found in chap. xxxvii. of this prophet, ver. 30, 31 (compared with 2 Kings xix. 29), where the promise, that for two years the people should subsist on the spontaneous produce of the seed of the previous harvest, is constituted a 'sign' that the kingdom of Judah should recover from the effects of the Assyrian invasion, and by inference, that the designs of Sennacherib against

Jerusalem should be frustrated, of which a positive assurance is subjoined in ver. 33 and following; just as the sign of Immanuel, which is indirect, and indefinite as to time, is supplemented, ch. viii., by a special and definite token of the downfall of Samaria and Damascus within the space of two years.

In regard to עִמָּנוּאֵל, we are perfectly willing to accept the derivation of Gesenius (from the Arab.

عَمَل, pubes fuit), and the etymological sense thence derived, puella nubilis, 'a marriageable maid,' along with the admission of its advocates regarding the usus loquendi, which is what, after all, fixes the meaning of a term, 'that in all the places of the O. T. in which the word occurs, it undoubtedly denotes a young woman who is properly and strictly a virgin' (Dr. P. Smith's Test. to Mess., sec. 19, note A); for in that case it is the most apposite designation that could have been selected for the virgin mother of our Lord.

In fine, with respect to עִמָּנוּאֵל we hold, in accordance with the views above exhibited—(1) That it is an expressive epithet or title, and not a proper name. (2) That it denotes that the presence of God should be with his people, to defend and deliver them; the same expression, or others of precisely similar import, being of frequent occurrence in the sacred writers, from Moses downwards, of which it may be sufficient to adduce as examples Gen. xxvi. 24, 28; xxxix. 2, 21; xlviii. 21; 1 Sam. xvi. 18; 1 Kings viii. 57; Ps. xlv. 7, 11; Zech. viii. 23, and especially the repetition of the phrase in the immediate context of this passage (ch. viii. 10), compared with its like use on a similar occasion, 2 Chron. xxxii. 7, 8. (Compare also the use of σύν-εμν and adsum in the classics, as—οὐ θεὸς σὺν ἡμῖν ἔσονται, Xen. Anab. iii. 1, 21; Adsis O! placidusque juves, Virg. Æn. iv. 578.) (3) That it is of analogous significance to the name (Jesus) actually conferred on our Lord in conformity with the directions of the angel. (4) That the former, no more than the latter, can fairly be considered as implying the divinity of our Lord. In this, as in many other such cases, we have insensibly brought to the term, from independent sources of information, an idea which is not in it, and which does not harmonize with the context and occasion. All that can be said is, that, as applied to Christ, the title has a peculiar appropriateness. Let it be enough that divine attributes are explicitly ascribed to him in a prophecy which must have been delivered almost immediately after (ch. ix. 6).—W. S.

IMMANUEL B. SALOMON ROMI. This distinguished poet and commentator, also called אֱלֹהֵי הָדָעַת בִּמְנִיָּאֵל, the prince of science in Rome, was born in the eternal city about A.D. 1265, of a highly respectable Roman family denominated (אִפְרוֹנִים) Ziphronim, and by diligent study and his natural endowments soon became master of the whole cycle of Biblical and Talmudic literature, as well as of the productions of ancient and modern Greece and Rome. His brilliant talents, his charming poetry, and his delightful company, made him a general favourite, and attracted the notice of the immortal Dante, so that the two spirits, kindred, and yet different in many respects, formed a mutual and intimate attachment. Immanuel wrote commentaries on the whole O. T., with the exception of the minor Prophets and Ezra, giving not only a grammatical and archaeological explanation of the text, but making also some of the most valuable remarks upon the nature and spirit of the poetical books. It is greatly to be regretted that of all his exegetical works which are in different public libraries of Europe, the Commentary on Proverbs (פֶּרֶשׁ עַל מִשְׁלֵי), and some glosses on the Psalms (לְקוּטִים מִפֶּרֶשׁ הַתְּהִלִּים), are the only ones as yet published, the former in Naples 1486, and the latter in Parma 1806. The introduction of his commentary on the Song of Songs has been published with an English translation by Ginsburg, Historical and Critical Commentary on the Song of Songs, Longman 1857, p. 49-55. Immanuel died about 1330. Comp. Zunz, in Geiger's Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift, Stuttgart 1839, iv. 194, etc.; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, Leipzig 1863, vol. vii. p. 307, etc.—C. D. G.

IMMER (אִמֶּר; Sept. Ἐμμήρ). 1. The father of Pashur, who was chief governor of the Temple in the time of Jeremiah, and the head of a priestly family (Ezra ii. 37; Neh. vii. 40; Ezra x. 20; Neh. iii. 29; xi. 13; 1 Chron. ix. 12); from which the sixteenth order or course was formed, 1 Chron. xxiv. 14. 2. The name of a place in Babylonia, Ezra ii. 59 (Ἐμμήρ); Neh. vii. 61 (Ἰεμμήρ), from which several persons returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem who could not prove their nationality.—J. E. R.

INCENSE, קְטֹרֶת, once קְטֹרֶת, LXX. θυμίαμα, συνθετός; Vulg. thymiamia, is to be distinguished from לֶבְנָה, lebannah, or frankincense, with which, however, it is confounded by Calmet, as it sometimes also is in the A. V.; the former being a confection of several sweet spices; the latter, a distinct precious gum, forming one of the ingredients of the incense. The components of incense, as given in Exod. xxx., are Stacte, Onycha, Galbanum, and pure Frankincense,* tempered together, or rather, salted, מֶלַח. Salt, the symbol of incorruptness, was added to all sacrifices and offerings, except the wine of the drink offerings, the blood, and the wood (Lev. ii. 13, where see Bp. Patrick). These four ingredients were mingled together 'in equal proportions,' בֶּרֶךְ בֶּרֶךְ, according to the A. V., LXX., Vulg., 'Targ. et Arabs uterque,' although 'Ebenesra et Abarbanel: singula aromata scorsim, atque ita hac formula utuntur in Talm. Sebach 2 (Ges. Thes. 178). What weight of each ingredient was compounded at a time is unknown; for, says Bp. Patrick, 'I see no authority for what the Hebrew doctors say, that there were 70 pounds of each of the four spices; and they add (which makes all they say of this matter questionable), that there were also several pounds of Cinnamon, and Cassia, and Crocus, in short, of 13 several spices, which Josephus (Bell. Jud. v. 5) affirms were in this composition—of which Moses, they say, made in the whole 368 lbs.; that is, one pound for every day in the year, and three for the day of Expiation. And accordingly R. Levi Barzelonita saith, the priests made every year as much as would suffice for every day of it; and that the ordinary priests might make it as well as the high-priest, Præcept. ci. (Com. on Exod. xxx. 34).

Incense compounded in any other way than that prescribed by Moses was called 'strange incense,' and was forbidden to be offered (Exod. xxx. 9); this law, as well as the requisition in ver. 36, that it should be 'pure,' excludes all those additional ingredients mentioned by Josephus and the Rabbins; and if they were introduced in later times, as seems to have been the case, it was done in direct violation of the law.

This incense is called 'most holy,' קֹדֶשׁ קֹדֶשׁ (ver. 36), because it was to be used in the service of Jehovah only, and was pre-eminently sacred to him. The preparation of a similar kind by any one for private use was forbidden under a severe penalty—the penalty of excision from among his people (Exod. xxx. 38); but that this includes the excision not only of the transgressor himself but of his 'whole race' is far from 'probable,' as Bp. Patrick says.

Aaron at first performed the duty of burning incense, but it does not appear to have been made an exclusive part of the functions of the high-priest; for afterwards the sons of Aaron in their courses performed this service, as appears from Luke i. 8, 9, when Zacharias, who was not an high-priest, offered incense when it fell to his lot. The offering of incense was considered the most honourable part of the priest's duty; a peculiar blessing was supposed to attach to it; but surely Alford is wrong when he says that, 'the same person could not serve in it more than once' (N. T. on L. i. 9), since the parts of the priests' duty were distributed by lot (ἐλαχε, Lightfoot, Ministerium Templi, ix. 1, Hor. Heb. Tal. on L. i. 9); but that all might share the honour, those of the family who ministered on any particular day, who had not hitherto obtained the incense, cast lots for it among themselves (Lightfoot, Minist. Temp. ix. 5). Uzziah, attempting to invade this sacred function of the priesthood, was smitten with 'leprosy' which 'clave to him till the day of his death' (2 Chron. xxvi. 16-21). [OFFERING.]

The times for offering incense are distinctly specified. First, it was to be burned every morning and every evening in the holy place, on the 'altar of incense' provided for the purpose. This altar was made of 'Shittim,' or acacia wood, a cubit in length and breadth, covered with gold, encircled with a golden crown or wreath, having horns at the corners, and rings beneath the crown, through which the acacia gold-covered staves passed for carrying it. It stood before the vail which separated the holy from the most holy place. On this altar, then, the priests burned incense every evening when they lighted, and every morning when they trimmed, the lamps in the sanctuary. 'Mane, inter sanguinem et membra suffiebat, vesperi, inter membra et libamina' (Talm. in Lightfoot M. T. ix. 5). When the priest entered to burn incense, the people, at the sound of a bell,* were removed from the temple and stood without, and the priests and Levites hastened to take their stations. The most profound silence prevailed (Rev. viii. 5) while prayer ascended to God from the assembled worshippers. At a signal from the Præfectus Ministerii the priest cast incense upon the fire on the altar and then departed. 'When the incense and the prayers were finished the parts of the victim were laid on the altar, and then the Levites applied themselves to psalmody, and the priests to the blowing of trumpets' (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. a Tal. on L. i. 9, 10; M. T. cix. 5). [ALTAR.]

On the great day of Atonement it is enjoined the high-priest 'that he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hand full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the vail, and he shall put the incense on the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of incense may cover the mercy-seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not' (Lev. xvi. 12, 13). Before he entered with the incense, the Jewish doctors tell us, that the elders of the Sanhedrim brought him into the house of Abtine, where the incense was kept, that he might learn how it was to be handled. Then they adjured him thus: 'Lord high-priest, we, the delegates of the Sanhedrim, . . . adjure thee by Him who has caused His name to dwell in this temple, that thou make no change in those things we have said unto you. Then they parted in tears.' The reason of this solemn adjuration was, that the Sadducees taught that he might kindle the incense without the vail, and then carry it smoking into the most holy place, contrary to the express command of the Lord. The high-priest then took a censer full of live coals from the altar and placed it on a bench in the temple, and from a vase brought to him he took a handful of incense and threw it upon a plate. He took the censer of coals in his right hand, and the plate with the incense in his left. Thus he entered the most holy place and approached the Ark, on which place he deposited his coals, and poured incense into his hands, and placed it on the coals, and waited until the whole apartment was filled with smoke, then he retired backward from the Adytum with his face turned towards the Ark. Having come forth, he offered this short prayer: 'O Lord God, may it please thee that this year may have timely rains; nor suffer thy sceptre to depart from Judah; nor thy people Israel to want food; nor the prayers of transgressors to come before thee' (Lightfoot, M. T. c. xv.) Presently he went forth out of the sanctuary and showed himself to the people, that 'they might not suspect he had done amiss and miscarried in his office'—(Patrick). [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.]

Incense was also offered on extraordinary occasions, as in the case of the plague which broke out among the murmuring people after the destruction of Korah and his company, when Aaron, by command of Moses, took a censer and put fire therein, and incense upon the fire, and ran into the midst of the congregation and 'stood between the living and the dead,' and made atonement for the people, so that the 'plague was stayed' (Num. xvi. 46-50). Thus atonement, usually made by blood, was made by incense, 'Currens ira Dei, sacerdotii voce prohibebatur' (Jerome)—a notable type of the power with God of our great High-priest and Intercessor, the Lord Jesus—(Patrick). [TABERNACLE, iii. 926.]

The offering of incense formed a part of the worship of almost all nations. How ancient the practice is we have no means of knowing. By the Egyptians 'incense was presented to all the gods, and introduced on every grand occasion when a complete oblation was made (Wilkinson's Pop. Acc. of the Auct. Egyptians, i. 265).

As might be expected, the Jews in their fits of idolatry offered incense to their idols (Hos. xi. 2; Jer. xlviii. 35).

The incense burnt in the Temple is called 'a perpetual incense' (Exod. xxx. 8), 'in the same sense that the morning and evening sacrifice is called a perpetual burnt-offering (Exod. xxxix. 38, 42), because it was never intermitted twice a day. And one reason why it was thus continually burnt was because of the vast number of beasts that were slain and cut to pieces, and washed, and burnt every day in the sanctuary, which would have made it smell like shambles (as Maimonides speaks), if this sweet odour had not perfumed it and the garments of the priests who there ministered.

Whence, saith he, that speech of the Rabbins: This sweet odour might be smelt as far as Jericho; whereby the reverence due to God's house was preserved, which would have been contemptible if there had been an ill smell constantly in it, as he truly observes, More Nevoch. p. iii. c. 45' (Pat. on Exod. xxx. 8). There need be little difficulty in admitting this. The incense was, most likely, disinfectant and corrective, purifying and sweetening the atmosphere of the sacred house. But this view does not interfere in the least with the higher and nobler object contemplated by the appointment of the incense offering. There can be little doubt that it was intended, more humano, in the honour of Jehovah, the Great King, whose palace the tabernacle, as also the temple, was. In this way it served its purpose directly and at once; but as God is truly worshipped in a spiritual manner only ('God is a spirit'), the incense in the symbolism of the Hebrews was intended to represent some spiritual truth. What was that? Josephus thinks that the spices gathered from sea and all lands inhabited and uninhabited were designed to teach that 'all things are of God and for God' (Jewish War, Traill's Trans., B. v., sec. 5). Philo indulges in his accustomed vagaries of the imagination. Bahr in his Symbolik regards the incense as the symbol of the name of God, each ingredient representing some divine perfection. Fairbairn, in his admirable Typology, following Hengstenberg, takes what appears the most natural and Scriptural view. In the language of the latter, 'the smoking, sweet-smelling incense, is in Scripture the standing symbol of the prayer of believers, which is precious before God (comp. Apoc. v. 8; viii. 3, 4; Luke i. 10). The Psalmist comes forth here [Ps. cxli. 2] as an expositor of the Mosaic law, in which the offering of incense every morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 77, 95) symbolised prayer, and reminded the faithful of their obligation to present it, and the blessing which arises from it. He who prayed brought to the Lord the substance of the incense-offering' (Com. on Ps. cxli.) Nor is it a conclusive objection to this view, that, if the incense is a symbol of prayer, the evening sacrifice must have the same symbolic meaning; for the evening sacrifice is rather the meat-offering, קרבן, which, according to Hengstenberg, 'is in the law the symbolical representation of good works.' Hence the Psalmist prays, that his prayer might be set forth as incense before the Lord, and the lifting up of his hands as the evening meat-offering; prayer and good works being inseparably connected in the true worship of God. It might, indeed, appear at first view, that the incense was not symbolical of the prayers of the saints, but rather of that which renders those prayers acceptable before God—the merits of the Lord Jesus. But in Rev. v. 8 the representatives of the Church have golden vials full of odours (lit. incenses, Θυμαμύδρων), which are said to be 'the prayers of the saints,' where the logical connection of the relative is with 'odours,' not with 'vials,' which in no proper sense could be called the 'prayers of the saints.' And in Rev. viii., although the incense is 'given' to the angel to be offered with the prayers of the saints, all that we are compelled by the symbolism to understand is the acceptability of the prayers of the saints of God, long unanswered, but now at length about to be accomplished. It is, however, perfectly true that the prayers of the saints are a sweet incense unto God, chiefly because they came up before Him 'through Jesus Christ.'—I. J.

INCHANTMENTS. [WITCHCRAFT.]

INDIA (Ἰνδία; Sept. Ἰνδική). This name occurs only in Esther i. 1; viii. 9, where the Persian king is described as reigning 'from India unto Ethiopia, over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces.' It is found again, however, in the Apocrypha, where India is mentioned among the countries which the Romans took from Antiochus and gave to Eumenes (1 Maccab. viii. 8). It is also with some reason conceived that in Acts ii. 9 we should read Ἰνδία, India, and not Ἰουδαία, Judæa. If this could be admitted, an interesting subject of inquiry would arise; for these dwellers in India—that is, Jews of India—are described as being present in Jerusalem at the Passover. There is much to say in favour of this reading, but more in favour of Idumæa; for the name of that country, Ἰδουμαία, might, much more easily than that of India, Ἰνδία, have been accidentally, or rather carelessly, corrupted into Ἰουδαία: and, at the same time, the name of Idumæa would come better into the list than that of India, seeing that the enumeration is manifestly taken from east to west; which allows Idumæa with great propriety to follow Mesopotamia, but forbids India to do so. Whichever may be preferred of the other two, the reading 'Judæa' cannot but be wrong; for, on the face of the list, we cannot but see the superfluity of the information, that the people of Judæa were present in their own city at the Passover.

It is evident on the face of the above intimations, and indeed from all ancient history, that the country known as India in ancient times extended more to the west, and did not reach so far to the east—that is, was not known so far to the east—as the India of the moderns. When we read of ancient India, we must clearly not understand the whole of Hindostan, but chiefly the northern parts of it, or the countries between the Indus and the Ganges; although it is not necessary to assert that the rest of that peninsula, particularly its western coast, was then altogether unknown. It was from this quarter that the Persians and Greeks (to whom we are indebted for the earliest accounts of India) invaded the country; and this was consequently the region which first became generally known. The countries bordering on the Ganges constituted to be involved in obscurity, the great kingdom of the Prasians excepted, which, situated nearly above the modern Bengal, was dimly discernible. The nearer we approach the Indus, the more clear becomes our knowledge of the ancient geography of the country; and it follows that the districts of which at the present day we know the least were anciently best known. Besides, the western and northern boundaries were not the same as at present. To the west, India was not then bounded by the river Indus, but by a chain of mountains which, under the name of Koh (whence the Grecian appellation of the Caucasus), extended from Bactria to Makran, or Gedrosia, enclosing the kingdoms of Candahar and Cabul, the modern kingdom of Eastern Persia, or Afghanistan. These districts anciently formed part of India, as well as, further to the south, the less perfectly known countries of the Arabi and Hauri (the Arabiæ and Oriæ of Arrian, vi. 21), bordering on Gedrosia. This western boundary continued at all times the same, and was removed to the Indus only in consequence of the victories of Nadir Shah.

Towards the north, ancient India overpassed not less its present limit. It comprehended the whole of the mountainous region above Cashmir, Badakshan, Belur Land, the western boundary mountains of Little Bucharía, or Little Thibet, and even the desert of Cobi, so far as it was known. The discovery of a passage by sea to the coasts of India has contributed to withdraw from these regions the attention of Europeans, and left them in an obscurity which hitherto has been little disturbed, although the current of events seems likely ere long to lead to our better knowledge.

From this it appears that the India of Scripture included no part of the present India, seeing that it was confined to the territories possessed by the Persians and the Syrian Greeks, that never extended beyond the Indus, which, since the time of Nadir Shah, has been regarded as the western boundary of India. Something of India beyond the Indus became known through the conquering march of Alexander, and still more through that of Seleucus Nicator, who penetrated to the banks of the Ganges; but the notions thus obtained are not embraced in the Scriptural notices, which, both in the canonical and the Apocryphal text, are confined to Persian India. (See Heeren's Historical Researches, i. c. 1, sec. 3, on Persian India; and Rennel's Geog. of Herodotus.)

INHERITANCE. The laws and observances which determine the acquisition and regulate the devolution of property, are among the influences which affect the vital interests of states; and it is therefore of high consequence to ascertain the nature and bearing of the laws and observances relating to this subject, which come to us with the sanction of the Bible. We may also premise that, in a condition of society such as that in which we now live, wherein the two diverging tendencies which favour immense accumulations on the one hand, and lead to poverty and pauperism on the other, are daily becoming more and more decided, disturbing, and baneful, there seems to be required, on the part of those who take Scripture as their guide, a careful study of the foundations of human society, and of the laws of property, as they are developed in the divine records which contain the revealed will of God.

That will, in truth, as it is the source of all created things, and specially of the earth and its intelligent denizen, man, so is it the original foundation of property, and of the laws by which its inheritance should be regulated. God, as the Creator of the earth, gave it to man to be held, cultivated, and enjoyed (Gen. i. 28, sg.; Ps. cxv. 16; Eccles. v. 9). The primitive records are too brief and fragmentary to supply us with any details respecting the earliest distribution or transmission of landed property; but from the passages to which reference has been made, the important fact appears to be established beyond a question, that the origin of property is to be found, not in the achievements of violence, the success of the sword, or any imaginary implied contract, but in the will and the gift of the common Creator and bountiful Father of the human race. It is equally clear that the gift was made, not to any favoured portion of our race, but to the race itself—to man as represented by our great primogenitor, to whom the use of the divine gift was first graciously vouchsafed. The individual appropriation of portions of the earth, and the transmission of the parts thus appropriated—in other words, the consuetudinary laws of property—would be determined in each instance by the peculiar circumstances in which an individual, a family, or a clan, might find itself placed in relation to the world and its other inhabitants; nor is it now, in the absence of written evidence, possible to ascertain, and it is useless, if not worse, to attempt to conjecture, what these laws were. This, however, is certain, that if in any case they inflicted injury, if they aided the aggrandisement of the few, and tended to the depression of the many, they thereby became unjust, and not only lost their divine sanction, but, by opposing the very purposes for which the earth was given to man, and operating in contravention of the divine will, they were disowned and condemned of God, the tenure of the property was forfeited, and a recurrence to first principles and a re-distribution became due alike to the original donor, and to those whom he had intended impartially to benefit.

The enforcement of these principles has, in different periods of human history, been made by the seen hand of God, in those terrible providential visitations which upturn the very foundations of society and reconstruct the social frame. The Deluge was a kind of revocation of the Divine gift; the Creator took back into his own hands the earth which men had filled with injustice and violence. The trust, however, was, after that terrible punishment, once more committed to man, to be held, not for himself, but for God; and to be so used and improved as to further the divine will by furthering human good. And, whatever conduct may have been pursued, at any period, at variance with the divine purpose, yet it is in trust, not in absolute possession, it is for God's purposes, not our own, that the earth at large, and every portion of the earth, has been and is still held. In truth, man is the tenant, not the proprietor, of the earth. It is the temporary use, not the permanent possession of it that he enjoys. The lord of ten thousand broad acres, equally with the poor penniless squatter, is a sojourner and pilgrim in the land, as all his fathers were, and is bound, not less than the other, to remember, not only that property has its duties as well as its rights, but also that its best titles are held by a momentary tenure, revocable at the will of an omnipotent power, and subject to unerring scrutiny, in regard both to their origin and their use, in a court where the persons of men are not respected, where justice is laid to the line, and judgment to the plummet (Is. xxiii. 17).

The impression which the original gift of the earth was calculated to make on men, the Great Donor was pleased, in the case of Palestine, to render, for his own wise purposes, more decided and emphatic by an express re-donation to the patriarch Abraham (Gen. xiii. 14, sq.). Many years, however, elapsed before the promise was fulfilled. Meanwhile the notices which we have regarding the state of property in the patriarchal ages, are few and not very definite. The products of the earth, however, were at an early period accumulated and held as property. Violence invaded the possession; opposing violence recovered the goods. War soon sprang out of the passions of the human heart. The necessity of civil government was felt. Consuetudinary laws accordingly developed themselves. The head of the family was supreme. His will was law. The physical superiority which he possessed gave him this dominion. The same influence would secure its transmission in the male rather than the female line. Hence too the rise of the rights of primogeniture. In the early condition of society which is called patriarchal, landed property had its origin, indeed, but could not be held of first importance by those who led a wandering life, shifting continually, as convenience suggested, from one spot to another. Cattle were then the chief property (Gen. xxiv. 35). But land, if held, was held on a freehold tenure; nor could any other tenure have come into existence till more complex and artificial relations arose, resulting, in all probability, from the increase of population and the relative insufficiency of food. When Joseph went down into Egypt, he appears to have found the freehold tenure prevailing, which, however, he converted into a tenancy at will, or, at any rate, into a conditional tenancy. Other intimations are found in Genesis which confirm the general statements which have just been made. Daughters do not appear to have had any inheritance. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they only serve to prove it. Thus Job (the book so called is undoubtedly very old, so that there is no impropriety in citing it in this connection) is recorded (xlii. 15) to have given his daughters an inheritance conjointly with their brothers—a record which of itself proves the singularity of the proceeding, and establishes our position that inheritance generally followed the male line. How highly the privileges conferred by primogeniture were valued, may be learnt from the history of Jacob and Esau. In the patriarchal age doubtless these rights were very great. The eldest son, as being by nature the first fitted for command, assumed influence and control, under his father, over the family and its dependents; and when the father was removed by death, he readily, and as if by an act of Providence, took his father's place. Thus he succeeded to the property in succeeding to the headship of the family, the clan, or the tribe. At first the eldest son most probably took exclusive possession of his father's property and power; and when, subsequently, a division became customary, he would still retain the largest share—a double portion, if not more (Gen. xxvii. 25, 29, 40). That in the days of Abraham other sons partook with the eldest, and that too though they were sons of concubines, is clear from the story of Hagar's expulsion:—'Cast out (said Sarah) this bondwoman and her son; for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac' (Gen. xxi. 10). The few notices left us in Genesis of the transfer of property from hand to hand are interesting, and bear a remarkable similarity to what takes place in Eastern countries even at this day (Gen. xxi. 22, sq.; xxiii. 9, sq.). The purchase of the Cave of Machpelah as a family burying-place for Abraham, detailed in the last passage, serves to shew the safety of property at that early period, and the facility with which an inheritance was transmitted even to sons' sons (comp. Gen. xlix. 29). That it was customary, during the father's lifetime, to make a disposition of property, is evident from Gen. xxiv. 35, where it is said that Abraham had given all he had to Isaac. This statement is further confirmed by ch. xxv. 5, 6, where it is added that Abraham gave to the sons of his concubines 'gifts, sending them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward unto the east country.' Sometimes, however, so far were the children of unmarried females from being dismissed with a gift, that they shared, with what we should term the legitimate children, in the father's property and rights. Thus Dan and Naphtali were sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, whom she gave to her husband, failing to bear children herself. So Gad and Asher were, under similar circumstances, sons of Zilpah, Leah's maid (Gen. xxx. 2-14). In the event of the eldest son's dying in the father's lifetime, the next son took his place; and if the eldest son left a widow, the next son made her his wife (Gen. xxxvii. 7, sq.), the offspring of which union was reckoned to the first-born and deceased son. Should the second likewise die, the third son took his place (Gen. xxxviii. 11). While the rights of the first-born were generally established and recognised, yet were they sometimes set aside in favour of a younger child. The blessing of the father or the grandsire seems to have been an act essential in the devolution of power and property—in its effects not unlike wills and testaments with us; and instances are not wanting in which this (so to term it) testamentary bequest set aside consuetudinary laws, and gave precedence to a younger son (Gen. xlviii. 15, sq.). Special claims on the parental regards were acknowledged and rewarded by special gifts, as in the case of Jacob's donation of Joseph (Gen. xlviii. 22). In a similar manner, bad conduct on the part of the eldest son (as well as of others) subjected him, if not to the loss of his rights of property, yet to the evil influence of his father's dying malediction (Gen. xlix. 3); while the good and favoured, though younger, son was led by the paternal blessing to anticipate, and probably also to reap, the richest inheritance of individual and social happiness (Gen. xlix. 8-22).

The original promise made to Abraham of the land of Palestine was solemnly repeated to Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 3), the reason assigned being, because 'Abraham obeyed my voice and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws;' while it is expressly declared that the earlier inhabitants of the country were dispossessed and destined to extermination for the greatness of their iniquity. The possession of the promised land was embraced by Isaac in his dying benediction to Jacob (Gen.

xxviii. 3, 4), to whom God vouchsafed (Gen. xxviii. 15; see also xxxv. 10, 11) to give a renewed assurance of the destined inheritance. That this donation, however, was held to be dependent for the time and manner of its fulfilment on the divine will, appears from Gen. xxxiii. 18, where Jacob, on coming into the land of Canaan, bought for an hundred pieces of money 'a parcel of a field, at the hand of the children of Hamor.' Delayed though the execution of the promise was, confidence never deserted the family of Abraham, so that Joseph, dying in the land of Egypt, assured his brothers that they would be visited of God and placed in possession of Canaan, enjoining on them, in this conviction, that, when conducted to their possession, they should carry his bones with them out of Egypt (Gen. I. 25).

A promise thus given, thus repeated, and thus believed, easily, and indeed unavoidably, became the fundamental principle of that settlement of property which Moses made when at length he had effected the divine will in the redemption of the children of Israel. The observances and practices, too, which we have noticed as prevailing among the patriarchs would, no doubt, have great influence on the laws which the Jewish legislator originated or sanctioned. The land of Canaan was divided among the twelve tribes descended through Isaac and Jacob from Abraham. The division was made by lot for an inheritance among the families of the sons of Israel, according to the tribes and to the number and size of families in each tribe. The tribe of Levi, however, had no inheritance; but forty-eight cities with their suburbs were assigned to the Levites, each tribe giving according to the number of cities that fell to its share (Num. xxxiii. 50; xxxiv. 1; xxxv. 1). The inheritance thus acquired was never to leave the tribe to which it belonged; every tribe was to keep strictly to its own inheritance. An heiress, in consequence, was not allowed to marry out of her own tribe, lest property should pass by her marriage into another tribe (Num. xxxvi. 6-9). This restriction led to the marriage of heiresses with their near relations: thus the daughters of Zelophehad 'were married unto their father's brother's sons,' 'and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father' (ver. 11, 12; comp. Joseph. Antiq. iv. 7. 5). In general cases the inheritance went to sons, the first-born receiving a double portion, 'for he is the beginning of his father's strength.' If a man had two wives, one beloved, the other hated, and if the first-born were the son of her who was hated, he nevertheless was to enjoy 'the right of the first-born' (Deut. xxi. 15). If a man left no sons, the inheritance passed to his daughters; if there was no daughter, it went to his brothers; in case there were no brothers, it was given to his father's brothers; if his father had no brothers, it came into possession of the nearest kinsman (Num. xxvii. 8). The land was Jehovah's, and could not therefore be permanently alienated. Every fiftieth year, whatever land had been sold returned to its former owner. The value and price of land naturally rose or fell in proportion to the number of years there were to elapse prior to the ensuing fiftieth or jubilee-year. If he who sold the land, or a kinsman, could redeem the land before the year of jubilee, it was to be restored to him on his paying to the purchaser the value of the produce of the years remaining till the jubilee. Houses in villages or unwall'd towns might not be sold for ever: they were restored at the jubilee, and might at any time be redeemed. If a man sold a dwelling-house situated in a walled city, he had the option of redeeming it within the space of a full year after it had been sold; but if it remained unredeemed, it belonged to the purchaser, and did not return to him who sold it even at the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8, 23). The Levites were not allowed to sell the land in the suburbs of their cities, though they might dispose of the cities themselves, which, however, were redeemable at any time, and must return at the jubilee to their original possessors (Lev. xxvii. 16).

The regulations which the laws of Moses established rendered wills, or a testamentary disposition of (at least) landed property, almost, if not quite, unnecessary; we accordingly find no provision for anything of the kind. Some difficulty may have been now and then occasioned when near relations failed; but this was met by the traditional law, which furnished minute directions on the point (Misch. Baba Bathra, iv. 3, c. 8, 9). Personal property would naturally follow the land, or might be bequeathed by word of mouth. At a later period of the Jewish polity the mention of wills is found, but the idea seems to have been taken from foreign nations. In princely families they appear to have been used, as we learn from Josephus (Antiq. xiii. 16. 1; xvii. 3. 2; De Bell. Jud. ii. 2. 3); but such a practice can hardly suffice to establish the general use of wills among the people. In the N. T., however, wills are expressly mentioned (Gal. iii. 15; Heb. ix. 17). Michaelis (Commentaries, i. 431) asserts that the phrase (2 Sam. xvii. 23; 2 Kings xx. 1; צוה לוֹבֵיתוֹ 'set thine house in order' has reference to a will or testament. But his grounds are by no means sufficient, the literal rendering of the words being, 'give commands to thy house.' The utmost which such an expression could inferentially be held to comprise in regard to property, is a dying and final distribution of personal property; and we know that it was not unusual for fathers to make, while yet alive, a division of their goods among their children (Luke xv. 12; Rosenmüller, Morgent. v. 197).—J. INN. [CARAVANSERAI.]

INSPIRATION. This word is sometimes used to denote the excitement and action of a fervent imagination in the poet or orator. But even in this case there is generally a reference to some supposed divine influence, to which the excited action is owing. It is once used in Scripture to denote that divine agency by which man is endued with the faculties of an intelligent being, when it is said, 'the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding.' But the inspiration now to be considered is that which belonged to those who wrote the Scriptures, and which is particularly spoken of in 2 Tim. iii. 16, and in 2 Pet. i. 21: 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God;' 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' These passages relate specially to the O. T.; but there is at least equal reason to predicate divine inspiration of the N. T.

The definition which Dr. Knapp gives of inspiration is the one we shall adopt. He says, 'It may be best defined, according to the representations of the Scriptures themselves, as an extraordinary divine agency upon teachers while giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught what and how they should write or speak. Or we may say more briefly, that the sacred penmen were completely under the direction of the Holy Spirit, or that they wrote under a plenary inspiration. Dr. Calamy's definition agrees substantially with that of Dr. Knapp.

To prove that the Scriptures are divinely inspired we might with propriety refer to the excellence of the doctrines, precepts, and promises, and other instructions, which they contain; to the simplicity and majesty of their style; to the agreement of the different parts, and the scope of the whole; especially to the full discovery they make of man's fallen and ruined state, and the way of salvation through a Redeemer; together with their power to enlighten and sanctify the heart, and the accompanying witness of the spirit in believers. These are circumstances of real importance, and the discerning advocates of inspiration have not overlooked them. But the more direct and conclusive evidence that the Scriptures were divinely inspired, is found in the testimony of the writers themselves. And as the writers did, by working miracles, and in other ways, sufficiently authenticate their divine commission, and establish their authority and infallibility as teachers of divine truth, their testimony, in regard to their own inspiration, is entitled to our full confidence. For who can doubt that they were as competent to judge of, and as much disposed to speak the truth on this subject as on any other? If then we admit their divine commission and authority, why should we not rely upon the plain testimony which they give concerning the divine assistance afforded them in their work? To reject their testimony in this case would be to impeach their veracity, and thus to take away the foundation of the Christian religion. And it is well known that those who deny the justice of the claim which they set up to divine inspiration, do, in fact, give up the infallible truth and authority of the Scriptures, and adopt the principles of deism.

It is, then, of the first importance to inquire what representations are made by the prophets, and by Christ and his apostles, respecting the inspiration, and the consequent authority, of the sacred Scriptures.

The prophets generally professed to speak the word of God. What they taught was introduced and confirmed by a 'Thus saith the Lord;' or 'The Lord spake to me, saying.' And, in one way or another, they gave clear proof that they were divinely commissioned, and spoke in the name of God, or as it is expressed in the N. T., that God spake by them.

But the strongest and most satisfactory proof of the inspiration and divine authority of the O. T. writings is found in the testimony of Christ and the apostles.

The Lord Jesus Christ possessed the spirit of wisdom without measure, and came to bear witness to the truth. His works proved that he was what he declared himself to be—the Messiah, the great Prophet, the infallible Teacher. The faith which rests on him rests on a rock. As soon then as we learn how he regarded the Scriptures, we have reached the end of our inquiries. His word is truth. Now every one who carefully attends to the four Gospels will find, that Christ everywhere spoke of that collection of writings called the Scripture, as the word of God; that he regarded the whole in this light; that he treated the Scripture, and every part of it, as infallibly true, and as clothed with divine authority,—thus distinguishing it from every mere human production. Nothing written by man can be entitled to the respect which Christ showed to the Scriptures. This, to all Christians, is direct and incontrovertible evidence of the divine origin of the Scriptures, and is, by itself, perfectly conclusive.

But there is clear concurrent evidence, and evidence still more specific, in the writings of the apostles. In two texts in particular, divine inspiration is positively asserted. In the first (2 Tim. iii. 16), Paul lays it down as the characteristic of 'all Scripture,' that it 'is given by inspiration of God' (θεοπνευστος, 'divinely inspired'); and from this results its profitableness. Some writers think that the passage should be rendered thus: All divinely inspired Scripture, or, all Scripture, being divinely inspired, is profitable. According to the common rendering, inspiration is predicated of all Scripture. According to the other, it is presupposed, as the attribute of the subject. But this rendering is liable to insuperable objections. For θεοπνευστος and ωφέλιμος are connected by the conjunction καί, and must both be predicates, if either of them is; and unless one of them is a predicate there is no complete sentence. Henderson remarks, that the mode of construction referred to 'is at variance with a common rule of Greek syntax, which requires, that when two adjectives are closely joined, as θεοπνευστος and ωφέλιμος here are, if there be an ellipsis of the substantive verb ἔστι, this verb must be supplied after the former of the two, and regarded as repeated after the latter. Now there exists precisely such an ellipsis in the case before us; and as there is nothing in the context which would lead to any exception to the rule, we are bound to yield to its force.' And he adds, that 'the evidence in favour of the common rendering, derived from the Fathers, and almost all the versions, is most decided.' It cannot for a moment be admitted, that the apostle meant to signify that divine inspiration belongs to a part of Scripture, but not to the whole; or that he meant, as Semler supposes, to furnish a criterion by which to judge whether any work is inspired or not, namely, its utility. 'That author proceeds fearlessly to apply this criterion to the books of the O. T., and to lop off eight of them, as not possessing the requisite marks of legitimacy. Most of the German divines adopt Semler's hypothesis.' But it is very manifest that such a sense is not by any means suggested by the passage itself, and that it is utterly precluded by other parts of the N. T. For neither Christ nor any one of his apostles ever intimates a distinction between some parts of Scripture which are inspired and other parts which are not inspired. The doctrine which is plainly asserted in the text under consideration, and which is fully sustained by the current language of the N. T., is, that all the writings denominated the Scriptures are divinely inspired.

The other text (2 Pet. i. 21) teaches that 'prophecy came not by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' This passage, which the apostle Peter applied particularly to the subject of which he was speaking, may be considered as explanatory of what is intended by inspiration. For to say that all Scripture is divinely inspired, and that men of God wrote it as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, is one and the same thing.

The various texts in which Christ and the apostles speak of Scripture as the word of God, and as invested with authority to decide all questions of truth and duty, fully correspond with the texts above considered.

From this view of the subject it follows, that the attempt which has been made by a certain class of writers, to account for the production of the whole or any part of the Scriptures by the will or agency, the ingenuity, diligence or fidelity of men, in the use of the means within their reach, without the supernatural influence of the Spirit, is utterly at variance with the teachings of Christ and the apostles as to the origin of the sacred writings.

As the Christian dispensation surpasses the former in all spiritual privileges and gifts, it is reasonable to presume that the N. T. was written under at least an equal degree of divine influence with the Old, and that it comes recommended to us by equal characteristics of infallible truth. But of this there is clear positive evidence from the N. T. itself.

In the first place, Jesus Christ, whose works proved him to be the great unerring Teacher, and to be possessed of all power in Heaven and earth, gave commission to his apostles to act in his stead, and to carry out the work of instruction which he had begun, confirming their authority by investing them with power to perform miracles. But how could such a commission have answered the end proposed, had not the Divine Spirit so guided the apostles as to render them infallible and perfect teachers of divine truth?

But, secondly, in addition to this, Jesus expressly promised to give them the Holy Spirit, to abide with them continually, and to guide them into all the truth. He said to them, 'When they shall deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in the same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you.' Storr and Flatt think this is the idea intended: 'The instructions which ye in general give are derived not so much from yourselves as from the Holy Spirit. Hence, when ye are called on to defend your doctrines, ye need feel no anxiety, but may confidently rely on the Holy Spirit to vindicate his own doctrines, by suggesting to you the very words of your defence.' If these promises were not fulfilled, then Jesus was not a true prophet. If they were fulfilled, as they certainly were, then the apostles had the constant assistance of the Holy Spirit, and, whether engaged in speaking or writing, were under divine guidance, and, of course, were liable to no mistakes either as to the matter or manner of their instructions.

In the third place, the writers of the N. T. manifestly considered themselves to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions, whether oral or written, to be clothed with divine authority, as the word of God.

'We speak,' they say, 'as of God.' Again, 'Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth.' They declared what they taught to be the word of God, and the things they wrote to be the commandments of God. Now the apostles, being honest, unassuming, humble men, would never have spoken of themselves and their writings in such a manner, had they not known themselves to be under the unerring guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions perfectly in accordance with the mind of God.

From several passages in Paul's epistles to the Corinthians, it has been supposed that, in the cases referred to, he meant to disclaim inspiration. But that those passages will bear another construction, and ought to be understood in another manner, has been satisfactorily argued by several writers, particularly by Haldane and Gausson in their treatises on inspiration, and by Henderson in his lectures. And the writer of this article would take the liberty to refer also to his lectures on the same subject.

It is perfectly consistent with the plenary inspiration here maintained, that God operated on the minds of inspired men in a variety of ways, sometimes by audible words, sometimes by direct inward suggestions, sometimes by outward visible signs, sometimes by the Urim and Thummim, and sometimes by dreams and visions. This variety in the mode of divine influence detracted nothing from its certainty. God made known his will equally in different ways; and, whatever the mode of his operation, he made it manifest to his servants that the things revealed were from him.

But inspiration was concerned not only in making known the will of God to prophets and apostles, but also in giving them direction in writing the sacred books. They wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. And in this, also, there was a diversity in the mode of divine influence. Sometimes the Spirit of God moved and guided his servants to write things which they could not know by natural means, such as new doctrines or precepts, or predictions of future events. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write the history of events which were wholly or partly known to them by tradition, or by the testimony of their contemporaries, or by their own observation or experience. In all these cases the Divine Spirit effectually preserved them from all error, and influenced them to write just so much and in such a manner as God saw to be best. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write a summary record of larger histories, containing what his infinite wisdom saw to be adapted to the end in view, that is, the benefit of his people in all ages. Sometimes he influenced them to make a record of important maxims in common use, or to write new ones, derived either from their own reason or experience, or from special divine teaching. Sometimes he influenced them to write parables or allegories, particularly suited to make a salutary impression of divine things on the minds of men; and sometimes to record supernatural visions. In these and all other kinds of writing the sacred penman manifestly needed special divine guidance, as no man could of himself attain to infallibility, and no wisdom, except that of God, was sufficient to determine what things ought to be written for permanent use in the church, and what manner of writing would be best fitted to promote the great ends of revelation.

Some writers speak of different modes and different kinds, and even different degrees, of inspiration. And if their meaning is that God influenced the minds of inspired men in different ways; that he adopted a variety of modes in revealing divine things to their minds; that he guided them to give instruction in prose and in poetry, and in all the different forms of composition; that he moved and guided them to write history, prophecy, doctrines, commands, promises, reproofs, and exhortations, and that he adapted his mode of operation to each of these cases—against this no objection can be made. It is a fact, that the Scriptures exhibit specimens of all these different kinds of writing and these different modes of divine instruction. Still each and every part of what was written was divinely inspired, and equally so. It is all the word of God, and clothed with divine authority, as much as if it had all been made known and written in one way.

Dr. Henderson, who labours perhaps with too much zeal against carrying inspiration to extreme lengths, still says that if those who hold to different modifications of inspiration intend that there are different modifications and degrees of authority given to Scripture, their opinion must meet with unqualified reprobation from every sincere believer. He insists that a diversity in the modes and degrees of divine operation did exist in the work of inspiration, and that this diversity was the result of infinite wisdom adapting itself to different circumstances. He thinks that, unless we admit such a diversity, we cannot form correct ideas of the subject. But he is confident that the distinction which he endeavours to establish is not in the slightest degree hostile to the divine authority of Scripture. He affirms that no part of that holy book was written without miraculous influence; that all parts were equally inspired; that in regard to the whole volume the great end was infallibly attained, namely, the commitment to writing of precisely such matters as God designed for the religious instruction of mankind; that the sacred penman wrote what had for its object not merely the immediate benefit of individual persons or churches, but what would be useful to Christians in all future times; and that in regard to the most minute and inconsiderable things which the Scripture contains we are compelled to say, this also cometh from the Lord.

The controversy among orthodox divines respecting what is called verbal inspiration, appears to arise, in a great measure, from the different senses affixed to the phrase. Dr. Henderson, who is among the most candid and able writers opposed to the doctrine of verbal inspiration, seems to understand the doctrine as denoting the immediate communication to the writers of every word, and syllable, and letter of what they wrote, independently of their intelligent agency and without any regard to their peculiar mental faculties or habits:—while those who most earnestly and successfully contend for the higher views of inspiration, particularly Calamy, Haldane, and Gausson, consider the doctrine they maintain as entirely consistent with the greatest diversity of mental endowments, culture, and taste in the writers, and with the most perfect exercise of their intelligent agency,—consistent with their using their own memory, their own reason, their own manner of thinking, and their own language,—consistent, too, with their making what they were to write the subject of diligent and laborious study,—only insisting that it was all under the unerring guidance of the Divine Spirit.

In a controversy of such a character as this, we may often succeed in removing difficulties, and in presenting the subject in a light which will be satisfactory to all concerned, by laying aside an ambiguous word or phrase, and making use of one which will express the idea intended with clearness and certainty. The word verbal, in its most common senses, is not well suited to the present subject. According to the best philologists its first signification is, 'spoken, expressed to the ear in words, not written.' But no one supposes that when God inspired the sacred writers he generally spoke to them in audible words. It is, indeed, true, that he sometimes uttered articulate words in making known his will, as at Sinai, at the baptism of Christ, and on some other occasions. In such cases he did, properly speaking, make verbal communications, or give verbal instruction. But we should hardly call this verbal inspiration. Who can suppose that this was commonly, if ever, the way, in which God inspired holy men of old while engaged in writing the Scriptures? Who can suppose that he taught them what to write by speaking words in their ears, as a man teaches his amanuensis? His influence was doubtless inward. He guided them in writing by an operation in their minds.

The next meaning of verbal is 'oral, uttered by the mouth;' and this agrees no better with our subject. Other significations of verbal are, 'consisting in mere words; respecting words only; literal,' as in a translation, 'having word answering to word.' Neither of these senses is adapted to the subject. Now it would be nothing strange, if applying this word to inspiration, and thus giving it an unusual sense, should occasion needless perplexity and confusion. For the sake of avoiding this evil why would it not be expedient to employ such words as will convey the idea intended clearly and definitely; and, if necessary, to incur the inconvenience of using an exact explanation, instead of the word or phrase which causes the difficulty?

The real question, and the whole question at issue, may be stated thus: did the work of the Divine Spirit in the sacred penmen relate to the language they used, or their manner of expressing their ideas; and if so, how far, and in what way?

All those with whom we are concerned in the discussion of this question, hold that divine inspiration had some respect to the language employed by the inspired writers, at least in the way of general supervision. And Dr. Henderson shows, in various passages of his excellent lectures, that there is no material difference between him and those who profess to maintain higher ground. He allows that, to a certain extent, what is called verbal inspiration, or the inspiration of words, took place. 'In recording what was immediately spoken with an audible voice by Jehovah, or by an angel interpreter; in giving expression to points of revelation which entirely surpassed the comprehension of the writers; in recording prophecies, the minute bearings of which they did not perceive; in short, in committing to writing any of the dictates of the Spirit, which they could not have otherwise accurately expressed, the writers,' he alleges, 'were supplied with the words as well as the matter.' He says, that even when Biblical writers made use of their own faculties, and wrote each one in his own manner, without having their mental constitution at all disturbed, they were yet 'always secured by celestial influence against the adoption of any forms of speech, or collocation of words, that would have injured the exhibition of divine truth, or that did not adequately give it expression ;' that the characteristic differences of style, so apparent among the sacred writers, were employed by the Holy Spirit for the purposes of inspiration, and 'were called forth in a rational way ;' that the writers, 'being acted upon by the Divine Spirit, expressed themselves naturally ; that while the divine influence adapted itself to whatever was peculiar in the minds of inspired men, it constantly guided them in writing the sacred volume.' He declares his belief that the Scriptures were written not under a partial or imperfect, but under a plenary and infallible inspiration ; that they were entirely the result of divine intervention, and are to be regarded as the oracles of Jehovah. Referring to 2 Tim. iii. 16, he says, 'We are here expressly taught the divine inspiration of the whole O. T. Codex, that the Scriptures are inspired as written documents ; that they are the result of the special and extraordinary influence of the Spirit, and contain whatever the Spirit caused to be written for our instruction.' Referring to 1 Cor. ii. 13, he says, 'It is past all dispute that the apostle here unequivocally ascribes both the doctrines which he and his fellow-labourers taught, and their manner of propounding them, to the influence of the same divine agent ;' that the passage conveys the idea 'that the style, or mode of expression which they used, was such as they were instructed by the Spirit to employ ;' that 'in delivering their doctrines they were under the constant guidance of the Great Instructor, and clothed them in that garb which he directed them to use ;' that, in the passage alluded to, the apostle refers 'to the entire character of the style which the first teachers of Christianity were taught to use in announcing its all important doctrines.' The passage in Matt. x. 19, 20, he says, implies, 'that the subject-matter of apology was to be supplied to the apostles ; and they might be well assured that if this, which was the most important, was secured by divine instruction, the mere expression would not be wanting.' 'To remove all ground of hesitation from their minds, our Lord says, it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. By his teaching and superintending influence, they would always be enabled to express themselves in a manner worthy of the divine cause which they were called to defend—a manner which they could never have attained by the exertion of their unassisted powers ; so that, although these powers were not to be superseded, but employed, it was to be as the organs of the divine agency by which they were employed.' And he concedes that, as to all practical purposes, they were favoured with divine influence in composing their writings, as well as in their public speaking.

Our author says that on the day of Pentecost, when the apostles were filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance, 'verbal inspiration in the strictest sense of the term took place.' 'The immediate supply of words,' he holds, 'was in this and every similar instance absolutely necessary.' And he thinks that direct verbal inspiration was indispensably requisite in all instances in which prophets and apostles were employed to write what they did not clearly comprehend. The passages in which such terms as the word of God, the Lord spake, etc., occur, are, in this view, descriptive of immediate verbal communications. He supposes that, in all such cases, words were literally spoken, or audibly pronounced by God himself, or by an angel in his name. In this opinion, however, I think he is mistaken. For unquestionably the word of the Lord often, if not generally, came to the prophets in the way of dreams, or other modes of inward suggestion.

The doctrine of a plenary inspiration of all Scripture in regard to the language employed, as well as the thoughts communicated, ought not to be rejected without valid reasons. The doctrine is so obviously important, and so consonant to the feelings of sincere piety, that those evangelical Christians who are pressed with speculative objections against it, frequently, in the honesty of their hearts, advance opinions which fairly imply it. This is the case, as we have seen, with Dr. Henderson, who says, that the Divine Spirit guided the sacred penmen in writing the Scriptures ; that their mode of expression was such as they were instructed by the Spirit to employ ; that Paul ascribes not only the doctrines which the apostles taught, but the entire character of their style, to the influence of the Spirit. He indeed says, that this does not always imply the immediate communication of the words of Scripture ; and he says it with good reason. For immediate properly signifies, acting without a medium, or without the intervention of another cause or means, not acting by second causes. Now, those who hold the highest views of inspiration do not suppose that the Divine Spirit, except in a few instances, so influenced the writers of Scripture as to interfere with the use of their rational faculties or their peculiar mental habits and tastes, or in any way to supersede secondary causes as the medium through which his agency produced the desired effect.

In regard to this point, therefore, there appears to be little or no ground for controversy. For, if God so influenced the sacred writers that, either with or without the use of secondary causes, they wrote just what he intended, and in the manner he intended, the end is secured ; and what they wrote is as truly his word, as though he had written it with his own hand on tables of stone, without any human instrumentality. The very words of the decalogue were all such as God chose. And they would have been equally so if Moses had been moved by the Divine Spirit to write them with his hand. The expression, that God immediately imparted or communicated to the writers the very words which they wrote, is evidently not well chosen. The exact truth is that the writers themselves were the subjects of the divine influence. The Spirit employed them as active instruments, and directed them in writing, both as to matter and manner. They wrote 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' The matter, in many cases, was what they before knew, and the manner was entirely conformed to their habits ; it was their own. But what was written was none the less inspired on that account. God may have influenced and guided an apostle as infallibly in writing what he had before known, and that guidance may have been as really necessary, as in writing a new revelation. And God may have influenced Paul or John to write a book in his own peculiar style, and that influence may have been as real and as necessary as if the style had been what some would call a divine style. It was a divine style, if the writer used it under divine direction. It was a divine style, and it was, at the same time, a human style, and the writer's own style, all in one. Just as the believer's exercises, faith and love, are his own acts, and at the same time are the effects of divine influence. 'In efficacious grace,' says Edwards, 'we are not merely passive, nor yet does God do some and we do the rest. But God does all, and we do all. God produces all, and we act all. For that is what he produces, namely our own acts. God is the only proper author and foundation: we only are the proper actors. We are, in different respects, wholly passive and wholly active. In the Scriptures, the same things are represented as from God and from us. God is said to convert men, and men are said to convert and turn. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart—not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty. These things are agreeable to that text, 'God worketh in you both to will and to do.' The mental exercises of Paul and of John had their own characteristic peculiarities, as much as their style. God was the author of John's mind and all that was peculiar to his mental faculties and habits, as really as of Paul's mind and what was peculiar to him. And in the work of inspiration he used and directed, for his own purposes, what was peculiar to each. When God inspired different men he did not make their minds and tastes all alike, nor did he make their language alike. Nor had he any occasion for this; for while they had different mental faculties and habits, they were as capable of being infallibly directed by the Divine Spirit, and infallibly speaking and writing divine truth, as though their mental faculties and habits had been all exactly alike. And it is manifest that the Scriptures written by such a variety of inspired men, and each part agreeably to the peculiar talents and style of the writer, are not only equally from God, but, taken together, are far better adapted to the purposes of general instruction, and all the objects to be accomplished by revelation, than if they had been written by one man, and in one and the same manner.

This view of plenary inspiration is fitted to relieve the difficulties and objections which have arisen in the minds of men from the variety of talent and taste which the writers exhibited, and the variety of style which they used. See, it is said, how each writer expresses himself naturally, in his own way, just as he was accustomed to do when not inspired. And see too, we might say in reply, how each apostle, Peter, Paul, or John, when speaking before rulers, with the promised aid of the Holy Spirit, spoke naturally, with his own voice, and in his own way, as he had been accustomed to do on other occasions when not inspired. There is no more objection to plenary inspiration in the one case than in the other. The mental faculties and habits of the apostles, their style, their voice, their mode of speech, all remained as they were. What, then, had the divine Spirit to do? What was the work which appertained to him? We reply, his work was so to direct the apostles in the use of their own talents and habits, their style, their voice, and all their peculiar endowments, that they should speak or write, each in his own way, just what God would have them speak or write, for the good of the Church in all ages.

The fact that the individual peculiarities of the sacred penmen are everywhere so plainly impressed on their writings, is often mentioned as an objection to the doctrine, that inspiration extended to their language as well as their thoughts. This is, indeed, one of the most common objections, and one which has obtained a very deep lodgment in the minds of some intelligent Christians. It may, therefore, be necessary to take some further pains completely to remove it. And in our additional remarks relative to this and other objections, it will come in our way to shew that such a writer as Gausson, who contends with great earnestness and ability for the highest views of inspiration, does still, on all important points, agree with those who advocate lower views of the subject.

Gausson says, 'Although the title of each book should not indicate to us that we are passing from one author to another; yet we could quickly discover, by the change of their characters, that a new hand has taken the pen. It is perfectly easy to recognise each one of them, although they speak of the same master, teach the same doctrines, and relate the same incidents.' But how does this prove that Scripture is not, in all respects, inspired? 'So far are we,' says this author, 'from overlooking human individuality everywhere impressed on our sacred books, that, on the contrary, it is with profound gratitude, and with an ever-increasing admiration, that we regard this living, real, human character infused so charmingly into every part of the Word of God. We admit the fact, and we see in it clear proof of the divine wisdom which dictated the Scriptures.'

Those who urge the objection above mentioned are plainly inconsistent with themselves. For while they deny the plenary inspiration of some parts of Scripture, because they have these marks of individuality, they acknowledge inspiration in the fullest sense in other parts, particularly in the prophecies, where this individuality of the writers is equally apparent.

In truth, what can be more consonant with our best views of the wisdom of God, or with the general analogy of his works, than that he should make use of the thoughts, the memories, the peculiar talents, tastes, and feelings of his servants in recording his Word for the instruction of men? Why should he not associate the peculiarities of their personal character with what they write under his personal guidance? But, independently of our reasoning, this matter is decided by the Bible itself. 'All Scripture is divinely-inspired,' and it is all the word of God. And it is none the less the Word of God, and none the less inspired, because it comes to us in the language of Moses, and David, and Paul, and the other sacred writers. 'It is God who speaks to us, but it is also man; it is man, but it is also God.' The word of God, in order to be intelligible and profitable to us, 'must be uttered by mortal tongues, and be written by mortal hands, and must put on the features of human thoughts. This blending of humanity and divinity in the Scriptures reminds us of the majesty and the condescension of God. Viewed in this light, the Word of God has unequalled beauties, and exerts an unequalled power over our hearts.'

The objection to the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, from the inaccuracy of the translations and the various readings of the ancient manuscript copies, is totally irrelevant. For what we assert is, the inspiration of the original Scriptures, not of the translations or the ancient copies. The fact that the Scriptures were divinely inspired, cannot be expunged or altered by any subsequent event. The very words of the decalogue were written by the finger of God, and none the less so because the manuscripts which transmit it to us contain some variations. The integrity of the copies has nothing to do with the inspiration of the original. It is, however, well known that the variations are hardly worthy to be mentioned.

But if the copies of the Scriptures which we have are not inspired, then how can the inspiration of the original writings avail to our benefit? The answer is, that according to the best evidence, the original writings have been transmitted to us with remarkable fidelity, and that our present copies, so far as anything of consequence is concerned, agree with the writings as they came from inspired men; so that, through the gracious care of divine providence, the Scriptures now in use are, in all important respects, the Scriptures which were given by inspiration of God, and are stamped with divine authority. In this matter, we stand on the same footing with the apostles. For when they spoke of the Scriptures, they doubtless referred to the copies which had been made and preserved among the Jews, not to the original manuscripts written by Moses and the prophets.

It has been made an objection to the plenary inspiration of the writers of the N. T., that they generally quote from the Septuagint version, and that their quotations are frequently wanting in exactness. Our reply is, that their quotations are made in the usual manner, according to the dictates of common sense, and always in such a way as to subserve the cause of truth; and therefore, that the objection is without force. And as to the Septuagint version, the apostles never follow it so as to interfere with the authority of the Hebrew Scriptures. Their references to the O. T. are just such as the case required. There is a noble freedom in their quotations, but that freedom never violates truth or propriety.

If any one, like Priestley and others of the same school, alleges, that there are in the Scriptures errors in reasoning and in matters of fact, he opens the door to the most dangerous consequences. Indeed he takes the ground of infidelity. And if any one holds that some parts are inspired, while other parts are not inspired, then we ask, who shall make the distinction? And if we begin this work, where will it end? But our present concern is with those who deny that inspiration respected the language of Scripture.

There are some who maintain that all which was necessary to secure the desired results, was an infallible guidance of the thoughts of the sacred writers; that with such a guidance they might be safely left to express their thoughts in their own way, without any special influence from above.

Now, if those who take this view of the subject mean that God not only gives the sacred penmen the very ideas which they are to write, but, in some way, secures an infallible connection between those ideas and a just expression of them in words; then, indeed, we have the desired result—an infallible revelation from God, made in the proper language of the writers. But if any one supposes that there is naturally such an infallible connection between right thoughts and a just expression of them in language, without an effective divine superintendence, he contradicts the lessons of daily experience. But those to whom we refer evidently do not themselves believe in such an infallible connection. For when they assign their reason for denying that inspiration related to the language of the Scriptures, they speak of the different, and, as they regard them, the contradictory statements of facts by different writers—for example, the different accounts of the crucifixion and the resurrection, and the different accounts of the numbers of the slain in Num. xxv. 9 and 1 Cor. x. 8. Who, they say, can believe that the language was inspired, when one writer says that 24,000 were slain, and the other 23,000? But it is easy to see that the difficulty presses with all its force upon those who assert the inspiration of the thoughts. For surely they will not say that the sacred writers had true thoughts in their minds, and yet uttered them in the language of falsehood. This would contradict their own idea of a sure connection between the conceptions of the mind and the utterance of them in suitable words, and would clearly shew that they themselves feel it to be necessary that the divine guidance should extend to the words of inspired men as well as their thoughts. But if Paul, through inadvertence, committed a real mistake in saying that 23,000 fell in one day, it must have been a mistake in his thoughts as well as in his words. For when he said 23,000, had he not the idea of that number in his mind? If, then, there was a mistake, it lay in his thoughts. But if there was no mistake in either of the writers, then there is nothing to prove that inspiration did not extend to the language. If, however, there was a real mistake, then the question is not, what becomes of verbal inspiration, but what becomes of inspiration in any sense.

As to the way of reconciling the two statements above mentioned, but a few words can be offered here. Some writers attempt to remove the difficulty in this manner. The first writer says, 24,000 were slain, meaning to include in that number all who died in consequence of that rebellion. The other writer says, 23,000 fell in one day, leaving us to conclude that an addition of 1000 fell the next day. But it may perhaps be more satisfactory to suppose, that neither of the writers intended to state the exact number, this being of no consequence to their objects. The real number might be between 23,000 and 24,000, and it might be sufficient for them to express it in general terms, one of them calling it 24,000, and the other 23,000, that is, about so many, either of the numbers being accurate enough to make the impression designed. Suppose that the exact number was 23,579, and that both the writers knew it to be so. It was not at all necessary, in order to maintain their character as men of veracity, that they should, when writing for such a purpose, mention the particular number. The particularity and length of the expression would have been inconvenient, and might have made a less desirable impression of the evil of sin and the justice of God, than expressing it more briefly in a round number; as we often say, with a view merely to make a strong impression, that in such a battle 10,000, or 50,000, or 500,000 were slain, no one supposing that we mean to state the number with arithmetical exactness, as our object does not require this. And who can doubt that the Divine Spirit might lead the sacred penmen to make use of this principle of rhetoric, and to speak of those who were slain, according to the common practice in such a case, in round numbers?

It is sometimes said that the sacred writers were of themselves generally competent to express their ideas in proper language, and in this respect had no need of supernatural assistance. But there is just as much reason for saying that they were of themselves generally competent to form their own conceptions, and so had no need of supernatural aid in this respect. It is just as reasonable to say that Moses could recollect what took place at the Red Sea, and that Paul could recollect that he was once a persecutor, and Peter what took place on the mount of transfiguration, without supernatural aid, as to say that they could, without such aid, make a proper record of these recollections. We believe a real and infallible guidance of the Spirit in both respects, because this is taught in the Scriptures. And it is obvious that the Bible could not be what Christ and the apostles considered it to be, unless they were divinely inspired.

The diversity in the narratives of the Evangelists is sometimes urged as an objection against the position we maintain in regard to inspiration, but evidently without reason, and contrary to reason. For what is more reasonable than to expect that a work of divine origin will have marks of consummate wisdom, and will be suited to accomplish the end in view. Now it will not be denied that God determined that there should be four narratives of the life and death of Jesus from four historians. If the narratives were all alike, three of them would be useless. Indeed such a circumstance would create suspicion, and would bring discredit upon the whole concern. The narratives must then be different. And if, besides this useful diversity, it is found that the seeming contradictions can be satisfactorily reconciled, and if each of the narratives is given in the peculiar style and manner of the writers, then all is natural and unexceptionable, and we have the highest evidence of the credibility and truth of the narratives.

We shall advert to one more objection. It is alleged that writers who were constantly under a plenary divine inspiration would not descend to the unimportant details, the trifling incidents, which are found in the Scriptures. To this it may be replied that the details alluded to must be admitted to be according to truth, and that those things which, at first view, seem to be trifles, may, when taken in their connections, prove to be of serious moment. And it is moreover manifest that, considering what human beings and human affairs really are, if all those things which are called trifling and unimportant were excluded, the Scriptures would fail of being conformed to fact; they would not be faithful histories of human life: so that the very circumstance which is demanded as proof of inspiration would become an argument against it. And herein we cannot but admire the perfect wisdom which guided the sacred writers, while we mark the weakness and shallowness of the objections which are urged against their inspiration.

On the whole, after carefully investigating the subject of inspiration, we are conducted to the important conclusion that 'all Scripture is divinely inspired;' that the sacred penmen wrote 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;' and that these representations are to be understood as implying that the writers had, in all respects, the effectual guidance of the divine Spirit. And we are still more confirmed in this conclusion because we find that it begets, in those who seriously adopt it, an acknowledgment of the divine origin of Scripture, a reverence for its teachings, and a practical regard to its requirements, like what appeared in Christ and his apostles. Being convinced that the Bible has, in all parts and in all respects, the seal of the Almighty, and that it is truly and entirely from God, we are led by reason, conscience, and piety, to bow submissively to its high authority, implicitly to believe its doctrines, however incomprehensible, and cordially to obey its precepts, however contrary to our natural inclinations. We come to it from day to day, not as judges, but as learners, never questioning the propriety or utility of any of its contents. This precious Word of God is the perfect standard of our faith, and the rule of our life, our comfort in affliction, and our sure guide to heaven.—L. W.

INTERPRETATION (BIBLICAL), AND HERMENEUTICS. There is a very ancient and wide-spread belief that the knowledge of divine things in general, and of the divine will in particular, is by no means a common property of the whole human race, but only a prerogative of a few specially-gifted and privileged individuals. It has been considered that this higher degree of knowledge has its source in light and instruction proceeding directly from God, and that it can be imparted to others by communicating to them a key to the signs of the divine will. Since, however, persons who in this manner have been indirectly taught, are initiated into divine secrets, and consequently appear as the confidants of deity, they also enjoy, although instructed only through the medium of others, a more intimate communion with God, a more distinct perception of his thoughts, and consequently a mediate consciousness of deity itself. It therefore follows that persons thus either immediately or mediately instructed are supposed to be capable, by means of their divine illumination and their knowledge of the signs of the divine will, to impart to mankind the ardently-desired knowledge of divine things and of the will of deity. They are considered to be interpreters or explainers of the signs of the divine will, and, consequently, to be mediators between God and man. Divine illumination and a communicable knowledge of the signs and expressions of the divine will, are thus supposed to be combined in one and the same person.

This idea is the basis of the Hebrew מַנְבִּי, prophet. The prophet is a divinely-inspired seer, and, as such, he is an interpreter and preacher of the divine will. He may either be directly called by God, or have been prepared for his office in the schools of the prophets (comp. Knobel, Der Prophetismus der Hebräer vollständig dargestellt, Breslau 1837, pt. i. p. 102, sq.; pt. ii. p. 45, sq.)

However, the being filled with the Holy Ghost was the most prominent feature in the Hebrew idea of a prophet. This is even implied in the usual appellation מַנְבִּי, which means a person in the state of divine inspiration (not a predictor of future events). Prophetism ceased altogether as soon as Jehovah, according to the popular opinion, ceased to communicate his Spirit.

The ancient Greeks and Romans kept the idea of divine inspiration more distinct from the idea of interpretation of the divine will. They, according to a more natural manner of viewing the subject, recognised generally, in the mediator between God and man, more of an experienced and skilful interpreter than of a divinely-inspired seer. They distinguished the interpreter and the seer by different names, of which we will speak hereafter. It was the combination of the power of interpretation with inspiration, which distinguished the Hebrew prophets or seers from those of other ancient nations. The Hebrew notion of a מַנְבִּי appears, among the Greeks, to have been split into its two constituent parts of mάντις, from μαίνεσθαι, to rave (Platonis Phaedrus, sec. 48, ed. Steph. p. 244, a. b.), and of ἐξηγητής, from ἐξηγεῖσθαι, to expound. However, the ideas of mάντις and of ἐξηγητής could be combined in the same person. Comp. Boissonnade, Anecdota Græca, i. 96, Ἀάμπων οὐξἐξηγητής mάντις γὰρ ἦν καὶ χρησμούς ἐξηγεῖτο (comp. Scholia in Aristophanis Nubes, 336), and Arriani Epictetus, ii. 7, τὸν μάντιν τὸν ἐξηγούμενον τὰ σημεῖα; Plato, De Legibus, ix. p. 871, c., μετ' ἐξηγητῶν καὶ μάντεων; Euripidis Phænisæ, v. 1018, ὁ μάντις ἐξηγήσατο, and Iphigenia in Aulide, l. 529. Plutarch (Vita Numæ, cap. xi.) places ἐξηγητής and προφήτης together; so also does Dionysius Halicarnassensis, ii. 73. The first two of these examples prove that ἐξηγηταὶ were, according to the Greeks, persons who possessed the gift of discovering the will of the Deity from certain appearances, and of interpreting signs. Jul. Pollux, viii. 124, ἐξηγηταὶ δὲ ἐκαλοῦντο, οἱ τὰ περὶ τῶν διοσμειῶν καὶ τὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἱερῶν διδάσκοντες. Harpocration says, and Suidas repeats after him, ἐξηγητής ὁ ἐξηγούμενος τὰ ἱερὰ. Comp. Bekker, Anecdota Græca, i. 185, ἐξηγούνται οἱ ἐμπειροί. Creuzer defines the ἐξηγηταί, in his Symbolik und Mythologie der Alten Völker, i. 15, as 'persons whose high vocation it was to bring laymen into harmony with divine things.' These ἐξηγηταὶ moved in a religious sphere (comp. Herod. i. 78, and Xenophon's Cyropædia, viii. 3, 11). Even the Delphic Apollo, replying to those who sought his oracles, is called by Plato ἐξηγητής (Polit. iv. 448, b.) Plutarch mentions, in Vita Thesei, c. 25, ὁσίων καὶ ἱερῶν ἐξηγηταί; comp. also the above-quoted passage of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, and especially Ruhnken (ad Timæi Lexicon, ed. Lugd. Bat. 1789, p. 189, sq.) The Scholiast on Sophocles (Ajax, l. 320) has ἐξήγησις ἐπὶ τῶν θεῶν, and the Scholiast on Electra, 426, has the definition ἐξήγησις διασάφησις θεῶν. It is in connection with this original signification of the word ἐξηγητής that the expounders of the law are styled ἐξηγηταί; because the ancient law was derived from the gods, and the law-language had become unintelligible to the multitude. (Comp. Lysias, vi. 10; Diodorus Siculus, xiii. 35; Ruhnken, as quoted above; the annotators on Pollux and Harpocration; and K. Fr. Hermann, Lehrbuch der Griechischen Staatsalterthümer, Marburg 1836, sec. 104, note 4.) In Athenæus and Plutarch there are mentioned books under the title ἐξηγητικά, which contained introductions to the right understanding of sacred signs. (Comp. Valesius, ad Harpocrationis Lexicon, Lipsiæ 1824, ii. 462.)

Like the Greeks, the Romans also distinguished between vates and interpretes (Cicero, Frugm.; Hortens.) :—'Sive vates sive in sacris initiisque tradendis divinæ mentis interpretes.' Servius (ad Virgilii Æn., iii. 359) quotes a passage from Cicero thus :—ut ait Cicero, omnis divinandi peritia in duas partes dividitur. Nam aut furor est, ut in vaticinantibus; aut ars, ut in aruspiciibus, fulguritis sive fulguratoribus, et auguribus. The aruspices, fulguriti, fulguratores, and augures, belong to the idea of the interpretes deorum. Comp. Cicero, Pro domo sua, c. 41 :—Equidem sic accēpi, in religionibus suscipiendis caput esse interpretari quæ voluntas deorum immortalium esse videatur. Cicero (De Divinatione, l. 41) says :—Etruria interpretatur quid quibusque ostendatur monstris atque portentis. Hence, in Cicero (De Legibus, ii. 27), the expression, 'interpretes religionum.'

An example of this distinction, usual among the Greeks, is found in 1 Cor. xii. 4, 30. The Corinthians filled with the Holy Ghost were γλωσσαι λαλοῦντες, speaking in tongues, consequently they were in the state of a mάντις; but frequently they did not comprehend the sense of their own inspiration, and did not understand how to interpret it because they had not the ἐρμηνεῖα γλωσσῶν, interpretation of tongues: consequently they were not ἐξηγηταί.

The Romans obtained the interpretatio from the Etruscans (Cicero, De Divinatione, i. 2, and Otfried Müller, Die Etrusker, ii. 8, sq.); but the above distinction was the cause that the interpretatio degenerated into a common art, which was exercised without inspiration, like a contemptible soothsaying, the rules of which were contained in writings. Cicero (De Divinatione, i. 2) says :—Furoris divinationem Sibyllinis maxime versibus contineri arbitrati, eorum decem interpretes delectos e civitate esse voluerunt.

The ideas of interpretes and of interpretatio were not confined among the Romans to sacred sub jects ; which, as we have seen, was the case among the Greeks with the corresponding Greek terms. The words interpretes and interpretatio were not only, as among the Greeks, applied to the explanation of the laws, but also, in general, to the explanation of whatever was obscure, and even to a mere intervention in the settlement of affairs ; for instance, we find in Livy (xxi. 12) pacis interpretes, denoting Alorcius, by whose instrumentality peace was offered. At an earlier period interpretes meant only those persons by means of whom affairs between God and man were settled (comp. Virgilii Æneis, x. 175, and Servius on this passage). The words interpretes and conjectores became convertible terms — unde etiam somniorum atque omnium interpretes conjectores vocantur (Quintil. Instit. iii. 6).

From what we have stated it follows that ἐξηγῆσθαι and interpretatio were originally terms confined to the unfolding of supernatural subjects, although in Latin, at an early period, these terms were also applied to profane matters. The Christians also early felt the want of an interpretation of their sacred writings, which they deemed to be of divine origin ; consequently they wanted interpreters and instruction, by the aid of which the true sense of the sacred Scriptures might be discovered. The right understanding of the nature and will of God seemed, among the Christians, as well as at an early period among the heathen, to depend upon a right understanding of certain external signs ; however, there was a progress from the unintelligible signs of nature to more intelligible written signs, which was certainly an important progress.

The Christians retained, in respect of the interpretation of their sacred writings, the same expressions which had been current in reference to the interpretation of sacred subjects among the heathen. Hence arose the fact that the Greek Christians employed with predilection the words ἐξηγῆσθαι and ἐξηγητής in reference to the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. But the circumstance that St. Paul employs the term ἐρμηνεία γλωσσῶν for the interpretation of the γλώσσαις λαλῶν (1 Cor. xii. 10, xiv. 26), greatly contributed to establish the usage of words belonging to the root ἐρμηνεύειν. According to Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica, iii. 9), Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, wrote, as early as about A.D. 100, a work under the title of λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις, which means an interpretation of the discourses of Jesus. Papias explained the religious contents of these discourses, which he had collected from oral and written traditions. He distinguished between the meaning of ἐξηγεῖσθαι and ἐρμηνεύειν, as appears from his observation (preserved by Eusebius in the place quoted above), in which he says, concerning the λόγια of St. Matthew, written in Hebrew, ἐρμήνευσε δὲ αὐτὰ ὡς ἐδύνατο ἕκαστος, 'but every one interpreted them according to his ability.' In the Greek Church ὁ ἐξηγητής and ἐξηγηταὶ τοῦ λόγου were the usual terms for teachers of Christianity. (See Eusebii Historia Ecclesiastica, vii. 30, and Heinichen on this passage, note 21 ; Photii Biblioth. Eccl. 105 ; Cave, Hist. Liter. i. 146.) Origen called his commentary on the Holy Scriptures ἐξηγητικὴ ; and Procopius of Gaza wrote a work on several books of the Bible, entitled σχολαὶ ἐξηγητικαί. However, we find the word ἐρμηνεία employed as a synonym of ἐξηγήσεις, especially among the inhabitants of Antioch. For instance, Gregorius Nyssenus says, concerning Ephraim Syrus, γραφὴν διην ἀκριβῶς πρὸς λέξιν ἡρμήνευσεν (See Gregorii Nysseni Vita Ephraimi Syri ; Opera, Paris, ii. p. 1033). Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and others, wrote commentaries on the sacred Scriptures under the title of ἐρμηνεῖα (compare A. H. Niemeyer, de Isidori Pelusiote Vita, Scriptis, et Doctrina, Halae 1825, p. 207).

Among the Latin Christians the word interpretes had a wider range than the corresponding Greek term, and the Latins had no precise term for the exposition of the Bible which exactly corresponded with the Greek. The word interpretatio was applied only in the sense of OCCUPATION or ACT of an expositor of the Bible, but not in the sense of CONTENTS elicited from Biblical passages. The words tractare, tractator, and tractatus, were in preference employed with respect to Biblical exposition, and the sense which it elicited. Together with these words there occur commentarius and expositio. In reference to the exegetical work of St. Hilary on St. Matthew, the codices fluctuate between commentarius and tractatus. St. Augustine's tractatus are well known ; and this father frequently mentions the divinorum scripturarum tractatores. For instance, Retractiones l. 23. divinorum tractatores eloquiorum. Sulpicius Severus, Dial. i. 6. originis . . . qui tractator sacrorum peritissimus habebatur. Vincentius Lirinensis observes in his Commonitorium on 1 Cor. xii. 28 :—tertio doctores qui tractatores nunc appellantur ; quos hic idem apostolus etiam prophetas interdu nuncupat, eo quod per eos prophetarum mysteria populis aperiantur (compare Dufresne, Glossarium mediae et infimae Latinitatis, sub TRACTATOR et TRACTATUS ; and Baluze, ad Servat. Lupum, p. 479).

However, the occupation of interpretes, in the nobler sense of this word, was not unknown to St. Jerome ; as may be seen from his Præfatio in libros Samuelis (Opera, ed. Vallarsi, ix. p. 459) :—Quicquid enim crebrius vertendo et emendando sollicitius et didicimus et tenemus, nostrum est. Et quum intellexeris, quod antea nesciebas, vel interpretem me estimato si gratus es, vel παραφραστήν si ingratus.

In modern times the word interpretatio has again come into repute in the sense of scriptural exposition, for which, indeed, interpretation is now the standing technical term.

The German language also distinguishes between the words auslegen and erklären in such a manner that the former corresponds to ἐξηγεῖσθαι and interpretari. The word auslegen is always used in the sense of rendering perceptible what is contained under signs and symbols. Compare Dionysii Halicarnassensis Antiq. Rom. ii. 73 : τοῖς τε ἰδιωταῖς, ὅποσοι μὴ ἴσασιν τοὺς περὶ τὰ θεῖα σεβασμῶς, ἐξηγηταὶ γίνονται καὶ προφῆται.

The word erklären, on the contrary, means to clear up by arguments what has been indistinctly understood, so that what was incomprehensible is comprehended.

The Erklärer does not develope what is hidden and concealed, but explains what is unclear and obscure (see Weigand, Wörterbuch der Deutschen Synonymen, 1, Mainz 1840, p. 140, seq.) Hence it follows that the Ausleger of the Bible occupies a position different from that of the Erklärer, although these terms are frequently employed as if they were synonymous. The Ausleger, ἐξηγητής, opens what is concealed under the words of the Bible. He unveils mysteries, while the Erklärer, ἐρμηνεύς, sees in the words of the Bible not merely signs for something concealed and hidden, but words the sense of which is to be cleared up whenever it is obscure. The Erklärer stands on NATURAL ground, but the Ausleger on SUPERNATURAL.

From ancient times the church, or rather ecclesiastical bodies and religious denominations, have taken the supernatural position with reference to the Bible, as, before the Church, the Jews did in respect of the O. T. The church and denominations have demanded Ausleger, not Erklärer. They have supposed that in the authors of Biblical books there did not exist a literary activity of the same kind which induces men to write down what they have thought, but have always required from their followers the belief that the Biblical authors wrote in a state of inspiration, that is to say, under a peculiar and direct influence of the Divine Spirit. Sometimes the Biblical authors were described to be merely external and mechanical instruments of God's revelation. But however wide, or however narrow the boundaries were, within which the operation of God upon the writers was confined by ecclesiastical supposition, the origin of the Biblical books was always supposed to be essentially different from the origin of human compositions; and this difference demanded the application of peculiar rules in order to understand the Bible. There were required peculiar arts and kinds of information in order to discover the sense and contents of books which, on account of their extraordinary origin, were inaccessible by the ordinary way of logical rules, and whose written words were only outward signs, behind which a higher and divine meaning was concealed. Consequently, the church and denominations required Deuter, Ausleger, ἐξηγηταί, or interpreters, of the signs by means of which God had revealed his will. Thus necessarily arose again in the Christian church the art of opening or interpreting the supernatural; which art had an existence in earlier religions, but with this essential difference, that the signs, by the opening of which supernatural truth was obtained, were now more simple, and of a more intelligible kind, than in earlier religions. They were now written signs, which belonged to the sphere of speech and language, through which alone all modes of thinking obtain clearness, and can be readily communicated to others. But the Holy Scriptures in which divine revelation was preserved, differ, by conveying divine thoughts, from common language and writing, which convey only human thoughts. Hence it followed that its sense was much deeper, and far exceeded the usual sphere of human thoughts, so that the usual requisites for the right understanding of written documents appeared to be insufficient. According to this opinion a LOWER and a higher sense of the Bible were distinguished. The lower sense was that which could be elicited according to the rules of grammar; the higher sense was considered to consist of deeper thoughts concealed under the grammatical meaning of the words. These deeper thoughts they endeavoured to obtain in various ways, but not by grammatical research.

The Jews, in the days of Jesus, employed for this purpose especially the typico-allegorical interpretation. The Jews of Palestine endeavoured by means of this mode of interpretation especially to elicit the secrets of futurity, which were said to be fully contained in the O. T. (See Wähner, Antiquitates Hebraeorum, vol. i., Göttingæ 1743, p. 341, sq.; Döpke, Hermeneutik der neutestamentlichen Schriftsteller, Leipzig 1829, p. 88, sq., 164, sq.; Hirschfeld, der Geist der Talmudischen Auslegung der Bibel, Berlin 1840; comp. Juvenal, Sat. xiv. 103; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. pp. 52, 61; Bretschneider, Historisch-dogmatische Auslegung des Neuen Testaments, Leipzig 1806, p. 35, sq.)

The Alexandrine Jews, on the contrary, endeavoured to raise themselves from the simple sense of the words, τὸ ψυχικόν, to a higher, more general, and spiritual sense, τὸ πνευματικόν (see Dähne, Geschichtliche Darstellung der jüdisch-Alexandrinischen Religions-Philosophie, Halle 1834, i. p. 52, sq.; ii. 17, 195, sq., 209, 228, 241). Similar principles were adopted by the authors of the N. T. (see De Wette, Ueber die Symbolisch-Typische Lehrart in Briefen an die Hebräer, in der Theologischen Zeitschrift, von Schleiermacher und De Wette, part iii.; Tholuck, Beilage zum Commentar über den Brief an die Hebräer, 1840).

These two modes of interpretation, the ALLEGORICO-TYPICAL and the ALLEGORICO-MYSTICAL, are found in the Christian writers as early as the 1st and 2d centuries; the latter as γνώσις, the former as a demonstration that all and everything, both what had happened, and what would come to pass, was somehow contained in the sacred Scriptures (see Justin Martyr, as quoted above, and Tertullian, Adversus Marcionem, iv. 2, Prædicatio discipulorum suspecta fieri posset si non assistat auctoritas).

To these allegorical modes of interpretation was added a third mode, which necessarily sprung up after the rise of the Catholico-apostolical church, namely, the DOGMATICAL, or THEOLOGICO-ECCLESIASTICAL. The followers of the Catholico-apostolical church agreed that all apostles and all apostolical writings had an equal authority, because they were all under an equal guidance of the Holy Ghost. Hence it followed that they could not set forth either contradictory or different doctrines. A twofold expedient was adopted in order to effect harmony of interpretation. The one was of the apparent and relative kind, because it referred to subjects which appear incomprehensible only to the confined human understanding, but which are in perfect harmony in the divine thoughts. Justin (Dialogus cum Tryphone, c. 65) says:—ἐκ παντὸς πεπεισμένοι οὐτι οὐδεμία γραφή τῇ ἑτέρᾳ ἐναντία ἐστίν, αὐτὸς μὴ νοεῖν μάλλον ὁμολογήσω τὰ εἰρημένα. St. Chrysostom restricted this as follows:—πάντα σαφὴ καὶ εὐθέα τὰ παρὰ ταῖς θείαις γραφαῖς, πάντα τὰ ἀναγκαῖα ὅληα (Homil. iii. c. 4. in Ep. 2 ad Thessalonicenses) (comp. Homil. iii. de Lazaro, and Athanasii Oratio contra gentes; Opera i. p. 12).

The SECOND expedient adopted by the church was to consider certain articles of faith to be LEADING DOCTRINES, and to regulate and define accordingly the sense of the Bible wherever it appeared doubtful and uncertain. This led to the THEOLOGICO-ECCLESIASTICAL or DOGMATICAL mode of interpretation, which, when the Christians were divided into several sects, proved to be indispensable to the Church, but which adopted various forms in the various sects by which it was employed. Not only the heretics of ancient times, but also the followers of the Roman Catholic, the Greek Catholic, the Syrian, the Anglican, the Protestant Church, etc., have endeavoured to interpret the Bible in harmony with their dogmas.

The different modes of interpreting the Bible are, according to what we have stated, the following three—the GRAMMATICAL, the ALLEGORICAL, the DOGMATICAL. The grammatical mode of interpretation simply investigates the sense contained in the words of the Bible. The allegorical, according to Quintilian's sentence, 'aliud verbis, aliud sensu ostendo,' maintains that the words of the Bible have, besides their simple sense, another which is concealed as behind a picture, and endeavours to find out this supposed figurative sense, which, it is said, was not intended by the authors (see Olshausen, Ein Wort über tieferen Schriftsinn, Königsberg 1824). The dogmatical mode of interpretation endeavours to explain the Bible in harmony with the dogmas of the church, following the principle of analogia fidei. Comp. Concilii Tridentini, sess. iv. decret. 2:—Ne quis Sacram Scripturam interpretari audeat contra eum sensum quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione Scripturarum Sacrarum.

Rambach, Institutiones Hermeneutica Sacra, Jenæ 1723: Auctoritas, quam hæc analogia fidei in re exegetica habet, in eo consistit, ut sit fundamentum ac principium generale, ad cujus normam omnes Scripturæ expositiones, tanquam ad lapidem Lydium, exigendæ sunt.

Anglican Church, art. xx.:—ECCLESIAE non licet quicquam instituere, quod verbo Dei scripto adversetur, nec unum Scripturæ locum sic exponere potest, ut alteri contradicat:—'It is not lawful for the church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's word written, neither may it expound one place of Scripture so as to be repugnant to another.'

Confessio Scotica, 18:—Nullam enim interpretationem admittere audeamus, quæ alicui principali articulo fidei, aut alicui plano textui Scripturæ, aut caritatis regulæ repugnat, etc.:—'We dare not admit any interpretation which contradicts any leading article of faith, or any plain text of Scripture, or the rule of charity, etc.'

Besides the three modes of interpretation which have been mentioned above, theological writers have spoken of TYPICAL, PROPHETICAL, EMPHATIC, PHILOSOPHICAL, TRADITIONAL, MORAL, or PRACTICAL interpretation. But all these are only one-sided developments of some single feature contained in the above three, arbitrarily chosen; and, therefore, they cannot be considered to be separate modes, but are only modifications of one or other of those three. The interpretation in which all these modes are brought into harmony, has lately been called the PANHARMONICAL, which word is not very happily chosen (F. H. Germar, Die Panharmonische Interpretation der Heiligen Schrift, Leipzig 1721; and by the same author, Beitrag zur Allgemeinen Hermeneutik, Altona 1828).

The ALLEGORICAL, as well as the DOGMATICAL, mode of interpretation, presupposes the GRAMMATICAL, which, consequently, forms the basis of the other two; so that neither the one nor the other can exist entirely without it. Consequently, the grammatical mode of interpretation must have an historical precedence before the others. But history also proves that the church has constantly endeavoured to curtail the province of grammatical interpretation, to renounce it as much as possible, and to rise above it. If we follow, with the examining eye of an historical inquirer, the course in which these three modes of interpretation, in their mutual dependence upon each other, have generally been applied, it becomes evident that in opposition to the grammatical mode, the allegorical was first set up. Subsequently, the allegorical was almost entirely supplanted by the dogmatical; but it started up with renewed vigour when the dogmatical mode rigorously confined the spiritual movement of the human intellect, as well as all religious sentiment, within the too narrow bounds of dogmatical despotism.

The dogmatical mode of interpretation could only spring up after the church, renouncing the original multiplicity of opinions, had agreed upon certain leading doctrines; after which time, it grew, together with the church, into a mighty tree towering high above every surrounding object, and casting its shade over everything. The longing desire for light and warmth, of those who were spell-bound under its shade, induced them to cultivate again the allegorical and the grammatical interpretation; but they were unable to bring the fruits of these modes to full maturity. Every new intellectual revolution, and every spiritual development of nations, gave a new impulse to grammatical interpretation. This impulse lasted until interpretation was again taken captive by the overwhelming ecclesiastical power, whose old formalities had regained strength, or which had been renovated under new forms. Grammatical interpretation, consequently, goes hand in hand with the principle of spiritual progress, and the dogmatical with the conservative principle. Finally, the allegorical interpretation is as an artificial aid subservient to the conservative principle, when, by its vigorous stability, the latter exercises a too unnatural pressure. This is confirmed by the history of all times and countries, so that we may confine ourselves to the following few illustrative observations. The various tendencies of the first Christian period were combined in the 2d century, so that the principle of one general (Catholic) church was gradually adopted by most parties. But now, it became rather difficult to select, from the variety of doctrines prevalent in various sects, those by the application of which to Biblical interpretation a perfect harmony and systematical unity could be effected. Nevertheless, the wants of science powerfully demanded a systematical arrangement of Biblical doctrines, even before a general agreement upon dogmatical principles had been effected. The wants of science were especially felt among the Alexandrine Christians; and in Alexandria, where the allegorical interpretation had from ancient times been practised, it offered the desired expedient which met the exigency of the church. Hence, it may naturally be explained why the Alexandrine theologians of the 2d and 3d century, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, interpreted allegorically, and why the allegorical interpretation was perfected, and in vogue, even before the dogmatical came into existence. Origen, especially in his fourth book, De Principiis, treats on scriptural interpretation, using the following arguments:—The Holy Scriptures, inspired by God, form an harmonious whole, perfect in itself, without any defects and contradictions, and containing nothing that is insignificant and superfluous. The grammatical interpretation leads to obstacles and objections, which, according to the quality just stated of the Holy Scriptures, are inadmissible and impossible. Now, since the merely grammatical interpretation can neither remove nor overcome these objections, we must seek for an expedient beyond the boundaries of grammatical interpretation. The allegorical interpretation offers this expedient, and consequently is above the grammatical. Origen observes that man consists of body, soul, and spirit; and he distinguishes a triple sense of the Holy Scriptures analogous to this division:—οἰκοῦν τρισῶς ἀπογράφεσθαι δεῖ εἰς τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχὴν τὰ τῶν ἁγίων γραμμάτων νοήματα· ἵνα ὁ μὲν ἀπλούστερος οἰκοδομηταί, ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκῆς σαρκὸς τῆς γραφῆς, οὕτως ὀνομαζόντων ἡμῶν τὴν πρόχειρον ἐκδοχὴν· ὁ δὲ ἐπὶ ποσὸν ἀναβεβηκώς, ἀπὸ τῆς ὡς περὶ ψυχῆς αὐτῆς· ὁ δὲ τέλειος καὶ ὁμοίος τοῖς παρὰ τῷ ἀποστόλῳ (1 Cor. ii. 6, 7) λεγομένοις σοφίαν δὲ λαλοῦμεν . . . ἀπὸ τοῦ πνευματικοῦ νόμου σκίαν ἔχοντας τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν· ὡς περ γὰρ ὁ ἀνθρώπος συνέστηκεν ἐκ σώματος καὶ ψυχῆς καὶ πνεύματος, τὸν αὐτὸν πρόπον καὶ ἡ οἰκονομηθεῖσα ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς ἀνθρώπων σωτηρίαν δοθῆναι γραφὴν (De Princ., iv. 108; comp. Klausen, Hermeneutik des Neuen Testaments, Leipzig 1841, p. 104, sq.)

Since, however, allegorical interpretation cannot be reduced to settled rules, but always depends upon the greater or less influence of imagination; and since the system of Christian doctrines, which the Alexandrine theologians produced by means of allegorical interpretation, was in many respects objected to; and since, in opposition to these Alexandrine theologians, there was gradually established, and more and more firmly defined, a system of Christian doctrines which formed a firm basis for uniformity of interpretation, in accordance with the mind of the majority, there gradually sprung up a dogmatical mode of interpretation founded upon the interpretation of ecclesiastical teachers, which had been recognised as orthodox in the Catholic church. This dogmatical interpretation has been in perfect existence since the beginning of the 4th century, and then more and more supplanted the allegorical, which henceforward was left to the wit and ingenuity of a few individuals. Thus St. Jerome, about A.D. 400, could say:—Regula scripturarum est: ubi manifestissima prophetia de futuris textitur per INCERTA ALLEGORIÆ non extenuare quæ scripta sunt (Comment. in Malachi i. 16). During the whole of the 4th century, the ecclesiastico-dogmatical mode of interpretation was developed with constant reference to the grammatical. Even Hillary, in his book De Trinitate, i. properly asserts:—Optimus lector est, qui dictorum intelligentiam expectet ex dictis potius quam imponat, et retulerit magis quam attulerit; neque cogat id videri dictis contineri, quam ante lectionem præsumperit intelligendum.

After the commencement of the 5th century, grammatical interpretation fell entirely into decay; which ruin was effected partly by the full development of the ecclesiastico-system of doctrines defined in all their parts, and by a fear of deviating from this system, partly also by the continually increasing ignorance of the languages in which the Bible was written. The primary condition of ecclesiastico or dogmatical interpretation was then most clearly expressed by Vincentius Lirinensis (Commonit. l.) :—Quia videlicet scripturam sacram pro ipsa sua altitudine non uno eodemque sensu uni- versi accipiunt, sed ejusdem eloquia aliter atque aliter alius atque alius interpretatur, ut pæne quot homines sunt, tot illinc sententiæ erui posse videantur. . . . in ipsa catholica ecclesia magnopere curandum est, ut id teneamus, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est (compare Commonit. ii., ed. Bremensis, 1688, p. 321, sq.) Henceforward, interpretation was confined to the mere collection of explanations, which had first been given by men whose ecclesiastical orthodoxy was unquestionable. Præstantius præsumpta novitate non imbui, sed prisorum fonte satiari (Casiodori Institutiones Divinae, Pref. Compare Alcuini Epistola ad Gislam; Opera, ed. Frobenius, i. p. 464. Comment. in Joh. Pref., ib. p. 460. Claudius Turon, Prolegomena in Comment. in libros Regum. Haymo, Historia Ecclesiastica, ix. 3, etc.) Doubtful cases were decided according to the precedents of ecclesiastical definitions. In his quæ vel dubia vel obscura fuerint id novimus sequendum quod nec præceptis evangelicis contrarium, nec decretis sanctorum invenitur adversum (Benedicti Capitularia, iii. 58, in Pertz, Monumenta Veteris German. Histor. iv. 2, p. 107). But men like Bishop Agobardus (A.D. 840, in Galandii Bibl., xiii. p. 446), Johannes Scotus, Erigena, Druthmar, Nicolaus Lyranus, Roger Bacon, and others, acknowledged the necessity of grammatical interpretation, and were only wanting in the requisite means, and in knowledge, for putting it successfully into practice.

During the whole period of the middle ages the allegorical interpretation again prevailed. The middle ages were more distinguished by sentiment than by clearness, and the allegorical interpretation gave satisfaction to sentiment and occupation to free mental speculation.

When, in the 15th century, classical studies had revived, they exercised also a favourable influence upon Biblical interpretation, and restored grammatical interpretation to honour. It was especially by grammatical interpretation that the domineering Catholic church was combated at the period of the Reformation; but as soon as the newly-sprung-up Protestant church had been dogmatically established, it began to consider grammatical interpretation a dangerous adversary of its own dogmas, and opposed it as much as did the Roman Catholics themselves. From the middle of the 16th to the middle of the 18th century this important ally of Protestantism was subjected to the artificial law of a new dogmatical interpretation; while the Roman Catholic church changed the principle of interpretation formerly advanced by Vincentius into an ecclesiastico dogma. In consequence of this new oppression the religious sentiment, which had frequently been wounded both among Roman Catholics and Protestants, took refuge in allegorical interpretation, which then re-appeared under the forms of typical and mystical theology.

After the beginning of the 18th century grammatical interpretation recovered its authority. It was then first re-introduced by the Arminians, and, in spite of constant attacks, towards the conclusion of that century it decidedly prevailed among the German Protestants. It exercised a very beneficial influence, although it cannot be denied that manifold errors occurred in its application. During the last thirty years both Protestants and Roman Catholics have again curtailed the rights and invaded the province of grammatical interpretation, by promoting (according to the general reaction of our times) the opposing claims of dogmatical and mystical interpretation (comp. J. Rosenmüller, Historia Interpretationis Librorum sacrorum in Ecclesia Christiana, Lipsiæ 1795-1814, 5 vols.; W. Van Mildert, An Inquiry into the General Principles of Scripture Interpretation, in Eight Sermons, etc., Oxford 1815; G. W. Meyer, Geschichte der Schrift-erklärung seit der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften, Göttingen 1802-9, 5 vols.; Richard Simon, *Histoire Critique des principaux Commentateurs du Nouv. The aim of human speech in general may be described as the desire to render one's own thoughts intelligible to others by means of words in their capacity of signs of thoughts. These words may be written, or merely spoken. In order to understand the speech of another, several arts and branches of knowledge are requisite. The art of understanding the language of another is called hermeneutics, ἑρμηνευτική τέχνη, or ἐπιστήμη. Every art may be reduced to the skilful application of certain principles, which, if they proceed from one highest principle, may be said to be based on science.

Here we have to consider not the spoken, but the written language only. The rules to be observed by the interpreter, and the gifts which qualify him for the right understanding of written language, are applicable either to all written language in general, or only to the right understanding of particular documents; they are, therefore, to be divided into general and particular, or especial rules and gifts. In Biblical interpretation arises the question, whether the general hermeneutical rules are applicable to the Bible and sufficient for rightly understanding it, or whether they are insufficient, and have to undergo some modification.

Most Biblical interpreters, as we might infer from the principle of dogmatical and allegorical interpretation, have declared the general hermeneutical principles to be insufficient for explaining the Bible, and required for this purpose especial hermeneutical rules, because the Bible, they said, which had been written under the direct guidance of the Holy Ghost, could not be measured by the common rules which are applicable only to the lower sphere of merely human thoughts and compositions. Therefore, from the most ancient times, peculiar hermeneutical rules, meeting the exigency of Biblical interpretation, have been set forth, which deviated from the rules of general hermeneutics. Thus Biblical hermeneutics were changed into an art of understanding the Bible according to a certain ecclesiastical system in vogue at a certain period.

The advocates of grammatical interpretation have opposed these Biblical hermeneutics, as proceeding upon merely arbitrary suppositions. Sometimes they merely limited its assertions, and sometimes they rejected it altogether. In the latter case they said that the principles of general hermeneutics ought to be applicable to the Holy Scriptures also. Against the above-mentioned train of argument cited from Origen, on which the demand of particular Biblical hermeneutics essentially rests, the following argument might, with greater justice, be opposed: if God deemed it requisite to reveal his will to mankind by means of intelligible books, he must, in choosing this medium, have intended that the contents of these books should be discovered according to those general laws which are conducive to the right understanding of documents in general. If this were not the case God would have chosen insufficient and even contradictory means inadequate to the purpose he had in view.

The interpretation, which, in spite of all ecclesiastical opposition, ought to be adopted as being the only true one, strictly adheres to the demands of general hermeneutics, to which it adds those particular hermeneutical rules which meet the requisites of particular cases. This has, in modern times, been styled the HISTORICO-GRAMMATICAL mode of interpretation. This appellation has been chosen because the epithet grammatical seems to be too narrow and too much restricted to the mere verbal sense. It might be more correct to style it simply the HISTORICAL interpretation, since the word HISTORICAL comprehends everything that is requisite to be known about the language, the turn of mind, the individuality, etc., of an author in order rightly to understand his book.

In accordance with the various notions concerning Biblical interpretation which we have stated, there have been produced Biblical hermeneutics of very different kinds; for instance, in the earlier period we might mention that of the Donatist Iiconius, who wrote about the 4th century his Regulæ ad investigandam et inveniendam Intelligentiam Scripturarum Septem; Augustine, De Doctrina Christiana, lib. i. 3; Isidorus Hispalensis, Sentent. 419, seq.; Santis Pagnini (who died in 1541), Isagoga ad Mysticos Sacra Scriptura Sensus, libri octodecim, Colon. 1540; Sixti Senensis (who died 1599), Bibliotheca Sancta, Venetiis 1566. Of this work, which has been frequently reprinted, there belongs to our present subject only Liber tertius Artem exponendi Sancta Scripta Catholicis Expositoribus aptissimis Regulis et Exemplis ostendens. At a later period the Roman Catholics added to these the works of Bellarmine, Martianay, Calmet, Jahn, and Arigler.

On the part of the Lutherans were added by Matt. Flacius, Clavis Scripturæ Sacrae, Basileæ 1537, and often reprinted in two volumes; by Johann Gerhard, Tractatus de Legitima Scripturæ Sacrae Interpretatione, Jenæ 1610; by Solomon Glassius, Philologia Sacra, libri quinque, Jenæ 1623, and often reprinted; by Jacob Rambach, Institutiones Hermeneuticæ Sacrae, Jenæ 1723.

On the part of the Calvinists there were furnished by J. Alph. Turretinus, De Scripturæ Sacrae Interpretatione Tractatus Bipartitus, Dortrecht 1723, and often reprinted. In the English Church were produced by Herbert Marsh Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, Cambridge 1828.

Since the middle of the last century it has been usual to treat on the O. T. hermeneutics and on those of the N. T. in separate works. For instance, G. W. Meyer, Versuch einer Hermeneutik des Alten Testaments, Lubeck 1799; J. H. Pareau, Institutio Interpretis Veteris Testamenti, Trajecti 1822, translated into English by Dr. P. Forbes, Edin. 1835-40, 2 vols.; J. A. Ernesti, Institutio Interpretis Novi Testamenti, Lipsiæ 1761, ed. 5ta, curante Ammon, 1809, translated into English by Terrot, Edinburgh, 1833; Morus, Super Hermeneutica

INTRODUCTION, BIBLICAL. The Greek word εἰσαγωγή, in the sense of an introduction to a science, occurs only in later Greek, and was first used to denote an introduction to the right understanding of the Bible, by a Greek called Adrian, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. Ἀδριανὸς εἰσαγωγὴ τῆς γραφῆς is a small book, the object of which is to assist readers who are unacquainted with Biblical phraseology in rightly understanding peculiar words and expressions. It was first edited by David Hæschel, under the title of Adriani Isagoge in Sacram Scripturam Græcum Scholiis, Augustæ Vindobonæ, 1602, 4to. This work is reprinted in the London edition of the Critici Sacri, tom. viii.; and in the Frankfort edition, tom. vi. Before Adrian, the want of similar works had already been felt, and books of a corresponding tendency were in circulation, but they did not bear the title of εἰσαγωγή. Melito of Sardis, who lived in the latter half of the 2d century, wrote a book under the title of ἡ κλεις, being a key both to the Old and to the N. T. The so-called Αἰεις, which were written at a later period, are books of a similar description. Some of these Αἰεις have been printed in Matthæi's Novum Testamentum Græce, and in Boissonade's Anecdota Græca, tom. iii., Parisiis 1831. These are merely linguistic introductions; but there was soon felt the want of works which might solve other questions; such as, for instance, what are the principles which should guide us in Biblical interpretation. The Donatist Ticonius wrote, about the year 380, Regule ad investigandam et inveniendam Intelligentiam Scripturarum Septem. St. Augustine, in his work De Doctrinâ Christianâ (iii. 302), says concerning these seven rules, that the author's intention was by means of them to open the secret sense of Holy Writ, 'quasi clavibus,' as if it were by keys.

There arose also a question concerning the extent of Holy Writ—that is to say, what belonged, and what did not belong, to Holy Writ; and also respecting the contents of the separate Biblical books, and the order in which they should follow each other, etc.

About A.D. 550, Cassiodorus wrote his Institu- tiones Divinæ. He mentions in this work, under the name of Introductores Divina Scriptura, five authors who had been engaged in Biblical investigations, and in his tenth chapter speaks of them thus:—Ad introductores scripturæ divinæ sollicita mente redeamus, id est TICONIUM Donatistam, Sanctum AUGUSTINUM de doctrina Christiana, ADRIANUM, EUCHERIUM, et JUNILLUM, quos sedula curiositate collegi, ut, quibus erat similis intentio, in uno corpore adunati codices clauderentur.

Henceforward the title, Introductio in Scripturam Sacram, was established, and remained current for all works in which were solved questions introductory to the study of the Bible. In the Western, or Latin church, during a thousand years, scarcely any addition was made to the collection of Cassiodorus; while in the Eastern, or Greek church, only two works written during this long period deserve to be mentioned, both bearing the title Σύνοψις τῆς θείας γραφῆς. One of these works was falsely ascribed to Athanasius, and the other as falsely to Chrysostom.

At the commencement of the 16th century, the Dominican friar Santes Pagninus, who died in 1541, published his Isagoge, by means of which he intended to revive the Biblical knowledge of Jerome and St. Augustine. This work, considering the time of its appearance, was a great step in advance. Its title is, Santis Pagnini Lucensis Isagoge ad Sacras Literas, liber unicus, Coloniz 1540, fol.

The work of the Dominican friar Sixtus of Sienna, who died in 1599, is of greater importance, although it is manifestly written under the influence of the Inquisition, which had just been restored, and is perceptibly shackled by the decrees of the Council of Trent. Sixtus had the intention, worthy of an inquisitor, to expurgate from Christian literature every heretical element. The Index Librorum Prohibitorum, which was then first published, had the same object; but Sixtus furnished also a list of books to be used by a true Catholic Christian for the right understanding of Holy Writ, as well as the principles which should guide a Roman Catholic in criticism and interpretation. The title of his work is, Bibliotheca Sancta ab A. F. Sixto, Senensi, ordinis predicatorum, ex præcipuis Catholica Ecclesiæ auctoribus collecta, et in octo libros digesta, Venetiis 1566. This book is dedicated to the Cardinal Ghisleri, who ascended the papal throne in 1566, under the name of Pius V.: it has frequently been reprinted.

The decrees of the Council of Trent prevented the Roman Catholics from moving freely in the field of Biblical investigation, while the Protestants zealously carried out their researches in various directions. The Illyrian, Matthias Flacius, in his Clavis Scripturæ Sacre, seu de Sermonum Sacrarum Literarum, which was first printed at Basle, 1567, in folio, furnished an excellent work on Biblical hermeneutics; but it was surpassed by the Prolegomena of Brian Walton, which belong to his celebrated Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, Lond. 1657, six volumes fol. These Prolegomena contain much that will always be accounted valuable and necessary for the true criticism of the sacred text. They have been published separately, with notes, by Archdeacon Wrangham, in 2 vols. 8vo. Thus we have seen that excellent works were produced on isolated portions of Biblical introduction, but they were not equalled in merit by the works in which it was attempted to furnish a whole system of Biblical introduction.

The following Biblical introductions are among the best of those which were published about that period: Michaelis Waltheri Officina Biblica noviter adaperita, etc., Lipsiæ, first published in 1636; Abrahami Calovii Criticus Sacer Biblicus, etc., Vitembergæ 1643; J. H. Hottinger, Thesaurus Philologicus, seu Clavis Scripturæ Sacræ, Tiguri 1649; Johannis Henrici Heidegger, Enchiridion Biblicum λεπομνημονικόν, Tiguri 1681; Leusden, a Dutchman, published a work entitled Philologus Hebræus, etc., Utrecht 1656, and Philologus Hebræo-Græcus Generalis, Utrecht 1670. All these works have been frequently reprinted.

The dogmatical zeal of the Protestants was greatly excited by the work of Louis Capelle, a reformed divine and learned professor at Saumur, which appeared under the title of Ludovici Cappelli Critica Sacra; sive de variis quæ in veteris Testamenti libris occurrunt lectionibus libri sex. Editæ opere ac studio Joannis Cappelli, auctoris filii, Parisiis 1650. A learned Roman Catholic and priest of the Oratory, Richard Simon, who was born in 1658, and died in 1712, rightly perceived, from the dogmatical bile stirred up by Capelle, that Biblical criticism was the most effective weapon to be employed against the Protestantism which had grown cold and stiff in dogmatics. He therefore devoted his critical knowledge of the Bible to the service of the Roman Catholic church, and endeavoured to inflict a death-blow upon Protestantism. The result, however, was the production of Simon's excellent work on Biblical criticism, which became the basis on which the science of Biblical introduction was raised. Simon was the first who correctly separated the criticism of the O. T. from that of the New. His works on Biblical introduction appeared under the following titles Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament, Paris 1678. This work was inaccurately reprinted at Amsterdam by Elsevir in 1679, and subsequently in many other bad piratical editions. Among these the most complete was that printed, together with several polemical treatises occasioned by this work, at Rotterdam, in 1685, 4to:—Histoire Critique du Texte du Nouveau Testament, Rotterdam 1689; Histoire Critique des Versions du Nouveau Testament, Rotterdam 1690; Histoire Critique des principaux Commentateurs du Nouveau Testament, Rotterdam 1693. By these excellent critical works Simon established a claim upon the gratitude of all real friends of truth; but he was thanked by none of the prevailing parties in the Christian church. The Protestants saw in Simon only an enemy of their church, not the thorough investigator and friend of truth. To the Roman Catholics, on the other hand, Simon's works appeared to be destructive, because they demonstrated their ecclesiastical decrees to be arbitrary and unhistorical. The Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament was suppressed by the Roman Catholics in Paris immediately after its publication, and in Protestant countries also it was forbidden to reprint it. The Roman Catholic bishop Bossuet lamented that Simon had undermined the dogma of tradition, and had changed the holy fathers into Protestants. Simon, as an honest investigator and friend of truth, remained undisturbed; but kept aloof from both Roman Catholics and Protestants, by both of which parties he was persecuted, and died in 1712, in a merely external connection with the Romish church.

The churches endeavoured, with apparent success, to destroy Simon and his writings, in a host of inimical and condemnatory publications, by which the knowledge of truth was not in the least promoted. However, the linguistic and truly scientific researches of Pococke; the Oriental school in the Netherlands; the unsurpassed work of Humphry Hody, De Bibliorum Textibus Originalibus Versionibus, etc., Oxoniæ 1705, folio; the excellent criticism of Mill, in his Novum Testamentum Græcum cum Lectionibus Variantibus, Oxoniæ 1707, folio; which was soon followed by Wetstein's Novum Testamentum Græcum editionis receptæ, cum Lectionibus Variantibus, Amstelodami 1751-52, folio, and by which even Johann Albert Bengel, who died in 1752, was convinced, in spite of his ecclesiastical orthodoxy (comp. Bengelii Apparatus Criticus Novi Testamenti, p. 634, sq.); the Biblical works by Johann Heinrich Michaelis, especially his Biblia Hebræica ex Manuscriptis et impressis Codicibus, Halæ 1720; and Benjamin Kennicott's Vetus Testamentum Hebræicum cum variis Lectionibus, Oxoniæ 1776, and the revival of classical philology;—all this gradually led to results which coincided with Simon's criticism, and shewed the enormous difference between historical truth and the arbitrary ecclesiastical opinions which were still prevalent in the works on Biblical introduction by Pritius, Blackwall, Carpov, Van Til, Moldenhauer, and others. Johann David Michaelis, who died in 1791, mildly endeavoured to reconcile the church with historical truth, but has been rewarded by the anathemas of the ecclesiastical party, who have pronounced him a heretic. By their ecclesiastical persecutors, Richard Simon was falsely described to be a disciple of the atheistical Spinoza, and Michaelis as a follower of both Simon and Spinoza. However, the mediating endeavours of Michaelis gradually prevailed. His Introduction to the New Testament appeared first as a work of moderate size, under the title of Johann David Michaelis Einleitung in die Göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes, Göttingen 1750, 8vo. It was soon translated into English. In the years 1765-66 Michaelis published a second and augmented edition of the German original, in two volumes. The fourth edition, which received great additions, and in which many alterations were made, appeared in 1788, in two vols. 4to. This edition was translated and essentially augmented by Herbert March, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, and appeared under the title, Introduction to the New Testament, by John David Michaelis, translated from the fourth edition of the German, and considerably augmented, Cambridge 1791-1801, 4 vols. 8vo. Michaelis commenced also an Introduction to the Old Testament, but did not complete it. A portion of it was printed under the title, Einleitung in die Göttlichen Schriften des Alten Bundes, Theil i. Abschnitt 1, Hamburg 1787.

A work by Ed. Harwood, entitled A New Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the New Testament, London 1767-71, was translated into German by Schulz, Halle 1770-73, in three volumes. In this book there are so many heterogeneous materials, that it scarcely belongs to the science of introduction.

The study of N. T. introduction was in Germany especially promoted also by Johann Solomon Semler, who died at Halle in 1791. It was by Semler's influence that the critical works of Richard Simon were translated into German, and the works of Wetstein re-edited and circulated. The original works of Semler on Biblical introduction are his Apparatus ad liberalem Novi Testamenti Interpretationem, Halae 1767, and his Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canons, 4 vols., Halle 1771-75.

Semler's school produced Johann Jacob Griesbach, who died at Jena in the year 1812. Griesbach's labours in correcting the text of the N. T. are of great value. K. A. Haenlein published a work called Handbuch der Einleitung in die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, Erlangen 1794-1802, in two volumes, in which he followed up the lectures of Griesbach. A second edition of this work appeared in the years 1802-9. This introduction contains excellent materials, but is wanting in decisive historical criticism.

Johann Gottfried Eichhorn, who died at Göttingen in 1827, was formed in the school of Michaelis at Göttingen, and was inspired by Herder's poetical views of the East in general, and of the literature of the ancient Hebrews in particular. Eichhorn commenced his Introduction when the times were inclined to give up the Bible altogether, as a production of priestcraft inapplicable to the present period. He endeavoured to bring the contents of the Bible into harmony with modern modes of thinking, to explain, and to recommend them. He endeavoured by means of hypothesis to furnish a clue to their origin, without sufficiently regarding strict historical criticism. Eichhorn's Einleitung in das Alte Testament was first published at Leipzig in 1780-83, in three volumes. The fifth edition was published at Göttingen in 1820-24, in five volumes. His Einleitung in das Neue Testament was published at Göttingen in 1804-27, in five volumes. The earlier volumes have been republished. The external treatment of the materials, the style, aim, and many separate portions of both works, are masterly and excellent; but with regard to linguistic and historical research, they are feeble and overwhelmed with hypotheses.

Leonhardt Bertholdt was a very diligent but uncritical compiler. He made a considerable step backward in the science of introduction, not only by reuniting the Old and N. T. into one whole, but by even intermixing the separate writings with each other, in his work entitled Historisch-kritische Einleitung in sämtliche kanonische und Apocryphische Schriften des Alten und Neuen Testaments, Erlangen 1812-19, in six volumes.

The Isagoge Historico-critica in Libros Novi Fœderis Sacros, Jenæ 1830, of H. A. Schott, is more distinguished by diligence than by penetration. The Lehrbuch der Historisch-kritischen Einleitung in die Bibel A. und N. T., Berlin; Theil 1, Die Allgemeine Einleitung und das Alte Testament enthaltend, 1817 (fifth edition, 1840); Theil 2, Das Neue Testament enthaltend, 1826 (fourth edition, 1842), by W. M. Lebrecht de Wette, is distinguished by brevity, precision, critical penetration, and in some parts by completeness. This book contains an excellent survey of the various opinions prevalent in the sphere of Biblical introduction, interspersed with original discussions. Almost every author on Biblical criticism will find that De Wette has made use of his labours; but in the purely historical portions the book is feeble, and indicates that the author did not go to the first sources, but adopted the opinions of others; consequently the work has no internal harmony. An English translation of this work, with additions by the translator, Theodore Parker, has lately appeared in America, under the title of A Critical and Historical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament.

The word 'introduction' being of rather vague signification, there was also formerly no definite idea attached to the expression BIBLICAL INTRODUCTION. In works on this subject (as in Home's Introduction) might be found contents belonging to geography, antiquities, interpretation, natural history, and other branches of knowledge. Even the usual contents of Biblical introductions were so unconnected, that Schliermacher, in his Kurze Darstellung des Theologischen Studiums, justly called it ein Mancherlei; that is, a farrago or omnium-gatherum. Biblical introduction was usually described as consisting of the various branches of preparatory knowledge requisite for viewing and treating the Bible correctly. It was distinguished from Biblical history and archaeology by being less intimately connected with what is usually called history. It comprised treatises on the origin of the Bible, on the original languages, on the translations, and on the history of the sacred text; and was divided into general and special introduction.

The author of this article endeavoured to remove this vagueness by furnishing a firm definition of Biblical introduction. In his work, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, von Dr. K. A. Credner, th. I., Halle 1836, he defined Biblical introduction to be the history of the Bible, and divided it into the following parts:

1. The history of the separate Biblical books.
2. The history of the collection of these books, or of the canon.
3. The history of the spread of these books, or of the translations of it.
4. The history of the preservation of the text.
5. The history of the interpretation of it.

This view of the science of introduction has received much approbation, and is the basis of Reus's Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften des Neuen Testaments, Halle 1842 [3d ed. enlarged, Braunschweig, 1860]. The results of the critical examination of the books of the N. T. are comprehended in the following work, Das Neue Testament nach seinem Zweck, Ursprunge und Inhalt, von A. R. Credner, Giessen 1841-43, in two volumes.

The critical investigation which prevailed in Germany after the days of Michaelis, has of late been opposed by a mode of treating Biblical introduction, not so much in the spirit of a free search after truth as in an apologetical and polemical style. This course, however, has not enriched Biblical science. To this class of books belong a number of monographs, or treatises on separate subjects; also the Handbuch der Historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament, Erlangen 1836, by H. A. C. Havermick, of which there have been published two parts, in three volumes, and of which The General Introduction and the Introduction to the Pentateuch have been translated into English, Edin. 1850, 1852; and also H. E. Ferd. Guericke's Einleitung in das Neue Testament, Halle 1843, in which too frequently an anathema against heretics serves as a substitute for demonstration. The apologetical tendency prevails in the work of G. Hamilton, entitled A General Introduction to the Study of the Hebrew Scriptures, etc., Dublin 1814; in Thomas Hartwell Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, etc., London 1818, four volumes [the tenth edition of this work was issued in four large vols. 8vo, in 1856, of which the second vol. on the O. T. was prepared by Dr. S. Davidson, and the fourth on the N. T., by Dr. P. Tregelles. For Dr. Davidson's vol., one by Mr. Ayre has since been substituted]; and in J. Cook's Inquiry into the Books of the New Testament, Edin. 1824.

The Roman Catholics also have, in modern times, written on Biblical introduction, although the unchangeable decrees of the Council of Trent hinder all free, critical, and scientific treatment of the subject. The Roman Catholics can treat Biblical introduction only in a polemical and apologetical manner, and are obliged to keep up the attention of their readers by introducing learned archaeological researches, which conceal the want of free movement. This latter mode was adopted by J. Jahn (who died at Vienna in 1816) in his Einleitung in die Göttlichen Bücher des Alten Bundes, Vienna 1793, two volumes, and 1802, three volumes; and in his Introductio in Libros Sacros Veteris Testamenti in epitomen redacta, Viennæ 1805. This work has been republished by F. Ackermann, in what are asserted to be the third and fourth editions, under the title of Introductio in Libros Sacros Veteris Testamenti, usibus academicis accommodata, Viennæ 1825 and 1839. But these so-called new editions are full of alterations and mutilations, which remove every free expression of Jahn, who belonged to the liberal period of the Emperor Joseph.

Johann Leonhard Hug's Einleitung in das Neue Testament, Stuttgart and Tübingen 1808, two volumes, third edition, 1826, surpasses Jahn's work in ability, and has obtained much credit among Protestants by its learned explanations, although these frequently swerve from the point in question. Hug's work has been translated into English by the Rev. D. G. Wait, LL.D.; but this translation is much surpassed by that of Fosdick, published in the United States, and enriched by the addenda of Moses Stuart. The polemical and apologetical style prevails in the work of J. G. Herbst, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in die Schriften des Alten Testaments, completed and edited after the death of the author, by Welte, Carlsruhe 1840; and in L'Introduction Historique et Critique aux Livres de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament, par J. B. Glaire, 6 vols., 2d ed., Paris 1843. The work of the excellent Feilmoser, who died in 1831, Einleitung in die Bücher des Neuen Bundes, in the second edition, Tübingen 1830, forsakes the position of a true Roman Catholic, inasmuch as it is distinguished by a noble ingenuousness and candour. All these last-mentioned works prove that the science of introduction cannot prosper in ecclesiastical fetters.—K. A. C.

IONIA. It has been suggested that in 1 Maccab. viii. 8, for the existing reading χωραν την Ἰουδαίαν καὶ Μήδεια, should be read χ. τ. Ἰωνίαν καὶ Μυσίαν, on the ground that to include India and Media within the domain of Antiochus III. is to contradict directly the voice of history, which confines this monarch's possessions to this side the Taurus range (Liv. Hist. xxxvii. 56; xxxviii. 38). This alteration is purely conjectural, and it is not easy to see, supposing it to be the correct reading, how the error in the text could have arisen. Michaelis supposes that by a mistake on the part of the translator, יוֹדא was read for מִסִּי, and יוֹדא or יוֹדא for יוֹדא, and that the nations intended are the Mysians and the 'Everal' (Hom. Il. ii. 580) of Paphlagonia; but this is still more improbable than the former conjecture, and besides, not only was Paphlagonia not within the domain of Antiochus, but the Eretians did not at that time exist (Strabo, xii. 8). Perhaps the conjectural emendation above mentioned may be adopted on the ground of its internal probability; as the only alternative seems to be to suppose gross geographical and historical ignorance on the part of the author. It is followed by Luther (who puts 'Ionien' in the text), Drusius, Grotius, Houbigant, etc. Adopting the reading Ionia, the district referred to is that bordering on the Ægean Sea from Phocæa to Miletus. Its original inhabitants were Greeks, but in later times a large Jewish element was found in the population (Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 2. 3). Under the Roman dominion the name Ionia remained, but its towns were distributed politically under other provinces. Ptolemy ranks them in Asia Proper, while Strabo (xiv. 632), Pliny (H. N. v. 31), and Mela (i. 17), speak of Ionia as a distinct territory. In the account which Josephus gives (Antiq. xvi. 2. 3) of the appeal of the Jews in Ionia to Agrippa for exemption from certain oppressions to which they were exposed, the ancient name of the country is retained. He speaks of πολὺ πλῆθος Ἰουδαίων as inhabiting its cities.—W. L. A.

IOTA (Α. V. 'Yot'), the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (ι); corresponding to the Hebrew jod (י) and the Syriac juth (ܝܬܐ), and employed metaphorically to express the minutest trifle. This is, in fact, one of several metaphors derived from the alphabet—as when alpha, the first letter, and omega, the last, are employed to express the beginning and the end. We are not to suppose, however, that this proverb was exclusively apposite in the Greek language. The same practical allusion equally existed in Hebrew, some curious examples of which may be seen in Wetstein and Lightfoot. [Jor.]-J. K.

IPHEDEIAH (יִפְדִּיָּה, Yiph'd'yah; Sept. Ἰφεδαίας; Alex. Ἰφεδαία), a Benjamite of the family of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 25), and himself the head of a branch or clan of that family. He, with the other chiefs of the family, resided at Jerusalem (ver. 28).

IRA (עִירָא). There seem to have been as many as three different individuals connected with David who were known by this name. They occur in the following order in Samuel:—

1. (Sept. Ἰράς; Alex. Εἰράς). 'Ira the Jairite' (2 Sam. xx. 26), described in the A. V. as 'a chief ruler about David.' [JAIRITE.]

2. 'Ira, the son of Ikkeish the Tekoite' (2 Sam. xxiii. 26, Ἰράς; Alex. Εἰράς; 1 Chron. xi. 28, Ἰρά; Alex. Ὀράς). His name occurs as sixth among David's guard of 'thirty-seven in all'; also as sixth among the twelve captains appointed to the monthly course of service (1 Chron. xxvii. 9, Ὀδούλας; Alex. Εἰρά).

3. 'Ira the Ithrite,' also one of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 38, Ἰράς; Alex. Εἰράς; 1 Chron. xi. 40, Ἰρά; Alex. Ἰράς). Some are of opinion that this Ira was identical with the first mentioned; but when the names occur so distinctly one after the other in the Bible narrative, we incline to the belief that there were three individuals bearing the name of Ira.—W. J. C.

IRAM (עִירָם; LXX. Alex. Ἰράμ; Vat. Ζαφωῖς; Vulg. Hiram). The personal or territorial designation of one of the Edomite chiefs or alluphim (אַלְלֻפִּים, 'phylarchs'; in A. V. 'dukes'; Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chron. i. 54). In the genealogy of Esau, contained in Gen. xxxvi, we have, after the names of his wives and children, a list of the alluphim of the Edomite tribes. These are given in the following order: in vers. 15, 16, the alluphim, seven in number, who sprang from Eliphaz, the son of Esau, by his wife Adah; in ver. 17 the alluphim, four in number, who sprang from Reuel, the son of Esau, by his wife Bashemath; and in ver. 18 we have, as three additional alluphim, the three sons of Esau by his wife Aholibamah. The genealogy of Esau is then interrupted for the purpose of giving that of Seir the Horite, from whom Aholibamah was descended. After this digression we have, in vers. 31-39, a list of 'the kings who reigned in Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel'; and then follows, in vers. 40-43, another list of Edomite alluphim. It is in this that the name Iram occurs. The position of this latter list has given rise to various opinions respecting it. By some it is regarded as a list of chiefs who exercised either in succession or contemporaneously the supreme authority after the kingly power had been overthrown. There is, however, no evidence that in the time of Moses kings had ceased to reign in Edom; on the contrary, it is clear from Num. xx. 14 that there was still a king of Edom. By others it is taken to be a list of the chiefs who were descended from the three sons of Esau mentioned in ver. 18, just as those who are mentioned in vers. 15-17 were descended from the two elder sons of Esau. It is an objection to this opinion that these three sons of Esau are themselves termed alluphim, and that this is not the case with their two elder brothers. A third, and more probable opinion, is that the list in vers. 40-43 gives, not the personal, but the territorial designations of the Edomite chiefs. This is confirmed by the fact that two of the names in the list, namely Timnah and Aholibamah are feminine nouns, and still further by the statement made at the beginning of the passage, 'these are the names of the princes (alluphim) of Esau according to their families and places, after their names'; and by that with which it concludes—'these are the princes (alluphim) of Edom, according to their habitations.' If it be alleged that the personal names given in vers. 15-18 are fourteen in number, but that the territorial names are eleven only, the objection may be met by the supposition that some of the names have been accidentally omitted from the latter list—an hypothesis which derives some support from the peculiar reading of the Vatican MS., which may possibly have preserved one of the omitted names.—S. N.

IR-HAHERES. In Isaiah xix. 18 the words הָרָס עִיר are rendered 'City of destruction,' though, as is suggested in the margin of the A. V., they might be taken as the proper name of a city of Egypt. The meaning of the verse is very obscure, and has been variously interpreted. Some maintain that the prophet refers to five great and noted cities of Egypt, when he says, 'In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan'; but they cannot agree as to what cities these are. Others suppose that by five a round number is meant; while others think that some proportional number is referred to—five out of 20,000, or five out of 1000. Calvin interprets the passage as meaning five out of six—five professing the true religion, and one rejecting it. That one is hence called 'City of destruction,' which is not its proper name, but a description indicative of its doom. Instead of הָרָס, however, a number of ancient MSS. read הָרָם, which signifies 'the sun.' This reading is supported by the version of Symmachus, which has πόλις ἡλίου, and by the Vulgate, civitas solis. Hence some have supposed that Ir-haheres is a proper name, and equivalent to Heliopolis, the famous city of Lower Egypt, called On in Gen. xli. 45, and Beth-shemesh ('City of the Sun') in Jer. xliii. 13. All this, however, is mere conjecture. Jerome supposes הָרָס to be equivalent to חֶרֶס, 'a potsherd,' and to be a name of the town called by the Greeks Ὀστρακίνη ('earthen'). Others suppose that reference is made to Tahpanes, the brick-kilns of which are mentioned by Jeremiah (xliii. 9; Alexander on Is. xix. 18; Jerome, ad loc.) Gesenius says, 'From the Arabic usage of حرس, 'to defend,' 'to preserve,' the clause may be rendered, 'One shall be called a city preserved,' that is, 'one of the five cities shall be preserved' (Comment. ad loc.) Several other interpretations have been given of the passage, but they are too fanciful to be worth recording. The most natural meaning is that of Calvin, who follows the reading הָרָס, and the ordinary signification of the word, making it a descriptive title, and not a proper name. The prophecy of the whole verse would thus express the idea, that for one town of Egypt which should perish in unbelief, five should pro-less the true faith, and swear fealty to the Lord. The simplicity of this interpretation, and its agreement with the scope of the whole passage as a prophetic picture of the changes in Egypt, serve to commend the common reading as the true one (Alexander, l. c.)—J. L. P.

IR-HATTEMARIM, 'The city of palm trees' (עִיר הַתְּמָרִים; ἰρὸς ταννῶν), a name given to JERICHO (Judg. i. 16; Deut. xxxiv. 3) in consequence of the number of palm trees which at one time grew on the rich plain round it. It is a remarkable fact that not a single palm exists there now.—J. L. P.

IR-NAHASH (עִיר נָחָשׁ, 'City of Serpents'; ἰρὸς Νᾱῆς; Urbs Naas). In 1 Chron. iv. 12 we read that Eshton of the tribe of Judah 'begat Tehinnah the father of Ir-nahash,' which means that Tehinnah occupied the ancient town of Ir-nahash. Its situation is not indicated, and the place is not again mentioned in the Bible. Van de Velde says, that about two miles east of Beit Jibrin, on the road to Hebron, is a village with some ancient ruins called Deir Nakhas, and this he would identify with Ir-nahash (Memoir, p. 322); but it is mere conjecture. We have no data by which to fix the locality.—J. L. P.

IRON. [BARZEL]

IRPEEL (יִרְפֵּאל, 'God restores'; Sept. Alex. Ἰερφαήλ; Jarephel), an ancient town of Benjamin, apparently situated on the mountain ridge north of Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 27). The site is unknown.—J. L. P.

IR-SHEMESH (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'City of the Sun'; ἰρὸς Σαμμαῖς; Alex. ἰρὸς Σαμῆς; Hirsemes), a city of Dan, near Zorah and Eshtaol (Josh. xix. 41), and doubtless identical with BETH-SHEMESH ('House of the Sun').—J. L. P.

ISAAC (יִצְחָק, or יִשְׁחָק, as it occurs four times in the poetical books, viz., Ps. cv. 9; Jer. xxxiii. 26; Amos vii. 9, 16—in the last two cases being put poetically for the whole nation of Israel; LXX. Ἰσαὰκ, laughter, sporting), son of Abraham and Sarah, and child of promise, born when his father was one hundred, and his mother ninety years of age (Gen. xxi. 1-7). To the etymology of the name there is reference in Gen. xvii. 17, 19; xviii. 12; xxi. 6. There need be no dispute as to which of these passages the import of the name refers; it includes a reference to them all, besides according with, and expressing the happy, cheerful disposition of the bearer, and suggesting the relation in which he stood, as the seed of Abraham, the channel of the promised blessing, and the type of Him who is pre-eminently THE SEED, whose birth has put laughter into the hearts of myriads of our race.

When he was eight days old he received circumcision, and was thus received into the covenant made with his father; while his mother's sceptical laughter was turned into triumphant exultation and joy in God (Gen. xxi. 4-7). 'And the child grew and was weaned' (in his third year), upon which occasion Abraham made a 'great feast' to celebrate the glad event; when Sarah saw Ishmael, the son of the Egyptian, 'mocking,' as the A. V. has it, and therefore resolved that Ishmael should be 'cast out,' that he might not 'inherit' with her son Isaac. It is generally supposed that Paul refers to this, when he says, that he who was born after the flesh persecuted 'him that was born after the spirit' (Gal. iv. 29). But we question the correctness of the translation, 'mocking,' in Genesis, and, of course, the fact of Paul's reference to it. יִצְחָק does not mean to insult, Gen. xxxix. 14, where it relates 'ad lusus venereos' (Ges. Thes.); nor to pay idolatrous worship, Exod. xxxii. 6, where it expresses idolatrous sports in the form of dance and song; nor to fight, 2 Sam. ii. 14, where, to sport* covers the real object contemplated by Abner. Gesenius seems to take the right view: 'Vidit Sarah filium Hagaris יִצְחָק, ludentem, i.e., exultantem, saltantem—Convivium enim Pater instituerat (com. 8) in quo filiolus saltando novam gratiam inibat a patre. Quare novæ invidia et zelotypia ita resuscitata est, uti pueri matrisque expulsionem a marito flagitaret (com. 10).' He adds, 'Male LXX. et Vulg. addunt: ludentem cum Isaac filio suo; in eo enim causa odii recandescentis esse non potuit; et ridicule Hebræi pueros faciunt de hereditate futura inter se disceptantes' (Thes. 1163). Paul must, therefore, have had in view some unrecorded fact, traditionally handed down, when he represented the son of Hagar as persecuting Isaac. It may be added, that it is very unlikely that the verb יִצְחָק should be used in a sense so different from that which it has twice before in the same chapter and in several preceding chapters.

What effect the companionship of the wild and wayward Ishmael might have had on Isaac it is not easy to say; but his expulsion was, no doubt, ordered by God for the good of the child of promise, and most probably saved him from many an annoyance and sorrow. Freed from such evil influence, the child grew up under the nurturing care of his fond parents, mild and gentle, loving and beloved. In his twenty-fifth year the most notable circumstance of his life occurred to him. Jehovah, resolving to test the faith of Abraham, and exhibit it as a pattern to all generations, commanded him to take his son, the son of his love, Isaac, to the land of Moriah, and offer him up as a burnt-offering† upon a mountain by and by to be shown him

* 'De lusu puerorum se invicem tentantium, quid vires valeant' (Furst).

† Kurtz maintains that the basis for this trial of Abraham was laid in the state of mind produced in him by beholding the Canaanitish human sacrifices around him. His words are: 'These Canaanitish sacrifices of children, and the readiness with which the heathen around him offered them, must have excited in Abraham a contest of thoughts. . . and induced him to examine himself whether he also were capable of sufficient renunciation and self-denial to do, if his God demanded it, what the heathen around him were doing. But if this question was raised in the heart of Abraham, it must also have been brought to a definite settlement through some outward fact. Such was the basis for the demand of God so far as Abraham was concerned, and such the educational motive for his trial. The obedience of Abraham's faith must, in energy and entireness, not lag behind that which the religion of nature demanded and obtained from its profes

(ver. 22). Not hesitating for a moment, nor staggered by the imposition of a service so severe and unnatural, and although pierced through the heart with sorrow, Abraham directly set out to fulfil the Divine command, accompanied by two servants and his son, and in full confidence that God, who had quickened Sarah's womb, would quicken his son when slain, and raise him from the dead (Heb. xi. 19). Nothing but a clear command from God could have suggested such a service. 'A craving to please, or propitiate, or communicate with the powers above' by surrendering 'an object near and dear' to one, which Canon Stanley erroneously says is the 'source of all sacrifice,' and to which he attributes Abraham's conduct in the present case, could never have led to such an act. The idea is wholly improbable and irrational (Lectures on the Hist. of the J. Ch., p. 47).

As they drew near to the place of sacrifice, Isaac bearing the wood, and Abraham the fire and the knife, the former said to his father, 'behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering?'—words which must have pierced like a sword through the father's heart; replying to which he uttered an unconscious prophecy: 'My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering.' Arrived at the place,* Abraham built an altar, arranged the wood, and bound his son, to whom no doubt he had before this communicated the divine command, and who, unresistingly submitted to the will of his father, and of his father's God. But when the patriarch was in the very act of stretching forth his hand to complete the solemn, awful act, the voice of the 'Angel of the Lord' reached his ear, forbidding the deed, and accepting the obedient, submissive will instead. A ram caught by its branching horns in a thicket, and thus providentially furnished, served as a substitute. But, virtually, the sacrifice was consummated. The obedience of the father, and the submission of the son concurred in it—the actual death of the sors. Abraham must be ready to do for his God what the nations around him were capable of doing for their false gods. In every respect Abraham, as the hero of faith, is to out-distance all others in self-denial' (Hist. of the O. Cov., i. 269). Objectively, the transaction was intended to recognise the element of truth in human sacrifices, while condemning the sacrifices themselves (pp. 269, 270).

It were at once tedious and unprofitable even to catalogue the various, for the most part, absurd theories of especially German theologians respecting the sacrifice of Isaac.

* What place was this? Moriah, on which the Temple was afterwards built, or Mount Gerizim? Stanley is in favour of the latter (see S. and P., 250-252, 3d ed.). The Samaritans read Moreh for Moriah (Gen. xxii.). Kurtz, however, successfully defends the more usual view (see Hist. of the O. Cov., i. 270-272). Stanley records the following interesting Samaritan tradition: 'Isaac was offered on Ar-Gerizim. Abraham said, 'Let us go up and sacrifice on the mountain.' He took out a rope to fasten his son; but Isaac said, 'No: I will lie still.' Thrice the knife refused to cut. Then God from heaven called to Gabriel, 'Go down and save Isaac or I will destroy thee from among the angels.' From the seventh heaven Gabriel called, and pointed to the ram. The place of the ram's capture is still shewn near the holy place.'

victim was neither necessary, nor desired by God. An example of faith and self-sacrifice was furnished to the world, which still continues, and shall, to the end of time, continue to exert a blessed influence, and teach mankind that their best and dearest are to be surrendered unto God whenever he demands them. At the same time a check was given to human sacrifices, which are here most strikingly shewn not to be pleasing to God, but, on the contrary, abhorrent to his will. 'Human sacrifice which was in outward form nearest to the offering of Isaac was, in fact and in spirit, condemned and repudiated by it' (Stanley's J. Ch., p. 51). Isaac became by this transaction pre-eminently a type of the Messiah. In the surrender by the father of his 'only son,' the concurrence of the son's will with the father's, the sacrificial death which virtually took place, and the resurrection from the dead, whence Abraham received his son 'in figure' (Heb. xi. 19) are all points of analogy which cannot be overlooked.*

When Isaac had reached the age of forty years, Abraham, disliking the daughters of Canaan, sent his most trusted servant to Mesopotamia to take from thence of his own kindred a wife for his son (Gen. xxiv.) This mission having, by the guidance of Jehovah, proved successful, the servant immediately returned home with the bride, and fell in with Isaac, who, in accordance with his reflective disposition, had gone out into the fields 'at eventide' to meditate. Isaac having heard from the servant the story of his wonderful success, received Rebecca as a gift from God, 'and brought her to his mother Sarah's tent, and she became his wife, and he loved her, and was comforted after his mother's death.' As Kalisch remarks, after three years lonely sorrow for his loved mother, joy for the first time entered his heart. This simple record brings before us, very beautifully, the domestic character and loving disposition of Isaac.

The sons which Abraham had by Keturah he sent away with appropriate gifts from his son Isaac, sometime after which he died, when Isaac and Ishmael united in burying him in the family tomb.

Isaac was forty years old when he married Rebecca, who, to his great grief, was barren; but he, although the seed through whom Abraham's posterity was to be multiplied as the stars of heaven, and although he knew the Divine purpose could not be frustrated, yet had recourse to prayer for the fulfilment of the promise, and the 'Lord was entreated of him,' and Rebecca bore him two sons at a birth (Esau and Jacob), when he was in the sixtieth year of his age. Of these Esau, the open, ingenuous, brave, impulsive boy, was, naturally, his father's favourite.

Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi, but a famine drove him unto Gerar (ch. xxvi.), God appearing to him and forbidding him to go down into Egypt, and renewing to him the covenant promise given originally to Abraham. While here he fell into the great error and sin into which his father had fallen twice,—the sin of denying his wife, and saying that she was his sister, through fear of suffering for her sake. There is no improbability, as has been asserted, that the same sort of event should happen in rude times at different intervals; and, therefore, no reason for maintaining that these events have the same historical basis, and are, in fact, the same event differently represented. Neither is it an unfair assumption that Abimelech was the common title of the kings of Gerar, as Pharaoh was of the kings of Egypt, or that it may have been the proper name of several kings in succession, as George has been of several English kings. Abimelech discovered the cheat practised by Isaac. From a window, which probably overlooked the courts of the surrounding houses, he saw Isaac 'sporting,' פִּינְיָן,* with Rebecca his wife, in a way that plainly indicated the relationship between them; and having called him severely reproved him for his falsehood, and afterwards charged his people respecting them. Isaac's excuse was that he thought 'the fear of God' was 'not in the place'; but the real cause was, the failure of his own trust in the gracious guardian care of Jehovah.

* Several Greek myths have been compared with this narrative, ex. gr., the story of Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, and that of Athamas and Phrixus; but this is mere trifling. The similarity exists only in one or two outward circumstances; the narratives are, in all essential particulars, unlike (see Kalisch).

While in Gerar his prosperity was so great that the Philistines envied him; and Abimelech requested him to depart from them. He, therefore, left the city and dwelt in the country. But even there he was not free from annoyance. Having digged wells, the herdsmen of Gerar contended for them; and in accordance with his pacific temper, he yielded them up, one after another, rather than live in contention, till at length his servants digged one for which no one contended, which, from that circumstance, he called Rehoboth = room; 'for now,' saith he, 'the Lord hath made room for us' (vers. 17-23). But Abimelech, feeling that God was with him, visited him, in company with Ahuzzath, and Phichol the chief captain of his army, and entered into a covenant-oath with him of mutual peace and friendship. On the day this covenant was ratified, Isaac's servants having found water came and told him of it; when he, in commemoration of the event which had just occurred, called the well Beer-Sheba—the well of the oath.

The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing of his sons (ch. xxvii.). When old and dim of sight (which fails much sooner in eastern countries than in Europe), supposing that the time of his departure was at hand, he called for his beloved son Esau, and sent him to 'take some venison' for him, and to make his favourite 'savoury meat,' that he might eat and 'bless' him before his death. Esau prepared to obey his father's will, and set forth to the field; but through the deceptions stratagem of Rebecca the 'savoury meat' was provided before Esau's return; and Jacob, disguised so as to resemble his hairy brother, imposed on his father, and obtained the blessing. Yet, on the discovery of the cheat, when Esau brought into his father the dish he had prepared, Isaac, remembering no doubt the prediction that 'the elder should serve the younger,' and convinced that God intended the blessing for Jacob, deeply agitated though he was, would not, perhaps rather could not, reverse the solemn words he had uttered, but bestowed an inferior blessing on Esau.†

There is little ground for founding on this narrative a criticism adverse to Isaac, as if he had degenerated very much from his former self, because of his seeming to lay so much stress on the 'savoury meat' he requested of his son. Such a longing in an old man was innocent enough, and indicated nothing of a spirit of self-indulgence. It was an extraordinary case, too, and Kalisch sets it in its true light: 'The venison is evidently like a sacrifice offered by the recipient of the blessing, and ratifying the proceedings; and hence Jacob killed and prepared two kids of the goats (ver. 9), whereas, for an ordinary meal, one would have been more than sufficient; it imparted to the ceremony, in certain respects, the character of a covenant (comp. xxi. 27-30; xxvi. 30; Exod. xii. 2; xxiv. 5-11, etc.); the one party shewed ready obedience and sincere affection, while the other accepted the gift, and granted in return, the whole store of happiness he was able to bequeath. Thus the meal which Isaac required has a double meaning, both connected with the internal organism of the book' (Com. on Gen. xxvii. 1-4).

Isaac lived after this forty or fifty years in complete privacy, and died in Hebron at the advanced age of 180 years, and was buried by his sons Esau and Jacob in the cave of Machpelah.

The character of Isaac may be summed up in the words of Kalisch: 'Isaac was the worthy offspring of the chosen patriarch. He ever displayed imperturbable harmony of soul, unmoved by the greatest and dearest sacrifices; his mind was, by nature, calm and placid; modest and reserved; he was susceptible of that happiness which flows from sentiment; his heart was warm and sensitive; his piety internal and unostentatious; he inclined to reflection and prayer; his affections were strong without impetuosity; his impressions profound without exuberance. His destinies corresponded with his character. They form the exact medium between the history of Abraham and that of Jacob. He spent his life without the deeds of the one and the sufferings of the other; he was not like either, compelled to distant wanderings; after the grand trial of his youth, the course of his life was, on the whole, calm and even. Without labour or care he inherited a large fortune, while both his father and his son acquired property but gradually, and the latter not without laborious exertion; he obtained a pious and beautiful wife without the least personal effort, by the care of a provident father and a faithful servant, whereas Jacob had, for the same purpose, not only to undertake a perilous journey, but to submit to a long and toilsome servitude; and though we shall soon have occasion to shew many parallels in the destinies of Isaac and Abraham, the history of the former exhibits a certain pause in the progress of the narrative; it contains few new elements, and advances but little the Hebrew theocracy; its tendency is rather to secure the old ideas, than to introduce new ones; and its chief interest consists in proving how the enlightenment of Abraham had, by habit and temperament, relates to purely earthly good things. The dew of heaven, the fatness of the earth, plenty of corn and wine, dominion over nations, and lordship over brethren, with a curse to those who cursed, and a blessing to those that blessed him, constituting the portion bestowed on Jacob, who obtained the blessing in its highest form.

* 'De blanditiis maritalibus' (Fürst).

† It is remarkable that the blessing, in both cases, become with Isaac an impulsive feeling; and how the acquirements of the mind had become the property of the heart' (Com. on Gen. xxiv. 62-67).

Many curious legends exist among the Jews and Mohammedans respecting Isaac, such as that he was an angel created before the world, who descended to earth in a human form: that he was one of the three in whom there was no sin, and one of the six over whom the angel of death had no power; and that he was the instituter of evening prayer, as Abraham was of morning, and Jacob of night prayer; but that related by Canon Stanley, in his account of the visit of the Prince of Wales to the patriarchal tomb at Hebron, is the strangest, because of its being so totally out of harmony with the character of the patriarch. It is as follows:—'On requesting to see the tomb of Isaac, we were entreated not to enter.' Asking the reason of this, we were told 'that Abraham was full of loving-kindness,' etc.; but that 'Isaac was proverbially jealous, and it was exceedingly dangerous to provoke him. When Ibrahim Pasha [as conqueror of Palestine] had endeavoured to enter, he was driven out by Isaac, and fell back as if thunderstruck' (Lect. on the Hist. of the J. Ch., pp. 496, 497). ISAIAH (יִשְׁעִיָּה; Sept. 'Isaías). I. Times and circumstances of the Prophet Isaiah.—The heading of this book places the prophet under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and an examination of the prophecies themselves, independently of the heading, leads us to the same chronological results. Chapter vi., in which is related the call of Isaiah, not to his prophetic office, but to a higher degree of it, is thus headed: 'In the year in which king Uzziah died I saw the Lord,' etc. The collection of prophecies is chronologically arranged, and the utterances in the preceding chapters (i. to vi.) belong, for chronological and other reasons, to an earlier period, preceding the last year of the reign of Uzziah, although the utterances in chapters ii. iii. iv. and v. have been erroneously assigned to the reign of Jotham. We have no document which can, with any degree of certainty, or even of probability, be assigned to that reign. We by no means assert that the prophetic ministry of Isaiah was suspended during the reign of Jotham, but merely that then apparently the circumstances of the times did not require Isaiah to utter predictions of importance for all ages of the church. We certainly learn from the examples of Nathan, Elijah, and Elisha, that a powerful prophetic ministrations may be in operation, although the predictions uttered, finding their accomplishment within the times of the prophet, are not preserved for subsequent ages. As, however, the position of affairs was not materially changed under the reign of Jotham, we may say that the first two utterances have a bearing upon that reign also. These two prophecies contain the sum and substance of what Isaiah taught during twenty years of his life. If these prophetic utterances belonging to the reign of Uzziah had not been extant, there would, doubtless, have been written down and preserved similar discourses uttered under the reign of Jotham. As, however, the former utterances were applicable to that reign also, it was unnecessary to preserve such as were of similar import.

The continuation of prophetic authorship, or the writing down of uttered prophecies, depended upon the commencement of new historical developments, such as took place under the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah. Several prophecies in the seventh and following chapters belong to the reign of Ahaz; and most of the subsequent prophecies to the reign of Hezekiah. The prophetic ministry of Isaiah under Hezekiah is also described in an historical section contained in chapters xxxvi.-xxxix. The data which are contained in this section come down to the fifteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah; consequently we are in the possession of historical documents proving that the prophetic ministry of Isaiah was in operation during about forty-seven or fifty years, commencing in the year B.C. 763 or 759, and extending to the year B.C. 713. Of this period, from one to four years belong to the reign of Uzziah, sixteen to the reign of Jotham, sixteen to the reign of Ahaz, and fourteen to the reign of Hezekiah.

Staudlein, Jahn, Bertholdt, and Gesenius, have, in modern times, advanced the opinion that Isaiah lived to a much later period, and that his life extended to the reign of Manasseh, the successor of Hezekiah. For this opinion, the following reasons are adduced:—

1. According to 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, Isaiah wrote the life of King Hezekiah. It would hence appear that he survived that king.

2. We find a tradition current in the Talmud, in the Fathers, and in Oriental literature, that Isaiah suffered martyrdom in the reign of Manasseh, by being sawn asunder. It is thought that an allusion to this tradition is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 37), in the expression they were sawn asunder (ἐπλάθηναι), which seems to harmonise with 2 Kings xxi. 16, 'moreover Manasseh shed innocent blood very much.'

3. The authenticity of the second portion of the prophecies of Isaiah being admitted, the nature of this portion would seem to confirm the idea that its author had lived under Manasseh. The style of the second portion, it is asserted, is so different from that of the first, that they could not well have been composed by the same author, except under the supposition that a considerable time intervened between the composition of the first and second portion. The contents of the latter—such as the complaints respecting gross idolatry, the sacrifice of children to idols, the wickedness of rulers, etc.—seem to be applicable neither to the times of the exile, into which the prophet might have transported himself in the spirit, nor to the period of the pious Hezekiah, but are quite applicable to the reign of Manasseh.

These arguments, however, do not stand a strict scrutiny. The first can only prove that Isaiah survived Hezekiah; but even this does not follow with certainty, because in 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, where Isaiah's biography of Hezekiah is mentioned, the important words 'first and last' are omitted; while in chap. xxvi. 22, we read, 'Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, FIRST AND LAST, did Isaiah, the son of Amoz, write.' If we take into consideration this important omission, we can easily believe that Isaiah died before Hezekiah, although he wrote his biography up to a certain point; more especially if we bear in mind that, according to the books of Kings and Chronicles, the latter years of the reign of Hezekiah were devoid of important events. We certainly find, in all ages of literature, biographies of persons written during their life-time.

We may well suppose that the history of Hezekiah terminated with the glorious aid granted to him in his war with the Assyrians, and with the events immediately consequent upon that war.

In reply to the second argument, we observe, that it is not certain that the word ἐπλάθηναι, they were sawn asunder, is used in Hebrews with reference to Isaiah. The statement in the Fathers, and in Oriental writers, is entirely deduced from the Jewish tradition, which is throughout of so doubtful a character that no conclusive argument can be based upon it.

With regard to the third argument, we remark, that the difference discernible, if we compare the latter with the former portion of Isaiah, can, and ought to be, differently accounted for. Such merely external attempts at explanation, when applied to Holy Writ, always appear unsatisfactory if closely examined. We invariably find that the real cause of the external appearance lies deeper, and in the nature of the subject itself. For instance, the peculiarity of Deuteronomy arises from the special bearing of that book upon the other books of the Pentateuch, and the peculiar style of the Apocalypse arises from its relation to the gospel of St. John. The appeal to such merely external arguments always proceeds from an inability to understand the essence of the matter. In reference to the censures occurring in the latter portion of Isaiah, we observe, that they might also have a bearing upon the corruptions prevalent in former reigns, and that they were not necessarily confined to manifestations of wickedness occurring at the time when they were written down. These censures might also refer to the gross perversions under Ahaz; and it is also unlikely that the personal piety of Hezekiah entirely extinguished all abuses among his people. We certainly do not find that the personal piety of King Josiah had that effect upon all his subjects.

Several other arguments adduced against the opinion that Isaiah died during the reign of Manasseh, are certainly of little weight. For instance, the argumentum e silentio, or the proof derived from the silence of the historical books respecting Isaiah during the reign of Manasseh. This argument is of no importance at all, since, at any rate, the death of Isaiah is nowhere mentioned in the Bible; from which circumstance we infer, that, on account of his advanced age, he had retired from active life.

Of somewhat more weight is the objection that, according to the supposition that Isaiah died under Manasseh, too great an age would be ascribed to the prophet. Although we were to suppose that Isaiah, as well as Jeremiah, was called to the prophetic office at an early age—perhaps in his twentieth year—he, nevertheless, in the fifteenth year of Hezekiah, up to which date we can prove his ministrations by existing documents, would have reached quite or nearly to his seventieth year, which is the usual duration of human life; consequently, at the time of the accession of Manasseh he would have been about eighty-four years old; and if, with the defenders of the tradition, we allow that he exercised the prophetic functions for about seven or eight years during the reign of Manasseh, he must at the period of his martyrdom have attained to the age of ninety-two. This, indeed, is quite possible. The example of the prophet Hosea, who exercised his prophetic calling during sixty years, and that of the priest Jehoiada, who, according to 2 Chron. xxiv. 15, was a hundred and thirty years old when he died, prove the possibility of the age ascribed to Isaiah.

The chief argument against the tradition, however, is contained in the inscription of the book itself. According to this inscription all the prophecies of Isaiah in our collection are included within the period from Uzziah to Hezekiah. Not one of the prophecies which are headed by an inscription of their own is placed after the fifteenth year of Hezekiah; and the internal evidence leads us in none beyond this period. Hence we infer that the prophetic ministry of Isaiah terminated soon after its fullest development, to which it attained during the period of the Assyrian invasion, in the reign of Hezekiah.

According to these statements Isaiah belongs to the cycle of the most ancient prophets whose predictions have been preserved in writing. He was a contemporary of Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, although younger than those prophets, who belonged to the kingdom of Israel. He was likewise a contemporary and co-worker of the prophet Micah in the kingdom of Judah. We infer also from the circumstance that the prophecies of Joel are inserted among the books of the minor prophets before those of Micah, that Isaiah must have been a contemporary of Joel, since the minor prophets are chronologically arranged.

Micah entered upon his prophetic office under the reign of Jotham, consequently somewhat later than Isaiah commenced his prophetic career. Obadiah, who is placed among the minor prophets, after Joel and before Micah, was likewise a contemporary of Isaiah. It is not accidental that Isaiah and all these prophets commence the series of those whose prophetic utterances were written down and preserved. Nor is there any reason to assert that the preceding age was neglectful of the preservation of prophetic literature, although even Ewald, in his Propheten (i. p. 54, Stuttgart, 1840), asserts that beyond the prophetic literature which we possess there lay an earlier, which was more comprehensive. There is, however, no one genuine proof sufficient to evince that there were written prophecies before Isaiah and his contemporaries. Hosea refers (viii. 12), not to earlier prophetic writings, but to the books of Moses. This has been proved by Hengstenberg (Beiträge, part ii. p. 604, seq.) Isaiah ii. and Micah iv. do not rest upon an earlier prophetic production which was lost; but Isaiah rests upon Micah as Jeremiah does upon Obadiah; and it is not the case that both prophets rest upon a third unknown prophet. At the period when these prophets commenced their career, prophetism itself had attained a new epoch, at which a great number of important prophets were ranged beside each other. The affairs of the Israelites became at this period more interwoven with those of the great Asiatic empires, which then began to bring about the threatened judgments of the Lord upon his people. Henceforward, also, the prophetic office was to be conducted on a grander scale. To the prophets it was now assigned to declare and to interpret the judgments of the Lord, in order to render the people conscious as well of his chastising justice as of his preserving mercy. A larger field was now opened to the strictly prophetic office, which consisted in uttering predictions of the future. The admonitions to repentance were now also supported by more powerful motives. The hopes of a coming Messiah were revived. To the worldly power, which threatens destruction to the external theocracy, is henceforth opposed the kingdom of God, destined to conquer and to govern the world through the Messiah. This consolation was offered to those who would otherwise have been driven to despair. Now only was prophetism able to develop its full power and become important for all subsequent ages. This persuasion induced the prophets to write their prophecies, and it caused these documents also to be carefully preserved. The reason why the earlier prophets did not commit their utterances to writing is the same that, with two exceptions, led Isaiah not to write under Uzziah, and to omit writing his utterances under Jotham altogether.

Little is known respecting the circumstances of Isaiah's life. His father's name was Amoz (אֲמוֹז). The fathers of the church confound him with the prophet Amos (אֲמוֹס), because they were unacquainted with Hebrew, and in Greek the two names are spelled alike. The opinion of the Rabbins, that Isaiah was a brother of King Amaziah, rests also on a mere etymological combination. Isaiah resided at Jerusalem, not far from the temple. We learn from chapters vii. and viii. that he was married. Two of his sons are mentioned, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz. These significant names, which he gave to his sons, prove how much Isaiah lived in his vocation. He did not consider his children to belong merely to himself, but rendered them living admonitions to the people. In their names were contained the two chief points of his prophetic utterances: one recalled to mind the severe and inevitable judgment wherewith the Lord was about to visit the world, and especially his people; the other, which signifies 'The remnant shall return,' pointed out the mercy with which the Lord would receive the elect, and with which, in the midst of apparent destruction, he would take care to preserve his people and his kingdom. Isaiah calls his wife נְבִיאָה, prophetess. This indicates that his marriage-life was not in opposition to his vocation, and also that it not only went along with his vocation, but that it was intimately interwoven with it. This name cannot mean the wife of a prophet, but indicates that the prophetess of Isaiah had a prophetic gift, like Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah. The appellation here given denotes the genuineness of their conjugal relation.

Even the dress of the prophet was subservient to his vocation. He wore a garment of hair-cloth or sackcloth (ch. xx. 2). This seems also to have been the costume of Elijah, according to 2 Kings i. 8; and it was the dress of John the Baptist. Heavy sackcloth is, in the Bible, the symbol of repentance (compare Is. xx. 11, 12, and 1 Kings xxi. 27). This costume of the prophets was a sermo propheticus realis, a prophetic preaching by fact. The prophetic preacher comes forward in the form of personified repentance. What he does exhibits to the people what they should do. Before he has opened his lips his external appearance proclaims metavoire, repent.

II. On the Historical Works of Isaiah.—Besides the collection of prophecies which has been preserved to us, Isaiah also wrote two historical works. It was part of the vocation of the prophets to write the history of the kingdom of God, to exhibit in this history the workings of the law of retribution, and to exhort to the true worship of the Lord. History, as written by the prophets, is itself retroverted prophecy, and, as such, offers rich materials for prophecy strictly so-called. Since all the acts of God proceed from his essence, a complete understanding of the past implies also the future; and, vice versa, a complete understanding of the future implies a knowledge of the past. Most of the historical books in the O. T. have been written by prophets. The collectors of the Canon placed most of these books under the head נביאים, prophets; hence, it appears that, even when these historical works were re-modelled by later editors, these editors were themselves prophets. The Chronicles are not placed among the נביאים: we may, therefore, conclude that they were not written by a prophet. But their author constantly indicates that he composed his work from abstracts taken verbatim from historical monographs written by the prophets; consequently the books of Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, are the only historical books of the O. T. which did not originate from prophets.

The first historical work of Isaiah was a biography of King Uzziah (comp. 2 Chron. xxvi. 22), 'Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, write.' The second historical work of Isaiah was a biography of King Hezekiah, which was subsequently inserted in the annals of Judah and Israel. These annals consisted of a series of prophetic monographs, which were received partly entire, partly in abstracts, and are the chief source from which the information contained in the Chronicles is derived. In this work of Isaiah, although its contents were chiefly historical, numerous prophecies were inserted. Hence it is called in 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, חזון ישעיהו, The Vision of Isaiah. In a similar manner the biography of Solomon by Ahijah is called in 2 Chron. ix. 29, 'the prophecy of Ahijah.' The two historical works of Isaiah were lost, together with the annals of Judah and Israel, into which they were embodied. Whatever these annals contained that was of importance for all ages, has been preserved to us by being received into the historical books of the O. T., and the predictions of the most distinguished prophets have been formed into separate collections. After this was effected, less care was taken to preserve the more diffuse annals, which also comprehended many statements, of value only for particular times and places.

III. The integral genuineness of the prophecies of

Isaiah.—The Jewish synagogue, and the Christian church during all ages, have considered it as an undoubted fact that the prophecies which bear the name of Isaiah really originated from that prophet. Even Spinoza did not expressly assert in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (viii. 8), that the book of Isaiah consisted of a collection originating from a variety of authors, although it is usually considered that he maintained this opinion. But in the last quarter of the 18th century this prevailing conviction appeared to some divines to be inconvenient. In the theology of the natural man it passed as certain, that nature was complete in itself, and that prophecies, as well as miracles, never had occurred, and were even impossible. Whoever is spell-bound within the limits of nature, and has never felt the influence of a supernatural principle upon his own heart, is incapable of understanding the supernatural in history, and feels a lively interest in setting it aside, not only on account of its appearing to him to be strange and awful, but also because supernatural events are facts of accusation against the merely natural man. The assumption of the impossibility of miracles necessarily demanded that the genuineness of the Pentateuch should be rejected; and, in a similar manner, the assumption of the impossibility of prophecy demanded that a great portion of the prophecies of Isaiah should be rejected likewise. Here also the wish was father to the thought, and interest led to the decision of critical questions, the arguments for which were subsequently discovered. All those who attack the integral genuineness of Isaiah agree in considering the book to be an anthology, or gleanings of prophecies, collected after the Babylonian exile, although they differ in their opinions respecting the origin of this collection. Koppe gave gentle hints of this view, which was first explicitly supported by Eichhorn in his Introduction. Eichhorn advances the hypothesis that a collection of Isaian prophecies (which might have been augmented, even before the Babylonian exile, by several not genuine additions) formed the basis of the present anthology, and that the collectors, after the Babylonian exile, considering that the scroll on which they were written did not form a volume proportionate to the size of the three other prophetic scrolls, containing Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and the minor prophets, annexed to the Isaian collection all other oracles at hand whose authors were not known to the editors. In this supposition of the non-identity of date and authorship, most learned men, and lately also Hitzig and Ewald, followed Eichhorn. Gesenius, on the contrary, maintained, in his introduction to Isaiah, that all the non-Isaian prophecies extant in that book originated from one author and were of the same date. Umbreit and Köster on the main point follow Gesenius, considering chapters xl. to lvi. to be a continuous whole, written by a pseudo-Isaiah who lived about the termination of the Babylonian exile. In reference to other portions of the book of Isaiah, the genuineness of which has been questioned, Umbreit expresses himself doubtfully, and Köster assigns them to Isaiah. Gesenius declines to answer the question, how it happened that these portions were ascribed to Isaiah, but Hitzig felt that an answer to it might be expected. He accordingly attempts to explain why such additions were made to Isaiah and not to any of the other prophetic books, by the extraordinary veneration in which Isaiah was held. He says that the great authority of Isaiah occasioned important and distinguished prophecies to be placed in connection with his name. But he himself soon after destroys the force of this assertion by observing, that the great authority of Isaiah was especially owing to those prophecies which were falsely ascribed to him. A considerable degree of suspicion must, however, attach to the boasted certainty of such critical investigations, if we notice how widely these learned men differ in defining what is of Isaian origin and what is not, although they are all linked together by the same fundamental tendency and interest. There are very few portions in the whole collection whose genuineness has not been called in question by some one or other of the various impugnors. Almost every part has been attacked either by Dæderlein, or by Eichhorn (who, especially in a later work entitled Die Hebräischen Propheten, Göttingen 1816 to 1819, goes farther than all the others), or by Justi (who, among the earlier adversaries of the integral genuineness of Isaiah, uses, in his Vermischte Schriften (vols. i. and ii.), the most comprehensive, and, apparently, the best grounded arguments), or by Paulus, Rosenmüller, Bauer, Bertholdt, De Wette, Gesenius, Hitzig, Ewald, Umbreit, or others. The only portions left to Isaiah are chap. i. 3-9, xvii., xv., xxviii., xxxi., and xxxiii. All the other chapters are defended by some and rejected by others; they are also referred to widely different dates. In the most modern criticism, however, we observe an inclination again to extend the sphere of Isaian genuineness as much as the dogmatic principle and system of the critics will allow. Modern criticism is inclined to admit the genuineness of chaps. i. to xxiii., with the only exception of the two prophecies against Babylon in chaps. xiii. and xiv., and in chap. xxi. 1-10. Chaps. xxviii.-xxxiii. are allowed to be Isaian by Ewald, Umbreit, and others.

Divines, who were not linked to these critics by the same dogmatical interest, undertook to defend the integrity of Isaiah, as Hensler, Jesaias neu übersetzt, 1788; Piper, Integritas Jesaie, 1793; Beckhaus, Ueber die Integrität der Prophetischen Schriften, 1796; Jahn, in his Einleitung, who was the most able among the earlier advocates; Dereser, in his Bearbeitung des Jesaias iv. 1; Greve, Vaticinia Jesaie, Amsterdam 1810. All these works have at present only an historical value, because they have been surpassed by two recent monographies. The first is by Jo. Ulr. Møller, De Authentica Oraculorum Jesaie, ch. xl.-lxvi., Copenhagen 1825. Although this work professionally defends only the latter portion of the book of Isaiah, there occur in it many arguments applicable also to the first portion. The standard work on this subject is that of Kleinert, Die Aechtheit des Jesaias, vol. i., Berlin 1829. It is, however, very diffuse, and contains too many hypotheses. The comprehensive work of Schleier, Würdigung der Einwurfe gegen die Alttestamentlichen Weissagungen im Jesaias, chaps. xiii. and xiv., of course refers more especially to these chapters, but indirectly refers also to all the other portions whose authenticity has been attacked. Since the objections against the various parts of Isaiah are all of the same character, it is very inconsistent in Köster, in his work Die Propheten des alten Testaments, to defend, in page 102, the genuineness of chaps. xiii., xiv., and xxi.; but nevertheless, in pages 117 and 297, to ascribe chaps. xl.-lxvi. to a pseudo-Isaiah.

After this survey of the present state of the inquiry, we proceed to furnish, first, the external arguments for the integral genuineness of Isaiah.

1. The most ancient testimony in favour of Isaiah's being the author of all the portions of the collection which bears his name, is contained in the heading of the whole (i. 1), 'The vision of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, kings of Judah.' It is here clearly stated that Isaiah was the author of the following prophecies, uttered during the reign of four successive kings. This inscription is of great importance, even if it originated not from Isaiah, but from a later compiler. If we adopt the latest date at which this compilation could have been made, we must fix it at the time of its reception into the canon in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah. Consequently the compiler could not be separated by many years from the pseudo-Isaiah, who is said to have prophesied just before Babylon was conquered, or who, according to most critics, wrote even after the fall of Babylon. It is not credible that a compiler living so near the times of the author, should have erroneously ascribed these prophecies to Isaiah, who lived so much earlier, especially if we bear in mind that this so-called pseudo-Isaiah must have been a very remarkable person in an age so devoid of the prophetic spirit as that in which he is said to have lived.

It is still less credible that a pseudo-Isaiah should himself have fraudulently ascribed his prophecies to Isaiah. None of the adversaries of the genuineness of the book make such an assertion.

If the compiler lived before the exile, the inscription appears to be of still greater importance. That the collection was made so early is very likely, from the circumstance that Jeremiah and other prophets apparently made use of the prophecies of Isaiah. This fact indicates that the prophecies of Isaiah early excited a lively interest, and that the compiler must have lived at a period earlier than that which is ascribed to the pseudo-Isaiah himself. From all this we infer that the compiler lived before the exile. The adversaries themselves felt the weight of this argument. They, therefore, attempted to remove it by various hypotheses, which received a semblance of probability from the circumstance that even the considerate Vitringa had called in question the genuineness of the heading. Vitringa conjectured that this heading belonged originally to the first chapter alone. He further conjectured that it originally contained only the words, prophecy of Isaiah, the son of Amos, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem. The following words, he says, were added by the compiler, who enlarged the particular inscription of the first chapter to a general one of the whole collection. According to Vitringa the inscription does not suit the whole book, the contents of which are not confined to Judah and Jerusalem alone. This had been felt even by Kimchi, who, anticipating the objection, observes, quæcunque contra gentes profert, ea omnia propter Judam dicit. Whatsoever Isaiah utters against the nations, he says on account of Judah. Judah and Jerusalem are the chief subject, and, in a certain sense, the only subject of prophecy. There is no prophecy concerning other nations without a bearing upon the covenant-people. If this bearing should be wanting in any portion of prophecy, that portion would be a piece of divination and soothsaying. No prophet against foreign nations prophesied concerning them with the view to spread his predictions among them, because the mission of all prophets is to Israel. The predictions against foreign nations are intended to preserve the covenant-people from despair, and to strengthen their faith in the omnipotence and justice of their God. These predictions are intended to annihilate the reliance upon political combinations and human confederacies. They are intended to lead Israel to the question, 'If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?' If this is the punishment of those who are less intimately allied with God, what shall then become of us to whom he has more clearly revealed himself? But they are also intended to indicate the future conversion of the heathen, and to open to the view of the faithful the future glory of the kingdom of God, and its final victory over the kingdoms of this world; and thus to extirpate all narrow-minded nationality. God shall be revealed not only as Jehovah but also as Elohim. His relation to Israel is misunderstood, if that relation is exclusively kept in view without any regard to the universe. Therefore the whole collection is justly entitled Prophecies concerning Judah and Jerusalem. No matter whether this inscription originated from Isaiah himself or from an ancient compiler. That the word נביות means not merely a vision, but also a collection of visions and prophecies, may be learned from 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, and Nahum i. 1. It means a collection of prophecies and visions united like a picture in an historical frame (comp. Jer. xiv. 14), although it may also denote one separate prophecy, as in Obadiah, ver. 1. נביות has no plural (comp. Hitzig's Commentary on ch. i. 1; Ewald, Propheten i., p. 59).

The inscription in ch. i. 1 has a general bearing upon the whole collection. Then follows the first portion, which contains, as it were, the general prophetic programme. Thereupon follows a series of prophecies directly bearing upon Judah and Jerusalem, commencing again with a particular heading (ii. 1). To this succeeds a series of prophecies indirectly bearing upon Judah and Jerusalem, but directly upon foreign nations. The first of this series has again its own heading (xiii. 1).

Gesenius, advancing in the direction to which Vitringa had pointed, although he grants the integrity of ch. i. 1, nevertheless maintains that this heading belonged originally only to chaps. i.-xii., in which were contained genuine prophecies of Isaiah. To this collection, he asserts, were afterwards subjoined the anthologies contained in the following chapters, and the heading was then misunderstood as applying to the whole volume. This opinion is more inconsistent than that of Vitringa, since there occur in the first twelve chapters two prophecies against foreign nations; one against the Assyrians, in ch. x., and another against Ephraim, in ch. ix.

Vitringa, Gesenius, and their followers, are also refuted by the parallel passage in the heading of Amos, 'The words of Amos, which he saw concerning Israel.' The prophecies of Amos in general are here said to be concerning Israel, although there are, as in Isaiah, several against foreign nations, a series of which stands even at the commencement of the book. To this we may add the similarity of the headings of other prophetic books. For instance, the commencement of Jeremiah, Hosea, Micah, and Zephaniah.

Ewald spoils the argument of Vitringa still more than Gesenius, by extending the original collection to ch. xxiii., and thus introducing within the cycle headed by the inscription, whose genuineness he grants, most of the predictions against foreign nations. Whoever subjoined the subsequent portions to the so-called original collection, did it only because he perceived that these portions could be brought under the general heading. He could only have been induced to make the so-called additions, because he perceived that the heading applied to the whole: consequently neither Gesenius nor Ewald rid themselves of the troublesome authority of ch. i. 1; the words of which have the more weight, since all critics ascribe to the headings of the prophetic books a far greater authority than to the headings of the Psalms, and agree in saying that nothing but the most stringent arguments should induce us to reject the statements contained in these prophetic headings.

2. It cannot be proved that there ever existed any so-called prophetic anthology as has been supposed to exist in the book of Isaiah. We find nothing analogous in the whole range of prophetic literature. It is generally granted that the collections bearing the names of Jeremiah and Ezekiel contain only productions of those authors whose name they bear. In the book of the minor prophets, the property of each is strictly distinguished from the rest by headings. The genuineness of only the second portion of Zechariah has been attacked; and this with very feeble arguments, which have been refuted. De Wette himself has, in the latest editions of his Introduction, confessed that on this point he is vanquished.

But even if it could be proved that the prophecies of Zechariah belonged to two different authors, namely, as Bertholdt and Gesenius suppose, to the two Zechariahs, each of whom happened to be the son of a Berechiah, this identity of names might be considered an inducement for uniting the productions of the two authors in one collection: still this case would not be analogous to what is asserted to be the fact in Isaiah. In Isaiah, it is alleged not only that a series of chapters belonging to a different author were subjoined, commencing about chap. xxiv., but it is affirmed that, even in the first thirty-three chapters, the genuine and spurious portions are intermixed. Before we admit that the compilers proceeded here in a manner so unreasonable, and so contrary to their usual custom, we must expect some cogent proof to be adduced. Gesenius declares that he would not attempt to touch this problem. This is as much as to admit the validity of our objection. Eichhorn supposes that the spurious additions were made because the scroll otherwise would not have been filled up. But this fuga vacui, this abhorrence of a vacuum, does not explain the intermixture of the spurious with the genuine. It does not explain why the additions were not all subjoined at the end of the genuine portions. Doederlein creates for himself a second Isaiah, son of Amos, living at the conclusion of the exile. But even this fiction does not explain why the property of these two prophets was intermixed in spite of their being separated from each other by two centuries, and so intermixed that it is now difficult to say which belongs to which. Augusti supposes that the spurious pieces were added to the genuine on account of their being written entirely in the spirit and style of Isaiah. But in this he seems to contradict himself, since he bases his attack against their authenticity upon the assertion that they differed from Isaiah in spirit and manner. The style of Isaiah was certainly not the style of the age in which the pseudo-Isaiah is said to have lived. Justi supposes that the prediction concerning the Babylonian exile, in ch. xxxix. led to the addition of the whole of the second portion. But this hypothesis is improbable and without analogy, and it does not explain the intermixture of the genuine with the spurious in the first portion.

How untenable all these hypotheses are may be readily perceived from the fact that each of them remained the almost exclusive property of its author, and that each following critic felt himself prompted to discover a new hypothesis, until Gesenius endeavoured to stop them by cutting the Gordian knot. Hitzig, however, again attempted to unloose it, but, as we have already seen, unsuccessfully. Ewald maintains that the compiler never intended that chaps. xl.-lxvi. should belong to Isaiah, and that the last twenty-six chapters had been subjoined merely in order to preserve them the better. But it is untrue that the first portion is unconnected with these chapters. The first portion terminates with the prediction of the Babylonian exile, and the second commences with the announcement of a future redemption from this captivity. Chaps. xl.-lxvi. have no heading of their own; which proves that the compiler annexed them as Isaian, and intended them to be read as such. The so-called spurious portions in the first part of Isaiah were, according to the opinion of Ewald (p. 62), intermixed with the genuine, because the compiler really supposed them to belong to Isaiah. Thus Ewald admits that the intermixed pieces have the testimony of the compiler in favour of their authenticity. To deny that this testimony extends also to the second part, is an arbitrary assumption. Now, if this testimony is granted, we are content. With it we gain this much, that the attacked portions have the presumption of genuineness in their favour, and that, therefore, very substantial reasons are required for denying their Isaian origin. This is all that we want.

3. According to the opinion of several critics, all the spurious portions of Isaiah belong to one and the same author. But it so happens that the portion which is most emphatically declared to be spurious, namely, chaps. xliii. and xlv., bear an inscription which expressly ascribes them to Isaiah. Now, as the internal arguments against the authenticity of all the portions which are said to be spurious are nearly identical, if the opposition to chaps. xliii. and xlv. is given up, it cannot with consistency be maintained against the other portions. This argument serves also as an answer to those who ascribe the portions which they consider spurious to several authors. The contents of these portions are similar. They contain predictions of the fall of Babylon, and of the redemption of Israel from captivity. Whatever proves the genuineness of one of these portions, indirectly proves the others also to be genuine.

4. According to Josephus (Antiq. xi. i. 1, 2) Cyrus was induced by the prophecies of Isaiah respecting him to allow the return of the Jews, and to aid them in rebuilding the temple. The credibility of Josephus, who in regard to facts of ancient history is not always to be relied upon, is here supported by two circumstances. First, the favour shewn by Cyrus to the Jews, which remains inexplicable except by the fact mentioned, in combination with the influence of Daniel. In modern times, the favour of Cyrus to the Jews has been called a prudential measure; but it does not appear what he could either hope or fear from a people so enfeebled as the Jews were at that period. It has been added that Cyrus was favourable to the Jews on account of the similarity between the Persian and the Jewish religion; but there is no historical proof that the Persians, on any other occasion, favoured the Jews on account of their religion. The favours shewn to Nehemiah on behalf of Israel were only personal favours, owing to his position at the Persian court. We allow that all this would be insufficient to prove the correctness of the above statement in Josephus, but it must render us inclined to admit its truth.

The second argument is much stronger: it is, that the statement of Josephus is supported by the edict of Cyrus (Ezra i.). This edict pre-supposes the fact related by Josephus, so that Jahn calls the passage in Josephus a commentary on the first chapter of Ezra, in which we read that Cyrus announces in his edict, that he was commanded by Jehovah to build him a temple in Jerusalem, and that he received all the conquered kingdoms of the earth as a gift from Jehovah. This cannot refer to any other predictions of the prophet, but only to what are called the spurious portions of Isaiah, in which the Lord grants to Cyrus all his future conquests, and appoints him to be the restorer of his temple (comp. xli. 2-4; xlv. 24-28; xlv. 1-13; xlv. 11; xlviii. 13-15). The edict adopts almost the words of these passages (comp. the synopsis in the above-mentioned work of Kleinert, p. 142). In reply to this, our adversaries assert that Cyrus was deceived by pseudo-prophecies forged in the name of Isaiah; but if Cyrus could be deceived in so clumsy a manner, he was not the man that history represents him; and to have committed forgery is so contrary to what was to be expected from the author of chaps. xl.-lxvi., that even the feelings of our opponents revolt at the supposition that the pseudo-Isaiah should have forged vaticinia post eventum in the name of the prophet. Had these prophecies been written, as it is alleged, only in sight of the conquest of Babylon, Cyrus would have been deceived before the eyes of the author, and this could not have been effected without collusion on the part of the author. This collusion would be undeniable, since the author again and again repeats that he was proclaiming unheard-of facts, which were beyond all human calculation.

5. In the books of the prophets who lived after Isaiah, and before the period of the so-called pseudo-Isaiah, we find imitations of those prophecies which have been ascribed to the latter. Since Gesenius has demonstrated that all the portions which have been considered spurious are to be ascribed to only one author, it can be shewn that they were all in existence before the time assigned to the pseudo-Isaiah, although we can produce the imitations of only some of these portions. But even those opponents who ascribe these portions to different authors must grant that their objections are invalidated, if it can be shewn that later prophets have referred to these portions, because the arguments employed against them closely resemble each other: consequently these prophecies stand and fall together. The verbal coincidence between Jeremiah and the so-called pseudo-Isaiah is in this respect most important. Jeremiah frequently makes use of the earlier prophets, and he refers equally, and in the same manner, to the portions of Isaiah whose genuineness has been questioned, as to those which are deemed authentic (comp. Küper, Jeremias librorum sacrorum interpres atque vindex, pp. 132-155). The most striking is the coincidence of Jer. l. i, li., with the predictions against Babylon in Isaiah. Jeremiah here gives to God the appellation קדש ישראל the Hoiyone of Israel, which frequently occurs in Isaiah, especially in the portions whose authenticity is questioned, but is found only three times in the other books of the O. T. Isaiah uses the appellation קדש ישראל with peculiar predilection, because it points out the omnipotent covenant fidelity of the Lord; which was to be considered, especially as it guarantees the truth of the contents of those prophecies which are attacked by our opponents. This circumstance is so striking that Von Coelln and De Wette, on this account, and in contradiction to every argument, declare even the corresponding chapter of Jeremiah to be spurious. This is certainly a desperate stroke, because the chapter is otherwise written in the very characteristic style of that prophet. This desperation, however, gives us the advantage afforded by an involuntary testimony in favour of those portions of Isaiah which have been attacked. The words of Isaiah, in ch. li. 15, 'I am the Lord thy God who moves the sea that its waves roar,' are repeated in Jer. xxxi. 35. The image of the cup of fury in Is. li. 17, is in Jer. xxv. 15-29 transformed into a symbolic act, according to his custom of embodying the imagery of earlier prophets, and especially that of Isaiah. In order to prove that other prophets also made a similar use of Isaiah, we refer to Zephaniah ii. 15, where we find Isaiah's address to Babylon applied to Nineveh, 'Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart I am, and none else beside me,' etc. Zephaniah, living towards the termination of prophetism, has, like Jeremiah, a dependent character, and has here even repeated the characteristic and difficult word דבר. Küper (p. 138) has clearly demonstrated that the passage cannot be original in Zephaniah. The words of Isaiah (lii. 7), 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace,' are repeated by Nahum in ch. i. 15 (ii. 1); and what he adds, 'the wicked shall no more pass through thee,' agrees remarkably with Is. lii. 1, 'for henceforth shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean.' Nahum iii. 7 contains an allusion to Is. li. 19. Beside these references to the portions of Isaiah which are said to be spurious, we find others to the portions which are deemed genuine (comp. for instance, Nahum i. 13, with Is. x. 27).

6. Again, the most ancient production of Jewish literature after the completion of the canon furnishes proof of the integral authenticity of Isaiah. The book of Jesus Sirach, commonly called Ecclesiasticus, was written as early as the 3d century before Christ, as Hug has clearly demonstrated, in opposition to those who place it in the 2d century before Christ. In Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 22-25, Isaiah is thus praised: 'For Hezekiah had done the thing that pleased the Lord, and was strong in the ways of David his father, as Isaiah the prophet, who was great and faithful in his vision, had commanded him. In his time the sun went backward, and he lengthened the king's life. He saw by an excellent spirit what should come to pass at the last, and he comforted them that mourned in Sion. He shewed what should come to pass for ever, and secret things or ever they came.'

This commendation especially refers, as even Gesenius grants, to the disputed portions of the prophet, in which we find predictions of the most distant futurity. The comfort for Zion is found more particularly in the second part of Isaiah, which begins with the words 'Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people.' The author of this second part himself says (xlviii. 3), 'I have declared the former things from the beginning; and they went forth out of my mouth, and I shewed them.' Thus we perceive that Jesus Sirach, the learned scribe, confidently attributes the debated passages to Isaiah, in such a manner as plainly indicates that there was no doubt in his days respecting the integral genuineness of that book, which has the testimony of historical tradition in its favour. Jesus Sirach declares his intention (Ecclus. xlv. l.) to praise the most celebrated men of his nation. The whole tenor of these chapters shews that he does not confine himself to celebrated authors. We therefore say that the praise which he bestows upon Isaiah is not intended for the book personified, but for the person of the prophet. If Jesus Sirach had entertained doubts respecting the genuineness of those prophecies on which, in particular, he bases his praise, he could not have so lauded the prophet.

In the Jewish synagogue the integral genuineness of Isaiah has always been recognised. This general recognition cannot be accounted for except by the power of tradition based upon truth; and it is supported as well by the N. T., in which Isaiah is quoted as the author of the whole collection which bears his name, as also by the express testimony of Josephus, especially in his Antiquities (x. 2. 2, and xi. 1. 1). After such confirmation it would be superfluous to mention the Talmudists.

7. According to the hypothesis of our opponents, the author or authors of the spurious portions wrote at the end of the Babylonian exile. They confess that these portions belong to the finest productions of prophetism. Now it is very remarkable that in the far from scanty historical accounts of this period, considering all circumstances, no mention is made of any prophet to whom we could well ascribe these prophecies. This is the more remarkable, because at that period prophetism was on the wane, and the few prophets who still existed excited on that account the greater attention. What Ewald (p. 57) writes concerning the time about the conclusion of the Babylonian exile, is quite unhistorical. He says, 'In this highly excited period of liberty regained, and of a national church re-established, there were rapidly produced a great number of prophecies, circulated in a thousand pamphlets, many of which were of great poetical beauty.' What Ewald states about a new flood of prophetic writings which then poured forth, is likewise unhistorical. History shews that during the exile prophetism was on the wane. What we read in the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel proves that these prophets were isolated; and from the book of Ezra we learn what was the spiritual condition of the new colony. If we compare with their predecessors the prophets who then prophesied, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, we cannot say much about a revival of the prophetic spirit towards the conclusion of the exile. Everything concurs to shew that the efficiency of prophetism was drawing towards its end. The later the prophets are, the more do they lean upon the earlier prophets; so that we are enabled to trace the gradual transition of prophetism into the learning of scribes. Prophetism dug, as it were, its own grave. The authority which it demands for its earlier productions necessarily caused that the later were dependent upon the earlier; and the more this became the case during the progress of time, the more limited became the field for new productions. It is not only unhistorical, but, according to the condition of the later productions of prophecy, impossible, that about the conclusion of the exile there should have sprung up a fresh prophetic literature of great extent. In this period we hear only the echo of prophecy. That one of the later prophets of whom we possess most, namely Zechariah, leans entirely upon Jeremiah and Ezekiel, as upon his latest predecessors. There is not a vestige of an intervening prophetic literature. The feebleness of our opponents is manifested by their being obliged to have recourse to such unhistorical fictions in order to defend their opinions.

Thus we have seen that we possess a series of external arguments in favour of the integral genuineness of Isaiah. Each of these arguments is of importance, and in their combination they have a weight which could only be counterbalanced by insurmountable difficulties in the contents of these prophecies. We now proceed to shew that there are no such difficulties, and that the internal arguments unite with the external in demonstrating the authenticity of Isaiah as a whole.

1. The portions of Isaiah which have been declared by our opponents to be spurious, are, as we have already said, almost entirely such as contain prophecies of an especially definite character. It is this very definiteness which is brought forward as the chief argument against their genuineness. Those of our adversaries who go farthest assert in downright terms that predictions in the stricter sense, such, namely, as are more than a vague foreboding, are impossible. The more considerate of our opponents express this argument in milder terms, saying, that it was against the usage of the Hebrew prophets to prophesy with so much individuality, or to give to their prophecies so individual a bearing. They say that these prophecies were never anything more than general prophetic descriptions, and that, consequently, where we find a definite reference to historical facts quite beyond the horizon of a human being like Isaiah, we are enabled by analogy to declare those portions of the work in which they occur to be spurious.

Although this assertion is pronounced with great assurance, it is sufficiently refuted by an impartial examination of the prophetic writings. Our opponents have attempted to prove the spuriousness of whatever is in contradiction with this assertion, as, for instance, the book of Daniel; but there still remain a number of prophecies announcing future events with great definiteness. Micah, for example (iv. 8-10), announces the Babylonian exile, and the deliverance from that exile, one hundred and fifty years before its accomplishment, and before the commencement of any hostilities between Babylon and Judah, and even before Babylon was an independent state. All the prophets, commencing with the earliest, predict the coming destruction of their city and temple, and the exile of the people. All the prophets whose predictions refer to the Assyrian invasion, coincide in asserting that the Assyrians would NOT be instrumental in realising these predictions; that Judah should be delivered from those enemies, from whom to be delivered seemed impossible; and this not by Egyptian aid, which seemed to be the least unlikely, but by an immediate intervention of the Lord; and, on the contrary, all the prophets whose predictions refer to the successors of the Assyrians, the Chaldees, unanimously announce that these were to fulfil the ancient prediction, and exhort to resignation to this inevitable fate. These are facts quite beyond human calculation. At the period when the Chaldean empire had reached the summit of its power, Jeremiah not only predicts in general terms its fall, and the destruction of its chief city, but also details particular circumstances connected therewith; for instance, the conquest of the town by the Medes and their allies; the entrance which the enemy effected through the dry bed of the Euphrates, during a night of general revelry and intoxication; the return of the Israelites after the reduction of the town; the utter destruction and desolation of this city, which took place, although not at once, yet certainly in consequence of the first conquest, so that its site can scarcely be shewn with certainty. In general, all those proud ornaments of the ancient world, whose destruction the prophets predicted—Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, Memphis, the chief cities of the Moabites and Ammonites, and many others—have perished, and the nations to whom the prophets threatened annihilation—the Ammonites, Moabites, Philistines, and Idumæans—have entirely disappeared from the stage of history. There is not a single city nor a single people, the fate of which has been at variance with prophecy. All this is not a casual coincidence. The ruins of all these cities, every vestige of the former existence of those once flourishing nations, are loud speaking witnesses, testifying to the futility of the opinion which raises into a fact the subjective wish that prophecy might not exist. Zechariah clearly describes the conquests of Alexander (ix. 1-8). He foretells that the Persian empire, which he specifies by the symbolic name Hadrach, shall be ruined; that Damascus and Hamath shall be conquered; that the bulwarks of the mighty Tyre shall be smitten in the sea, and that the city shall be burned; that Gaza shall lose its king, and that Ashdod shall be peopled with the lowest rabble; and that Jerusalem shall be spared during all these troubles. These prophecies were fulfilled during the expedition of Alexander (comp. Jahn's Einleitung, vol. i. p. 84, sq.; vol. ii. p. 349, sq.). Eichhorn despaired of being able to explain the exact correspondence of the fulfilment with the predictions; he, therefore, in his work, Die Hebräischen Propheten, endeavours to prove that these prophecies were veiled historical descriptions. He has recourse to the most violent operations in order to support this hypothesis; which proves how fully he recognised the agreement of the prophecies with their fulfilment, and that the prophecies are more than general poetical descriptions. The Messianic predictions prove that the prophecies were more than veiled historical descriptions. There is scarcely any fact in Gospel history, from the birth of our Saviour at Bethlehem down to his death, which is unpredicted by a prophetic passage.

Eichhorn's hypothesis is also amply refuted by the unquestioned portion of Isaiah. How can it be explained that Isaiah confidently predicts the destruction of the empire of Israel by the Assyrians, and the preservation of the empire of Judah from these enemies, and that he with certainty knew beforehand that no help would be afforded to Judah from Egypt, that the Assyrians would advance to the gates of Jerusalem, and there be destroyed only by the judgment of the Lord? No human combinations can lead to such results. Savonarola, for instance, was a pious man, and an acute observer; but when he fancied himself to be a prophet, and ventured to predict events which should come to pass, he was immediately refuted by facts (comp. Biographie Savonarola's, von Rudelbach).

If we had nothing of prophetic literature, beside the portions of Isaiah which have been attacked, they alone would afford an ample refutation of our opponents, because they contain in chapter liii. the most remarkable of O. T. prophecies, predicting the sufferings and glory of our Saviour. If it can be proved that this one prophecy necessarily refers to Christ, we can no longer feel tempted to reject other prophecies of Isaiah, on account of their referring too explicitly to some event, like that of the Babylonian exile. As soon as only one genuine prophecy has been proved, the whole argument of our opponents falls to the ground. This argument is also opposed by the authority of Christ and his apostles; and whoever will consistently maintain this opinion must reject the authority of Christ. The prophets are described in the N. T. not as acute politicians, or as poets full of a foreboding genius, but as messengers of God raised by His Spirit above the intellectual sphere of mere man. Christ repeatedly mentions that the events of his own life were also destined to realise the fulfilment of prophecy, saying, 'this must come to pass in order that the Scripture may be fulfilled.' And after his resurrection, he interprets to his disciples the prophecies concerning himself. Peter, speaking of the prophets, says, in his First Epistle (i. 11), 'Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow;' and, in his Second Epistle (i. 21), 'For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost—ὡς πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι.'

Since we have shewn that there are in the Holy Scriptures definite prophecies, the à priori argument of our opponents, who pretend that prophecy is useless, loses its significance. Even if we could not understand the purpose of prophecy, the inquiry respecting its reality should nevertheless be independent of such à priori reasoning, since the cause of our NOT understanding it might be in ourselves. We frequently find, after we have been raised to a higher position, the causes of facts which at an earlier period we could not comprehend. A later age frequently understands what was hidden to the preceding. However, the purpose of definite predictions is not hidden to those who recognise the reality of the divine scheme for human salvation.

There is one truth in the opinion of our opponents. The predictions of the future by the prophets are always on a general basis, by which they are characteristically distinguished from soothsaying. Real prophecy is based upon the idea of God. The acts of God are based upon his essence, and have therefore the character of necessity. The most elevated prerogative of the prophets is that they have possessed themselves of his idea, that they have penetrated into his essence, that they have become conscious of the eternal laws by which the world is governed. For instance, if they demonstrate that sin is the perdition of man, that where the carcase is, the eagles will be assembled, the most important point in this prediction is not the HOW but the WHAT which first by them was clearly communicated to the people of God, and of which the lively remembrance is by them kept up. But if the prophets had merely kept to the THAT, and had never spoken about the HOW, or if, like Savonarola, they had erroneously described this HOW, they would be unfit effectually to teach the THAT to those people who have not yet acquired an independent idea of God. According to human weakness, the knowledge of the FORM is requisite in order to fertilize the knowledge of the ESSENCE, especially in a mission to a people among whom formality so much predominated as among the people of the Old Covenant. The position of the prophets depends upon these circumstances. They had not, like the priests, an external warrant. Therefore Moses (Deut. xviii.) directed them to produce true prophecies as their warrant. According to ver. 22, the true and the false prophet are distinguished by the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of prophecy. This criterion is destroyed by the modern opinion respecting prophetism. Without this warrant, the principal point of prophetic preaching, the doctrine of the Messiah, could not be brought to the knowledge of the people, as being of primary importance. Without this fulfilment the prophets had no answer to those who declared that the hopes raised by them were fantastic and fanatical.

It is true that, according to what we have stated, the necessity of prophecy arises only from the weakness of man. Miracles also are necessary only on account of this weakness. Prophecy is necessary only under certain conditions; but these conditions were fully extant during the period of the ancient Covenant. During the New Covenant human weakness is supported by other and more powerful means, which were wanting during the time of the Old Covenant; especially by the operation of the Spirit of Christ upon the hearts of the faithful; which operation is by far more powerful than that of the Spirit of God during the Old Covenant; consequently, definite predictions can be dispensed with, especially since the faithful of the N. T. derive benefit also from the prophecies granted to the people of the O. T.

The predictions of futurity in the O. T. have also a considerable bearing upon the contemporaries of the prophet. Consequently, they stand not so isolated and unconnected as our opponents assert. The Chaldeans, for instance, who are said to threaten destruction to Israel, were, in the days of Isaiah, already on the stage of history ; and their juvenile power, if compared with the decline of the Assyrians, might lead to the conjecture that they would some time or other supplant the Assyrians in dominion over Asia. Babylon, certainly, was as yet under Assyrian government ; but it was still during the lifetime of the prophet that this city tried to shake off their yoke. This attempt was unsuccessful, but the conditions under which it might succeed at a future period were already in existence. The future exaltation of this city might be foreseen from history, and its future fall from theology. In a pagan nation success is always the forerunner of pride, and all its consequences. And, according to the eternal laws by which God governs the world, an overbearing spirit is the certain forerunner of destruction. The future liberation of Israel might also be theologically foreseen ; and we cannot look upon this prediction as so abrupt as a prediction of the deliverance of other nations would have been, and as, for instance, a false prediction of the deliverance of Moab would have appeared. Even the Pentateuch emphatically informs us that the covenant-people cannot be given up to final perdition, and that mercy is always concealed behind the judgments which befall them.

2. Attempts have been made to demonstrate the spuriousness of several portions from the circumstance that the author takes his position not in the period of Isaiah, but in much later times, namely, those of the exile. It has been said, ' Let it be granted that the prophet had a knowledge of futurity : in that case we cannot suppose that he would predict it otherwise than as future, and he cannot proclaim it as present.' The prophets, however, did not prophesy in a state of calculating reflection, but ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι, ' borne along by the Holy Ghost.' The objects offered themselves to their spiritual vision. On that account they are frequently called seers, to whom futurity appears as present. Even Hebrew grammar has long ago recognised this fact in the terms præterita prophetica. These prophetic præter tenses indicate a time ideally past, in contrast-distinction to the time which is really past. Every chapter of Isaiah furnishes examples of this grammatical fact. Even in the first there is contained a remarkable instance of it. Interpreters frequently went astray, because they misunderstood the nature of prophecy, and took the præterita prophetica as real præterites ; consequently, they could only by some inconsistency escape from Eichhorn's opinion, that the prophecies were veiled historical descriptions. The prophets have futurity always before their eyes. Prophetism, therefore, is subject to the laws of poetry more than to those of history (compare the ingenious remarks on the connection of poetry and prophetism in the work of Steinbeck, Der Dichter ein Seher, Leipzig 1836). Prophetism places us in medias res, or rather the prophet is placed in medias res. The Spirit of God elevates him above the terra firma of common reality, and of common perception. The prophet beholds as connected things externally separated, if they are linked together by their internal character. The prophet beholds what is distant as near, if its hidden basis, although concealed to the eyes of flesh, already exists. This was, for instance, the case with Israel's captivity and deliverance. Neither happened by chance. Both events proceeded from the justice and mercy of God, a living knowledge of which necessarily produced the beholding knowledge of the same. The prophet views things in the light of that God who calls the things that are not as though they were, and to whom the future is present.

3. What the prophet says about what is present to him (namely, about that which appears to him in the form of the present time), is correctly and minutely detailed ; and what he describes as future, are ideal and animated hopes which far exceed terrene reality. Hence our opponents attempt to prove that the present time in those portions which they reject, is not ideal but real ; and that the author was actually an eye-witness of the exile, because, they say, if the prophet merely placed himself in the period of the exile, then this present time would be ideal, and in that case there could be no difference between this ideally present time and the more distant future. But we question this fact most decidedly. The descriptions of the person of Messiah in the second part of Isaiah are far more circumstantial than the descriptions of the person of Cyrus. Of Cyrus these prophecies furnish a very incomplete description. Whoever does not fill up from history what is wanting, obtains a very imperfect idea of Cyrus. But there is sufficient information to show the relation between history and prophecy ; and nothing more was required than that the essence of prophecy should be clear. The form might remain obscure until it was cleared up by its historical fulfilment. The Messiah, on the contrary, is accurately depicted, especially in ch. liii., so that there is scarcely wanting any essential trait. It is quite natural that there should be greater clearness and definiteness here, because the anti-type of redemption stands in a far nearer relation to the ideal than is the case with Cyrus, so that form and essence less diverge.

The assertion that the animated hopes, expressed in the second part of Isaiah, had been very imperfectly fulfilled, proceeds from the erroneous supposition that these hopes were to be entirely fulfilled in the times immediately following the exile. But if we must grant that these prophecies refer both to the deliverance from captivity, and to the time of the Messiah in its whole extent, from the lowliness of Christ to the glorious completion of his kingdom, then the fulfilment is clearly placed before our eyes ; and we may expect that whatever is yet unfulfilled, will, in due time, find its accomplishment. In this hope we are supported by the N. T., and still more by the nature of the matter in question. If the prophecies of Isaiah were nothing but arbitrary predictions on his own external authority, without any internal warrant, one might speak here of an evasion of the difficulty ; but as the matter stands, this objection proves only that those who make it are incapable of comprehending the idea which pervades the whole representation. The entire salvation which the Lord has destined to his people has been placed before the spiritual eye of the prophet. His prediction is not entirely fulfilled in history, so that we could say we have now done with it, but every isolated fulfilment is again a prediction de facto, supporting our hope of the final accomplishment of the whole word of prophecy.

4. Our opponents think that they have proved that a portion of Isaiah is not genuine, if they can show that there occur a few Aramaic words and forms of speech, which they endeavour to explain from the style prevalent in a period later than Isaiah.

That this argument is very feeble even our opponents have granted in instances where it can be adduced with by far greater stringency than in the questioned portions of Isaiah. This appears especially from the example of the Song of Solomon, in which there occur a considerable number of Aramaic words and expressions, said to belong to the later Hebrew style. Bertholdt, Umbreit, and others, base upon this their argument, that the Song of Solomon was written after the Babylonian exile. They even maintain that it could not have been written before that period. On the contrary, the two most recent commentators, Ewald and Doepke, say most decidedly that the Song of Solomon, in spite of its Aramaisms, was written in the days of Solomon.

Hirzel, in his work De Chaldaismi Biblici origine, Leipsic 1830, has contributed considerably to the formation of a correct estimate of this argument. He has proved that in all the books of the O. T., even in the most ancient, there occur a few Chaldaisms. This may be explained by the fact that the patriarchs were surrounded by a population whose language was Chaldee. Such Chaldaisms are especially found in poetical language in which unusual expressions are preferred. Consequently, not a few isolated Chaldaisms, but only their decided prevalence, or a Chaldee tincture of the whole style, can prove that a book has been written after the exile. Nobody can assert that this is the case in those portions of Isaiah whose authenticity has been questioned. Even our opponents grant that the Chaldaisms in this portion are not numerous. After what have erroneously been called Chaldaisms are subtracted, we are led to a striking result, namely, that the unquestionable Chaldaisms are more numerous in the portions of Isaiah of which the genuineness is granted, than in the portions which have been called spurious. Hirzel, an entirely unsuspected witness, mentions in his work De Chaldaismo, p. 9, that there are found only four real Chaldaisms in the whole of Isaiah; and that these all occur in the portions which are declared genuine; namely in vii. 14 (where, however, if the grammatical form is rightly understood, we need not admit a Chaldaeism); xxix. 1; xviii. 7; xxi. 12.

5. The circumstance that the diction in the attacked portions of Isaiah belongs to the first, and not to the second period of the Hebrew language, must render us strongly inclined to admit their authenticity. It has been said that these portions were written during, and even after, the Babylonian exile, when the ancient Hebrew language fell into disuse, and the vanquished people began to adopt the language of their conquerors, and that thus many Chaldaisms penetrated into the works of authors who wrote in ancient Hebrew. Since this is not the case in the attacked portions of Isaiah, granting the assertions of our opponents to be correct, we should be compelled to suppose that their author or authors had intentionally abstained from the language of their times, and purposely imitated the purer diction of former ages. That this is not quite impossible we learn from the prophecies of Haggai, Malachi, and especially from those of Zechariah, which are nearly as free from Chaldaisms as the writings before the exile. But it is improbable, in this case, because the pseudo-

Isaiah is stated to have been in a position very different from that of the prophets just mentioned, who belonged to the newly returned colony. The pseudo-Isaiah has been placed in a position similar to that of the strongly Chaldaizing Ezekiel and Daniel; and even more unfavourably for the attainment of purity of diction, because he had not, like these prophets, spent his youth in Palestine, but is said to have grown up in a country in which the Aramaean language was spoken; consequently, it would have been more difficult for him to write pure Hebrew than for Ezekiel and Daniel. In addition to this it ought to be mentioned that an artificial abstinence from the language of their times occurs only in those prophets who entirely lean upon an earlier prophetic literature; but that union of purity in diction with independence, which is manifest in the attacked portions of Isaiah, is nowhere else to be found.

The force of this argument is still more increased when we observe that the pretended pseudo-Isaiah has, in other respects, the characteristics of the authors before the exile; namely, their clearness of perception, and their freshness and beauty of description. This belongs to him, even according to the opinion of all opponents. These excellences are not quite without example among the writers after the exile, but they occur in none of them in the same degree; not even in Zechariah, who, besides, ought not to be compared with the pseudo-Isaiah, because he does not manifest the same independence, but leans entirely upon the earlier prophets. To these characteristics of the writers before the exile belongs also the scarcity of visions and symbolic actions, and what is connected therewith (because it proceeds likewise from the government of the imagination), the naturalness and correctness of poetical images. What Umbreit says concerning the undisputedly genuine portions of Isaiah fully applies also to the disputed portions: 'Our prophet is more an orator than a symbolic seer. He has subjected the external imagery to the internal government of the word. The few symbols which he exhibits are simple and easy to be understood. In the prophets during and after the exile visions and symbolic actions prevail, and their images frequently bear a grotesque Babylonian impress. Only those authors, after the exile, have not this character, whose style, like that of Haggai and Malachi, does not rise much above prose. A combination of vivacity, originality, and vigour, with naturalness, simplicity, and correctness, is not found in any prophet during and after the exile.' Nothing but very strong arguments could induce us to ascribe to a later period prophecies which rank in language and style with the literary monuments of the earlier period. In all the attacked portions of Isaiah independence and originality are manifest in such a degree, as to make them harmonize not only with the prophets before the exile in general, but especially with the earliest cycle of these prophets. If these portions were spurious, they would form a perfectly isolated exception, which we cannot admit, since, as we have before shewn, the leaning of the later prophets upon the earlier rests upon a deep-seated cause arising from the very nature of prophetism. A prophet forming such an exception would stand, as it were, without the cycle of the prophets. We cannot imagine such an exception.

6. A certain difference of style between the portions called genuine and those called spurious does not prove what our opponents assert. Such a difference may arise from various causes in the productions of one and the same author. It is frequently occasioned by a difference of the subject-matter, and by a difference of mood arising therefrom; for instance, in the prophecies of Jeremiah against foreign nations, the style is more elevated and elastic than in the home-prophecies. How little this difference of style can prove, we may learn by comparing with each other the prophecies which our opponents call genuine; for instance, ch. ix. 7-x. 4. The genuineness of this prophecy is not subject to any doubt, although it has not that swing which we find in many prophecies of the first part. The language has as much ease as that in the second part, with which this piece has several repetitions in common. The difference of style in the prophecies against foreign nations (which predictions are particularly distinguished by sublimity), from that in chapters i.-xii., which are now generally ascribed to Isaiah, appeared to Bertholdt a sufficient ground for assigning the former to another author. But in spite of this difference of style it is, at present, again generally admitted that they belong to one and the same author. It consequently appears that our opponents deem the difference of style alone not a sufficient argument for proving a difference of authorship; but only such a difference as does not arise from a difference of subjects and of moods, especially if this difference occurs in an author whose mind is so richly endowed as that of Isaiah, in whose works the form of the style is produced directly by the subject. Ewald correctly observes (p. 173), 'We cannot state that Isaiah had a peculiar colouring of style. He is neither the especially lyrical, nor the especially elegiacal, nor the especially oratorical, nor the especially admonitory prophet, as, perhaps, Joel, Hosea, or Micah, in whom a particular colouring more predominates. Isaiah is capable of adapting his style to the most different subject, and in this consists his greatness and his most distinguished excellence.'

The chief fault of our opponents is, that they judge without distinction of persons; and here distinction of persons would be proper. They measure the productions of Isaiah with the same measure that is adapted to the productions of less-gifted prophets. Jeremiah, for example, does not change his tone according to the difference of subject so much that it could be mistaken by an experienced Hebraist. Of Isaiah, above all, we might say what Fichte wrote in a letter to a friend in Königsberg: 'Strictly speaking, I have no style, because I have all styles' (Fichte's Leben von seinem Sohne, th. i. p. 196). If we ask how the difference of style depends upon the difference of subject, the answer must be very favourable to Isaiah, in whose book the style does not so much differ according to the so-called genuineness or spuriousness, as rather according to the subjects of the first and second parts. The peculiarities of the second part arise from the subjects treated therein; and from the feelings to which these subjects give rise. Here the prophet addresses not so much the multitude who live around him, as the future people of the Lord, purified by his judgments, who are about to spring from the ἐκλογή, that is, the small number of the elect who were contemporaries of Isaiah. Here he does not speak to a mixed congregation, but to a congregation of brethren whom he comforts. The commencement, 'Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people,' is the theme of the whole. Hence arise the gentleness and tenderness of style, and the frequent repetitions. Comforting love has many words. Hence the addition of many epithets to the name of God, which are so many shields by which the strokes of despair are warded off, and so many bulwarks against the attacks of the visible world which was driving to despair. The sublimity, abruptness, and thunders of the first part find no place here, where the object of Isaiah is not to terrify and to shake stout-hearted sinners, but rather to bring glad tidings to the meek; not to quench the smoking flax, nor to break the bruised reed. But wherever there is a similarity of hearers and of subject, there we meet also a remarkable similarity of style, in both the first and second part; as, for example, in the description of the times of Messiah, and of the punishments, in which (lvi.-lix.) the prophet has the whole nation before his eyes, and in which he addresses the careless sinners by whom he is surrounded.

We attach no importance to the collections of isolated words and expressions which some critics have gleaned from the disputed parts of Isaiah, and which are not found in other portions that are deemed genuine. We might here well apply what Krüger wrote on a similar question in profane history (De authenticis et integritate Anab. Xenophontis, Halle 1824, p. 27): Hoc argumentandi genus perquam lubricum est. Si quid numerus valeret, urgeri posset, quod in his libris amplius quadraginta vocabula leguntur, quæ in reliquis Xenophontis operibus frustra querantur. Si quis propter vocabula alibi ab hoc scriptore vel alia potestate, vel prorsus non usurpata, Anabasin ab eo profectam neget, hac ratione admissa quodvis aliud ejus opus injuria ei tribui, ostendi potest; that is, 'This is a very slippery mode of reasoning. If number were of importance, it might be urged that in these books occur more than forty words for which one searches in vain in the other works of Xenophon. But if it should be denied on account of those words which this author has either employed in a different sense, or has not made use of at all, that the Anabasis was written by him, it could, by the same reasoning, be shewn, that every other work was falsely attributed to him.'

7. We find a number of characteristic peculiarities of style which occur both in what is accounted genuine and what is styled spurious in Isaiah, and which indicate the identity of the author. Certain very peculiar idioms occur again and again in all parts of the book. Two of them are particularly striking. The appellation of God, 'the Holy One of Israel,' occurs with equal frequency in what has been ascribed to Isaiah and in what has been attributed to a pseudo-Isaiah; it is found besides in two passages in which Jeremiah imitates Isaiah, and only three times in the whole of the remainder of the O. T. Another peculiar idiom is that 'to be called' stands constantly for 'to be.' These are phenomena of language which even our opponents do not consider casual; but they say that the later poet imitated Isaiah, or that they originated from the hand of a uniformising editor, who took an active part in modelling the whole. But there cannot be shewn any motive for such interference; and we find nothing analogous to it in the whole of the O. T. Such a supposition cuts away the linguistic ground from under the feet of higher criticism, and deprives it of all power of demonstration. In this manner every linguistic phenomenon may easily be removed, when it is contrary to preconceived opinions. But everything in Isaiah appears so natural, bears so much the impress of originality, is so free from every vestige of patch-work, that no one can conscientiously maintain this hypothesis.

We have still to consider the other conjecture of our opponents. If we had before us a prophet strongly leaning, like Jeremiah and Zechariah, upon preceding prophets, that conjecture might be deemed admissible, in case there were other arguments affording a probability for denying that Isaiah was the author of these portions—a supposition which can here have no place. But here we have a prophet whose independence and originality are acknowledged even by our opponents. In him we cannot think of imitation, especially if we consider his peculiarities in connection with the other peculiar characteristics of Isaiah, and of what has been said to belong to a pseudo-Isaiah; we refer here to the above-mentioned works of Möller and of Kleinert (p. 231, sq.) In both portions of Isaiah there occur a number of words which are scarcely to be found in other places; also a frequent repetition of the same word in the parallel members of a verse. This repetition very seldom occurs in other writers (compare the examples collected by Kleinert, p. 239). Other writers usually employ synonyms in the parallel members of verses. It further belongs to the characteristics of Isaiah to employ words in extraordinary acceptations; for instance, וַיִּשְׂרַח is used contemptuously for brood; אֵיִם, for rabble; שֵׁשׁ, for a shoot. Isaiah also employs extraordinary constructions, and has the peculiar custom of explaining his figurative expressions by directly subjoining the prosaic equivalent. This custom has induced many interpreters to suppose that explanatory glosses have been inserted in Isaiah. Another peculiarity of Isaiah is that he intersperses his prophetic orations with hymns; that he seldom relates visions, strictly so called, and seldom performs symbolic actions; and that he employs figurative expressions quite peculiar to himself, as, for example, pasted-up eyes, for spiritual darkness; morning-red, for approaching happiness; the remnant of olive trees, vineyards, and orchards, for the remnant of the people which have been spared during the judgments of God; rejected tendrils or branches, for enemies who have been slain.

In addition to this we find an almost verbal harmony between entire passages; for instance, the Messianic description commencing xi. 6, compared with lxxv. 25.

IV. The origin of the present Collection, and its arrangement.—No definite account respecting the method pursued in collecting into books the utterances of the Prophets has been handed down to us. Concerning Isaiah, as well as the rest, these accounts are wanting. We do not even know whether he collected his prophecies himself. But we have no decisive argument against this opinion. The argument of Kleinert, in his above-mentioned work (p. 112), is of slight importance. He says, If Isaiah himself had collected his prophecies, there would not be wanting some which are not to be found in the existing book. To this we reply, that it can by no means be proved with any degree of probability that a single prophecy of Isaiah has been lost, the preservation of which would have been of importance to posterity, and which Isaiah himself would have deemed it necessary to preserve. Kleinert appeals to the fact, that there is no prophecy in our collection which can with certainty be ascribed to the days of Jotham; and he thinks it incredible that the prophet, soon after having been consecrated to his office, should have passed full sixteen years without any revelation from God. This, certainly, is unlikely; but it is by no means unlikely that during this time he uttered no prophecy which he thought proper to preserve. Nay, it appears very probable, if we compare the rather general character of chaps. i.-v., the contents of which would apply to the days of Jotham also, since during his reign no considerable changes took place; consequently the prophetic utterances moved in the same sphere with those preserved to us from the reign of Uzziah. Hence it was natural that Isaiah should confine himself to the communication of some important prophetic addresses, which might as well represent the days of Jotham as those of the preceding reign. We must not too closely identify the utterances of the prophets with their writings. Many prophets have spoken much and written nothing. The minor prophets were generally content to write down the quintessence alone of their numerous utterances. Jeremiah likewise, of his numerous addresses under Josiah, gives us only what was most essential.

The critics who suppose that the present book of Isaiah was collected a considerable time after the death of the prophet, and perhaps after the exile, lay especial stress upon the assertion that the historical section in the 36th and following chapters was transcribed from 2 Kings xviii.-xx. This supposition, however, is perfectly unfounded.

According to Ewald (p. 39), the hand of a later compiler betrays itself in the headings. Ewald has not, however, adduced any argument sufficient to prove that Isaiah was not the author of these headings, the enigmatic character of which seems more to befit the author himself than a compiler. The only semblance of an argument is that the heading 'Oracle (better translated burden) concerning Damascus (xvii. 1), does not agree with the prophecy that follows, which refers rather to Samaria. But we should consider that the headings of prophecies against foreign nations are always expressed as concisely as possible, and that it was incompatible with the usual brevity more fully to describe the subject of this prophecy. We should further consider that this prophecy refers to the connection of Damascus with Samaria, in which alliance Damascus was, according to chap. vii., the prevailing power, with which Ephraim stood and fell. If all this is taken into account the above heading will be found to agree with the prophecy. According to the Talmudists, the book of Isaiah was collected by the men of Hezekiah. But this assertion rests merely upon Prov. xxv. 1, where the men of Hezekiah are said to have compiled the Proverbs. The Talmudists do not sufficiently distinguish between what might be and what is. They habitually state bare possibilities as historical facts.

To us it seems impossible that Isaiah left it to others to collect his prophecies into a volume, because we know that he was the author of historical works; and it is not likely that a man accustomed to literary occupation would have left to others to do what he could do much better himself.

Hitzig has of late recognised Isaiah as the collector and arranger of his own prophecies. But he supposes that a number of pieces were inserted at a later period. The chronological arrangement of these prophecies is a strong argument in favour of the opinion that Isaiah himself formed them into a volume. There is no deviation from this arrangement, except in a few instances where prophecies of similar contents are placed together; but there is no interruption which might appear attributable to either accident or ignorance. There is not a single piece in this collection which can satisfactorily be shewn to belong to another place. All the portions, the date of which can be ascertained either by external or internal reasons, stand in the right place. This is generally granted with respect to the first twelve chapters, although many persons erroneously maintain that chap. vi. should stand at the beginning.

Chaps. i.-v. belong to the later years of Uzziah; chap. vi. to the year of his death. What follows next, up to chap. x. 4, belongs to the reign of Ahaz. Chaps. x.-xii. is the first portion appertaining to the reign of Hezekiah. Then follows a series of prophecies against foreign nations, in which, according to the opinions of many, the chronological arrangement has been departed from, and, instead of it, an arrangement according to contents has been adopted. But this is not the case. The predictions against foreign nations are also in their right chronological place. They all belong to the reign of Hezekiah, and are placed together because, according to their dates, they belong to the same period. In the days of Hezekiah the nations of Western Asia, dwelling on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris, more and more resembled a threatening tempest. That the prophecies against foreign nations belong to this period is indicated by the home-prophecy in chap. xxii., which stands among the foreign prophecies. The assertion that the first twelve chapters are a collection of home-prophecies is likewise refuted by the fact that there occur in these chapters two foreign prophecies. The prophetic gift of Isaiah was more fully unfolded in sight of the Assyrian invasion under the reign of Hezekiah. Isaiah, in a series of visions, describes what Assyria would do, as a chastising rod in the hand of the Lord, and what the successors of the Assyrians, the Chaldees, would perform, according to the decree of God, in order to realise divine justice on earth, as well among Israel as among the heathen. The prophet shows that mercy is hidden behind the clouds of wrath. There is no argument to prove that the great prophetic picture in chaps. xxiv.-xxvii. was not depicted under Hezekiah. Chaps. xxviii.-xxxiii. manifestly belong to the same reign, but somewhat later than the time in which chaps. x., xi., and xii., were written. They were composed about the time when the result of the war against the Assyrians was decided. With the termination of this war terminated also the public life of Isaiah, who added an historical section in chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix., in order to facilitate the right understanding of the prophecies uttered by him during the most fertile period of his prophetic ministry. Then follows the conclusion of his work on earth. The second part, which contains his prophetic legacy, is addressed to the small congregation of the faithful strictly so called. This part is analogous to the last speeches of Moses in the fields of Moab, and to the last speeches of Christ in the circle of his disciples, related by John. Thus we have everywhere order, and such an order as could scarcely have proceeded from any one but the author.

V. Contents, Character, and Authority of the Book of Isaiah.—It was not the vocation of the prophets to change anything in the religious constitution of Moses, which had been introduced by divine authority; and they were not called upon to substitute anything new in its place. They had only to point out the new covenant to be introduced by the Redeemer, and to prepare the minds of men for the reception of it. They themselves in all their doings were subject to the law of Moses. They were destined to be extraordinary ambassadors of God, whose reign in Israel was not a mere name, not a mere shadow of earthly royalty, but rather its substance and essence. They were to maintain the government of God, by punishing all, both high and low, who manifested contempt of the Lawgiver by offending against his laws. It was especially their vocation to counteract the very ancient delusion, according to which an external observance of rites was deemed sufficient to satisfy God. This opinion is contrary to many passages of the law itself, which admonish men to circumcise the heart, and describe the sum of the entire law to consist in loving God with the whole heart; which make salvation to depend upon being internally turned towards God, and which condemn not only the evil deed, but also the wicked desire. The law had, however, at the first assumed a form corresponding to the wants of the Israelites, and in accordance with the symbolical spirit of antiquity. But when this form, which was destined to be the living organ of the Spirit, was changed into a corpse by those who were themselves spiritually dead, it offered a point of coalescence for the error of those who contented themselves with external observances.

The prophets had also to oppose the delusion of those who looked upon the election of the people of God as a preservative against the divine judgments; who supposed that their descent from the patriarchs, with whom God had made a covenant, was an equivalent for the sanctification which they wanted. Even Moses had strongly opposed this delusion; for instance, in Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxxii. David also, in the Psalms, as in xv. and xxiv., endeavours to counteract this error, which again and again sprang up. It was the vocation of the prophets to insist upon genuine piety, and to shew that a true attachment to the Lord necessarily manifests itself by obedience to his precepts; that this obedience would lead to happiness, and disobedience to misfortune and distress. The prophets were appointed to comfort the faint-hearted, by announcing to them the succour of God, and to bring glad tidings to the faithful, in order to strengthen their fidelity. They were commissioned to invite the rebellious to return, by pointing out to them future salvation, and by teaching them that without conversion they could not be partakers of salvation; and in order that their admonitions and rebukes, their consolations and awakenings, might gain more attention, it was granted to them to behold futurity, and to foresee the blessings and judgments which would ultimately find their full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah. The Hebrew appellation nebiim is by far more expressive than the Greek προφήτης, which denotes only a part of their office, and which has given rise to many misunderstandings. The word נְבִיא (from the root נָבַא, which occurs in Arabic in the signification of to inform, to explain, to speak) means, according to the usual signification of the form קָטַל, a person into whom God has spoken; that is, a person who communicates to the people what God has given to him. The Hebrew word indicates divine inspiration. What is most essential in the prophets is their speaking ἐν πνεύματι; consequently they were as much in their vocation when they rebuked and admonished as when they predicted future events. The correctness of our explanation may be seen in the definition contained in Deut. xviii. 18, where the Lord says, 'I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.'

The prophet here mentioned is an ideal person. It is prophetism itself personified. It is a characteristic mark that God gives his word into the mouth of the prophet, by means of which he is placed on an equality with the priest, who is likewise a bearer of the word of God. The prophet is at the same time distinguished from the priest, who receives the word of God from the Scriptures, while the prophet receives it without an intervening medium. The internal communications of God to the prophets are given to them only as being messengers to his people. By this circumstance the prophets are distinguished from mystics and theosophers, who lay claim to divine communications especially for themselves. Prophetism has an entirely practical and truly ecclesiastical character, remote from all idle contemplativeness, all fantastic trances, and all anchoritism.

In this description of the prophetic calling there is also contained a statement of the contents of the prophecies of Isaiah. He refers expressly in many places to the basis of the ancient covenant, that is, to the law of Moses; for instance, in viii. 16, 20, and xxx. 9, 10. In many other passages his utterance rests on the same basis, although he does not expressly state it. All his utterances are interwoven with references to the law. It is of importance to examine at least one chapter closely, in order to understand how prophecies are related to the law. Let us take as an example the first. The beginning, 'Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth,' is taken from Deut. xxxii. Thus the prophet points out that his prophecies are a commentary upon the Magna Charta of prophetism contained in the books of Moses. During the prosperous condition of the state under Uzziah and Jotham, luxury and immorality had sprung up. The impiety of Ahaz had exercised the worst influence upon the whole people. Great part of the nation had forsaken the religion of their fathers and embraced gross idolatry; and a great number of those who worshipped God externally had forsaken

Him in their hearts. The divine judgments were approaching. The rising power of Assyria was appointed to be the instrument of divine justice. Among the people of God internal demoralisation was always the forerunner of outward calamity. This position of affairs demanded an energetic intervention of prophetism. Without prophetism the ἐκλογή, the number of the elect, would have been constantly decreasing, and even the judgments of the Lord, if prophetism had not furnished their interpretation, would have been mere facts, which would have missed their aim, and, in many instances, might have had an effect opposite to that which was intended, because punishment which was not recognised to be punishment, necessarily leads away from God. The prophet attacks the distress of his nation, not at the surface but at the root, by rebuking the prevailing corruption. Pride and arrogance appear to him to be the chief roots of all sins.

He inculcates again and again that men should not rely upon the creature, but upon the Creator, from whom all temporal and spiritual help proceeds; that in order to attain salvation, we should despair of our own and all human power, and rely upon God. He opposes those who expected help through foreign alliances with powerful neighbouring nations against foreign enemies of the state.

The people of God have only one enemy, and one ally, that is, God. It is foolish to seek for aid on earth against the power of heaven, and to fear man if God is our friend. The panacea against all distress and danger is true conversion. The politics of the prophets consist only in pointing out this remedy. The prophet connects with his rebuke and with his admonition, his threatenings of divine judgment upon the stiff-necked. These judgments are to be executed by the invasion of the Syrians, the oppression of the Assyrians, the Babylonian exile, and by the great final separation in the times of the Messiah. The idea which is the basis of all these threatenings, is pronounced even in the Pentateuch (Lev. x. 3), 'I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified;' and also in the words of Amos (iii. 2), 'You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities:' that is, if the people do not voluntarily glorify God, he glorifies himself against them. Partly in order to recal the rebellious to obedience, partly to comfort the faithful, the prophet opens a prospect of those blessings which the faithful portion of the covenant-people shall inherit. In almost all prophetic utterances, we find in regular succession three elements—rebuke, threatening, and promise. The prophecies concerning the destruction of powerful neighbouring states partly belong, as we have shewn, to the promises, because they are intended to prevent despair, which, as well as false security, is a most dangerous hindrance to conversion.

In the direct promises of deliverance the purpose to comfort is still more evident. This deliverance refers either to burdens which pressed upon the people in the days of the prophet, or to burdens to come, which were already announced by the prophet; such, for instance, were the oppressions of the Syrians, the Assyrians, and finally, of the Chaldeans.

The proclamation of the Messiah is the inexhaustible source of consolation among the prophets. In Isaiah this consolation is so clear that some fathers of the church were inclined to style him rather evangelist than prophet. Ewald pointedly describes (p. 169) the human basis of Messianic expectations in general, and of those of Isaiah in particular:—‘He who experienced in his own royal soul what infinite power could be granted to an individual spirit in order to influence and animate many, he who daily observed in Jerusalem the external vestiges of a spirit like that of David, could not imagine that the future new congregation of the Lord should originate from a mind belonging to another race than that of David, and that it should be maintained and supported by any other ruler than a divine ruler. Indeed every spiritual revival must proceed from the clearness and firmness of an elevated mind; and this especially applies to that most sublime revival for which ancient Israel longed and strove. This longing attained to clearness, and was preserved from losing itself in indefiniteness, by the certainty that such an elevated mind was to be expected.’

Isaiah, however, was not the first who attained to a knowledge of the personality of Messiah. Isaiah's vocation was to render the knowledge of this personality clearer and more definite, and to render it more efficacious upon the souls of the elect by giving it a greater individuality. The person of the Redeemer is mentioned even in Gen. xlix. 10, ‘The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh (the tranquilliser) come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be’ (i.e., him shall the nations obey). The personality of Messiah occurs also in several psalms which were written before the times of Isaiah; for instance, in the 2d and 110th, by David; in the 45th, by the sons of Korah; in the 72d, by Solomon. Isaiah has especially developed the perception of the prophetic and the priestly office of the Redeemer, while in the earlier annunciations of the Messiah the royal office is more prominent; although in Ps. cx. the priestly office also is pointed out. Of the two states of Christ, Isaiah has expressly described that of the exanition of the suffering Christ, while, before him, his state of glory was made more prominent. In the Psalms the inseparable connection between justice and suffering, from which the doctrine of a suffering Messiah necessarily results, is not expressly applied to the Messiah. We must not say that Isaiah first perceived that the Messiah was to suffer, but we must grant that this knowledge was in him more vivid than in any earlier writer; and that this knowledge was first shewn by Isaiah to be an integral portion of O. T. doctrine.

The following are the outlines of Messianic prophecies in the book of Isaiah:—A scion of David, springing from his family, after it has fallen into a very low estate, but being also of divine nature, shall, at first in lowliness, but as a prophet filled with the spirit of God, proclaim the divine doctrine, develop the law in truth, and render it the animating principle of national life; he shall, as high priest, by his vicarious suffering and his death, remove the guilt of his nation, and that of other nations, and finally rule as a mighty king, not only over the covenant-people, but over all nations of the earth who will subject themselves to his peaceful sceptre, not by violent compulsion, but induced by love and gratitude. He will make both the moral and the physical consequences of sin to cease; the whole earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, and all enmity, hatred, and destruction shall be removed even from the brute creation. This is the survey of the Messianic preaching by Isaiah, of which he constantly renders prominent those portions which were most calculated to impress the people under the then existing circumstances. The first part of Isaiah is directed to the whole people, consequently the glory of the Messiah is here dwelt upon. The fear lest the kingdom of God should be overwhelmed by the power of heathen nations, is removed by pointing out the glorious king to come, who would elevate the now despised and apparently mean kingdom of God above all the kingdoms of this world. In the second part, which is more particularly addressed to the ἐκλογὴ, the elect, than to the whole nation, the prophet exhibits the Messiah more as a divine teacher and high-priest. The prophet here preaches righteousness through the blood of the servant of God, who will support the weakness of sinners, and take upon himself their sorrows.

We may show, by an example in chap. xix. 18-25, that the views of futurity which were granted to Isaiah were great and comprehensive, and that the Spirit of God raised him above all narrow-minded nationality. It is there stated that a time should come when all the heathen, subdued by the judgments of the Lord, should be converted to him, and being placed on an equality with Israel, with equal laws, would equally partake of the kingdom of God, and form a brotherly alliance for his worship. Not the whole mass of Israel is destined, according to Isaiah, to future salvation, but only the small number of the converted. This truth he enounces most definitely in the sketch of his prophecies contained in chapter vi.

Isaiah describes with equal vivacity the divine justice which punishes the sins of the nation with inexorable severity. Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Sabaoth, is the key-note of his prophecies. He describes also the divine mercy and covenant-fidelity, by which there is always preserved a remnant among the people: to them punishment itself is a means of salvation, so that life everywhere proceeds from death, and the congregation itself is led to full victory and glory.

Isaiah saw the moral and religious degradation of his people, and also its external distress, both then present and to come (chap. vi.) But this did not break his courage; he confidently expected a better futurity, and raised himself in God above all that is visible. Isaiah is not afraid when the whole nation and its king tremble. Of this we see a remarkable instance in chapter vii., and another in the time of the Assyrian invasion under Hezekiah, during which the courage of his faith rendered him the saviour of the commonwealth, and the originator of that great religious revival which followed the preservation of the state. The faith of the king and of the people was roused by that of Isaiah.

Isaiah stands pre-eminent above all other prophets, as well in the contents and spirit of his predictions, as in their form and style. Simplicity, clearness, sublimity, and freshness, are the never-failing characters of his prophecies. Even Eichhorn mentions, among the first merits of Isaiah, the concinnity of his expressions, the beautiful outline of his images, and the fine execution of his speeches. In reference to richness of imagery he stands between Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Symbolic actions, which frequently occur in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, seldom occur in Isaiah. The same is the case with visions, strictly so called, of which there is only one, namely, that in chapter vi.; and even it is distinguished by its simplicity and clearness above that of the later prophets. But one characteristic of Isaiah is, that he likes to give signs—that is, a fact then present, or near at hand—as a pledge for the more distant futurity; and that he thus supports the feebleness of man (comp. vii. 20; xxxvii. 30; xxxviii. 7, sqq.) The instances in chapters vii. and xxxviii. show how much he was convinced of his vocation, and in what intimacy he lived with the Lord, by whose assistance alone he could effect what he offers to do in the one passage, and what he grants in the other. The spiritual riches of the prophet are seen in the variety of his style, which always befits the subject. When he rebukes and threatens, it is like a storm, and, when he comforts, his language is as tender and mild as (to use his own words) that of a mother comforting her son. With regard to style, Isaiah is comprehensive, and the other prophets divide his riches.

Isaiah enjoyed an authority proportionate to his gifts. We learn from history how great this authority was during his life, especially under the reign of Hezekiah. Several of his most definite prophecies were fulfilled while he was yet alive: for instance, the overthrow of the kingdoms of Syria and Israel; the invasion of the Assyrians, and the divine deliverance from it; the prolongation of life granted to Hezekiah; and several predictions against foreign nations. Isaiah is honourably mentioned in the historical books. The later prophets, especially Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, clearly prove that his book was diligently read, and that his prophecies were attentively studied.

The authority of the prophet greatly increased after the fulfilment of his prophecies by the Babylonian exile, the victories of Cyrus, and the deliverance of the covenant-people. Even Cyrus (according to the above-mentioned account in Josephus, Antiq. xi. 1. 1, 2) was induced to set the Jews at liberty by the prophecies of Isaiah concerning himself. This prediction of Isaiah made so deep an impression upon him that he probably took from it the name by which he is generally known in history. Jesus Sirach (xlviii. 22-25) bestows splendid praise upon Isaiah, and both Philo and Josephus speak of him with great veneration. He attained the highest degree of authority after the times of the N. T. had proved the most important part of his prophecies, namely, the Messianic, to be divine. Christ and the apostles quote no prophecies so frequently as those of Isaiah, in order to prove that he who had appeared was one and the same with him who had been promised. The fathers of the church abound in praises of Isaiah. —E. W. H.

ISCAH (יִסְחָה; Sept. Ἰσχα), the daughter of Haran, the brother of Abraham, and the sister of Lot and of Milcah Nahor's wife (Gen. xi. 27, 29). According to Jewish tradition (Joseph. Antiq. i. 6. 5; Targ. Jonath.; Talm.; Hieron., Quaest. in Gen.), Iscah was the same as Sarai, Abraham's wife; but there are serious difficulties in the way of this belief. [SARAH.]—W. L. A.

ISHBAH (יִשְׁבָּה; Sept. Ἰσβαῖ; Alex. Ἰεσβαῖ), the father of Eshtemoa, and apparently the son of Ezra by his Egyptian wife Bithiah (1 Chron. iv. 17; comp. Bertheau, Exeg. Hdb. in loc.)—†.

ISHBAK (יִשְׁבָּק; Ἰεσβῶκ and Σοβακ; Jesboc), a son of Abraham by Keturah, and founder of one of the tribes of Arabia. His brethren Midian and Jokshan are better known. We are told that Abraham 'gave gifts' to the sons of Keturah, 'and sent them away from Isaac his son, eastward, unto the east country' (Gen. xxv. 1-6). They settled in the region east of the Arabah, in and near Mount Seir, and southward in the peninsula of Sinai (Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36; Exod. iii. 1; Num. xxxi. 9, 10). On the top of the mountain range which bounds the valley of Arabah on the east, and about twelve miles north of Petra, stands the great castle of Shobek, on the crest of a peak commanding a wide view. It was built by Baldwin king of Jerusalem in A.D. 1115, on the site of a much more ancient fortress and city, and it was one of the chief strongholds of the Crusaders. The name they gave it was Mons Regalis; but by the Arabs, both before and since, it has been uniformly called Shobek. It was finally taken from the Franks by Saladin in A.D. 1188 (Gesta Dei Per Francos, pp. 426, 611, 812; Bohadin, Vita Saladini, pp. 38, 54, and Index Geographicus, s. v. Sjanbachum). The castle is still in tolerable preservation, and a few families of Arabs find within its walls a secure asylum for themselves and their flocks. It contains an old church, with a Latin inscription of the Crusading age over its door (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 416; Handbook for S. and P., p. 58).

It seems highly probable that in Shobek we have still preserved the name and first possession of Abraham's son Ishbak. The words شوبك (Robinson spells it شوبك) and יִשְׁבָּק are radically identical. And as the descendants of Ke-turah unquestionably settled in this region, and were closely connected with the Ishmaelites and Moabites, we may safely identify Shobek and Ishbak (see Forster, Geography of Arabia, i. 352; Robinson, B. R. ii. 164; Bunsen, Bibelwerk, i. ii. 53).—J. L. P.

ISHBI, or ISHBI-BENOB. [GIANTS.]

ISH-BOSHETH (יִשְׁבֹּשֶׁת, man of shame;

Sept. Ἰεβωσθέ), a son of king Saul, and the only one who survived him. • In 1 Chron. viii. 33, and ix. 39, this name is given as אֶשְׁבַּאל Eshbaal. Baal was the name of an idol, accounted abominable by the Hebrews, and which scrupulous persons avoided pronouncing, using the word bosheth, 'shame' or 'vanity,' instead. This explains why the name Eshbaal is substituted for Ish-bosheth, Jerubbaal for Jerubbesheth (comp. Judg. viii. 35 with 2 Sam. xi. 21), and Merib-baal for Mephibosheth (comp. 2 Sam. iv. 4 with 1 Chron. viii. 34 and ix. 40). Ish-bosheth was not present in the disastrous battle at Gilboa, in which his father and brothers perished; and, too feeble of himself to seize the sceptre which had fallen from the hands of Saul, he owed the crown entirely to his uncle Abner, who conducted him to Mahanaim, beyond the Jordan, where he was recognised as king by ten of the twelve tribes. He reigned seven, or, as some will have it, two years—if a power so uncertain as his can be called a reign. Even the semblance of authority which he possessed he owed to the will and influence of Abner, who kept the real substance in his own hands. A sharp quarrel between them led at last to the ruin of Ish-bosheth. Although accustomed to tremble before Abner, even his meek temper was roused to resentment by the discovery that Abner had invaded the harem of his late father Saul, which was in a peculiar manner sacred under his care as a son and a king. By this act Abner exposed the king to public contempt; if it did not indeed leave himself open to the suspicion of intending to advance a claim to the crown on his own behalf. Abner highly resented the rebuke of Ish-bosheth, and from that time contemplated uniting all the tribes under the sceptre of David. Ish-bosheth, however, reverted to his ordinary timidity of character. At the first demand of David, he restored to him his sister Michal, who had been given in marriage to the son of Jesse by Saul, and had afterwards been taken from him and bestowed upon another. It is, perhaps, right to attribute this act to his weakness; although, as David allows that he was a righteous man, it may have been owing to his sense of justice. On the death of Abner Ish-bosheth lost all heart and hope, and perished miserably, being murdered in his own palace, while he took his mid-day sleep, by two of his officers, Baanah and Rechab. They sped with his head to David, expecting a great reward for their deed; but the monarch—as both right feeling and good policy required—testified the utmost horror and concern. He slew the murderers, and placed the head of Ish-bosheth with due respect in the sepulchre of Abner: B. C. 1048 (2 Sam. ii. 8-11; iii. 6-39; iv.). There is a serious difficulty in the chronology of this reign. In 2 Sam. ii. 10 Ish-bosheth is said to have reigned two years; which some understand as the whole amount of his reign.

And as David reigned seven and a half years over Judah before he became king of all Israel upon the death of Ish-bosheth, it is conceived by the Jewish chronologer (Seder Olam Rabba, p. 37), as well as by Kimchi and others, that there was a vacancy of five years in the throne of Israel. It is not, however, agreed by those who entertain this opinion, whether this vacancy took place before or after the reign of Ish-bosheth. Some think it was before, it being then a matter of dispute whether he or Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, should be made king; but others hold that after his death five years elapsed before David was generally recognised as king of all Israel. If the reign of Ish-bosheth be limited to two years, the latter is doubtless the best way of accounting for the other five, since no ground of delay in the accession of Ish-bosheth is suggested in Scripture itself; for the claim of Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, which some have produced, being that of a lame boy five years old, whose father never reigned, against a king's son forty years of age, would have been deemed of little weight in Israel. Besides, our notions of Abner do not allow us to suppose that under him the question of the succession could have remained five years in abeyance. But it is the more usual, and perhaps the better course, to settle this question by supposing that the reigns of David over Judah, and of Ish-bosheth over Israel, were nearly contemporaneous, and that the two years are mentioned as those from which to date the commencement of the ensuing events—namely, the wars between the house of Saul and that of David.—J. ISHI. This word in the A. V. represents two different words in the original, viz.—1. יִשִּׁי, Yishi, a proper name of a man, occurring 1 Chron. ii. 31 (Sept. Ἰσημῆλ; Alex. Ἰεσῆλ; iv. 20 (Sept. Σῆλ; Alex. Ἰσ); iv. 42 (Sept. Ἰεσῆλ; Alex. Ἰεσῆλ); v. 24 (Sept. Σῆλ; Alex. Ἰεσῆλ). 2. יִשִּׁי, Ishi, Sept. ὁ ἀνὴρ μου, the name by which the true Israel should express her relation to Jehovah, as contradistinguished from בָּלִי, Baali, which, though once applicable to Jehovah (Is. liv. 5), had ceased to be so in consequence of its application to heathen deities (Hos. ii. 16; comp. Henderson on the place).—W. L. A.

ISHMAEL (יִשְׁמָאֵל, 'God hears'; Ἰσμαήλ; Ismad. Hence the patronymic יִשְׁמָאֵלִי, pl. יִשְׁמָאֵלִים, given to the Arabs descended from Ishmael).

1. Abraham's son by Hagar, Sarah's Egyptian maid. The story of his birth as recorded in Gen. xvi., though it seems so strange and even unnatural in Christian England, is in every respect characteristic of Eastern life and morals in the present age. The intense desire of both Abraham and Sarah for children; Sarah's gift of Hagar to Abraham as wife; the insolence of the slave when suddenly raised to a place of importance; the jealousy and consequent tyranny of her high-spirited mistress; Hagar's flight, return, and submission to Sarah—for all these incidents we could easily find parallels in the modern history of every tribe in the desert of Arabia. The origin of the name Ishmael is thus explained. When Hagar fled from Sarah, the Angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness in the way of Shur . . . and he said, 'Behold thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael ('God hears'), because the Lord hath heard thy affliction' (Gen. xvi. 11). Hagar had evidently intended when she fled to return to her native country. But when the Angel told her of the dignity in store for her as a mother, and the power to which her child, as the son of the great patriarch, would attain, she resolved to obey his voice, and to submit herself to Sarah (xvi. 10-13).

Ishmael was born at Mamre, in the eighty-sixth year of Abraham's age, eleven years after his arrival in Canaan, and fourteen before the birth of Isaac (xvi. 3, 16; xxi. 5). No particulars of his early life are recorded. His father was evidently strongly attached to him, for when an heir was promised through Sarah, he said, 'O that Ishmael might live before Thee!' (xvii. 18). Then were renewed to Abraham in more definite terms the promises made to Hagar regarding Ishmael; 'As for Ishmael, I have heard thee; behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly: twelve princes shall he beget: and I will make him a great nation' (ver. 20). Ishmael seems to have remained in a great measure under the charge of his mother, who, knowing his destiny, would doubtless have him trained in such exercises as would fit him for successfully acting the part of a desert prince. Indulged in every whim and wish by a fond father, encouraged to daring and adventure by the hardy nomads who fed and defended his father's flocks, and having a fitting field on that southern borderland for the play of his natural propensities, Ishmael grew up a true child of the desert—a wild and wayward boy. The perfect freedom of desert life, and his constant intercourse with those who looked up to him with mingled feelings of pride and affection as the son and heir-apparent of their great chief, tended to make him impatient of restraint, and overbearing in his temper. The excitement of the chase—speeding across the plains of Beersheba after the gazelles, and through the rugged mountains of Engedi after wild goats, and bears, and leopards, inured him to danger, and trained him for war. Ishmael must also have been accustomed from childhood to those feuds which raged almost incessantly between the 'trained servants' of Abraham and their warlike neighbours of Philistia, as well as to the more serious incursions of roving bands of freebooters from the distant East. Such was the school in which the great desert chief was trained. Subsequent events served to fill up and fashion the remaining features of Ishmael's character. He had evidently been treated by Abraham's dependents as their master's heir, and Abraham himself had apparently encouraged the belief. The unexpected birth of Isaac, therefore, must have been to him a sad and bitter disappointment. And when he was afterwards driven forth, with his poor mother, a homeless wanderer in a pathless wilderness; when in consequence of such unnatural harshness he was brought to the very brink of the grave, and was only saved from a painful death by a miracle; when, after having been reared in luxury, and taught to look forward to the possession of wealth and power, he was suddenly left to win a scanty and uncertain subsistence by his sword and bow—we need scarcely wonder that his proud spirit, revolting against injustice and cruelty, should make him what the Angei had predicted, 'a wild ass man; his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him' (xvi. 12).

The first recorded outbreak of Ishmael's rude and wayward spirit occurred at the weaning of Isaac. On that occasion Abraham made a great feast after the custom of the country. In the excitement of the moment, heightened probably by the painful consciousness of his own blighted hopes, Ishmael could not restrain his temper, but gave way to some insulting expressions or gestures of mockery. Perhaps the very name of the child, Isaac ('laughter'), and the exuberant joy of his aged mother, may have furnished subjects for his untimely satire. Be this as it may, Sarah's jealous eye and quick ear speedily detected him; and she said to Abraham, 'Expel this slave and her son; for the son of this slave shall not be heir with my son, with Isaac' (xxi. 10). Now Abraham loved the boy who first, lisping the name 'father,' opened in his heart the gushing fountain of paternal affection. The bare mention of such an unnatural act made him angry even with Sarah, and it was only when influenced by a Divine admonition that he yielded. The brief account of the departure of Hagar, and her journey through the desert, is one of the most beautiful and touching pictures of patriarchal life which has come down to us, 'And Abraham rose early in the morning, and took bread, and a skin of water, and gave it to Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the lad (^{וְהַנֶּכֶד}); and sent her away; and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. And when the water was spent in the skin, she placed the lad under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat down opposite, at the distance of a bowshot: for she said, I will not see the death of the lad. And she sat opposite, and lifted up her voice and wept' (xxi. 14-16).

Ishmael was about sixteen years old when thus cast upon the world. It may seem strange to some that the hardy, active boy, inured to fatigue, should have been sooner overcome by thirst than his mother; but those advanced in life can bear abstinence longer than the young, and besides, Ishmael had probably exhausted his strength in vain attempts to gain a supply of food by his bow. Again Hagar is saved by a miracle; 'God heard the voice of the lad . . . and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not . . . And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water' (ver. 17, 19). And again the cheering promise is renewed to her son, 'I will make of him a great nation' (ver. 18).

The wilderness of Paran, lying along the western side of the Arabah, between Canaan and the mountains of Sinai, now became the home of Ishmael; 'And God was with him, and he became a great archer' (ver. 20). Some of the border tribes with which the shepherds of Abraham were wont to meet and strive at the wells of Gerar, Beersheba, and En-Mishpat, probably received and welcomed the outcast to their tents. A youth of his warlike training and daring spirit would soon acquire a name and a high position among nomads. His relationship to Abraham also would add to his personal claims. His mother, as soon as she saw him settled, took for him an Egyptian wife—one of her own people, and thus completely separated him from his Shemite connections. At this period the Arabian desert appears to have been thinly peopled by descendants of Joktan, the son of Eber, 'whose dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east' (Gen. x. 25-30). The Joktanites, or Bene Kahlân, are regarded by Arab historians as the first and most honourable progenitors of the Arab tribes (ARABIA; D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Arabes). A very old tradition affirms that Ishmael married a woman of that race. This is not stated in the Bible; and the story may probably have its origin in the fact that he became closely allied with the Joktanites, and was one of their greatest leaders. Though Ishmael joined the native tribes of Arabia, his posterity did not amalgamate with them. The Joktanites have left traces of their names and settlements chiefly in the southern and south-eastern parts of the peninsula, while the Ishmaelites kept closer to the borders of Canaan (JOKTAN; Forster's Geography of Arabia, i. 77, seq.) Notwithstanding his expulsion, Ishmael appears to have kept up some slight intercourse with his father's house; and when Abraham died, we read that 'his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah.' The rival brothers then met, in the vale of Mamre at their father's tomb (Gen. xxv. 9). That must have been a strange and deeply interesting scene at the burial of the great patriarch. All his own old 'trained servants,' with Isaac, the peaceful shepherd chief, at their head, were assembled there; while Ishmael, surrounded by the whole body of his wild retainers and allies, as was and still is the custom of Bedawy sheikhs, stood there too. Of Ishmael's personal history after this event we know nothing. The sacred historian gives us a list of his twelve sons, tells us that Esau married his daughter Mahalath, the sister of Nebajoth (xxviii. 9), and sums up the brief simple sketch in these words, 'These are the years of the life of Ishmael, a hundred and thirty-seven years; and he died; and was gathered to his people' (xxv. 17). Where he died, or where he was buried, we know not.

Ishmael was driven out from his father's house, and his father's imperious wife said of him, 'The son of the slave shall not be heir with my son;' yet a divine promise assured the outcast that he should dwell 'in the presence of all his brethren.' Ishmael was the son of the 'faithful' Abraham, the chosen 'friend' of God; yet the Lord Himself said of him, 'He shall be a wild man—his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him.' The long history of Ishmael and his posterity, from the day he was sent into the desert till the present hour, is one continuous fulfilment of these remarkable prophecies. Ishmael had twelve sons: Nebajoth, Kedar, Abdeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah. In giving the list of them, the sacred historian communicates an important piece of information—'These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their cities (חציריהם), and these are their names, by their cities (חציריהם), and their camps (מירתם); twelve princes according to their nations' (לְאֻמָּתָם). Every one of the twelve sons of Ishmael, therefore, like the children of Jacob, was the head of a tribe, and the founder of a distinct colony or camp. In this respect the statements in the Bible exactly accord with the ancient traditions and histories of the Arabs themselves. Native historians divide the Arabs into two races—1. Pure Arabs (العرب الباردة), descendants of Joktan (جحطان); and

2. Mixed Arabs (العرب المستعربة), descendants of Ishmael. Abulfelda gives a brief account of the several tribes and nations which descended from both these original stocks (Historia Antislamica, ed. Fleischer, pp. 180, 191, seq.) Some of the tribes founded by sons of Ishmael retained the names of their founders, and were well known in history. The Nabatheans, who took possession of Idumæa in the 4th century B.C., and constructed the wonderful monuments of Petra, were the posterity of Nebajoth, Ishmael's eldest son [NABATHEANS]. The descendants of Jetur and Naphish disputed with the Israelites possession of the country east of the Jordan, and the former, described by Strabo as κακοὶ ἔργοι πάντες (xvi. 2), gave their name to a small province south of Damascus, which it bears to this day [ITUREA]. The black tents of Kedar were pitched in the heart of the Arabian desert, and from their abundant flocks they supplied the marts of Tyre (Jer. ii. 10; Is. lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21). The district of Tema lay south of Edom, and is referred to by both Job and Isaiah (Job vi. 19; Is. xxi. 14; Forster's Geogr. of Arabia, i. 292; Heeren's Historical Researches, ii. 107). Dumah has left his name to a small province of Arabia. For a fuller investigation of this subject the reader is referred to Forster's Geography of Arabia, where a vast amount of information has been collected, though not all entirely to the point. Still there is enough to shew that the statement of Moses is perfectly accurate, that the sons of Ishmael were heads of great tribes, and to shew too that the prophecy has been fulfilled to the letter, Ishmael 'shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren' (Gen. xvi. 12). Since the days of Abraham the tents of the Ishmaelites have been studded along the whole eastern confines of Palestine, and they have been scattered over Arabia from the borders of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates. As friends and foes, as oppressors and oppressed,—but ever as freemen,—the seed of Ishmael have dwelt in the presence of their brethren.

The prophecy which drew their character has been fulfilled with equal minuteness of detail. 'He shall be a wild ass of a man (פָּרָא אִדָּם);

his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him.' A recent commentator on the passage has illustrated the prophecy with equal force and beauty. 'The character of the Ishmaelites, or the Bedouins, could not be described more aptly or more powerfully. Against them alone time seems to have no sickle, and the conqueror's sword no edge. They have defied the softening influence of civilization, and mocked the attacks of the invader. Ungovernable and roaming, obeying no law but their spirit of adventure, regarding all mankind as their enemies, whom they must either attack with their spears or elude with their faithful steeds, and cherishing their deserts as heartily as they despise the constraint of towns and communities; the Bedouins are the outlaws among the nations. Plunder is legitimate gain, a daring robbery is praised as valour. Liberty is the element which the Arab breathes, and if he were thrown into servitude he would either break the yoke or perish in the attempt. He cannot, indeed, be better compared than with a wild ass. This indomitable animal, which defies the swiftness of the swiftest horse, delights in its native deserts, easily satisfied with the scanty food furnished by those inhospitable regions. It seems to revel in independence, free from the master's pressing voice, it scorns the tumult of the town, and roves on the parched mountain sides in search of grass and herbs. Although in the zones it generally inhabits water seems a vital condition, the wild ass can long exist without it; and its marvellous power of enduring hunger and thirst explains its preservation in its arid and cheerless abodes. . . . With such animals are the Bedouins pointedly compared; to the latter may be properly applied the words of Job: 'Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land its dwellings' (xxxix. 5, 6). They may be hunted like game, but they cannot be caught; their wants are few, they neither covet wealth nor tempt the conqueror's avarice, and the waste tracts shunned by other nations are their terrestrial paradise. 'In the desert, everybody is everybody's enemy,' is their proverbial saying; and they express, therefore, only in other words the sense of our text, 'his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him' (Kalisch, ad loc.). The desert is now and has always been the home of the Ishmaelite.

In Arabic the desert is called bedu (بدو), campus in quo nulla sunt firma habitacula, Freytag, s. v.), hence the genuine Arab calls himself Bedawy (بدوي) or بدوي, 'a man of the desert,' pl. Bedawin).

The Ishmaelites are nomads, moving from place to place as the requirements of water and pasture, the chances of war, or the hope of plunder, may lead them. They live exclusively in tents, and have a kind of instinctive dread of towns, villages, and permanent habitations. They can pitch and move their camps with almost incredible rapidity, while on their fleet dromedaries and fleet horses they sweep like a tornado across the broad plains, now plundering a caravan beneath the walls of Baghdad, and anon carrying off the flocks of some border town of Syria. And it has not been on the confines of their own desert home only that 'the hand of the Ishmaelite has been against every man.' Inspired by the fierce fanaticism, and led by the daring chiefs of Mohammed, they carried their victorious arms to the banks of the Oxus and the Indus on the east, and over Syria, Egypt, Northern Africa, and Spain, to the shores of the Atlantic on the west. Nearly 4000 years have passed since the Ishmaelites became a nation, and yet in disposition, in manners, in habits, in government, in occupation, and even in dress, they are the same as they were at the first. The writer has seen much of them, and lived among them; he has experienced both their hospitality and their hostility, and all his personal knowledge has tended to impress more deeply upon his mind the wonderful accuracy of those brief but graphic descriptions given in the words of O. T. prophecy. (In addition to the books already referred to, the

2. ISHMAEL, the son of Nethaniah, one of the royal family of Judah, who committed acts of great treachery and cruelty in Palestine during the Babylonish captivity. It appears that during the wars which preceded the captivity, he, and a numerous band of followers, took refuge among the Ammonites. When Gedaliah was appointed governor by the king of Babylon, these refugees determined to slay him. They returned to Palestine, came to Gedaliah at Mizpah under the mask of friendship, and after being kindly received and promised full protection, Ishmael treacherously murdered him. This did not satisfy his savage cruelty; he slew all the Jews and Chaldeans who were with Gedaliah in Mizpah, and eighty others, who came from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria, with offerings to the Lord; and then, seizing the women and the remaining inhabitants of Mizpah, he attempted to carry them captive to the country of the Ammonites. In this, however, he was disappointed, for they were rescued in passing Gibeon; the followers of Ishmael were dispersed, but Ishmael himself effected his escape (2 Kings xxv. 23-28; Jer. xl.; xli.; Joseph. Antiq. x. 9).

Several other Ishmaels are mentioned in Scripture (1 Chron. viii. 38; 2 Chron. xix. 11; xxiii. 1; Ezra x. 22).—J. L. P.

ISHMAEL B. ELISA (ר' ישמעאל בן אלישע בקה). This renowned Rabbi, who is one of the principal interpreters of the Pentateuch or Law (תורה) mentioned in the Mishna, was the son of the high-priest Elisha b. Fabi, whom Josephus (Antiq. xx. 7) erroneously calls Ishmael b. Fabi. He was born about A.D. 60, carried away a captive to Rome during the destruction of Jerusalem, when a child, and was afterwards redeemed by R. Joshua, who, when at the Eternal city, with R. Eliezer b. Azzariah and R. Gamaliel II., as deputation to intercede with the emperor Domitian in behalf of their suffering brethren (circa A.D. 83), heard of the imprisonment of this far-famed beautiful boy. He at once went to the prison and exclaimed at the door—'Who gave Jacob for a spoil and Israel to the robbers?' (Is. xlii. 24); and when the captive boy touchingly replied, 'The Lord, against whom we have sinned, and would not walk in his ways, nor be obedient unto his law' (ibid.), the rabbi vowed that he would not quit Rome till he had redeemed this remarkable youth (Gittin, 58, a). R. Ishmael afterwards lived in southern Judaea, not far from the Idumean boundaries (Le'ethuboth, 64, b), at a place called Kephars-Aziz (כפר עזיז) where he occupied himself with the cultivation of the vine (Mishna Kilaim, vi. 4), and spent a large portion of his wealth in maintaining and fitting out young women who had been impoverished by the desolations of the war (Nedarim, 66, a). The remarkable part of his life to us is the system of interpretation which he laid down, and which, as the head of a large school in the apostolic age, he propounded to his disciples. As his exegetical canons were avowedly opposed to those of his contemporary R. Akiba, the head of an equally numerous and influential school, and as the mode in which the Scriptures were explained in the apostolic age will be better understood by setting forth the two systems, we shall notice R. Akiba's principles of interpretation before stating the rules which R. Ishmael laid down. According to some ancient notions which R. Akiba systematized, every repetition, figure, parallelism, synonym, word, letter, particle, pleonasm, nay the very shape, and every ornament of a letter or title, has a recondite meaning in the Scripture, 'just as every fibre of a fly's wing or an ant's foot has its peculiar significance.' Hence he maintained that the particles אֵת, נָם, אֵךְ, and וְ, as well as the construction of the finite verb with the infinitive, ex. gr., הֵשִׁב הָעֵבֶט חֶבְרִיטוֹ, have a dogmatic significance, and he, therefore, deduced points of law from them. Philo was of the same opinion (comp. σαφῶς εἰδὼς, ὅτι περιττὸν δνομα οὐδὲν τίθισιν, ὑπὸ τῆς τοῦ πραγματολογεῖν ἀμυλῆτος φορᾶς, De profugis, ed. Mangey, p. 458), only that he deduced from them ethical and philosophical maxims; and this was also the opinion of the Greek translator of Ecclesiastes in the Septuagint, as may be seen from his anxiety to indicate the Hebrew particle אֵת by the Greek σὺν, which has greatly perplexed the commentators who, being unacquainted with this fact, have been unable to account for this barbarism and violation of grammatical propriety (comp. Ginsburg, Comment. on Ecclesiastes, p. 496). Now R. Ishmael opposed this mode of interpretation, and maintained that the Bible, being written in human language, uses expressions in their common acceptation, that many of the repetitions and parallelisms are simply designed to render the style more rhetorical and powerful, and cannot, therefore, without violation of the laws of language be adduced in support of legal deductions. Accordingly he laid down thirteen exegetical rules which are called שלוש עשרה מדות של רבי ישמעאל, the thirteen rules of R. Ishmael, by which alone the Scriptures are to be interpreted (שהתורה נדרשת בהם), and which are as follows:—

1. Inference from Minor to Major, קל וחומר.—As this law has been laid down by Hillel I., and as it is illustrated by examples in its proper place [HILLEL], we shall only add that the object of inference (i.e., the major) must never be treated more rigorously than the subject from which the inference is made (i.e., the minor), as is evident from Num. xii. 14, 15, where the argument de minore ad majorem is employed by God himself, and where, as the Talmud rightly remarks (Baba Kama, 28, a), Miriam, who offended her heavenly Father, is not treated more rigorously than a daughter who offends her earthly parent (comp. also Mishna, Baba Kama, ii. 5).

2. The Comparison of Words or Ideas (ניזרה שוה).—When a similar expression occurs in the Bible in connection with two subjects, the same law is under certain circumstances applied to both. Three distinctions must be observed in the application of this exegetical law:—1. Either the expression is superfluous in both passages, in which case there can be no objection to this comparison of words, inasmuch as the very employment in both places of the same or a similar superfluous expression indicates a design; or 2. The expression is necessary in both places, in which case no comparison is made, as the שוה is co ipso null and void, because the expressions are wanted to explain the sense, and cannot therefore be employed for the deduction of particular laws; or 3. One of the expressions is superfluous, in which case the inference may be made, provided no objection can be raised against it from another law which has assigned a distinction to the subject of comparison (comp. Jebamoth, 70, b).

3. Building of the father, or the chief law, from one verse, and the chief law from two verses (בנין אב, מכתוב אחד ובנין אב משני כתובים). That is to say, a law which is applied in the Bible to two subjects different in nature, and occurring either in one verse or in two separate verses, and through which these subjects become alike, is considered as the chief law, and every subject which through one point comes within its range, is also put thereby, in all other respects, on an equality with those two subjects. This hermeneutical law is called בנין אב, building of the father, because it requires two subjects, and something whereby they are connected, as if it were two bricks constituting the walls, and one serving as a cover and medium to join the two walls together. The term אב, father, shows the superior power and durability of this exegetical law (comp. Pesachim, 86, b; Succa, 6, b; Jebamoth, 8, a; Kiddushim, 18, b; Sanhedrim, 4, a; Maccoth, 37, b; Berachoth, 34, a; Kerithoth, 17, b).

4. General and Special (כלל ופרט).—Thus when the law mentions first a general subject which has fewer marks and is of a wider compass, and this is followed by a special subject, with more marks and of a smaller compass, the definition of the latter is applied to the former in the interpretation of the law (comp. Tosafoth Nasir, 35, b, and art. HILLEL).

5. Special and General (פרט וכלל).—If vice versa a special subject is followed by a general one, the special is extended by the general, since, according to the traditional mode of interpretation, the first term is to be explained by the one which follows it. Thus when it is said, Exod. xxii. 9, 'If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep,' where ass, ox, and sheep are special, but the following expression בהמה, beast or cattle, is general, the preceding special terms are extended thereby, and it is concluded that everything living, even if it is not like the ass, ox, or sheep, comes under this law.

6. General Special and General (כלל ופרט וכלל). That is, when the general is followed by a special and this again by a general subject, the law is interpreted according to the marks of the special subject, since there is a doubt whether the stress lies upon the middle term, whereby the first general term is limited, or upon the last general term, which obtains a wider generality through it. Hence the middle course is taken, and the law is neither extended to the whole compass of the last expression nor limited to the middle term, but is applied to everything which resembles it. Thus, for instance, when Deut. xiv. 26 ordains that the money realised from the sale of the tithes to be taken to the Temple 'may be bestowed on whatsoever thy soul lusteth after [general], for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink [special], and for whatsoever thy soul desireth' [general again], it is concluded that just as the general has two properties, viz., fecundity, which is the case with oxen and sheep, and sustenance, which is the case with wine, so the subject which is to be comprised therein must have these two properties; and as winged animals have these two qualities, the money in question may be expended upon them. It is, however, a matter of dispute whether the resemblance is to be established on the ground of two or three properties (comp. Eruvin, 27, b ; 28, a).

7. A general subject which requires a special one, and a special which requires a general subject (כלל

8. When a special law is enacted for something which has already been comprised in a general law, it shows that it is also to be applied to the whole class (דבר שהיה בכלל ויצא מן הכלל ללמד, לא)

(ללמד על עצמו יצא, אלא ללמד על הכל כולו יצא). Thus it is enacted in Lev. vii. 20, that 'the soul that eateth of peace-offerings that pertain unto the Lord, having his uncleanness upon him, shall be cut off from his people,' which is already comprised in the law, 'he shall not eat of the holy things' (ibid. xxii. 4), since peace-offerings are holy things, hence it is inferred that it is applicable to all the sacrifices which belong to the category of peace-offerings, but not to other classes of sacrifices which are devoted to the service of the Temple. This exegetical rule, however, is not applicable in case the subject thus singled out from the general law for special enactment is expressed in the positive, and the general law itself is in the negative form (comp. Jebamoth, 7, a ; Shebuoth, 7, a ; Rashi on Sabbath, 70, a).

9. When a subject included in a general description is excepted from it for another enactment, whilst it remains in all other respects like it, it is excepted to be alleviated but not aggravated (דבר שהיה בכלל

ויצא למען מעט אחר, שהוא כענינו, נצא להקל ולא להחמיר).—Thus, for instance, in Lev. xiii. 18 it is stated, 'The flesh, when there was in the skin thereof a boil and it healeth,' and in ver. 24, 'or flesh, when there was in the skin thereof a burn from fire.' Now, from both these, which seem to be superfluous, inasmuch as inflammation and a burn belong to eruptions, and hence come under the law enacted for this class of complaints, it is inferred that they are only subject to the law which is expressly stated here, and not to the rigid laws which are elsewhere enacted about eruptions.

10. When a subject included in a general description is excepted from it for another enactment, whilst it is also not like it in other respects, it is excepted both to be alleviated and aggravated, i.e., its connec- tion with the general law entirely ceases (וכר שהיה בכלל ויצא למען מעט אחר, שלא כענינו נצא להקל והחמיר).—Thus, for instance, from the special mention in Lev. xiii. 29, 'If a man or woman have a plague upon the head or the beard,' when we should have thought that head and beard are comprised under the skin and flesh, and come under the law of skin diseases generally, it is inferred that they are only comprised under it in name but not in reality, and are the subject of special law (comp. ibid., vers. 10, 25, 30).

11. If a subject included in a general description has been excepted from it for the enactment of a new and opposite law, it cannot be restored again to the general class unless the Bible itself expressly restores it (דבר

שהיה בכלל ויצא לדבר חדש אי אתה יכול להחזירו לכלל עד שיתירנו הכתוב במפורש).—Thus, from the statement in Lev. xiv. 13, 'And he shall slay the lamb in the place where he shall kill the sin-offering and the burnt-offering, in the holy place; for as the sin-offering is the priest's, so is the trespass-offering; it is most holy;' it is inferred that the phrase 'as the sin-offering so is the trespass-offering,' which would otherwise be entirely superfluous, shows that the special subject respecting which new laws had been passed (comp. Lev. xiv. 13 with vii. 2-5), whereby it had been put in opposition to the general class, is again united and put on an equality therewith (comp. Jebamoth, 7, a ; Sebachim, 49, a).

12. The sense of an indefinite statement must either be determined from its connection (comp. Art. HILLEL, rule 7) or from the form and tendency of the statement itself (דבר הלמד מענינו ודבר הלמד מסופו).

13. When two statements seem to contradict each other, a third statement will reconcile them (שני כתובים המכחישים זה את זה עד שיבוא הכתוב השלישי ויכריע ביניהם).

It will be seen in the article MIDRASHIM of this Cyclopædia that these hermeneutical rules are most important to the understanding of the ancient versions. R. Ishmael is also the reputed author of the celebrated Midrash or traditional commentary on Exod. xii.-xxiii. 20, called מכללתא [MIDRASH]. Comp. ISHTOB (אִישׁ טוֹב, 'men of good'; ἰσθῶς; Istob). It is doubtful whether this is to be taken as one word, Ishtob, or whether the sacred writer intended to express by it the 'men' (אִישׁ) or inhabitants 'of Tob,' as in the phrase אִישׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל 'the men of Israel' (Judg. xx. 39). According to the latter interpretation 2 Sam. x. 6 would read 'The children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob, and the Syrians of Zoba, twenty thousand footmen, and of king Maacah a thousand men, and the men of Tob twelve thousand men.' In ver. 8, the only other place where Ishtob occurs, it may be interpreted in the same way, though it has there more the appearance of a proper name; and we know that proper names were sometimes compounded of ʿN, as Ish-bosheth and Ishod. Whatever the name may have been, reference is evidently made to one of the small principalities of Aram south of Damascus. 'The land of Tob' lay east of the Jordan, and may perhaps be the same here referred to (Judg. xi. 3, 5; Tob).—J. L. P.

ISIDORUS HISPALENSIS, bishop of Seville (Hispalis), was born about A.D. 570 at Carthage, of which city his father Severianus was the Præfect. In the year 600 or 601 he succeeded his brother Leander in the episcopate of Seville. He presided at the second council of Seville (A.D. 619) and at the council of Toledo, held in the year 633. He died April 4, 636. For variety and extent of knowledge Isidore is entitled to rank amongst the most learned men of his time, and his numerous writings, which exhibit a marvellous degree of familiarity with almost every branch of learning then known, rendered important service to his country and age. Of his extant works, those which relate to Biblical exegesis are—1. Proemia in Libros Veteris ac Novi Testamenti, which, as its title intimates, consists of brief summaries of the contents of the books of the O. and N. T.; 2. Liber numerorum qui in Sanctis Scripturis occurrunt, which may be described as a brief treatise on the mystic signification of numbers; 3. Allegoria quedam Sancta Scriptura, brief allegorical explanations of various terms and passages in the O. and N. T.; 4. Questiones de Veteri et Novo Testamento, a short Scripture catechism; and 5. Mysticorum expositiones sacramentorum seu Questiones in Vetus Testamentum. This, which is the largest and most important of his Biblical works, consists of expositions of various passages in the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, and 1st and 2d Samuel, 1st and 2d Kings, Esdras, and Maccabees, selected for the most part from the writings of Origen, Victorinus, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Cassian, and Gregory the Great. As its title leads us to expect, it is constructed on the principle of finding a mystical meaning in the minutest details of the Scripture narrative. Thus, for instance, in the explanations of the work of creation, the gathering together of the salt waters is said to denote the punishment of unbelievers by leaving them to the consequences of their unbelief; whilst the dry land represents the men who are thirsting after faith; the formation of man from the dust of the earth prefigures the birth of Christ from the seed of David; and the creation of Eve from the rib taken out of Adam's side represents the origination of the Church from the blood which flowed from the side of the Saviour. In addition to the above-mentioned works the following are also attributed to Isidore, but the evidence in favour of their authenticity is not conclusive. 6. Expositio in Canticum Canticorum Solomonis. 7. Testimonia Divina Scriptura et Patrum—A classified arrangement of Scriptural texts and aphorisms from the Fathers. 8. Glossæ in Sacram Scripturam.—S. ISIDORUS PELUSIOTA, an exegetical writer of the early part of the 5th century. He was a native of Alexandria (Ephraem of Antioch in Photius, cod. 288), and if we may believe Nicephorus (Hist. Eccl. xiv. 30) was a disciple of Chrysostom. From two of his extant letters (i. epp. 310, 311) it appears that he survived the council of Ephesus (A.D. 381); and from another (i. ep. 370) that he was probably then of great age, since Cyril addressed him as 'father.' The date of his death is uncertain. He passed a large part of his life in monastic seclusion at Pelusium, and hence has acquired the surname Pelusiota. He was greatly celebrated amongst his contemporaries for the austerity of the discipline to which he subjected himself (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. i. 15). He is styled 'presbyter' by Facundius Hermianensis, a writer of the 6th century (Pro Def. Trium Capitul. ii. 4), who speaks of him as 'vir sanctissimus et magnæ in Ecclesia Christi gloriæ,' and adds, that 'he wrote two thousand letters to the edification of the church, as many persons well knew.' Other writers (Suidas and Nicephorus) speak of nine or ten thousand. Of the letters now extant, which are 2013 in number, a large proportion are devoted to the explanation of Scripture passages. From these it is evident that Isidore enjoyed a high reputation as an expositor of Scripture, and that a large number of persons amongst both the clergy and the laity were in the habit of seeking from him the solution of their exegetical difficulties. His replies are written in a terse and sententious style, and contain many judicious remarks on the study of the Scriptures (ii. ep. 63), the right method of exegesis (iii. epp. 125, 292), the interpretation of prophecy (iv. ep. 203), and the explanation of parables (iv. ep. 137). As an expositor he follows in the steps of Chrysostom, of whom he was a warm admirer, and although not wholly free from the allegorizing tendencies of the times, he commonly bases his exposition upon a careful investigation of the grammatical sense. His explanations show a sound judgment and much Christian insight, and many of them are still worthy of respectful consideration.—S. N.

ISLE, ISLAND (ʿN; Sept. ʾēšōs, Vulg. insula). The Hebrew word is invariably translated either by the former or by the latter of these English words, which, having the same meaning, will be considered as one. It occurs in the three following senses. First, that of dry land in opposition to water; as, 'I will make the rivers islands' (Is. xlii. 15). In Is. xx. 6, the Isle of Ashdod means the country, and is so rendered in the margin. In Is. xxiii. 2, 6, 'the isle' means the country of Tyre, and in Ezek. xxvii. 6, 7, that of Chittim and Elisha. (See also Job xxii. 30.) Secondly; it is used both in Hebrew and English, according to its geographical meaning, for a country surrounded by water, as in Jer. xlvii. 4, 'the isle (margin) of Caphtor,' which is probably that of Cyprus. 'The isles of the sea' (Esth. x. 1) are evidently put in opposition to 'the land,' or continent. In Ps. xcvi. 1, 'the multitude of the isles' seem distinguished from the earth or continents, and are evidently added to complete the description of the whole world. Thirdly; the word is used by the Hebrews to designate all those countries divided from them by the sea. In Is. xi. 11, after an enumeration of countries lying on their own continent, the words, 'and the islands of the sea,' are added in order to comprehend those situate beyond the ocean. The following are additional instances of this usage of the word, which is of very frequent occurrence (Is. xlii. 10; lix. 18; lxvi. 19; Jer. xxv. 22; Ezek. xxvii.

3, 15; Zeph. ii. 11). It is observed by Sir I. Newton (on Daniel, p. 276), 'By the earth the Jews understood the great continent of all Asia and Africa, to which they had access by land, and by the isles of the sea they understood the places to which they sailed by sea, particularly all Europe.'—J. F. D.

ISRAEL (יִשְׂרָאֵל, for יִשְׂרָאֵל, contender or wrestler with God, Gen. xxxii. 28; Hos. xii. 4), the name received from God by the patriarch Jacob on the occasion of the mysterious interview on Peniel. Jacob having made preparation for meeting his brother Esau on his return from Padan-Aram, sent his people on across the brook Jabbok, while he remained behind to spend the night alone, probably in earnest prayer for divine protection and help. Here during the night a being appeared to him in the form of a man, with whom the patriarch wrestled until the dawn. Unable to overcome him, the stranger touched the hollow of his thigh, that is, the place of the thigh-joint, the effect of which was to incapacitate him for continuing the struggle. Jacob then recognised in his opponent a superior being, the angel of Jehovah, and found that he had been in his ignorance struggling with God. This changed his course; he then betook himself to prayers and tears, and by these he prevailed (Hos. xii. 4); his former antagonist yielded the blessing which Jacob implored, and to signalise his success and perpetuate the lesson the scene was designed to teach, he said, 'Thy name shall be called no more Jacob but Israel, for thou hast wrestled (לָחָם) with God and with man, and hast prevailed.' It is the opinion of many who accept this narrative as historical, that the scene narrated took place in a vision (Hengstenberg, Schröder, Umbreit, Milman, etc.) But this view is plainly untenable; the wrestling with the angel is no more a vision than is the passing over Jabbok, the dawning of the morning, or the halting of Jacob; the intention of the writer is evidently to place the whole on the same level, and we must either accept the scene of the wrestling as a fact, or reject it wholly as a myth. To those who would eliminate the supernatural from the Bible histories entirely, it will of course appear as the latter. But if the supernatural be admitted, if it be believed that God was wont to appear in human form to his servants, there seems no difficulty in believing the whole transaction to have taken place as it is narrated. Where the supernatural is admitted at all, it is absurd to cavil about a greater or a less in the degree of mystery attaching to any reported case of its manifestation; and in the case before us it is not more incredible that the angel of Jehovah should have wrestled with Jacob than that he should have partaken of food with Abraham, or have allowed his feet to be washed when he entered that patriarch's tent (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 334; Kurz, Hist. of Old Cov., i. 333). Besides, what is gained by the hypothesis of a vision? If it was a true vision, and not a mere idle dream, God must have given it; so that all that came before the patriarch's mind was a representation vouchsafed by God himself. But if it were unworthy of God to wrestle with his creature, was it worthy of him to represent himself as doing so? If it lowers our conception of God to suppose him actually doing any given thing, does it mend the matter to say that he virtually did that thing? To most minds, we presume, this will increase the difficulty rather than alleviate it; as is generally the case when expedients are resorted to to avoid the plain obvious meaning of Scripture. As to the meaning and intent of the scene, the suggestion of Kurz seems most probable, that God designed by the whole transaction to teach Jacob that it was not by human astuteness or power that he was to prevail, but by submission, dependence, and prayer. 'As, with the thigh the seat of his natural strength, in which he had contended, was paralysed, and he has now to betake himself to entreaty and prayer, so on the last day of his former life all confidence in his own strength which he had hitherto cherished, all trust in his natural cunning and cleverness, is cast away. He acknowledges that he is overcome, and only appeals to the grace and promise of God (Gen. xxxii. 11, 13). . . . We do not find the reason of the victory of Jacob over Jehovah in the continuance of his bodily wrestling as a symbol of spiritual wrestling, but, on the contrary, we regard this very bodily wrestling as representing the perversity which had characterised his former life' (Bk. cited p. 331).

2. The designation of the people descended from Jacob (Gen. xlviii. 20; Exod. v. 2; Num. xxi. 1; Josh. iv. 22; Rom. ix. 6, etc.) For this we have sometimes the fuller expression בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, B'ney Yisrael, Children of Israel; בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל, Beyth Y., House of I.; אֲדָת יִשְׂרָאֵל, Adath Y., or Qahal Y., Congregation of I.; שִׁבְטֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, Shibtey Y., Tribes of I. Israel came to be the common historical designation of the nation. For the history of the Israelitish people before the division of kingdoms, see ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB, MOSES, WANDERING, JOSHUA, JUDGES, SAMUEL, SAUL, DAVID, SOLOMON.

3. A name of honour for the truly pious among the people, the elect of God (Ps. lxxiii. 1; Is. xlix. 3; Hosea viii. 2; Rom. ix. 6, xi. 26).

4. The designation of the ten tribes which separated from Judah and formed THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL (2 Sam. ii. 9; 1 Kings xii. 1, etc.)

5. After the captivity this name is applied to the whole nation as settled again in Palestine (Ezra ii. 70; x. 5; Neh. xii. 47, etc.); and it remains the designation by which the Jews still prefer being known.—W. L. A.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. The separation of the Hebrew nation into two parts, of which one was to embrace ten of the tribes, and be distinctively named Israel, had its origin in the early power and ambition of the tribe of Ephraim. The rivalry of Ephraim and Judah began almost from the first conquest of the land; nor is it insignificant, that as Caleb belonged to the tribe of Judah, so did Joshua to that of Ephraim. From the very beginning Judah learned to act by itself; but the central position of Ephraim, with its fruitful and ample soil, and the long-continued authority of Joshua, must have taught most of the tribes west of the Jordan to look up to Ephraim as their head; and a still more important superiority was conferred on the same tribe by the fixed dwelling of the ark at Shiloh for so many generations (Josh. xviii. etc.) Judah could boast of Hebron, Machpelah, Bethlehem, names of traditional sanctity; yet so could

Ephraim point to Shechem, the ancient abode of Jacob; and while Judah, being on the frontier, was more exposed to the attack of the powerful Philistines, Ephraim had to fear only those Canaanites from within who were not subdued or conciliated. The haughty behaviour of the Ephraimites towards Gideon, a man of Manasseh (Judg. viii. 1), sufficiently indicates the pretensions they made. Still fiercer language towards Jephthah the Gileadite (Judg. xiii. 1) was retorted by less gentleness than Gideon had shewn; and a bloody civil war was the result, in which their pride met with a severe punishment. This may in part explain their quiet submission, not only to the priestly rule of Eli and his sons, who had their centre of authority at Shiloh, but to Samuel, whose administration issued from three towns of Benjamin. Of course his prophetic character and personal excellence eminently contributed to this result; and it may seem that Ephraim, as well as all Israel besides, became habituated to the predominance of Benjamin, so that no serious resistance was made to the supremacy of Saul. At his death a new schism took place through their jealousy of Judah; yet, in a few years' time, by the splendour of David's victories, and afterwards by Solomon's peaceful power, a permanent national union might seem to have been effected. But the laws of inheritance in Israel, excellent as they were for preventing permanent alienation of landed property, and the degradation of the Hebrew poor into prædial slaves, necessarily impeded the perfect fusion of the tribes, by discouraging intermarriage, and hindering the union of distant estates in the same hands. Hence, when the sway of Solomon began to be felt as a tyranny, the old jealousies of the tribes revived, and Jeroboam, an Ephraimite (1 Kings xi. 26), being suspected of treason, fled to Shishak, king of Egypt. The death of Solomon was followed by a defection of ten of the tribes, which established the separation of Israel from Judah (B.C. 975).

This was the most important event which had befallen the Hebrew nation since their conquest of Canaan. The chief territory and population were now with Jeroboam, but the religious sanction, the legitimate descent, lay with the rival monarch. From the political danger of allowing the ten tribes to go up to the sanctuary of Jerusalem, the princes of Israel, as it were in self-defence, set up a sanctuary of their own; and the intimacy of Jeroboam with the king of Egypt may have determined his preference for the form of idolatry (the calves) which he established at Dan and Bethel. In whatever else his successors differed, they one and all agreed in upholding this worship, which, once established, appeared essential to their national unity. Nevertheless it is generally understood to have been a worship of Jehovah, though under unlawful and degrading forms. Worse by far was the worship of Baal, which came in under one monarch only, Ahab, and was destroyed after his son was slain by Jehu. A secondary result of the revolution was the ejection of the tribe of Levi from their lands and cities in Israel; at least, such as remained were spiritually degraded by the compliances required, and could no longer offer any resistance to the kingly power by aid of their sacred character. When the priestly tribe had thus lost independence, it lost also the power to assist the crown. The succession of Jeroboam's family was hallowed by no religious blessing; and when his son was slain, no Jehoiada was found to rally his supporters and ultimately avenge his cause. The example of successful usurpation was so often followed by the captains of the armies, that the kings in Israel present to us an irregular series of dynasties, with several short and tumultuous reigns. This was one cause of disorder and weakness to Israel, and hindered it from swallowing up Judah: another was found in the relations of Israel towards foreign powers, which will presently be dwelt upon.

Jeroboam originally fixed on Shechem as the centre of his monarchy, and fortified it; moved perhaps not only by its natural suitability, but by the remembrances of Jacob which clove to it, and by the auspicious fact that here first Israel had decided for him against Rehoboam. But the natural delightfulness of Tirzah (Cant. vi. 4) led him, perhaps late in his reign, to erect a palace there (1 Kings xiv. 17). After the murder of Jeroboam's son, Baasha seems to have intended to fix his capital at Ramah, as a convenient place for annoying the king of Judah, whom he looked on as his only dangerous enemy; but when forced to renounce this plan (xv. 17, 21), he acquiesced in Tirzah, which continued to be the chief city of Israel, until Omri, who, since the palace at Tirzah had been burned during the civil war (1 Kings xvi. 18), built Samaria, with the ambition not uncommon in the founder of a new dynasty (xvi. 24). Samaria continued to the end of the monarchy to be the centre of administration; and its strength appears to have justified Omri's choice. For details, see SAMARIA; also TIRZAH and SHECHEM.

There is reason to believe that Jeroboam carried back with him into Israel the good-will, if not the substantial assistance, of Shishak; and this will account for his escaping the storm from Egypt which swept over Rehoboam in his fifth year. During that first period Israel was far from quiet within. Although the ten tribes collectively had decided in favour of Jeroboam, great numbers of individuals remained attached to the family of David and to the worship at Jerusalem, and in the three first years of Rehoboam migrated into Judah (2 Chron. xi. 16, 17). Perhaps it was not until this process commenced, that Jeroboam was worked up to the desperate measure of erecting rival sanctuaries with visible idols (1 Kings xii. 27): a measure which met the usual ill-success of profane state-craft, and aggravated the evil which he feared. It set him at war with the whole order of priests and Levites, whose expulsion or subjugation, we may be certain, was not effected without convulsing his whole kingdom, and so occupying him as to free Rehoboam from any real danger, although no peace was made. The king of Judah improved the time by immense efforts in fortifying his territory (2 Chron. xi. 5-11); and, although Shishak soon after carried off the most valuable spoil, no great or definite impression could be made by Jeroboam. Israel having so far taken the place of heathen nations, and being already perhaps even in alliance with Egypt, at an early period—we know not how soon—sought and obtained the friendship of the kings of Damascus. A sense of the great advantage derivable from such a union seems to have led Ahab afterwards to behave with mildness and conciliation towards Benhadad, at a time when it could have been least expected

(1 Kings xx. 31-34). From that transaction we learn that Benhadad I. had made in Damascus 'streets for Omri,' and Omri for Benhadad in Samaria. This, no doubt, implied that 'a quarter' was assigned for Syrian merchants in Samaria, which was probably fortified like the 'camp of the Tyrians' in Memphis, or the English factory at Calcutta; and in it, of course, Syrian worship would be tolerated. Against such intercourse the prophets, as might be expected, entered their protest (ver. 35-43); but it was in many ways too profitable to be renounced. In the reign of Baasha, Asa king of Judah, sensible of the dangerous advantage gained by his rival through the friendship of the Syrians, determined to buy them off at any price [see also under JUDAH]; and by sacrificing 'the treasures of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the king's house' (xv. 18), induced Benhadad I. to break his league with Baasha and to ravage all the northern district of Israel. This drew off the Israelitish monarch, and enabled Asa to destroy the fortifications of Ramah, which would have stopped the course of his trade (xv. 17), perhaps that with the sea-coast and with Tyre. Such was the beginning of the war between Israel and Syria, on which the safety of Judah at that time depended. Cordial union was not again restored between the two northern states until the days of Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah, when Damascus must have already felt the rising power of Nineveh. The renewed alliance instantly proved so disastrous to Judah, which was reduced to extremest straits (Is. vii. 2; 2 Kings xv. 37; 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 6), as may seem to justify at least the policy of Asa's proceeding. Although it was impossible for a prophet to approve of it (2 Chron. xvi. 7), we may only so much the more infer that Judah was already brought into most pressing difficulties, and that the general course of the war, in spite of occasional reverses, was decidedly and increasingly favourable to Israel.

The wars of Syria and Israel were carried on chiefly under three reigns, those of Benhadad II., Hazael, and Benhadad III., the two first monarchs being generally prosperous, especially Hazael, the last being as decidedly unsuccessful. Although these results may have depended in part on personal qualities, there is high probability that the feebleness displayed by the Syrians against Jehoash and his son Jeroboam was occasioned by the pressure of the advancing empire of Nineveh. To make this clear, a small table of synchronisms, representing the two heathen powers, may be serviceable. The dates are only approximate.

B.C.	SYRIA.	B.C.	ASSYRIA.
1000?	Rezon.	1050	Nineveh unable to resist the king of Zobah, and quite unheard of in Palestine.
980?	Hizion.
960?	Tabrimon.
940	Benhadad I.	940	Nineveh still unable to interfere with the Syrians, but perhaps beginning to rise into empire by the conquest of Media and Babylon.
910?	Benhadad II.
885	Hazael.
845	Benhadad III.	850	Assyria undoubtedly coming forward into great power.
758	Rezin.	765?	The king of Assyria marches for the first time into Israel.

Asa adhered, through the whole of his long reign, to the policy of encouraging hostility between the two northern kingdoms; and the first Benhadad had such a career of success that his son found himself in a condition to hope for an entire conquest of Israel. His formidable invasions wrought an entire change in the mind of Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 44), who saw that if Israel was swallowed up by Syria there would be no safety for Judah. We may conjecture that this consideration determined him to unite the two royal families; for no common cause would have induced so religious a king to select for his son's wife Athaliah the daughter of Jezebel. The age of Ahaziah, who was sprung from this marriage, forces us to place it as early as B.C. 912, which is the third year of Jehoshaphat and sixth of Ahab. Late in his reign Jehoshaphat threw himself most cordially (1 Kings xxiii. 4) into the defence of Ahab, and by so doing probably saved Israel from a foreign yoke. Another mark of the low state into which both kingdoms were falling, is, that after Ahab's death the Moabites refused their usual tribute to Israel, and (as far as can be made out from the ambiguous words of 2 Kings iii. 27) the united force of the two kingdoms failed of doing more than irritate them. Soon after, in the reign of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, the Edomites followed the example, and established their independence. This event possibly engaged the whole force of Judah, and hindered it from succouring Samaria during the cruel siege which it sustained from Benhadad II., in the reign of Jehoram son of Ahab. The declining years and health of the king of Syria gave a short respite to Israel; but, in B.C. 885, Hazael, by defeating the united Hebrew armies, commenced the career of conquest and harassing invasion by which he 'made Israel like the dust by threshing.' Even under Jehu he subdued the trans-Jordanic tribes (2 Kings x. 32). Afterwards, since he took the town of Gath (2 Kings xii. 17) and prepared to attack Jerusalem—an attack which Jehoash king of Judah averted only by strictly following Asa's precedent—it is manifest that all the passes and chief forts of the country west of the Jordan must have been in his hand. Indeed, as he is said 'to have left to Jehoahaz only fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen,' it would seem that Israel was strictly a conquered province, in which Hazael dictated (as the English to the native rajahs of India) what military force should be kept up. From this thralldom Israel was delivered by some unexplained agency. We are told merely that 'Jehovah gave to Israel a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians; and the children of Israel dwelt in their tents as before-time,' 2 Kings xiii. 5. It is allowable to conjecture that the (apparently unknown) deliverer was the Assyrian monarchy, which, assailing Hazael towards the end of the reign of Jehoahaz, entirely drew away the Syrian armies. That it was some urgent, powerful, and continued pressure, considering the great strength which the empire of Damascus had attained, seems clear from the sudden weakness of Syria through the reigns of Jehoash and Jeroboam II., the former of whom thrice defeated Benhadad III. and 'recovered the cities of Israel; the latter not only regained the full territory of the ten tribes, but made himself master (for a time at least) of Damascus and Hamath. How entirely the friendship of Israel and Judah had been caused and cemented by their common fear of Syria is proved by the fact that no sooner is the power of Damascus broken than new war breaks out between the two kingdoms, which ended in the plunder of Jerusalem by Jehoash, who also broke down its walls and carried off hostages; after which there is no more alliance between Judah and Israel. The empire of Damascus seems to have been entirely dissolved under the son of Hazael, and no mention is made of its kings for eighty years or more. When Pekah, son of Remaliah, reigned in Samaria, Rezin, as king of Damascus, made a last but ineffectual effort for its independence.

The same Assyrian power which had doubtless so seriously shaken, and perhaps temporarily overturned, the kingdom of Damascus, was soon to be felt by Israel. Menahem was invaded by Pul (the first sovereign of Nineveh whose name we know), and was made tributary. His successor, Tiglath-pileser, in the reign of Pekah, son of Remaliah, carried captive the eastern and northern tribes of Israel (i.e., perhaps all their chief men as hostages?), and soon after slew Rezin, the ally of Pekah, and subdued Damascus. The following emperor, Shalmaneser, besieged and captured Samaria, and terminated the kingdom of Israel, B.C. 721.

This branch of the Hebrew monarchy suffered far greater and more rapid reverses than the other. From the accession of Jeroboam to the middle of Baasha's reign it probably increased in power; it then waned with the growth of the Damascene empire; it struggled hard against it under Ahab and Jehoram, but sank lower and lower; it was dismembered under Jehu, and made subject under Jehoahaz. From B.C. 940 to B.C. 850, is, as nearly as can be ascertained, the period of depression; and from B.C. 914 to B.C. 830 that of friendship or alliance with Judah. But after (about) B.C. 850 Syria began to decline, and Israel soon shot out rapidly; so that Joash and his son Jeroboam appear, of all Hebrew monarchs, to come next to David and Solomon. How long this burst of prosperity lasted does not distinctly appear; but it would seem that entire dominion over the ten tribes was held until Pekah received the first blow from the Assyrian conqueror.

Besides that which was a source of weakness to Israel from the beginning, viz., the schism of the crown with the whole ecclesiastical body, other causes may be discerned which made the ten tribes less powerful, in comparison with the two, than might have been expected. The marriage of Ahab to Jezebel brought with it no political advantages at all commensurate with the direct moral mischief, to say nothing of the spiritual evil; and the reaction against the worship of Baal was a most ruinous atonement for the sin. To suppress the monstrous iniquity, the prophets let loose the remorseless Jehu, who, not satisfied with the blood of Ahab's wife, grandson, and seventy sons, murdered first the king of Judah himself, and next forty-two youthful and innocent princes of his house; while, strange to tell, the daughter of Jezebel gained by his deed the throne of Judah, and perpetrated a new massacre. The horror of such crimes must have fallen heavily on Jehu, and have caused a wide-spread disaffection among his own subjects. Add to this, that the Phœnicians must have deeply resented his proceedings; so that we get a very sufficient clue to the prostration of Israel under the foot of Hazael during the reign of Jehu and his son.

Another and a more abiding cause of political debility in the ten tribes was found in the imperfect consolidation of the inhabitants into a single nation. Since those who lived east of the Jordan retained, to a great extent at least, their pastoral habits, their union with the rest could never have been very firm; and when a king was neither strong independently of them, nor had good hereditary pretensions, they were not likely to contribute much to his power. After their conquest of the Hagarenes and the depression of the Moabites and Ammonites by David, they had free room to spread eastward; and many of their chief men may have become wealthy in flocks and herds (like Machir the son of Ammiel, of Lodebar, and Barzillai the Gileadite, 2 Sam. xvii. 27), over whom the authority of the Israelitish crown would naturally be precarious; while west of the Jordan the agrarian law of Moses made it difficult or impossible for a landed nobility to form itself, which could be formidable to the royal authority. That the Arab spirit of freedom was rooted in the eastern tribes, may perhaps be inferred from the case of the Rechabites, who would neither live in houses nor plant vines; undoubtedly, like some of the Nabathæans, lest by becoming settled and agricultural they should be enslaved. Yet the need of imposing this law on his descendants would not have been felt by Jonadab, had not an opposite tendency been rising—that of agricultural settlement.

On another point our information is defective, viz., what proportion of the inhabitants of the land consisted of foreign slaves, or subject and degraded castes [SOLOMON]. Such as belonged to tribes who practised circumcision [CIRCUMCISION] would with less difficulty become incorporated with the Israelites; but the Philistines who were intermixed with Israel, by resisting this ordinance, must have continued heterogeneous. In 1 Kings xv. 27; xvi. 15, we find the town of Gibbethon in the hand of the Philistines during the reigns of Nadab, Baasha, and Zimri: nor is it stated that they were finally expelled. Gibbethon being a Levitical town, it might be conjectured that it had been occupied by the Philistines when the Levites emigrated into Judah; but the possibilities here are many.

Although the priests and Levites nearly disappeared out of Israel, prophets were perhaps even more numerous and active there than in Judah; and Ahijah, whose prediction first endangered Jeroboam (1 Kings xi. 29-40), lived in honour at Shiloh to his dying day (xiv. 2). Obadiah alone saved one hundred prophets of Jehovah from the rage of Jezebel (xviii. 13). Possibly their extra-social character freed them from the restraint imposed on priests and Levites; and while they felt less bound to the formal rites of the Law, the kings of Israel were also less jealous of them. In fact, just as a great cathedral in Christendom tends to elevate the priestly above the prophetic functions, so, it is possible, did the proximity of Jerusalem; and the prophet may have moved most freely where he came least into contact with the priest. That most inauspicious event—the rupture of Israel with Judah—may thus have been overruled for the highest blessing of the world, by a fuller development of the prophetic spirit.—F. W. N.

ISSACHAR (יִשָּׁכָר; Sept. Issachar). 1. A son of Jacob and Leah, born B.C. 1749, who gave name to one of the tribes of Israel (Gen. xxx. 18; Num. xxvi. 25).

2. The tribe called after Issachar. Jacob, on his death-bed, speaking metaphorically of the character and destinies of his sons, or rather of the tribes which should spring from them, said, 'Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens' (Gen. xlix. 14, 15). Remembering the character of the ass in eastern countries, we may be sure that this comparison was not intended in disparagement. The ass is anything but stupid; and the proverbial obstinacy which it sometimes exhibits in our own country is rather the result of ill-treatment than a natural characteristic of the animal. Its true attributes are patience, gentleness, great capability of endurance, laborious exertion, and a meek submission to authority. Issachar, therefore, the progenitor of a race singularly docile, and distinguished for their patient industry, is exhibited under the similitude of the meekest and most laborious of quadrupeds. The descriptive character goes on:—'And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute;' which probably does not imply that reproach upon Issachar, as addicted to ignominious ease, which some commentators find in it. It seems simply to mean that finding itself in possession of a most fertile portion of Palestine, the tribe devoted itself to the labours of agriculture, taking little interest in the public affairs of the nation. Josephus says that the portion of this tribe extended in length from Mount Carmel to the river [Jordan], and in breadth to Mount Tabor (Antiq. v. 1. 22). 'Every traveller has remarked on the richness of its soil, and the exuberance of its crops. . . . The very weeds are a sign of what, in better hands, the vast plain might become' (Stanley, Sin. and Pal., 348). But although a decided preference of agricultural over commercial or military pursuits is here indicated, there seems no reason to conclude, as some gather from the last clause, that the tribe would be willing to purchase exemption from war by the payment of a heavy tribute. The words do not necessarily imply this; and there is no evidence that the tribe ever declined any military service to which it was called. On the contrary, it is specially commended by Deborah for the promptitude with which it presented itself in the war with Jabin (Judg. v. 15); and in the days of David honourable testimony is borne to its character (1 Chron. xii. 32). In this passage the 'children of Issachar' are described as 'men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do:' which, compared with Esther i. 13, has been supposed to mean that they were skilled in the various practical applications of astronomy. But what need there was of astronomy on the occasion of calling David to the throne of Israel after the death of Abner and Ishbosheth, is not very easy to discover. It more probably means that they were men held in esteem for their prudence and wisdom, and who knew that the time was come when it was no longer safe to delay calling David to the throne of all Israel. On quitting Egypt the tribe of Issachar numbered 54,400 adult males, which gave it the fifth numerical rank among the twelve tribes, Judah, Simeon, Zebulun, and Dan being alone above it. In the wilderness it increased nearly 10,000, and then ranked as the third of the tribes, Judah and Dan only being more numerous (Num. i. 29; xxvi. 25). The territory of the tribe comprehended the whole of the plain of Esdraelon and the neighbouring districts—the granary of Palestine. It was bounded on the east by the Jordan, on the west and south by Manasseh, and on the north by Asher and Zebulun. It contained the towns of Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Jezreel, and Bethshan, with the villages of Endor, Aphek, and Ib-lean, all historical names: the mountains of Tabor and Gilboa, and the valley of Jezreel, were in the territory of this tribe, and the course of the river Kishon lay through it.—J. ISSHIAH (יִשְׁיָא; Sept. Issias), also written Jeshaiah (1 Chron. xxvi. 25), was son of Rehabiah, whose father was Eliezer, the younger son of Moses by his wife Zipporah. He was one of the 'rulers' or keepers 'of the treasures' in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi. 25, 26), and the head of the numerous family of Rehabiah (1 Chron. xxiii. 17).

The name also occurs (Sept. Istia) among the family of Uzziel the Kohathite, who was of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. xxiv. 20, 25). The name of his eldest son was Zechariah.—W. J. C.

ISSUE. 1. מִקְרָהּ דָּמִים, the puerperal hæmorrhage (Lev. xii. 7); the ceremonial uncleanness caused by which had to be atoned for and cleansed. 2. The γυνή αἰμορροῦσα who was cured by our Lord (Matt. ix. 20; Mark v. 25; Luke viii. 44) suffered from some chronic hæmorrhage, but of what kind we are not informed. It may have been excessive menstrual discharge, or it may have been severe hæmorrhoids. Whatever it was, the long continuance of the disease indicates that it must have been periodic in its attacks. Such a disease not only prostrated the strength of the sufferer but exposed her to a constant exclusion from the religious assemblies of the Jews, as well as to an enforced celibacy. 3. רָץ or רָץ ('a running issue,' Lev. xv. 2; xxii. 4; an 'issue,' Lev. xv. 3, 8, 25, 28; Num. v. 2; 2 Sam. iii. 29), denotes, in the case of females, doubtless the ordinary menstrual discharge, protracted, it may be, to an abnormal extent (Lev. xv. 25); and in the case of men either an involuntary flux of the seminal fluid, or gonorrhœa of the more virulent kind, such as is the result of impure coition. The LXX. describe the person referred to in Lev. xv. 2 as γονόρροος (cf. ver. 4, ff.); Josephus takes the same view (Antiq. iii. 11. 3; Bell. Jud. v. 5. 6; vi. 6. 9); and the Talmudists accord (Maimon. in Mishnam; Tr. Zabim ii. 2, p. vi., ed. Surenhus. p. 454). The uncleanness specified in this chapter as communicated by the רָץ seem to favour this opinion; for when the spittle, the clothes, the seat, convey uncleanness, something of the nature of a virulent disease must be supposed. A difficulty, however, arises in the way of our supposing that the disease referred to is the gonorrhœa virulenta, from the fact that this disease is supposed only to be consequent on the lues venerea, a disease unknown, it is said, before the 15th century. This has led Winer to conclude that the disease in question is a discharge from the urethra, such as may arise from impure coition, though without any syphilitic contagion (Realw., in voc. Samenfluss; comp. Michaelis, Lev. of Moses iv. 282; Bartholini, De morbis Biblicis).—W. L. A.

ITALIAN VERSIONS. The earliest version of the Scriptures into the modern Italian is said to have been made by Giacomo da Viraggio (Jacobus de Voragine), Archbishop of Genoa, in the beginning of the 13th century. This rests exclusively on the authority of Sixtus Senensis (Biblioth. Sanct., lib. 4), and there is weighty reason for doubting the statement. That at an early period, however, versions of parts, if not of the whole, of Scripture into Italian were made, is evidenced by the existence in various libraries of MSS. containing these. In the Royal Library at Paris is an Italian Bible in two vols. fol., as well as several codices containing parts of the Bible in that language; in the library at Upsala is a codex containing a history compiled from the first seven books of the O. T. in Italian; in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, is an Italian translation of the N. T., with portions of the Old; and in other libraries like reliques are preserved (see Le Long, Bib. Sac., cap. vi., sec. 1).

The earliest printed Italian Bible is that of Nicolo di Malermi (or Malherbi), a Venetian Benedictine monk of the order of Camaldoli; it appeared under the title of Biblia Volgare Historiata, etc., Venice 1471. The translation is from the Vulgate, and is pronounced by R. Simon to be executed in a harsh style and carelessly (Hist. Crit. du N. T., p. 487). It was, however, repeatedly reprinted; the best editions are, that superintended by Marini, 2 vols. fol., Ven. 1477, and that issued at Venice in 1 vol. fol. in 1567. In 1530 Antonio Brucioli [BRUCCIOLI] issued his translation of the N. T., and in 1532 the first edition of his translation of the entire Bible, containing a revised and corrected translation of the N. T., under the title of La Biblia che contiene Sacri libri del vecchio Testamento tradotto nuovamente de la Hebraica verita in lingua Toscana, con divini libri del N. T. tradotti da Greco in ling. Tosc. con privilegio de lo inclito Senato Veneto, e lettera a Francesco I. Rege Christianissimo, fol. Ven. ap. Luc. Ant. Junta. This translation is said by Simon to follow in the O. T. the Latin version of Pagnini rather than to be made from the original Hebrew, and to partake of the rudeness and barbarism of Pagnini's style. It was put in the index of the prohibited books among works of the first class. Many editions of it, however, appeared; of which the most important is that of Zanetti, 3 vols. fol., Ven. 1540. Bruccioli's version of the O. T. in a corrected form was printed at Geneva in 1562, along with a new version of the N. T. by Gallars and Beza; to this notes are added, and especially an exposition of the Apocalypse. The translation of Marmochini, though professedly original, is in reality only a revised edition of that of Bruccioli, the design of which was to bring it more fully into accordance with the Vulgate. Several translations of the Psalms, some from the Hebrew, and of other parts of Scripture, appeared in Italy between the middle and end of the 16th century, and a new translation of the N. T., by a Florentine of the name of Zacharia, appeared in 8vo at Venice in 1542, and at Florence in 1566; copies of which are now extremely rare. The Jew David de Pomis issued a translation of Ecclesiastes with the original Hebrew, Ven. 1578.

In 1607 appeared at Geneva the first Protestant Italian version, that of Giovanni Diodati [DIODATI]: La Biblia: Cioè I Libri del Vecchio e del Nuovo Testamento, sm. fol. To this are appended brief marginal notes. This version was made directly from the original texts, and stands in high esteem for fidelity. It has been repeatedly reprinted. Being in the plain Lucchese dialect, it is especially adapted for circulation among the common people.

A version affecting greater elegance, but by no means so faithful, is that of Antonio Martini, Archbishop of Florence. The N. T. appeared at Turin in 1769, and the O. T. in 1779, both accompanied with the text of the Vulgate and with copious notes, chiefly from the fathers. This work received the approbation of Pope Pius VI. It is made avowedly from the Vulgate, and is in the pure Tuscan dialect. Repeated editions have appeared; one issued at Livorno (Leghorn), and those issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society, Lond. 1813, 1821, want the notes, and have been consequently placed in the index of prohibited books. To read and circulate this book, though bearing the Papal sanction, was till lately a grave offence, as the well-known case of the Madaia in Florence proves.—W. L. A.

ITALY (Ἰταλία). This, like most geographical names, was differently applied at different periods. In the earliest times the name 'Italy' inclosed only the little peninsula of Calabria (Strabo, v. 1). The country now called Italy was then inhabited by a number of nations distinct in origin, language, and government: such as the Gauls, Ligurians, and Veneti, on the north; and the Pelasgi, Sabines, and Etrurians, etc., on the south. But as the power of Rome advanced, these nations were successively annexed to the great state, and the name 'Italy' extended also. The time when it came to be applied to the whole country south of the Alps cannot be ascertained; but Polybius seems to employ it in this sense (i. 6; ii. 14). In the age of Augustus the name was definitely used as a geographical term, in the same sense in which it is used at the present day, and Rome was its acknowledged capital. Italy was then the nucleus of the Roman empire—the centre of its wealth, its government, and its power. What England is now to the British empire, Italy was then to the Roman empire. It was evidently in this sense the N. T. writers used the name. Italy was to them the seat and centre of Roman authority. Luke tells us (Acts. xviii. 2) of a certain Aquila and Priscilla 'lately come from Italy (to Corinth), because Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome.' It would seem that for foreigners and all those in distant countries 'Rome' and 'Italy' were used as almost synonymous. So when Paul appealed to Caesar, and Agrippa resolved to send him to Rome, Luke writes, 'It was determined that we should sail into Italy' (Acts xxvii. 1). The phrase of ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας in Heb. xiii. 24 has been variously interpreted. Some have regarded it as clearly indicating that the writer was in Italy at the time; while others affirm that it proves the very contrary, showing the locality of the writer to have been out of Italy, otherwise οὐ ἐν τῇ Ἰταλίᾳ would have been used. The fact is however, as has been stated by Winer, that 'A critical argument regarding the place where the letter was written should never have been drawn from this passage.' The phrase simply means 'those belonging to Italy,' whether in that country or out of it (Winer, Grammar of N. T. Diction, p. 651; Delitzsch, Der Brief an die Hebräer, ad loc.) Christianity must have taken root in Italy at a very early period. The Epistle to the Romans, written only about twenty-five years after the crucifixion, shows that there was then a large and flourishing church there. Notwithstanding repeated and terrible persecutions, the church continued to prosper, until at length Rome became the centre of ecclesiastical as well as of civil authority.—J. L. P.

ITHAMAR (יִתְמָר, palm-island; Sept. Ἰθάμαρ), fourth son of Aaron. He was consecrated to the priesthood along with his brothers (Exod. vi. 23; Num. iii. 2, 3). Nothing is individually recorded of him, except that the property of the tabernacle was placed under his charge (Exod. xxxviii. 21), and that he superintended all matters connected with its removal by the Levitical sections of Gershon and Merari (Num. iv. 28-33). The sacred utensils and their removal were entrusted to his elder brother Eleazar. Ithamar, with his descendants, occupied the position of common priests till the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli, under circumstances of which we are ignorant. Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high-priest of that line; and the pontificate then reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings ii. 27).—J. K.

ITH-K'K (יִתְקַק). This expression, which is composed of the initials (י) יִשְׁעִיָּה Isaiah, (ח) חֲזַק the twelve minor prophets, and (ק) קִינֹת Lamentations, occurs at the end of these four books in the Masoretic text of some editions of the Hebrew Bibles. It is to indicate that each of these books belongs to those four in which the penultimate verse εὐφημίας χάρις is repeated to obviate the harsh expression with which these books terminate, and to shew that the verses thus repeated did not originally form part of the text, and are therefore left unpointed. In the minor prophets, which have always formed one volume in the Hebrew MSS., the repetition, and hence the phrase יִתְקַק—Note, this is one of the four indicated by Ith-K-k—occur at the end of Malachi.—C. D. G.

ITHNAN (יִתְנָן, 'given.' There is great confusion in the proper names in the part of the Septuagint where this occurs. Josh. xv. 23 reads καὶ Κἀδὲς καὶ Ἀσοριωνάλυ καὶ Μανῶμ. The word Ἀσοριωνάλυ appears to be formed by running together the two names Hazor and Ithnan. The Alexandrine text reads Ἰθναῖφ, joining Ithnan and Ziph; Vulg. Jethnam, a town on the south-east border of Judah, near Edom, and mentioned in connection with Kedesh and Hazor. The site is unknown.—J. L. P.

ITHRA (יִתְרָא, also יִתְרִי; 'Iēther, 'Iothōp; Jetra, Jether; Joseph. Antiq. Ἰεθάρος; excellence, pre-eminence), brother-in-law of David, father of Amasa, by Abigail, David's sister, and uncle of Joab. He is called an 'Ishmaelite, 1 Chron. ii. 17; but an 'Israelite, 2 Sam. xvii. 25. The latter is almost certainly an incorrect reading. It appears so for these reasons: 1. All the other persons mentioned in the connection are Israelites, and, consequently, there is no reason for distinguishing one of them by this title—the title would be meaningless. 2. There would be nothing noticeable in the fact that the father of Amasa was an Israelite, yet the historian by his manner evidently intends something remarkable. 3. It is quite a remarkable fact that a brother-in-law of David should be an 'Ishmaelite. 4. The use of the article before the word indicates something emphatic: 'Now Amasa was the son of a man whose name was Ithra, THE —,' 'Abigail bare A. and the father of A. was Jether, THE —,' Surely Israelite, in such a case, would be not only wholly unemphatic, but altogether unnecessary.—J. L.

ITHREAM (יִתְרֵאם; Sept. Ἰεθεράμ; Ἰεθράμ), the sixth and last son born to David in Hebron. His mother was Eglah, distinguished by the special title of 'David's wife' (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chron. iii. 3), and believed, according to Jewish tradition (Jerome, Quest. Heb. in 2 Sam. iii. 5; v. 23), to have been the same as Michal, the daughter of Saul (2 Sam. vi. 20). The Bible, however, not only affords no foundation for such a tradition, but expressly contradicts it by saying that 'Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death' (2 Sam. vi. 23).—W. J. C.

ITHRITE, THE (יִתְרִי; ὁ Ἰεθραῖος, 'Iethpl; Alex. Ἰθρηel), is a name supposed to be derived from Jether; but whether originally applied to a person belonging to a place of that name, or to one whose father's name was Jether, it is impossible to say. Gesenius is silent regarding it. The balance of probability, however, seems in favour of the latter supposition. Jether, it is understood, is only another form for Ithra (2 Sam. xvii. 25), the latter being most likely a corruption. Ithra was the brother-in-law of David, and it is just possible that the 'Ithrites,' as a family, sprang from him. In 1

Chron. (ii. 53) they are the first mentioned among the families of Kirjath-jearim, a circumstance which points to Judah as at one time their place of residence. Two of David's hero guards were Ithrites (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chron. xi. 40).—W. J. C.

ITTAH-KAZIN (יִתְחַזְקִין, 'The time or people of the judge; without the ה local it would be יִתְחַזְקִין; ἰθῆλ καζαζῖν; Alex. καζῖν; Thacasin), the name of one of the towns on the border of Zebulun. Japhia, which is mentioned along with it, stood about three miles south-west of Nazareth, and Ittah-Kazin could not have been far distant, but the site has not been discovered (Josh. xix. 13).—J. L. P.

ITTAI (יִתָּי, 'Eṯai, 'Eṯi; Alex. 'Eṯel; Ethai; my nearness), called 'Ittai, the Gittite,' usually regarded as a native of Gath and a Philistine, commander of David's body-guard of Gittites. We first meet with him, 2 Sam. xv. 19, when, during the rebellion of Absalom, David, at a distance from Jerusalem, took up a position to review his servants and his troops as they passed before him. Among those who passed were the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and the Gittites, who had followed the king from Gath, and of whom Ittai seems to have been the leader. And 'David said to Ittai the Gittite: wherefore goest thou also with us? Return to thy place and abide with the king;* for thou art a stranger, and also an exile. Whereas thou camest but yesterday, should I this day make thee to go up and down with us?' etc. But Ittai nobly resolved to abide with the king 'in life or in death;' so he 'passed over before the king with all his men and his little ones' (19-22). In the battle which ensued David appointed him commander of a third part of his army, co-ordinate in authority with Joab and Abishai. After this we, apparently at least, hear no more of him in Bible history.

2. 'Hṯō, Eṯai; Vat. Eṯai, Alpi; Ithai; called Ittai, in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29, but in the parallel list, 1 Chron. xi. 31, יִתָּי, Ithai; son of Ribai of Gibeah, of the children of Benjamin, one of David's thirty heroes. Is not this the same as the preceding? May he not be called a Gittite as a native of Gittaim in Benjamin, 2 Sam. iv. 3, as Obed Edom, a Levite, is called a Gittite, 2 Sam. vi. 10? And may he not be called a 'stranger and an exile,' as a Gibeonite, who having fled from Beeroth, a Gibeonite town (Josh. ix. 17), had, with his brethren, taken up his residence in Gittaim? Or, if this be denied, may not Ittai be called a Gittite from his residence in Gath, as Jesus was, for a similar reason, called a Nazarene, although, in reality, a native of Gibeah? Is it likely that Ittai the Gittite would be overlooked or omitted in a list of David's heroes? Or is it probable that David would have his body-guard composed of Philistines? and a Philistine commander at their head? If safe for himself, it would prove a source of annoyance and jealousy to his subjects—an error into which the wisdom of David would not be likely to fall.

Of Ittai Jerome preserves the following curious and interesting tradition in his Quaest. seu tradit. Hebraica in Paralipomenon, 20. 2; 'Tulit autem

coronam David Melchom de capite ejus. Melchom idolum Ammonitarum, de quo in Regum, et in Paralipom. et in Sophonia scribitur. Melchom interpretatur rex eorum. De simulachro enim illius idoli tulit David diadema. Illicitum erat de idolis aliquid auri appetere aut argenti Judæis per legem; sed, ut ipsi tradunt, Ethai Jethus, qui de gente Philistinorum ad David venerat, ipse diadema diripuit in capite Melchom, ut liceret Hebræo de manu hominis capere, quod de capite idoli non licebat.'—I. J.

ITURAEA (Ἰτρούα), a district of Syria on the northern border of Bashan, which formed part of the tetrarchy of Philip the brother of Herod (Luke iii. 1). Strabo mentions the country of the Ituraeans as adjoining the territory of Chalcis on the one side and Trachonitis on the other, and he says it is a mountainous and rugged region, inhabited by bands of freebooters who prey upon their neighbours (xvi. 2). According to Pliny it formed part of Coelesyria (H. N. v. 19); but the latter name was often used in a very wide signification. The true position of Ituraea is described incidentally by William of Tyre, 'Secus mare Galilææ, viam carpentes, Phoenicem Lybanicam ingressi, Paneadem, quæ est Caesarea Philippi, a dextris prætereuntes, Ituracem ingradientes,' etc. (De Bello Sacro, in Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 771). Lightfoot (Opp. ii. 475), Reland (Palaestina, p. 106, seq.), and others who follow their authority (Alford, on Luke iii. 1), have supposed that because in Luke we read that Philip was 'tetrarch of Iturea and the region of Trachonitis,' whereas Josephus says his tetrarchy was composed of Trachonitis, Batanaea, and Auranitis (Antiq. xv. 10. 1 and 11. 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 6. 3), therefore Batanaea and Auranitis were the same as Ituraea. A survey of the country soon convinced the writer that this view is wholly erroneous. The districts mentioned by Luke and Josephus were distinct; but neither of these historians gives a full list of all the little provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip. Each probably gave the names of such as were of most importance in connection with the events he was about to relate. Both Batanaea and Auranitis appear to have been included in the 'region of Trachonitis' (Τραχυνιτιδος χώρας); and as Josephus mentions a part of the 'House of Zenodorus' which was given to Philip, it unquestionably embraced Ituraea (Antiq. xv. 10. 3).

The sacred historian states that Ishmael's sons gave their names to the tribes they founded and the territories they occupied. One of them was Jetur (יֶטור; Gen. xxv. 15, 16). At a subsequent period the tribes of Reuben and Gad made war with the Hagarites or Ishmaelites, namely, with Jetur, Nephesh, and Nodab, conquered their territories, and dwelt in their land. And in immediate connection with the latter statement it is said that the 'children of the half-tribe of Manasseh dwelt in the land, and they increased from Bashan unto Baal-hermon, and Senir, and Mount Hermon' (1 Chron. v. 19-23). Now this indicates the district occupied by Jetur, and proves its identity with the Greek Ituraea and the modern Jedâr. It lies between Hermon and Bashan (Porter's Damascus, ii. 272, seq.). The old inhabitants were not annihilated, they took refuge in the mountain fastnesses, and returned again to the lowlands at the captivity. In the second century B. C. Aristobulus

* Meaning Absalom, and intended to test Ittai, who, however, would know no king but David. The words are not 'omitted' by the LXX.

conquered Ituraea, and gave the inhabitants their choice either to embrace the Jewish faith or leave the country. They chose the former, and we find them still there in the time of Strabo and Pliny (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 11. 3; Strabo, l. c.)

Ituraea was bounded on the south by Auranitis, on the east by Trachonitis, on the north by Damascus, and on the west by the ridge of Hermon. It probably embraced the eastern slopes of the latter. In name and extent it corresponds exactly with the modern province of Jedûr (جيدور).

The greater part of the province is table land, like Bashan. The soil is in general rich, the pasture excellent, and water abundant; yet portions of its surface near the mountains are covered with rugged fields of basalt, while conical and cup-shaped hills of the same material occur at intervals. Most of the ancient towns and villages are now mere heaps of ruins, and not one-tenth of the soil is under cultivation. The settled inhabitants live partly in old houses, built, like those of Bashan, of massive blocks of basalt, and partly in modern hovels constructed of old materials. Several small nomad tribes, perhaps descendants of the ancient Ituraeans, pitch their tents on its rich plains and among its rocky fastnesses. In early spring the vast flocks of the desert Bedawin cover the country like locusts; the settled inhabitants pay them black mail, and the local nomads retire before them to the mountains. (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 286; Handbook for S. and P., p. 465; Münter, De Rebus Ituraeorum; Robinson, Bibl. Res., iii. App. p. 149, 1st ed.; Journal of Sacred Literature, July 1854, p. 311).—J. L. P.

ITZCHAKI, also called Ben Jasus, יִצְחָק בֶּן יָסוּס הַנִּקְרָא בֶּן יִשְׁשִׁי (comp. Ibn Ezra, introduction to his Machonim), and by the long Arabic name of Abu Ibrahim Isaac Ibn Kastar (or Saklar), ben Jasus, was born A.D. 982 at Toledo, and died in 1057. This daring grammarian, commentator, and philosopher, who was physician to the princes of Denia, and Mug'ahid, and to Ali Ikbal Addaula, wrote (1) a Hebrew grammar, called סֵפֶר הַצִּיּוּרִים, the Book of Syntax; and (2) on Biblical criticism, called סֵפֶר הַפְּסוּקִים, the work of Itzhaki. Neither of these works has as yet come to light, but from Ibn Ezra, who quotes them, we see that Itzhaki was one of the earliest assailants of the Mosaic authorship of some portions of the Pentateuch. Thus he maintains that the portion in the Pentateuch which describes the kings of Idumæa (Gen. xxxvi. 30, etc.), was written many centuries after Moses. Comp. ITZCHAKI, SOLOMON. [RASHI].

IVAH (עִיבָה), also written AVA (אָבָה, 'overturning'), and under the latter may be seen the older opinions regarding its site and identity. There can be no doubt that it was a noted city of Assyria, as it is mentioned four times in connection with Saphervaim and Hena (2 Kings xvii. 31; xviii. 34; xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). Out of these cities Shalmaneser brought colonists to Samaria to occupy the place of the captive Jews. Sir Henry Rawlinson supposes that the city may have taken its name from the Assyrian deity Iva, the god of the air;

but when he attempts to institute an analogy between the Hebrew עִיבָה and the Arabic عِوَا, he runs counter to all principles of philology. The letters y and z are totally distinct (see, however, Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 606). Some would identify Ivah with the 'Is of Herodotus and the modern Hit on the Euphrates. For this there are no true grounds, and the names are radically different (Rawlinson's Herod. i. 317). The true site of Ivah has not yet been discovered.—J. L. P.

IVORY (עֵצִי) generally, twice שֵׁנִיָּהִים; Chald. שֵׁנִיָּהִים; Sept. ὀδόντες ἐλεφάντιναι. N. T. ἐλεφάντινος; 1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21; Rev. xviii. 12). 'Elephant's tooth,' or simply 'elephant,' is a common name for ivory, not only in the Oriental languages and in Greek, but also in the Western tongues; although in all of them teeth of other species may be included. There can be no doubt, for example, that the harder and more accessible ivory obtained from the hippopotamus, was known in Egypt, at least as early as that obtained from the elephant. We have seen what appeared to be an ivory sword-handle of Egyptian workmanship, which was declared by dentists to be derived from the river-horse, and of the same texture as that which they now manufacture into false teeth to supply decayed teeth in the human mouth. This kind of ivory does not split, and therefore was anciently most useful for military instruments. Elephants' teeth were largely imported as merchandise, and also brought as tribute into Egypt. The processions of human figures bearing presents, etc., still extant on the walls of palaces and tombs, attest by the black crisp-haired bearers of huge teeth, that some of these came from Ethiopia or Central Africa; and by white men similarly laden, who also bring an Asiatic elephant and a white bear, that others came from the East. Phœnician traders had ivory in such abundance that the chief seats of their galleys were inlaid with it. In the Scriptures, according to the Chaldee Paraphrase, Jacob's bed was made of this substance (Gen. xlix. 33); we find King Solomon importing it from Tarshish (1 Kings x. 22); and if Psalm xlv. 8 was written before his reign, ivory was extensively used in the furniture of royal residences at a still earlier period. The same fact is corroborated by Homer, who notices this article of luxury in the splendid palace of Menelaus, when Greece had not yet formed that connection with Egypt and the East which the

Hebrew people, from their geographical position, naturally cultivated. As an instance of the superabundant possession and barbarian use of elephants' teeth, may be mentioned the octagonal ivory hunting-tower built by Akbar, about twenty-four miles west of Agra: it is still standing, and bristles with 128 enormous tusks disposed in ascending lines, sixteen on each face. Mr. Roberts, remarking on the words of Amos (vi. 4), they 'that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches,' refers the last word, in conformity with the Tamil version, to swinging cots, often mentioned in the early tales of India, and still plentifully used by the wealthy. But it does not appear that they were known in Western Asia, or that figures of them occur on Egyptian bas-reliefs. It is more likely that 'palkies' (those luxurious travelling litters) are meant, which were borne on men's shoulders, whilst the person within was stretched at ease. They were in common use even among the Romans; for Cicero fell into his assassins' hands while he was attempting to escape in one of them towards Naples. The tusks of African elephants are generally much longer than those of the Asiatic; and it may be observed in this place, that the ancients, as well as the moderns, are mistaken when they assert elephants' tusks to be a kind of horns. They are genuine teeth, combining in themselves, and occupying, in the upper jaw, the whole mass of secretions which in other animals form the upper incisor and laniary teeth. They are useful for defence and offence, and for holding down green branches, or rooting up water-plants; but still they are not absolutely necessary, since there is a variety of elephant in the Indian forests entirely destitute of tusks, and the females in most of the races are either without them, or have them very small; not turned downwards, as Bochart states, but rather straight, as correctly described by Pliny. IYAR (יָאָר; 'Iār, Joseph. Antiq. viii. 3. 1; the Macedonian 'Aprelarian) is the late name of that month which was the second of the sacred, and the seventh of the civil, year of the Jews, and which began with the new moon of May. The few memorable days in it are the 10th, as a fast for the death of Eli; the 14th, as the second or lesser Passover, for those whom uncleanness or absence prevented from celebrating the feast in Nisan (Num. ix. 11); the 23d, as a feast instituted by Simon the Maccabee in memory of his taking the citadel Acra in Jerusalem (1 Maccab. xiii. 51, 52); the 28th, as a fast for the death of Samuel.

Gesenius derives Iyar from the Hebrew root יָאָר, to shine; but Benfey and Stern, following out their theory of the source from which the Jews obtained such names, deduce it from the assumed Zend representative of the Persian bahar, 'spring' (Monatsnamen, p. 134). The name Iyar does not occur in the O. T., this month being always described as the second month, except in four places in which it is called Ziv (1 Kings vi. 1, 37; Dan. ii. 31; iv. 33). Ziv, which is written זִיב and זִיב, is not considered to be a proper name, but an appellative. It is derived from זָהִיב, and is a curtailed form for זְהִיב, 'zehiv,' bright, an appropriate epithet of the month of flowers.—J. N.

IYIM (יָיִם), a term occurring Is. xiii. 22; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39, as designating some species of wild gregarious animal. In the A. V. it is rendered by 'wild beasts of the islands,' from a supposed connection of the word with יָם, an island.

But this is clearly inadmissible; יָיִם, the plural of יָם, means 'islands,' but cannot mean 'beasts of the islands.' The LXX. give βροχέωνται in the first two passages, and ἐν νήσοις in the third. The Targum has חֲתוּלִים, cats, as its equivalent. Bochart shows that the יָם was probably the jackal; and that the word is onomatopoeic from imitation of the animal's peculiar howl. The jackal is called by the Arabs Ibn-awi (ابن اوى), the son of howling. The cry of the jackal is like that of a child (Henderson on Is. xiii. 22).—W. L. A.

IZHAR (יִזְחָר; Sept. 'Izadap, 'Iodap), the son of Kohath, grandson of Levi, and uncle of Moses and Aaron (Exod. vi. 16-20; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18). From him were descended the family of the Izeharites (Num. iii. 27). He was the father of Korah whose rebellion brought such disaster on himself and those whom he induced to share in his 'gainsaying' (Num. xvi. 1). In 1 Chron. vi. 22 the name Amminadab is substituted for Izhar, apparently by some clerical error (comp. the Codex Alex. of the LXX. here, and see ver. 38).—W. L. A.

IZRAHITE (יִזְרָחִי; Sept. δ 'Izēpal; Alex. δ 'Izēpal), the designation of Shammuth, captain of the fifth of the monthly courses appointed by David (1 Chron. xxvii. 8). The word is probably formed from יִזְרָח, Zerach, the head of one of the families of Judah, and is another form of יִזְרָחִי, Zarchi (Zarhite, A. V.), the designation of two besides of these captains (ver. 11, 13).—W. L. A.

IZRI (יִזְרִי; Sept. 'Izēpl; Alex. 'Izēpl), a Levite, to whom fell the lot of leader of the fourth ward in the service of song in the house of the Lord under David (1 Chron. xxv. 11). The name is an abbreviation of יִזְרָחִי, Creator is Jah. By omission of the initial ' it becomes יִזְרִי, Zeri, as in ver. 3.—W. L. A.

JAAKAN. [BENEI-JAAKAN.]

JAARE OREGIM יָעַר אֹרֵגִים, according to the Massorah) small (doubtful יָעַר, according to the Massorah) LXX. Ἀρωγῶν, 2 Sam. xxi. 19; a Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, who in that passage is reported to have slain Goliath the Gittite. In order to reconcile this statement with the one contained in 1 Sam. xvii., according to which it was David who slew the formidable Philistine, the Midrash identifies Elhanan with David (שְׁחַנְנֵי מֶלֶךְ, 'whom God has favoured,' = Hananel, Elhanan, Jalk. to 2 Sam. xxi. 19, etc.), and interprets the Jaare Oregim, which follows, in various fanciful manners, so as to make it agree with the circumstances. Ben Jaar, according to one version (Jalk. ib.), was David's own name, 'because he was great among the forest [of the] Oregim or Weavers [of the Law]; i.e., the Sanhedrim, who brought the Halacha (legal decisions) before him that he might weave it,' as it were. Another version traces the Jaare Oregim to, or rather founds upon it, the legend that David's mother habitually wove veils for the sanctuary, which pious occupation procured for her son the epithet of a 'son of weavers' beams.' A third simply takes the two words as an epithet for David's father Jesse. Jonathan translates וְקָטַל דָּוִד בֶּרְיָ מַחֵי פְרוּחַת בֵּית מְקֻרָּשָׁא דְּמִבְנֵי לָחֵם וּבָרַךְ 'And David, the son of Jesse, the weaver of veils for the sanctuary in Bethlehem, killed,' etc. The Vulg. renders 'Adeodatus filius Saltūs [Jaar=forest] Polymitarii [David himself a weaver or=Polymitarius] Bethlehemites;' Pesh. מַלְפִּי וְסִסְנָן, Arab. V.

ملف النساخ = Malaph (?) the weaver.

All these more or less allegorical explanations, however, are unsatisfactory to a degree, and the whole passage has been sharply contested from the days of the early commentators. It would indeed appear as if nothing short of a corrupt reading, such as Kennicott, after Piscator, has lucidly pointed out, could account for the existence of this most mysterious compound name; while at the same time, by his suggestion, much is gained for the reconciliation of the two flagrantly contradictory accounts of Goliath's defeat. The parallel passage in 1 Chron. xx. 5 seems to have the correct reading, 'And Elhanan,' we find there, 'the son of Jair (Ketib יֵעֹר) slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite, whose spear staff was like a weaver's beam (כַּמְנוֹר אֹרְנִים).' Some early copyist, after having finished the word יֵעֹר (יֵעֹר), mistook the י in כַּמְנוֹר, which in the manuscript from which he copied happened to stand exactly underneath, for the one he had just written, and consequently went on with the word אֹרְנִים, which happened to follow in the second line. How this mistake was perpetuated, what efforts were made, by further additions of words or single letters, to render the now obscure passage somewhat more clear and more in accordance with the statements preferred elsewhere—for these and other points in connection with them we must refer to Elhanan (vol. i., p. 762), where also the different speculations and suggestions of ancient and modern commentators will be found discussed at somewhat greater length.

As a characteristic specimen of late poetical etymology (Jaare, Jair) we will add the Targum to the passage in 1 Chron. xx. 5, amended in its turn after the one in Samuel: "'And David, the son of Jishai,'—this is the pious man who arose (מִיִּתְעָרָה) from his sleep in the middle of the night to give praise unto God—'slew Lachmi the brother of Goliath on the same day on which he killed Goliath of Gath.' This derivation of יֵעֹר is founded upon the following beautiful legend, found in Talm. Berach. 3 b., Jer. Ber. i., Bamidb. Rab. 15, etc.: 'A harp was hanging above David's bed, and in the middle of the night the north wind came and rustled in its strings so that it sang [played] of itself. And David rose at once and praised God, and studied in the law till the dawn of morning. As it is written (Ps. lvii. 9 [A. V. 8]), 'Awake up my glory, awake, psalter and harp; I will wake the dawn.'—E. D.

JAAZANIAH (יֵאֲזָנְיָהּ), or with 1 parag. יֵאֲזָנְיָהּ; LXX. Ἰεζανίας; Vulg. Jezionias).

1. One of Zedekiah's 'captains of the forces,' who escaped capture by the army of Nebuchadnezzar, and to whom, with his troops, Gedaliah, after his appointment as governor of Judaea, gave assurances of safety (2 Kings xxv. 23). He is described as the son of the Maachathite (בֶּרֶךְ מַעֲחָתִי), which probably means that he was the son or descendant of a native of Maachah, a district on the slope of Mount Hermon, the Canaanitish inhabitants of which were not expelled by the Israelites, but were permitted to dwell amongst them on friendly terms (Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 13). In the book of Jeremiah his name appears in the slightly abbreviated form of Jezioniah (יֵזְזָנְיָהּ; LXX. Ἰεζανίας), xl. 8, xlii. 1; and in the latter passage he is said to be the son of Hoshaiiah.

2. Son of Jeremiah, the son of Habaziah, and the head of that family of Rechabites to whom the prophet Jeremiah announced the divine blessing because of their faithful observance of the commandments of Jonadab their ancestor (Jer. xxxv. 3). The LXX. reads in this passage Jechoniah (Ἰεχωνίας), which is probably an error of transcription; the same form occurs as a various reading in Ezek. viii. 11.

3. Son of Shaphan (Ezek. viii. 11), and an elder of the house of Israel, who took a prominent part in the idolatrous abominations practised in Jerusalem during the reign of Zedekiah.

4. Son of Azur (Ezek. xi. 1), and one of the princes of Jerusalem who 'gave wicked counsel in this city,' and encouraged the people in their disbelief of the prophetic warnings which had announced to them the approaching destruction of their city by the king of Babylon.—S. N.

JAAZER and JAZER (יֵאֲזֶר and יֵזֶר, 'Jehovah helps;' יֵאֲזֶר; Jazer), a town of Gilead (1 Chron. xxvi. 31), situated near Heshbon (vi. 81 [66]). It was originally occupied by the Amorites, and was taken by the Israelites after the defeat of Sihon (Num. xxi. 31-32). It must have been a place of importance, for it gave its name to a large section of country. The 'land of Jazer' was fertile, and its rich pastures attracted the attention of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (xxxii. 1). It was within the allotted territory of Gad (ver. 35; Josh. xiii. 25); and as it is mentioned between Dibon and Nimreh, it appears to have stood on the high plain north of Heshbon (Num. xxxii. 3). It was one of the four cities out of Gad assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 39); but on the decline of the Jewish power it fell into the hands of the Moabites. Isaiah connects it with Heshbon and Elealah in the prophetic curse pronounced upon Moab, predicting its utter ruin, and the destruction of its fields and vineyards by the wild hordes of the desert (xvi. 7-10). The parallel passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah are rendered somewhat obscure by reference to 'the sea.' Isaiah says of the vine, for which that region was celebrated:—'Its branches were stretched out, they reached to (or over) the sea;' and Jeremiah says—'Thy plants are gone over the sea, they reach to the sea of Jazer' (יֵזֶר; xlviii. 32). What sea is here referred to? Some have supposed it a noted 'pool' or 'lake' in the vicinity of Jazer; but there is no lake in that district, and the word יֵזֶר could scarcely be applied with propriety to a mere pool. We learn from Num. xxxii. 1 that the whole country around Heshbon and Jazer was called 'the land of Jazer.' That land must have extended to the shore of the Dead Sea. May not that sea, therefore, have been called by the inhabitants of the district 'the Sea of Jazer,' just as the northern lake took the name of 'Tiberias,' and 'Genesaret,' and 'Chinnereth?' Gesenius questions the integrity of the text in Jeremiah, but without sufficient reason (Comment. üb. Jes. xvi. 8). The Sept. reads ῥάλας 'Iaf̄h̄p; this version, however, is here far from being trustworthy.

Jazer was taken by Judas Maccabæus from the Ammonites (1 Maccab. v. 8; cf. Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 1). Eusebius and Jerome describe it as a city of the Amorites ten miles west of Philadelphia, and fifteen from Heshbon; they also state that a large stream rose beside it and flowed into the Jordan (Onomast. s. v. Jazer). Burckhardt in travelling from Es-Salt to Heshbon passed a ruined town called Str (صبر), situated on the side of a hill, and immediately below it was the source of a stream which ran down to the Jordan (Trav. in Syria, 364). The ruins lie four hours north of Heshbon, and thus correspond to the position of Jazer as given by Jerome. There can be little doubt that this is the Jazer of the Bible (Van de Velde, Memoir, 323). The prophecies of Scripture are fulfilled. The city and country are alike desolate. The vineyards that once covered the hill sides are gone; and the wild Bedawin from the eastern desert make cultivation of any kind impossible.—(Handbook for S. and P., 298, sq.)—J. L. P.

JAAZIAH (יאזיה; Sept. 'Oz̄a). This name appears (1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27) in the genealogy of Merari, a Levite; but the text is in such a state that it is hard to know in what light to regard the person to whom it is assigned. Elsewhere the only sons of Merari mentioned are Mahli and Mushi (Exod. vi. 10; Num. iii. 33; 1 Chron. vi. 4 [A. V. 19]; xxiii. 21). It has been supposed that Jaaziah was a third son of Merari, and the founder of three houses in that line, Shoham, Zaccur, and 'Ibri; but in its present state the text does not say this, and it can only be conjecturally asserted.—W. L. A.

JAAZIEL (יאזיה; Sept. 'Oz̄a; Alex. 'Ihoûl), a Levite of the second order of those who had charge of the music in the temple service in the time of David (1 Chron. xv. 18); called Aziel (אזיה) in ver. 20, and Jeiel (יזיה) in xvi. 5.

JABAL (יבאל), a stream; Sept. 'Iw̄b̄l, a descendant of Cain, son of Lamech and Adah, who is described in Gen. iv. 20, as 'the father of such as dwell in tents, and have cattle.' This obviously means that Jabal was the first who adopted that nomade life which is still followed by numerous Arabian and Tartar tribes in Asia. Abel had long before been a keeper of sheep; but Jabal invented such portable habitations (formed, doubtless, of skins) as enabled a pastoral people to remove their dwellings with them from one place to another, when they led their flocks to new pastures.—J. K.

JABBOK (יבבוק, perhaps = יבב, 'pouring out; 'Iab̄w̄k and 'Iab̄b̄k; Jaboc; in Joseph. 'Iab̄d̄x̄os), a stream which falls into the Jordan from the east, about midway between the lake of Tiberias and Dead Sea. It was on the banks of the Jabbok that the remarkable interview took place between Jacob and Esau, on the return of the former from Padanaram (Gen. xxxii. 22). The stream is important in a geographical point of view, and a knowledge of its topography helps us to understand more easily some passages of Scripture. It was the boundary between the Amorites and the Ammonites. We are told that after the defeat of Sihon, king of the Amorites, at Jazer, 'Israel possessed his land from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon; for the border of the children of Ammon was strong' (Num. xxi. 24). The Jabbok, flowing in a wild and deep ravine through the Gilead mountains, formed a strong natural frontier for the bordering principalities. It would seem that at the Exodus the Ammonites possessed the country eastward and northward of the upper sources and branches of the Jabbok, and that Sihon and Og occupied the whole region between the Ammonites and the Jordan, extending as far north as the Sea of Galilee (Josh. xii. 2-8; Joseph. Antiq. iv. 5. 2, and 3). The Israelites conquered Sihon and Og, and took their kingdoms; and the possessions of the three tribes, thus acquired, extended from the Dead Sea to Hermon; but they were not permitted to touch the territory of Ammon (Deut. ii. 37; iii. 16). About fifteen miles from the Jordan the Jabbok forks; one branch coming down from Jerash on the north, and the other from Rabbath-Amman on the south; these branches formed the western frontier of the Ammonites, dividing them from the Amorites, and subsequently from the Israelites (Reland, Pal., p. 103). Previous to the Exodus, the territory of the Ammonites was much more extensive, embracing the whole region between the Jabbok and the Arnon; but the Amorites drove them out of that portion, and forced them into the mountains around the sources of the Jabbok, and into the plain eastwards (Judg. xi. 13, 22). Eusebius and Jerome rightly describe the Jabbok as flowing between Ammon and Gerasa, and falling into the Jordan (Onomast. s. v. Jabboch).

The Jabbok is now called Wady Zurka (وزرکا). Its sources are chiefly on the eastern side of the mountains of Gilead, and it also drains a portion of the high plateau of Arabia beyond. The upper branches and tributaries are mere winter streams. At the point where the two main branches from Jerash and Ammon unite, the stream becomes perennial; and often, after heavy rain, is a foaming impassable torrent. 'The ravine through which it flows is narrow, deep, and in places wild. Throughout nearly its whole course it is fringed by thickets of cane and oleander, and the large clustering flowers of the latter give the banks a gay and gorgeous appearance during the spring and early summer' (Handbook for S. and P., 310). Higher up, the sides of the ravine are clothed with forests of evergreen oak, pine, and arbutus; and the undulating forest glades are carpeted with green grass, and strewn with innumerable wild flowers. The scenery along the banks of the Jabbok is probably the most picturesque in Palestine; and the ruins of town and village and fortress which stud the surrounding mountain sides render the country as interesting as it is beautiful (See Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 347; Irby and Mangels,

JABESH-GILEAD (יַבֶּשׁ גִּלְעָד, 'dry,' also יַבֶּשׁ: Iaḇēš and Iaḇš; Jabes). The first mention of this ancient city is in connection with the tragic story of the sin and punishment of the Benjamites. The Israelites had made an oath that every one who did not join in taking vengeance on them for their revolting crime should be put to death. The people of Jabesh failed to appear at the national gathering, and therefore, at the close of the war, their city was attacked and the whole population slain, except 400 young virgins, who were reserved as wives for the remnant of the Benjamites (Judg. xix. x; xxi. 8-14). About three centuries later Jabesh was again the scene of a remarkable episode in Jewish history. The city was surrounded by the vast forces of the Ammonites. Unable to resist, the inhabitants offered to become the slaves of their foes; but the conditions proposed by the cruel Arab prince were so terrible that they asked some days respite. Saul had just been proclaimed king. They sent to him and told their tale of woe. He saw in it a favourable opportunity for establishing his yet unrecognised authority. The news came to him at Gibeah. That very day he summoned Israel to the gathering-place at Bezek, near Bethshan. From thence he made a night march across the Jordan, attacked the Ammonites in the morning-watch, and gained one of the most signal victories ever achieved by Jewish arms (1 Sam. xi.) The whole subsequent history of Jabesh clusters round this one event. The inhabitants felt deeply grateful to their king. No opportunity occurred during his life of showing their gratitude, but when Saul fell on Gilboa, and when the barbarous Philistines fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan, the men of Jabesh heard the sad tidings. From the streets of their own city they could see, beyond the Jordan valley, that great fortress on which the mangled remains of their king hung. Then 'all the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Bethshan, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them there. And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days' (1 Sam. xxxi. 11-13). It was a noble act; and the heroism of the actors was appreciated by the high-minded David; for when he was told, 'he sent messengers unto the men of Jabesh-Gilead, and said unto them, 'Blessed be ye of the Lord, that ye have showed this kindness unto your lord. . . . And now the Lord show kindness and truth unto you: and I also will requite you for this kindness' (2 Sam. ii. 5, 6). The last mention of the city occurs when David, at a subsequent period, removed the bones of Saul and his sons, and buried them in the sepulchre of Kish (xxi. 12-14).

Jabesh is not again referred to by any writer except Josephus, who merely repeats the Scripture story (Antiq. v. 2. 11; vi. 14. 8), until the time of Eusebius, who says, 'It is now a village (κῶμη) situated on a hill, six miles from Pella, on the road to Gerasa (Onomast. s. v. Jabis; cf. Jerome, Comment. ad Lib. Jud.) The great city of Pella had risen beside it, and was made capital of the province; this probably led to the decline of Jabesh and its final ruin. From that time until our own age the site has remained, not merely deserted, but unknown. The old name, however, is still given in its Arabic form Yabes (يَابِس) to a ravine which winds down the side of Mount Gilead, nearly opposite Bethshan. On the south bank of the ravine, about six miles from the ruins of Pella, near the line of the ancient road to Gerasa, stands a little hill covered with ruins, called by the Arabs Ed-Dair ('the convent'); this in all probability marks the site of Jabesh-Gilead. (Robinson, B. R. iii. 39; Van de Velde, Travels ii. 349-52; Hand-book for S. and P., p. 317; Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 345.)—J. L. P.

JABEZ (יַבֶּז; Sept. Iḏḏis; Alex. Γαῖθς). 1. A town in which the 'families of the scribes' (מְסֻכְּבֹת) resided (1 Chron. ii. 55). It was apparently in Judah; for details, which are chiefly of a topographical kind, from ver. 42 onwards, form a sort of appendix to the statement of Judah's descendants (1-41). This sets aside the conjecture of Rashi, who would identify Jabesh with Abiez (Josh. xix. 20), which belonged to Issachar.

2. A descendant apparently of Coz, and head of one of the families of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 9). Fürst suggests that the reading here may originally have been—'Zereth, and Jezoar, and Ethran, and Coz. And Coz begat Azub and Jabez, and this Jabez was the father of Jabez [the town] and Zobeab,' etc. Of Jabez it is said, that 'he was more honourable than his brethren,' and it is stated that his mother gave him the name Jabez to commemorate the sorrow with which she bore him; thus tracing the name etymologically to עָנַב, to grieve. A remarkable prayer of Jabez is also recorded, with the notice that God granted it. These verses are supposed to be from some ancient source. There is a close resemblance between them and some of the narratives in Genesis (comp. Gen. xxviii. 20; xxix. 32-35; etc.)—W. L. A.

JABEZ (יַבֶּז), ISAAC B. SALOMO B. ISAAC B. JOSEPH, a Jewish commentator who flourished in the 16th century. He wrote—1. A Commentary on the Haphtaroth, or Sabbatic lessons from the prophets [HAPHTARA], entitled יַסְפַּר רֵצוֹן, he will find favour, which is of a homiletic character, and was published at Belvedere near Constantinople in 1593; 2. A Commentary on the Psalms, entitled תְּהִלֹת יְהוָה, the praises of the Lord; 3. A Commentary on Proverbs, entitled לְמוֹדֵי יְהוָה, the taught of God; 4. A Commentary on Proverbs, entitled יִרְאָה שְׁרִי, the fear of the Almighty; 5. A Commentary on the Song of Songs, entitled קִדְשֵׁי הַקִּדְשִׁים, the holy of holies; 6. A Commentary on Ruth, entitled צֶמַח צְדִיק, a branch of righteousness; 7. A Commentary on Lamentations, entitled צִדְקַת תַּמִּים, the righteousness of the perfect; 8. A Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes, entitled שְׁעַר מַדָּע, the gates of knowledge; 9. A Commentary on the Book of Esther, entitled עֲטֶרֶת שְׁלוֹם, the crown of peace; 10. A Commentary on Daniel, called בְּרִכַּת יִשְׂרָאֵל, the blessing of the upright; 11. A Commentary on Ezra and Nehemiah, entitled מוֹשִׁיעַ חוֹסִים, the Saviour of those who trust in him. All these commentaries, which are chiefly a compilation made up from ten different expositors, are, with the exception of the first, contained in Frankfurter's Rabbinic Bible [FRANKFURTER]. He also wrote a Commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled סֵפֶר הַמִּנְחָה, flour for offering, which is not published (comp. Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebraica, i. 694; iii. 617, sq., iv. 886; Furst, Bibliotheca Judaica ii. 2; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, col. 1125).—C. D. G.

JABIN (יָבִין, discerner; Sept. Ἰαβὴν). 1. King of Hazor, and one of the most powerful of all the princes who reigned in Canaan when it was invaded by the Israelites. His dominion seems to have extended over all the north part of the country; and after the ruin of the league formed against the Hebrews in the south by Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, he assembled his tributaries near the waters of Merom (the lake Huleh), and called all the people to arms. This coalition was destroyed, as the one in the south had been, and Jabin himself perished in the sack of Hazor, his capital, B.C. 1450. This prince was the last powerful enemy with whom Joshua combated, and his overthrow seems to have been regarded as the crowning act in the conquest of the Promised Land (Josh. xi. 1-14).

2. A king of Hazor, and probably descended from the preceding. It appears that during one of the servitudes of the Israelites, probably when they lay under the yoke of Cushan or Eglon, the kingdom of Hazor was reconstructed. The narrative gives to this second Jabin even the title of 'king of Canaan'; and this, with the possession of 900 iron-armed war-chariots, implies unusual power and extent of dominion. The iniquities of the Israelites having lost them the Divine protection, Jabin gained the mastery over them; and, stimulated by the remembrance of ancient wrongs, oppressed them heavily for twenty years. From this thralldom they were relieved by the great victory won by Barak in the plain of Esdraelon, over the hosts of Jabin, commanded by Sisera, one of the most renowned generals of those times, B.C. 1285. The well-compacted power of the king of Hazor was not yet, however, entirely broken. The war was still prolonged for a time, but ended in the entire ruin of Jabin, and the subjugation of his territories by the Israelites (Judg. iv.).

This is the Jabin whose name occurs in Ps. lxxiii. 10.—J. K.

Addendum.—The question has been raised whether these two Jabins were not one and the same; and the affirmative has by some been assumed as an argument against the authenticity of the narrative in Joshua (De Wette, Eintl. ins A. T., p. 251; Maurer, Comment. in loc.); while others think that the two narratives may be of events so nearly contemporaneous that they may have happened in the lifetime of the same person. This latter hypothesis, however, cannot possibly be retained; for, even supposing that the ordinary chronology, which places the defeat of Sisera 150 years after the time of Joshua, requires correction, no correction that can be legitimately made will render it possible to synchronise the two narratives, nor can we suppose that within the lifetime of one man Hazor could have been rebuilt, the shattered kingdom of its ruler restored, and that ruler enabled to tyrannise over his former conquerors for 20 years. It has been asked, 'What is to prevent us from supposing Jabin and his confederate kings to have been defeated both by Joshua and by Barak?' The reply is, That as Joshua killed the Jabin with whom he fought (Josh. ii. 10) the latter could not be alive to fight again with Barak, even supposing Joshua and Barak were contemporaries, as some would make them (Hervey, Genealogy of our Lord, p. 228). The only alternative possible, is the supposition that there were two Jabins, the one the antagonist of Joshua and destroyed by him, the other a later prince, by whom the recovered strength of the Canaanites was brought to bear on the Israelites so as to keep them in subjection until Barak delivered them; Or the supposition that the narrative in Joshua is borrowed from that in Judges, or vice versa. The burden of proof here lies on those who adopt the latter side of this alternative. They must show that the other side is impossible or incredible; and they must show what possible cause there is for supposing that the author of the book of Joshua should seek to defraud Barak of his rightful fame, or the author of the book of Judges seek to defraud Joshua of his. That Hazor was rebuilt after its destruction by Joshua we know (see 1 Kings ix. 15), and this may have been done by the time of the second Jabin; though, as it is nowhere said that he resided in Hazor, but only that he ruled over Hazor, this latter supposition is not necessary for the credibility of the narrative (Hävernick, Eintl. ii. 53; Keil on Joshua, p. 287; Winer, R. W. B., s. v.)—W. L. A.

JABLONSKI, DANIEL ERNST, born 1660, at Nassenhuben near Danzig, son of the preacher Figulus, who, a native of Jablunka, a small place in Silesia, had adopted the surname of Jablonski. Having acquired his first instruction at the Gymnasium of Lissa (in Prussian Poland), the subject of our notice went to the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he applied himself to literature and philosophy as well as to theology and the Oriental languages. In 1668 he set out for a learned tour to the universities and libraries of Holland and England, and remained for a considerable time at Oxford. At his return in 1683 he was appointed preacher at Magdeburg, which place he left two years later in order to assume the rectorship of the Gymnasium at Lissa. In 1690 he was made court preacher at Königsberg, and in 1693 his fame procured him the place of preacher to the king at Berlin. Many were the honourable offices further entrusted to his care. Thus, in 1718 he was made a member of the Consistory, in 1729 a church-councillor, and in 1733 he was elected president of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin. At the instance of Queen Anne the honorary degree of D.D. had, as early as 1706, been bestowed upon him. He died at the age of 81 years, in 1741. His chief work is the edition of the Hebrew Bible, under the title Biblia Hebraica, cum notis Hebraicis, the first edition of which appeared in Berlin 1699 in 2 vols. 4to, followed by a second in 1712, 12mo. Most of his other writings refer chiefly to the state of the church in Poland; such as, Jus et libertates dissidentium in regno Poloniae; Das betrübte Thorn; Historia consensus Sandomiriensis, etc. He also translated several theological works into Latin; e.g., Stultitia et irrationabilitas Atheismi ex Anglico Richardi Bentleii, latine versa; Gilberti Burnet expositio articuli xxi. Ecclesie Anglicanae de predestinatione et gratia, latine versa, etc. Many of his sermons have been printed. A not inconsiderable number of his writings, chiefly referring to the union of all the Protestant churches—an object which he had much at heart—are still extant in manuscript.—E. D.

JABLONSKI (JABLONSKY), PAUL ERNST, the son of the former, born in Berlin, 1693. Having completed his preliminary studies at the Joachimsthal Gymnasium at Berlin, he applied himself, at the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, whither he went in 1714, to theology, but also to linguistic studies, chiefly Coptic, in which La Croze was his instructor. By the munificence of the king he was enabled to travel, when he left the university, through Germany, Holland, England, and France. He visited the libraries at Leyden, Paris, and Oxford, chiefly with a view of extending his knowledge of Coptic language and literature. At his return, in 1720, he was appointed preacher at Liebenberg, but in the course of the very next year the chair of philosophy was offered to him at the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1722 he was elected professor of theology, and afterwards member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin. He died in 1757, and his contemporaries bestowed upon him the eulogy, 'Vir et singularis humanitatis et egregiæ doctrinæ laude celeberrimus.'

Although he had a singular aversion to print any of his writings, yet more than fifty independent, smaller or larger, works are extant. We name the following as the most important:—Disquisitio de lingua Lycaonica, Berlin 1714, 4to; Exercitatio Historico-Theologica de Nestorismo, etc., Berlin 1724, 8vo; Dissertationes academicae viii. de terra Gosen, Frankfort-on-the-Oder 1735, 4to; Pantheon Ægyptiorum sive de Diis eorum commentarius, cum prolegomenis de religione et Theologia Ægyptiorum, Berlin 1750-1752, in three vols. 8vo,—Jablonski's principal work, and one which will for all times ensure him the high respect of the learned; Institutiones Historiæ Christianæ Antiquioris, Frankfort-on-the-Oder 1753, 8vo; followed by Institutiones Historiæ Christianæ recentioris, Frankfort-on-the-Oder 1756, 8vo, both re-edited by Schultze, ib. 1783-84; by Stosch, who added a third volume, ib. in 1767; and by Schickedanz in 1767, 8vo. A collection of his minor works, under the title Opuscula quibus lingua et antiquitas Ægyptiorum, difficultia sacrarum librorum loca et historiæ ecclesiasticæ capita illustrentur, was published by J. S. T. Water, Leyden 1804-1810, in three vols. 8vo.—E. D.

JABNEEL (יַבְנֵה), 'God causeth to be built';

Λεβνὰ; Alex. 'Iaβνήλ; Jebneel).

1. A town on the north-western border of Judah, situated in the plain of Philistia, west of Ekron, and between Mount Baalah and the sea. Jabneel is only mentioned in Josh. xv. 11; but a comparison of that passage with 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, shews that it is the same place which is there called Jabneh, and which Uzziah captured, with Gath and Ashdod, from the Philistines. Jabneh (יַבְנֵה) is the first part of the compound Jabneel (יַבְנֵה־נֶחַל), the latter part (נֶחַל, 'God') being omitted (Sept. 'Iaβνήp and 'Iaβείs). In Josh. xv. 46, instead of 'From Ekron even unto the sea,' the Sept. has, ἀπὸ Ἀκκαρῶν Γεμὰ (Alex. 'Iεμναι), which at first sight would seem to be an allusion to this city, though it is only a mistake on the part of the translators of the Hebrew word גֶּמָא, 'to the sea,' for a proper name. Josephus calls this city Iamnia ('Iαμνία), and assigns it to the tribe of Dan (Antiq. v. i. 22). It became an important place during the wars of the Maccabees, and played a conspicuous part in later Jewish history (1 Maccab. iv. 15; v. 58; x. 69). The school of Iamnia was celebrated after the destruction of Jerusalem, especially under the presidency of the famous Rabbīn Gamaliel. The Jews called this school their Sanhedrim, though it only possessed a faint shadow of the authority of that great council (Milman, History of the Jews, iii. 95, 2d ed.; Lightfoot, Opera, ii. 141-143). At this period, also, Iamnia had a considerable trade, and a good port on the shore of the Mediterranean (2 Maccab. xii. 8, 9; Ptolemy, v. 16; Strabo, xv. 2, 29; Pliny, H. N. v. 14).

Iamnia stood, according to the Itinerary of Antonine, between Diospolis (Lydda) and Ascalon, twelve miles from the former, and twenty from the latter (Ant. Itin. ed. Wessel. p. 150). Eusebius describes it as a small town (πολιχὴν) between Diospolis and Ashdod (Onomast. s. v. Iamnia). We have no difficulty in identifying it with the modern village of Yebna, whose name is radically identical with the Hebrew Jabneh (יַבְנֵה = יבנה). Yebna is situated on an eminence in the midst of a rich plain, two miles from the sea, and three from Ekron. Between it and the latter place is a low ridge of limestone hills which the writer was able to identify as the 'Mount Baalah' of Josh. xv. 11 (which is different from the town of Baalah mentioned in ver. 9; see Handbook for S. and P., p. 275). The Crusaders thought Iamnia occupied the site of Gath, and they built in it a fortress called Ibelin, with a church, the ruins of which still remain, and have in later times been used as a mosque (Irby and Mangles, Travels, p. 57, ed. 1844; Robinson, B. R. ii. 66, 227; Reland, Falast. p. 822; Le Quien, Oriens Christ., iii. 587; Ritter, Pal. and Syr., iii. 125).

2. A city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). It may have been, perhaps, identical with the village Iamnia, which Josephus fortified during the Jewish wars (Vita, 37); but its site is unknown.—J. L. P.

JABNEH. [JABNEEL.]

JACHIN AND BOAZ, the names of two brazen pillars in the porch of Solomon's temple. [TEMPLE.]

JACINTH. [LESHEM.]

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב; Sept. 'Iακώβ) was the second son of Isaac by his wife Rebekah. Her conceiving is stated to have been supernatural. Led by peculiar feelings she went to inquire of the Lord, and was informed that she was indeed with child, that her offspring should be the founders of two nations, and that the elder should serve the younger: circumstances which ought to be borne in mind when a judgment is pronounced on her conduct in aiding Jacob to secure the privileges of birth to the exclusion of his elder brother Esau—conduct which these facts, connected with the birth of the boys, may well have influenced. Some have indeed denied the facts, and taken from them the colouring they bear in the Bible; and such persons may easily be led on to pronounce a severe and indiscriminate sentence of condemnation on Rebekah; but those who profess to receive and to respect the Biblical records are unjustifiable, if they view any part of them, or any event which they record, in any other light than that which the Bible supplies, in any other position than that which the Bible presents. It is as a whole that each separate character should be contemplated—under the entire assemblage of those circumstances which the Bible narrates. If we first maim an historical person we may very readily misrepresent him.

As the boys grew, Jacob appeared to partake of the gentle, quiet, and retiring character of his father, and was accordingly led to prefer the tranquil safety and pleasing occupations of a shepherd's life to the bold and daring enterprises of the hunter, for which Esau had an irresistible predilection. Jacob, therefore, passed his days in or near the paternal tent, simple and unpretending in his manner of life, and finding in the flocks and herds which he kept, images and emotions which both filled and satisfied his heart. His domestic habits and affections seem to have co-operated with the remarkable events that attended his birth, in winning for him the peculiar regard and undisguised preference of his mother, who probably in this merely yielded to impressions which she could scarcely account for, much less define, and who had not even a faint conception of the magnitude of influence to which her predilection was likely to rise, and the sad consequences to which it could hardly fail to lead.

That selfishness and a prudence which approached to cunning had a seat in the heart of the youth Jacob, appears but too plain in his dealing with Esau, when he exacted from a famishing brother so large a price for a mess of pottage as the surrender of his birthright. Nor does the simple narrative of the Bible afford grounds by which this act can be well extenuated. Esau asks for food, alleging, as his reason, 'for I am faint.' Jacob, unlike both a youth and a brother, answers, 'Sell me this day thy birthright.' What could Esau do? 'Behold,' he replies, 'I am at the point to die, and what profit (if by retaining my birthright I lose my life) shall this birthright do me?' Determined to have a safe bargain, the prudent Jacob, before he gave the needed refreshment, adds, 'Swear to me this day.' The oath was given, the food eaten, and Esau 'went his way,' leaving a home where he had received so sorry a welcome.

The leaning which his mother had in favour of Jacob would naturally be augmented by the conduct of Esau in marrying, doubtless contrary to his parents' wishes, two Hittite women, who are recorded to have been a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah.

Circumstances thus prepared the way for procuring the transfer of the birthright, when Isaac, being now old, proceeded to take steps to pronounce the irrevocable blessing which acted with all the force of a modern testamentary bequest. This blessing, then, it was essential that Jacob should receive in preference to Esau. Here Rebekah appears the chief agent; Jacob is a mere instrument in her hands. Isaac directs Esau to procure him some venison. This Rebekah hears, and urges her reluctant favourite to personate his elder brother. Jacob suggests difficulties; they are met by Rebekah, who is ready to incur any personal danger so that her object be gained. My father, peradventure, will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver, and I shall bring a curse upon me and not a blessing. His mother said unto him, Upon me be thy curse, my son, only obey my voice. Her voice is obeyed, the venison is brought, Jacob is equipped for the deceit; he helps out his fraud by direct falsehood, and the old man, whose senses are now failing, is at last with difficulty deceived. It cannot be denied that this is a most reprehensible transaction, and presents a truly painful picture; in which a mother conspires with one son in order to cheat her aged husband, with a view to deprive another son of his rightful inheritance. Justification is here impossible, but it should not be forgotten in the estimate we form, that there was a promise in favour of Jacob, that Jacob's qualities had endeared him to his mother, and that the prospect to her was dark and threatening which arose when she saw the neglected Esau at the head of the house, and his hateful wives assuming command over herself. [Eyck, De venditione primogenituræ Esau, Witteb. 1729; Roesler, De benedict. paterna Esau a Jacobo præcepta, Tüb. 1706; Heydegger, Hist. Patriarch. ii. 14; Shuckford, Connection, Bk. 7; Blunt, Undesigned Coincid., part i. 1, sec. 2, 3; Benson, Hulsean Lect. on Scripture Difficulties, 16, 17.]

Punishment in this world often follows close upon the heels of transgression. Fear seized the guilty Jacob, who is sent by his father, at the suggestion of Rebekah, to the original seat of the family, in order that he might find a wife among his cousins, the daughters of his mother's brother, Laban the Syrian. Before he is dismissed Jacob again receives his father's blessing, the object obviously being to keep alive in the young man's mind the great promise given to Abraham, and thus to transmit that influence which, under the aid of divine providence, was to end in placing the family in possession of the land of Palestine, and in so doing to make it 'a multitude of people.' The language, however, employed by the aged father suggests the idea, that the religious light which had been kindled in the mind of Abraham had lost somewhat of its fulness, if not of its clearness also; since 'the blessing of Abraham,' which had originally embraced all nations, is now restricted to the descendants of this one patriarchal family. And so it appears, from the language which Jacob employs (Gen. xxviii. 16) in relation to the dream that he had when he tarried all night upon a certain plain on his journey eastward, that his idea of the Deity was little more than that of a local god—'Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not.' Nor does the language which he immediately after employs shew that his ideas of the relations between God and man were of an exalted and refined nature:—'If God will be with me, and will keep me in the way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God.' The vision, therefore, with which Jacob was favoured was not without occasion, nor could the terms in which he was addressed by the Lord fail to enlarge and correct his conceptions, and make his religion at once more comprehensive and more influential. [Miegius De Scala Jacobi, in Iken's Thes. Theol.-Phil. i. 195; Kurz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, i. 309.]

daughter, to whom, with true eastern simplicity and politeness, he shewed such courtesy as the duties of pastoral life suggest and admit. And here his gentle and affectionate nature displays itself under the influence of the bonds of kindred and the fair form of youth:—'Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept.'

After he had been with his uncle the space of a month, Laban inquires of him what reward he expects for his services. He asks for 'the beautiful and well-favoured Rachel.' His request is granted on condition of a seven years' service—a long period truly, but to Jacob 'they seemed but a few days for the love he had to her.' When the time was expired, the crafty Laban availed himself of the customs of the country, in order to substitute his elder and 'tender-eyed' daughter Leah. In the morning Jacob found how he had been beguiled; but Laban excused himself, saying, 'It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born.' Another seven years' service gains for Jacob the beloved Rachel. Leah, however, has the compensatory privilege of being the mother of the first-born—Reuben; three other sons successively follow, namely, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, sons of Leah. This fruitfulness was a painful subject of reflection to the barren Rachel, who employed language on this occasion that called forth a reply from her husband which shews that, mild as was the character of Jacob, it was by no means wanting in force and energy (Gen. xxx. 2). An arrangement, however, took place, by which Rachel had children by means of her maid, Bilhah, of whom Dan and Naphtali were born. Two other sons—Gad and Asher—were born to Jacob of Leah's maid, Zilpah. Leah herself bare two more sons, namely, Issachar and Zebulun; she also bare a daughter, Dinah. At length Rachel herself bare a son, and she called his name Joseph.

Most faithfully, and with great success, had Jacob served his uncle for fourteen years, when he became desirous of returning to his parents. At the urgent request of Laban, however, he is induced to remain. The language employed upon this occasion (Gen. xxx. 25, sq.) shews that Jacob's character had gained considerably during his service both in strength and comprehensiveness; but the means which he employed in order to make his bargain with his uncle work so as to enrich himself, prove too clearly that his moral feelings had not undergone an equal improvement, and that the original taint of prudence, and the sad lessons of his mother in deceit, had produced some of their natural fruit in his bosom. Those who may wish to inquire into the nature and efficacy of the means which Jacob employed, may, in addition to the original narrative, consult Michaelis and Rosenmüller on the subject, as well as the following:—Hieron. Quæst. in Gen.; Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 10; Oppian, Cyneg. i. 330, sq.; Hastfeer, über Schafzucht; Bochart, Hieroz. i. 619. Winer, Handwört., gives a parallel passage from Ælian (Hist. Anim. viii. 21).

The prosperity of Jacob displeased and grieved Laban, so that a separation seemed desirable. His wives are ready to accompany him. Accordingly he set out, with his family and his property, 'to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan.' It was not till the third day that Laban learned that Jacob had fled, when he immediately set out in pursuit of his nephew, and after seven days' journey overtook him in Mount Gilead. Laban, however, is divinely warned not to hinder Jacob's return. Reproach and recrimination ensued. Even a charge of theft is put forward by Laban—'Wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?' In truth, Rachel had carried off certain images which were the objects of worship. Ignorant of this misdeed, Jacob boldly called for a search, adding, 'With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live.' A crafty woman's cleverness eluded the keen eye of Laban. Rachel, by an appeal which one of her sex alone could make, deceived her father. Thus one sin begets another; superstition prompts to theft, and theft necessitates deceit.

Whatever opinion may be formed of the teraphim which Michael stole, and which Laban was so anxious to discover, and whatever kind or degree of worship may in reality have been paid to them, their existence in the family suffices of itself to shew how imperfectly instructed regarding the Creator were at this time those who were among the least ignorant on divine things. [TERAPHIM.]

Laban's conduct on this occasion called forth a reply from Jacob, from which it appears that his service had been most severe, and which also proves that however this severe service might have encouraged a certain servility, it had not prevented the development in Jacob's soul of a high and energetic spirit, which when roused could assert its rights and give utterance to sentiments both just, striking, and forcible, and in the most poetical phraseology.

Peace, however, being restored, Laban, on the ensuing morning, took a friendly if not an affectionate farewell of his daughters and their sons, and returned home. Meanwhile Jacob, going on his way, had to pass near the land of Seir, in which Esau dwelt. Remembering his own conduct and his brother's threat, he was seized with fear, and sent messengers before in order to propitiate Esau, who, however, had no evil design against him; but, when he 'saw Jacob, ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck and kissed him, and they wept'—the one tears of joyful recognition, the other of gladness at unexpected escape.

The passage in which this meeting is recorded is very striking and picturesque. In moral qualities it exhibits Jacob the inferior of his generous, high-minded, and forgiving brother; for Jacob's bearing, whatever deduction may be made for Oriental politeness, is crouching and servile. Independently of the compellation, 'my lord,' which he repeatedly uses in addressing Esau, what can be said of the following terms:—'I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me?' (Gen. xxxiii. 10).

It was immediately preceding this interview that Jacob passed the night in wrestling with 'a man,' who is afterwards recognised as God, and who at length overcame Jacob by touching the hollow of his thigh. His name also was on this event changed by the mysterious antagonist into Israel, 'for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed' (Gen. xxxii. 28). It is added that on this account his descendants abstained from eating the thigh of slaughtered animals. [ISRAEL.]

in danger from the natives of Shechem in Canaan, Jacob is divinely directed, and under the divine protection proceeds to Bethel, where he is to 'make an altar unto God that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of Esau thy brother.' Obedient to the divine command, he first purifies his family from 'strange gods,' which he hid under 'the oak which is by Shechem;' after which God appeared to him again with the important declaration, 'I am God Almighty,' and renewed the Abrahamic covenant. While journeying from Beth-el to Ephrath, his beloved Rachel lost her life in giving birth to her second son, Benjamin. At length Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, the family residence, in time to pay the last attentions to the aged patriarch. Not long after this bereavement Jacob was robbed of his beloved son Joseph through the jealousy and bad faith of his brothers. This loss is the occasion of shewing us how strong were Jacob's paternal feelings; for on seeing what appeared to be proofs that 'some evil beast had devoured Joseph,' the old man 'rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days, and refused to be comforted.'—'I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning' (Gen. xxxvii. 33).

A widely extended famine induced Jacob to send his sons down into Egypt, where he had heard there was corn, without knowing by whose instrumentality. The patriarch, however, retained his youngest son Benjamin, 'lest mischief should befall him,' as it had befallen Joseph. The young men returned with the needed supplies of corn. They related, however, that they had been taken for spies, and that there was but one way in which they could disprove the charge, namely, by carrying down Benjamin to 'the lord of the land.' This Jacob vehemently refused:—'Me have ye bereaved; Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin; my son shall not go down with you; if mischief befall him, then shall ye bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave' (Gen. xlii. 36). The pressure of the famine, however, at length forced Jacob to allow Benjamin to accompany his brothers on a second visit to Egypt; whence in due time they brought back to their father the pleasing intelligence, 'Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt.' How naturally is the effect of this on Jacob told—'and Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.' When, however, they had gone into particulars, he added, 'Enough, Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die.' Touches of nature like this suffice to shew the reality of the history before us, and since they are not unfrequent in the book of Genesis they will of themselves avail to sustain its credibility against all that the enemy can do. Each competent and unprejudiced judge, on reading these gems of truth, may well exclaim, 'This is history, not mythology; reality, not fiction.' The passage, too, with others recently cited, strongly proves how much the character of the patriarch had improved. In the entire of the latter part of Jacob's life, he seems to have gradually parted with many less desirable qualities, and to have become at once more truthful, more energetic, more earnest, affectionate, and, in the largest sense of the word, religious.

Encouraged 'in the visions of the night,' Jacob goes down to Egypt. 'And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive' (Gen. xlvii. 29). Joseph proceeded to conduct his father into the presence of the Egyptian monarch, when the man of God, with that self-consciousness and dignity which religion gives, instead of offering slavish adulation, 'blessed Pharaoh.' Struck with the patriarch's venerable air, the king asked, 'How old art thou?' What composure and elevation is there in the reply, 'The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years; few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage: and Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh' (Gen. xlvii. 8-10).

Jacob, with his sons, now entered into possession of some of the best land of Egypt, where they carried on their pastoral occupations, and enjoyed a very large share of earthly prosperity. The aged patriarch, after being strangely tossed about on a very rough ocean, found at last a tranquil harbour, where all the best affections of his nature were gently exercised and largely unfolded. After a lapse of time Joseph, being informed that his father was sick, went to him, when 'Israel strengthened himself, and sat up in his bed.' He acquainted Joseph with the divine promise of the land of Canaan which yet remained to be fulfilled, and took Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, in place of Reuben and Simeon, whom he had lost. How impressive is his benediction in Joseph's family! 'And Israel said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face: and, lo, God hath showed me also thy seed' (Gen. xlviii. 11). 'God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth' (ver. 15, 16). 'And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold I die; but God will be with you and bring you again unto the land of your fathers' (ver. 21). Then having convened his sons, the venerable patriarch pronounced on them also a blessing, which is full of the loftiest thought, expressed in the most poetical diction, and adorned by the most vividly descriptive and engaging imagery, showing how deeply religious his character had become, how freshly it retained its fervour to the last, and how greatly it had increased in strength, elevation, and dignity:—And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people' (Gen. xlix. 33).—J. R. B.

JACOB B. ASHERI B. JECHIEL B. URI B. ELIAKIM B. JEHUDAH, also called Baal Ha-Turim, after his celebrated ritual work, was born in Germany about A.D. 1280. At the age of eighteen he was an eyewitness to the fearful massacres of his brethren which began at Röttingen, April 20, 1298, under the leadership of Rindfleisch, and spread over Bavaria, France, and Austria, when upwards of 120 Jewish communities, numbering more than 100,000 souls were slaughtered in less than six months. Though the death of the emperor Adolph and the election of Albrecht to the throne put an end to the civil war, yet Jacob b. Asheri felt it unsafe to remain in Germany, and hence emigrated, in the year 1303, with his renowned father, his mother, and seven brothers, wandered about from place to place for two years, and at last settled down at Toledo in Spain in 1305. Here he entered upon his literary labours under most straitened pecuniary circumstances, and published (1) A Commentary on the Pentateuch (פירוש בעל הטורים, but also in five editions of the Bible between 1595 and 1653, and in no less than twenty different editions of the Pentateuch between the years 1566 and 1804—whereas the exegetical part was not published till 1805 in Zolkiew, and again in 1838 in Hanover; and (2) the celebrated religious code called ארבעה טורים, from the fact that it consists of four parts or rows, respectively denominated אורח חיים, the way of life; יורה דעה, the teacher of knowledge; אבן העזר, the stone of help; and חושן המטעם, the breastplate of justice; which treats on the ritual, moral, matrimonial, civil, and social observances of the Jews. This remarkable work, which for a time supplanted the Iod Ha-Chezaka of the immortal Maimonides, soon became the text-book of the Jewish Rabbins throughout the world, and is indispensable to the formation of a correct knowledge of the manners and customs of this ancient people. The best editions of it are the one published in Augsburg 1540, and another published in Hanover 1610. Jacob b. Asheri died in 1340 (comp. JACOB, B. CHAJIM B. ISAAC IBN ADONIA, the celebrated editor of Bomberg's Rabbinic Bible, was born at Tunis about 1470. When about forty years of age, circa 1510, he was driven from his peaceful home and literary labours. He then went to Italy, lived for some time in Rome and in Florence, and not finding any occupation he at last went to Venice, where through the exertions of R. Chajim Alton, he became connected, in 1520, with the celebrated Hebrew printing-office of Daniel Bomberg as corrector of the press. He published (1) the celebrated Iod Ha-Chezaka of Maimonides, Venice 1524; and (2) edited, in four volumes folio, the Rabbinic Bible called Bomberg's second Rabbinic Bible, Venice 1524-1525, the first being the one edited by Felix Pratensis [PRATENSIS]. The following are the contents of this stupendous work.

על התורה), the basis of which is Nachmanide's exposition. He excluded from it Nachmanide's philosophico-Kabbalistic portions, inserted in their stead remarks of Rashi, Joseph Cara, Samuel b. Meier, Abraham b. Chija, R. Tam, Ibn Ezra, Joseph Kimchi, Jehudah the Pious, Simon b. Abraham, Meier of Rothenburg, R. Asher, the father, and R. Jehudah, the brother of the author, as well as glosses of his own at the beginning of every Sabbatic section [HAPHTARA], which chiefly consist of explanations of words and whole sentences according to the hermeneutical rule called גמטריא, i. e., reducing every letter of a word to its numerical value, and explaining it by another word of the same quantity [MIDRASH], and which he calls פריפראות, dainty supplements, and recondite reasons for the critical remarks of the Massorites upon the text (טעמי המסורות). This work is of great importance to the understanding of the original design of the Massora. Such was the extraordinary popularity of the Gematrical portions of this commentary that they were detached from the exegetical part and printed in a separate form in Constantinople 1514, in Venice 1544, and have since appeared not only in the Rabbinic Bibles of Bomberg, Venice 1546-1548, and 1568; of Buxtorf, Basle 1617-1619, and Frankfurter, Amsterdam 1724-1727, under the title of קצת פריפראות חידושי

The first volume, embracing the Pentateuch (תורה), begins, i., with the elaborate introduction of the editor, in which he discusses the Massora, the Keri, and Kethib, the variations between the Talmud and the Massora, the Tikune Sopherim (תקוני סופרים), and the order of the larger Massora; ii., an index of the sections of the whole O. T. according to Massora; and iii. Ibn Ezra's preface to the Pentateuch. Then follow the five books of Moses in Hebrew, with the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos and Jonathan b. Uziel, and the commentaries of Rashi and Ibn Ezra, the margins being filled up with as much of the Massora as they would admit.

The second volume, comprising the earlier prophets (נביאים ראשונים), i. e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and the Kings, has the Hebrew text, the Chaldee paraphrase of Jonathan b. Uziel, and the commentaries of Rashi, Kimchi, and Levi b. Gershon, and the Massora in the margin.

The third volume, comprising the later prophets (נביאים אחרונים), i. e., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, contains the Hebrew text, the Chaldee paraphrase of Jonathan b. Uziel, the commentaries of Rashi, which extend over all the books in this volume, of Ibn Ezra on Isaiah and the minor prophets, and of Kimchi on Jeremiah, and the Massora in the margin.

The fourth volume, comprising the Hagiographa (כתובים), gives the Hebrew text, the Chaldee paraphrase of Joseph the blind, the commentaries of Rashi on the Psalms, Ezra, Nehemiah, the five Megilloth, and Chronicles; of Ibn Ezra on the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, the five Megilloth, Ezra, and Nehemiah; of Levi b. Gershon on Proverbs and Daniel; of Saadia on Daniel and the second Targum of Esther. Appended to this volume are, i., the Massora which could not get into the margin of the text, in alphabetical order, with Jacob b. Chajim's directions; ii., the various readings of Ben-Asher and Ben-Naphtali, and the Eastern and Western Codd.; and iii., a treatise upon the points and accents, containing the work דרכי

כללי הנקוד or הנקוד והנקוד by Moses Nakdan. Jacob b. Chajim bestowed the utmost labour in amassing the Massora and in purifying and arranging those materials which Felix Pratensis published very incorrectly in the first edition of Bomberg's Rabbinic Bible. He was, moreover, the first who, in his elaborate introduction, furnished the Biblical student with a treatise on the Massora; and his edition of the Bible is of great importance to the criticism of the text, inasmuch as from it most of the Hebrew Bibles are printed. Kennicott published a Latin translation of Jacob b. Chajim's valuable introduction from an anonymous MS. in the Bodleian Library in an abridged form (Comp. Dissertation the second, Oxford 1759, p. 229-244), and Ginsburg has published an English translation of the whole with explanatory notes, in the Journal of Sacred Literature 1863. In after life Jacob b. Chajim embraced Christianity, a circumstance which will account for Elias Levita's vituperations against him (תנ"י נשמו צורה בצורה) (נקד).—C. D. G.

JACOB B. ELEAZAR, a Hebrew poet and grammarian who flourished at Toledo A. D. 1130. He distinguished himself in investigating the nature of the vowel points and the etymology of the proper names, and though he wrote several works upon these subjects, yet only one treatise of his, entitled דפן השלם, the book of completion, is known to us, through the quotations from it by Kimchi. The fragments of it show that Jacob b. Eleazar was a sound grammarian, laid down some excellent rules respecting the Hebrew syntax, and materially aided the development of philology in Spain at a time when Biblical exegesis was much neglected and the study of the Talmud was paramount. He moreover devoted himself to the formation of a correct Hebrew text of the O. T., and for this purpose used the celebrated Codex Hillali [HILLALI]. The importance of his labours may be seen from the fact that Kimchi quotes his explanations as authoritative. Comp. Biesenthal und Lebrecht's edition of Kimchi's Lexicon, Berlin 1847, introduction p. 15; Geiger in Osar Nechmad ii., Vienna 1857, p. 159, etc.; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden vi., Leipzig 1861, p. 131, etc.—C. JACOB B. MEIER. [TAM.]

JADDUA (יָדוּעַ; Sept. 'Ιαδού), son of Jonathan the high-priest, whom he succeeded in the same office. According to Eusebius his pontificate continued seventeen years. Josephus states that he was in office at the time when Alexander the Great invaded Judæa, and that he went out to meet the conqueror as he approached Jerusalem; that the latter went with Jaddua to the temple to worship and offer sacrifice; that he was shewn Daniel's predictions relating to himself, and gave the Jews permission to live according to their own laws, as well as freedom from tribute on Sabbatical years. His brother Manasseh was appointed first high-priest of the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim by Sanballat's request (Antiq. xi. 8. 5). These circumstances related by Josephus are not credible, though Jahn and other Roman Catholic writers usually receive them as historical. If 'Darius the Persian,' who is mentioned, Neh. xii. 22, in connection with Jaddua, be Darius III. Codomannus, last monarch of Persia (336-330 B. C.), the compiler of the book of Nehemiah is brought down to the time of the Grecian dynasty, and could not therefore have been Nehemiah himself. The name of Jaddua does not mark the time when the last additions were made to the book of Nehemiah and the O. T. canon; nor has it any proper relation to the settlement of the canon.—S. D.

JAEEL (יָעֵל, wild goat or gazelle; Sept. 'Ιαήλ), wife of Heber, the Kenite. When Sisera, the general of Jabin, had been defeated, he alighted from his chariot, hoping to escape best on foot from the hot pursuit of the victorious Israelites.

On reaching the tents of the nomade chief, he remembered that there was peace between his sovereign and the house of Heber; and, therefore, applied for the hospitality and protection to which he was thus entitled. This request was very cordially granted by the wife of the absent chief, who received the vanquished warrior into the inner part of the tent, where he could not be discovered by strangers without such an intrusion as eastern customs would not warrant. She also brought him milk to drink, when he asked only water; and then covered him from view, that he might enjoy repose the more securely. As he slept, a horrid thought occurred to Jael, which she hastened too promptly to execute. She took one of the tent nails, and with a mallet, at one fell blow, drove it through the temples of the sleeping Sisera. Soon after, Barak and his people arrived in pursuit, and were shown the lifeless body of the man they sought. This deed drew much attention to Jael, and preserved the camp from molestation by the victors; and there is no disputing that her act is mentioned with great praise in the triumphal song wherein Deborah and Barak celebrated the deliverance of Israel (Judg. v. 24).*

It does not seem difficult to understand the object of Jael in this painful transaction. Her motives seem to have been entirely prudential, and, on prudential grounds, the very circumstance which renders her act the more odious—the peace subsisting between the nomade chief and the king of Hazor—must, to her, have seemed to make it the more expedient. She saw that the Israelites had now the upper hand, and was aware that, as being in alliance with the oppressors of Israel, the camp might expect very rough treatment from the pursuing force; which would be greatly aggravated if Sisera were found sheltered within it. This calamity she sought to avert, and to place the house of Heber in a favourable position with the victorious party. She probably justified the act to herself, by the consideration that as Sisera would certainly be taken and slain, she might as well make a benefit out of his inevitable doom, as incur utter ruin in the attempt to protect him. We have been grieved to see the act vindicated as authorized by the usages of ancient warfare, of rude times, and of ferocious manners. There was not warfare, but peace, between the house of Heber and the prince of Hazor; and, for the rest, we will venture to affirm that there does not now, and never did exist, in any country, a set of usages under which the act of Jael would be deemed right.

It is much easier to explain the conduct of Jael

[* There is some doubt whether the Jael mentioned, Judg. v. 6, is the same as Jael the wife of Heber, or another Jael who had judged Israel before the time of Deborah. It is not necessary for the latter supposition to make Jael the name of a man; for the case of Deborah shews that the place of Judge might be occupied by a female. The reasons for this supposition are—1. That the state of things described in Judg. v. 6, as existing in Jael's days, is not the state of things existing in the days of Jael the wife of Heber, whose time was famous for the restoration of the nation to a better; 2. That the wife of a stranger would hardly have been named as marking an epoch in the history of Israel. (See Gesen. Thes. in verb.; Bertheau in the Exeg. Hd.B. in loc.)]

than to account for the praise which it receives in the triumphal ode of Deborah and Barak. But the following remarks will go far to remove the difficulty:—There is no doubt that Sisera would have been put to death if he had been taken alive by the Israelites. The war usages of the time warranted such treatment, and there are numerous examples of it. They had, therefore, no regard to her private motives, or to the particular relations between Heber and Jabin, but beheld her only as the instrument of accomplishing what was usually regarded as the final and crowning act of a great victory. And the unusual circumstance that this act was performed by a woman's hand was, according to the notions of the time, so great a humiliation, that it could hardly fail to be dwelt upon, in contrasting the result with the proud confidence of victory which had at the outset been entertained (Judg. iv. 5).—J. JAGUR (יָגוּר), 'lodging'; Ἀσὺρ; Alex. Ἰαγούρ;

Jagur, a city on the extreme south-eastern border of Judah, towards Edom (Josh. xv. 21). Its name might perhaps indicate that it was one of the fortified camping-grounds of the border Arabs. Its site is unknown.—J. L. P.

JAH. [JEHOVAH.]

JAHATH (יָחַת; LXX. Ἰέθ; Vulg. Jahath).

1. Son of Libni, the son of Gershon, the son of Levi (1 Chron. vi. 20, 43). In the latter verse the LXX. read Ἰέθ, and the Vulgate Jeth. He is perhaps identical with Jehiel (יְחִיֵּל), 1 Chron. xxiii. 8, who was the founder of one of the patriarchal houses (בֵּית אֲבוֹתֵינוּ, house of their fathers) of the tribe of Levi.

2. Another grandson of Gershon by his son Shimei, and the founder of one of the patriarchal houses of the Gershonites (1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11). In the Vulgate he is called Lebeth.

3. Son of Reaiah (= Haroeh, 1 Chron. ii. 52), the grandson of Hur (HUR, 3), of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2).

4. (LXX. Ἰδθ; Alex. Ἰδθ). The leader or chief in the time of David of the Benei-Shelomoth, the Levitical house, which was the only representative of Izhar, the son of Kohath (1 Chron. xxiv. 22).

5. A Levite of the family of Merari, who was appointed one of the overseers of the workmen engaged in the repair of the Temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).—S. N.

JAHAZ, JAHAZA, JAHAZAH, and JAH-

ZAH (יָחַז and יָחַזָּה, perhaps י. 9, יָחַזָּה, 'trampled down'; Ἰασαδ and Ἰασα; Jasa), a town in the territory of the Amorites, on the confines of the eastern desert, where the Israelites gained the decisive victory over Sihon (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32). It was given to the Reubenites, and was assigned out of that tribe to the Levites (Josh. xiii. 18; xxi. 36; 1 Chron. vi. 78). Isaiah and Jeremiah include it, with Heshbon and Elealeh, in the prophetic curse pronounced upon Moab (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 34). The whole country east of the Dead Sea had originally been given to the Moabites and Ammonites (Gen. xix. 36-38; Deut. ii. 19-22); but the warlike Amorites from the west of the Jordan conquered them and expelled them from the region north of the river Arnon. From the Amorites the Israelites took this country; but subsequently the Ammonites claimed it as theirs (Judg. xi. 13); and on the decline of Jewish power the Moabites and Ammonites again took possession of it. For this reason Jahaz is ascribed by the prophets to Moab. Eusebius states that in his day Jahaz (he writes it Ἰεσσά) still existed, and was situated between Medaba and Debus (Δηβοῦς, Jerome says Diblatia; Onomast. s. v. Jassa; Reland, Pal., p. 825; Winer, Realwoerterbuch, s. v.). The situation thus given to it appears to be too far west for the requirements of the sacred narrative. We read in Num. xxi. 23 that Sihon 'went out against Israel into the wilderness; and he came to Jahas and fought against them.' Consequently we must look for the site on the extreme eastern border of Ammon. This region is still unknown. No traveller has ventured to explore it; and the site of Jahaz remains yet to be identified (Keil on Joshua, xiii. 18).—J. L. P.

JAHAZIEL (יָחַזְיִאל, God regarded; similar in etymology and meaning to Jahaziah, יָחַזְיָה).

1. (LXX. Ἰεζήλ, Ἰαζήλ; Vulg. Jahaziel). A descendant of Hebron, the son of Kohath, and founder of one of the twenty-four chief houses, or clans, of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23).

2. (LXX. Ἰεζήλ; Vulg. Jehaziel). A Benjamite, and one of the mighty men who joined the party of David whilst he was under the protection of Lachish, king of Gath, and who are described as able to use both the right hand and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows (1 Chron. xii. 4).

3. (LXX. Ὀζήλ; Vulg. Jaziel). One of the two priests who were appointed by David to the office of playing the trumpet before the ark, after it had been brought to Jerusalem from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xvi. 6).

4. (LXX. Ὀζήλ; Vulg. Jahaziel). Son of Zechariah, and one of the 'sons of Asaph.' He lived in the reign of Jehoshaphat, and was inspired by the Spirit of the Lord to foretell to the king and the people of Jerusalem the miraculous overthrow of the combined army of the Moabites, Ammonites, and inhabitants of Mount Seir, upon the following day (2 Chron. xx. 14; Joseph. Antiq. ix. 1. 2). According to Hengstenberg, the authorship of Ps. lxxxiii. is to be referred to Jahaziel.

5. (LXX. Ἀζήλ, 1 Esd. Ἰέζηλος; Vulg. Ezekiel). The father of one of the 'chief men' who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 5; 1 Esd. viii. 32). According to the A. V. and the Hebrew text, Ben-Jahaziel appears as the chief or patriarch of the sons of Shechaniah, but according to the reading of the LXX., he was the patriarch of sons of Zathoes, and his personal name was Shechaniah. The same also is stated in the book of Esdras.—S. N.

JAHDAI (יָחַדַּי, God directed; LXX. Ἀδδαί; Alex. Ἰαδαί; Vulg. Jahaddai). A descendant of Caleb, the son of Hebron, by his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. ii. 47). The genealogical list gives the names of only the sons of Jahdai; the name of his father is not mentioned. Houbigant and others have supposed him to be the son of Haran (ver. 46), and that Gazez, the last name in the preceding verse, is an error of the copyist, who has repeated a name previously mentioned. Less probable is the conjecture of Grunenberg, quoted by Michaelis (Adnotat. in Hag. iog.), that Jahdai was another of Caleb's concubines.—S. N.

JAHN, JOHANN, a celebrated Biblical and Oriental scholar of the Roman Catholic church, was born at Taswitz in Moravia, June 18, 1750. He studied at the Gymnasium of Xnaim, at Olmütz, and at Bruck. In 1775 he was ordained priest, and devoted himself for some time to the care of souls at Miswitz. In 1782 he received the degree of doctor at Olmütz; and became vice-director of the Gymnasium at Xnaim. In 1784 he was chosen professor of Oriental languages and Biblical hermeneutics at the Lyceum of Olmütz. In 1789 he was transferred to a wider sphere of influence, being appointed to the same office with the superadded duties of teaching Biblical archæology and dogmatics in the University of Vienna. Here he laboured successfully for seventeen years, amid suspicions and petty persecutions which pained his ingenuous spirit. Some words in the preface to his Introduction to the Old Testament, the assertion that the books of Job, Jonah, Judith, and Tobit are didactic poems; and that the demoniacs in the N. T. were possessed with dangerous diseases, not with the devil, were made charges against him. Complaints of his unsoundness were laid before the emperor Francis II., by a cardinal; and a commission was appointed to examine the matter, which decided that the views were not heterodox. The worthy critic, however, received a caution to be more guarded in future. Though he honestly submitted, his detractors continued their machinations, till he was removed from the congenial duties of an office to which he had dedicated his life, and made canon or Domherr in the metropolitan church of St. Stephen, 1806. Even before he was compelled to resign his professorship, his two books, Introductio in libros sacros Veteris Testamenti in compendium redacta, Wien 1804; and Archæologia Biblica in compendium redacta, Wien 1805, were condemned, without their author being heard in his defence. His death took place August 16, 1816. Jahn was a clear, methodical writer, whose numerous works diffused a knowledge of Biblical subjects in places and circles where the books of Protestants would scarcely have been received. The latter, however, have appreciated his writings fully as much as Catholics. He was not profound in any one thing, because he scattered his energies over so wide a field; but he was a most useful author, and one of his books is still the largest and best on the subjects of which it treats. As a theologian of the Romish church, he was so liberal that Hengstenberg finds fault with him on the Pentateuch. He is the author of Einleitung in die göttlichen Bücher des alten Bundes, 2 parts, 1802, 1803, 2d ed.; Hebräische Sprachlehre für Anfänger, 1792; Aramäische oder Chaldäische u. Syrische Sprachlehre, 1796; Biblische Archæologie, three parts in five volumes, 1796-1804 (his best work); Elementarbuch der Hebräischen Sprache sammt Hebräischen Wörterbuch, 2 parts, 1799; Chaldäische Chresto- mathie, 1800; Arabische Chrestomathie, 1802; Lexicon Arabico-latinum, 1812; Biblica Hebraica, digestis, et graviores lectionum varietates adjectis, 4 vols., 1806; Enchiridion Hermeneuticæ generalis tabularum veteris et novi fœderis, 1812; Appendix Hermeneuticæ, two fasciculi, 1813-1815; and the two compendiums already mentioned. Some time after his death appeared Nachträge (Tübingen, 1821), containing six interesting dissertations on Biblical subjects. The memory of this meritorious scholar ought to be respectfully cherished by every Biblical student. Succeeding works have been largely indebted to his, of which several have been translated into English.—S. D.

JAIR (יֵאִיר, 'Jehovah enlightens,' יֵאִיר; Jair).

1. A descendant of Manasseh by his grandmother, and of Judah by his grandfather. His grandmother was probably an heiress, and therefore Jair was reckoned to the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii. 5, 22, 23). When the Israelites entered Eastern Palestine, Jair led an expedition against a part of Northern Gilead, and having taken a number of its towns, 'called them Havoth-Jair' ('the towns of Jair,' Num. xxxii. 41). He subsequently conquered the province of Argob in Bashan, with 'its threescore great cities,' and called it Bashan-Havoth-Jair, to distinguish it from the province previously occupied in Gilead (Deut. iii. 14). Most writers have confounded these two territories; but in Josh. xiii. 30, 1 Kings iv. 13, and 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23, they are clearly distinguished from each other (ARGOB; HAVOTH-JAIR; Porter's Damascus, ii. 268, seq.)

2. One of the judges of Israel, doubtless a descendant of the former, who 'had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass-colts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-Jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead' (Judg. x. 3, 4).—J. L. P.

JAIRITE (יֵאִירִי; Sept. ὁ Ἰαίρις; Alex. ὁ Ἰαίρις), a designation applied to Ira, one of David's officers (2 Sam. xx. 26). The word must be regarded as a patronymic from Jair; but such a mode of designating an individual is unusual, the more common method being to describe him from his place of nativity. This draws attention to the reading of the Syriac Vers. ܕܡܢ ܝܬܝܪ, d'men Jathir, 'of Jathir'; from which it may be inferred that probably the original reading was יֵאִירִי, Ha-Jathiri, 'The Jathirite,' or 'Ithrite.' In this case the Ira of 2 Sam. xx. 26 is the same as the Ira of 2 Sam. xxiii. 38 and 1 Chron. xi. 40. In the first of these passages he is farther described as כֹּהֵן, Cohen P. David, 'a chief ruler about David,' A. V. Cohen is here used, as in viii. 18, in its primary sense of a servant in a position of trust and honour; if of God a priest, if of an earthly sovereign a minister (Kimchi, Fürst). Ira may have been private secretary or annalist to David (Thenius, in loc.) The notion of Gesenius and others that the palatial cohenim were house chaplains of the king not of Aaronic descent, is purely conjectural and altogether improbable.—W. L. A.

JAIRUS (Ἰαῖρος), a ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose daughter Jesus restored to life (Mark v. 22; Luke viii. 41; comp. Matt. ix. 18).

JAISH. [IBN JAISH.]

JAKAN (1 Chron. i. 42), for JAAKAN, probably by a misprint.

JAKEH (יָקֵחַ), the pious or obedient, from the unused root יָקַח, derived from the 'Arab. يَكْبُ v.

to venerate; viii. to fear God, to be pious,' Ges.) occurs only in Prov. xxx. 1 as a proper name. Yet, that it is a proper name is disputed. Stuart, however, admits 'there can be no doubt' that this word and Ithiel and Ucal 'were regarded by the punctuators, by the Chal. and Syr. translators, and by nearly all the modern commentators, as proper names;' but he declines their authority. The Vulg. renders the whole verse thus: Verba congregantis, filii VOMENTIS (following the var. lec. of some MSS., נִפְּ), visio quam locutus est vir, cum suo est Deus et qui Deo secum morante confortatus ait. The LXX: τοὺς δὲ ἐμὸν λόγον, υἱέ, φοβήθητι, καὶ δεξιόμενος αὐτοῦς μετανοεῖ. Τὰδε λέγει ὁ ἀνὴρ τοῖς πιστεύουσιν θεῷ, καὶ παύομαι—renderings which not only alter the points, but dislocate the words.

Stuart, following Hitzig and Bertheau, takes equal liberties with the text. He renders the words thus: 'The words of Agur, the son of her who was obeyed in Massa. Thus spake the man: I have toiled, I have toiled for God, and have failed.' He converts יָקַח into יָקַחָהּ, by adding to it the ה from יָקַחָהּ, and altering the vowel points, and by a few more such alterations opens the way for his translation. Then Massa becomes the proper name of a country near Dumah, in Arabia (see Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30), and 'her who was obeyed,' the queen who reigned over it, the mother of Agur and Lemuel (Prov. xxxi. 1) and whom Lemuel succeeded on the throne.—The strangeness of attributing the proverbs which follow to Arabians and Amalekites is removed by the 'historic notice' (1 Chron. iv. 41-43) that this district of Arabia had been conquered in the reign of Hezekiah by a colony of Simeonites, who, having expelled the former inhabitants, took possession of it, taking which 'historical events into view,' it will be easily seen how 'a writer in Massah should develop an acquaintance with the Hebrew Scriptures.' The only objections to this whole course are: that it is arbitrary, involving principles which might be applied to dislocate the entire Hebrew text; that the alterations made are no improvement of the text, but rather exceedingly awkward, it being impossible to educe with ease the Eng. rendering from the altered original (יָקַחָהּ) cannot be fairly rendered 'her who was obeyed,' or 'her whose domain is'; and lastly, the entire theory of the Hebrew queen in Massa is simply a fancy of learned men, who often toil to bring forth wind. It remains for us, therefore, to abide by the Hebrew text and the A. V. as our best course. Agur, Jakeh, Ithiel, and Ucal may be the names of real persons; or they may be symbolical. Ithiel and Ucal may be either the sons or disciples of Agur; and the following proverbs may have been written for their special instruction. Beyond this we can aver nothing positive. Stuart's hypercritical objections do not throw any serious hindrance in the way of the following rendering: 'the words of Agur ben Jakeh, the weighty utterance, the oracle of the man to Ithiel—to Ithiel and Ucal.' The heaping together of words in such a connection, designed to call emphatic attention to what follows, has a remarkable parallel in 2 Sam. xxxiii. 1, 2 (see more in the Critic Sacri).—I. J.

JAMBRES. [JANNES.]

JAMBRI (LXX. Ἰαμβρί, Ἰαμβρι; Joseph. reads, οἱ Ἀμαπαλοὶ παῖδες; Vulg. Jambri), apparently a mighty man in the city of Medaba, with whom we first become acquainted in the first book of Maccabees (ch. ix. 36). Jonathan, who succeeded his brother Judas in the government of the Jews (B.C. 161), about to be attacked by Bacchides, an officer of the king of Syria, on the Sabbath day, sent off a detachment, under the command of his brother John, in charge of all his baggage, to leave it for security with their friends, the Nabathites. But 'the children of Jambri came out of Medaba, and took John and all that he had and went their way.' This hostile act was not, however, left unavenged; for, soon after, it was told Jonathan and Simon that, the 'children of Jambri' were celebrating a great marriage, and bringing the bride from Nadabath, when Jonathan and his party laid an ambush for them, and as the bridegroom was coming forth with great pomp to meet the bride, with timbrels and songs, fell upon them, committing great slaughter, and taking great spoil; thus 'converting the marriage into mourning, and their melody into lamentation' (1 Maccab. ix. 33-42). But who Jambri was we know not. Some suppose that the 'children of Jambri' were a family of Amorites who lived in Medaba, and who, as such, were ready to shew their hatred to the Jews. But, query, May not Jambri be the same as Jambres, one of the two magicians who opposed Moses? and may not the persons, who, on the above named occasion, attacked the Jews, be called the 'children of Jambri,' or Jambres, to brand them with infamy as the enemies of God's people and cause?—I. J.

JAMES, Ἰακώβος. Two, if not three persons of this name are mentioned in the N. T.

1. JAMES, the son of Zebedee (Ἰακώβος ὁ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου), and brother of the evangelist John. Their occupation was that of fishermen, probably at Bethsaida, in partnership with Simon Peter (Luke v. 10). On comparing the account given in Matt. iv. 21, Mark i. 19, with that in John i., it would appear that James and John had been acquainted with our Lord, and had received him as the Messiah, some time before he called them to attend upon him stately—a call with which they immediately complied. Their mother's name was Salome. We find James, John, and Peter associated on several interesting occasions in the Saviour's life. They alone were present at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28); at the restoration to life of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 42; Luke viii. 51); and in the garden of Gethsemane during the agony (Mark xiv. 33; Matt. xxvi. 37; Luke xxi. 37). With Andrew they listened in private to our Lord's discourse on the fall of Jerusalem (Mark xiii. 3). James and his brother appear to have indulged in false notions of the kingdom of the Messiah, and were led by ambitious views to join in the request made to Jesus by their mother (Matt. xx. 20-23; Mark x. 35). From Luke ix. 52, we may infer that their temperament was warm and impetuous. On account, probably, of their boldness and energy in discharging their apostleship, they received from their Lord the appellation of Boanerges, or Sons of Thunder. (For the various explanations of this title given by the fathers, see Suiceri The. Eccles. s. v. Βωανηγ, and Lücke's Commentar, Bonn. 1840; Einleitung, c. i. sec. 2, p. 17.) James was the first martyr among the apostles. Clement of Alexandria, in a fragment preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 9), reports that the officer who conducted James to the tribunal was so influenced by the bold declaration of his faith as to embrace the Gospel and avow himself also a Christian; in consequence of which he was beheaded at the same time.

2. JAMES, the son of Alphæus (Ἰάκωβος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφαίου), one of the twelve apostles (Mark iii. 18; Matt. x. 3; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). His mother's name was Mary (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40); in the latter passage he is called James the Less (ὁ μικρὸς, the Little), either as being younger than James the son of Alphæus, or on account of his low stature (Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 10).

3. JAMES, the brother of the Lord (ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ Κυρίου; Gal. i. 19). Whether this James is identical with the son of Alphæus is a question which Dr. Neander pronounces to be the most difficult in the apostolic history, and which cannot yet be considered as decided. We read in Matt. xiii. 55, 'Is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?' and in Mark vi. 3, 'Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, and brother of James and Joses, and of Juda and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us?' Those critics who suppose the terms of affinity in these and parallel passages to be used in the laxer sense of near relations, have remarked that in Mark xv. 40, mention is made of 'Mary, the mother of James the less and of Joses;' and that in John xix. 25, it is said, 'there stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene:' they therefore infer that the wife of Cleophas is the same as the sister of the mother of Jesus, and, consequently, that James (supposing Cleophas and Alphæus to be the same name, the former according to the Hebrew, the latter according to the Greek orthography) was a first cousin of our Lord, and, on that account, termed his brother, and that the other individuals called the brethren of Jesus stood in the same relation. It is also urged that in the Acts, after the death of James the son of Zebedee, we read only of one James; and, moreover, that it is improbable that our Lord would have committed his mother to the care of the beloved disciple, had there been sons of Joseph living, whether the offspring of Mary or of a former marriage. Against this view it has been alleged that in several early Christian writers James, the brother of the Lord, is distinguished from the son of Alphæus; that the identity of the names Alphæus and Cleophas is somewhat uncertain; and that it is doubtful whether the words 'his mother's sister,' in John xix. 21, are to be considered in apposition with those immediately following—'Mary, the wife of Cleophas,' or intended to designate a different individual; since it is highly improbable that two sisters should have had the same name. Wieseler (Studien und Kritiken, 1840, iii. 648) maintains that not three, but four persons are mentioned in this passage, and that since in Matt. xxvii. 56, Mark xv. 40, besides Mary of Magdala, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, Salome also (or the mother of the sons of Zebedee) is named as present at the Crucifixion, it follows that she must have been the sister of our Lord's mother. This would obviate the difficulty arising from the sameness of the names of the two sisters, and would set aside the proof that James, the Lord's brother, was the son of Alphæus. But even allowing that the sons of Alphæus were related to our Lord, the narrative in the Evangelists and the Acts presents some reasons for suspecting that they were not the persons described as 'the brethren of Jesus.' 1. The brethren of Jesus are associated with his mother in a manner that strongly indicates their standing in the filial relation to her (Matt. xii. 46; Mark iii. 31; Luke viii. 19; Matt. xiii. 56, where 'sisters' are also mentioned; they appear constantly together as forming one family, John ii. 12). 'After this he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples' (Kuinoel, Comment. in Matt. xii. 46). 2. It is explicitly stated, that at a period posterior to the appointment of the twelve apostles, among whom we find 'the son of Alphæus,' 'neither did his brethren believe on him' (John vii. 5; Lücke's Commentar). Attempts, indeed, have been made by Grotius and Lardner to dilute the force of this language, as if it meant merely that their faith was imperfect or wavering—that they did not believe as they should; but the language of Jesus is decisive:—'My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready; the world cannot hate you, but me it hateth' (compare this with John xv. 18, 19: 'If the world hate you,' etc.). This appears to overthrow the argument for the identity of the brethren of Jesus with the sons of Alphæus, drawn from the sameness of the names; for as to the supposition that what is affirmed in John's Gospel might apply to only some of his brethren, it is evident that, admitting the identity, only one brother of Jesus would be left out of the 'company of the apostles.' 3. Luke's language in Acts i. 13, 14, is opposed to the identity in question; for, after enumerating the apostles, among whom, as usual, is 'James, the son of Alphæus,' he adds, 'they all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' From this passage, however, we learn that, by this time, his brethren had received him as the Messiah. That after the death of the son of Zebedee we find only one James mentioned, may easily be accounted for on the ground that probably only one, 'the brother of the Lord,' remained at Jerusalem; and, under such circumstances, the silence of the historian respecting the son of Alphæus is not more strange than respecting several of the other apostles, whose names never occur after the catalogue in ch. i. 13. Paul's language in Gal. i. 19 has been adduced to prove the identity of the Lord's brother with the son of Alphæus, by its ranking him among the apostles, but Neander and Winer have shewn that it is by no means decisive (Winer's Grammatik, 4th ed. p. 517; Neander's History of the Planting, etc., vol. ii. p. 5, Eng. transl.) If we examine the early Christian writers, we shall meet with a variety of opinions on this subject. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 1) says that James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, brother of the Lord, son of Joseph, the husband of Mary, was surnamed the Just by the ancients, on account of his eminent virtue. He uses similar language in his Evangelical Demonstra- tion (iii. 5). In his commentary on Isaiah he reckons fourteen apostles; namely, the twelve, Paul, and James, the brother of our Lord. A similar enumeration is made in the 'Apostolic Constitutions' (vi. 14). Epiphanius, Chrysostom, and Theophylact speak of James, the Lord's brother, as being the same as the son of Cleopas. They suppose that Joseph and Cleopas were brothers, and that the latter dying without issue, Joseph married his widow for his first wife, according to the Jewish custom, and that James and his brethren were the offspring of this marriage (Lardner's Credibility, pt. ii. ch. 118, Works, iv. 548; ch. i. 163, Works, v. 160; History of Heretics, c. xi. sec. 11, Works, viii. 527; Supplement to the Credibility, ch. 17, Works, vi. 188). A passage from Josephus is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 23), in which James, the brother of 'him who is called Christ,' is mentioned; but in the opinion of Dr. Lardner and other eminent critics this clause is an interpolation (Lardner's Jewish Testimonies, ch. iv.; Works, vi. 496). According to Hegesippus (a converted Jew of the 2d century), James, the brother of the Lord, undertook the government of the church along with the apostles (μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων). He describes him as leading a life of ascetic strictness, and as held in the highest veneration by the Jews. But in the account he gives of his martyrdom some circumstances are highly improbable. In the Apocryphal Gospel according to the Hebrews, he is said to have been precipitated from a pinnacle of the temple, and then assaulted with stones; and at last dispatched by a blow on the head with a fuller's pole (Lardner's Supplement, ch. xvi., Works, vi. p. 174; Neander, History of the Planting, etc., vol. ii. pp. 9, 22, Eng. transl.). Dr. Niemeyer enumerates not less than five persons of this name, by distinguishing the son of Alphæus from James the less, and assuming that the James last mentioned in Acts i. 13 was not the brother, but the father of Judas (Charakteristik der Bibel, Halle 1830, i. 399).—J. JAMES, EPISTLE OF; said, according to Eusebius, to be the first of the so-called Catholic epistles, ἡ πρώτη τῶν ὀνομαζομένων καθολικῶν ἐπιστολῶν. The question of its authorship has been a subject of keen and prolonged controversy, since, as Eusebius has again remarked, πολλοὶ Ἰδωῦοι ἐκαλοῦντο. James the Great, or the son of Zebedee, was put to death under Herod Agrippa about the year 44, and, therefore, the authorship cannot with any propriety be ascribed to him, though a Syriac MS., published by Widmandstadt, and an old Latin version, published by Martianay and Sabatier, make the assertion. The authorship has been assigned by not a few to James the Less, ὁ μικρός, the son of Alphæus or Cleophas, and by others to James, the Lord's brother. Some, indeed, maintain that the two names were borne by the same individual, James being called the Lord's brother, either as being a cousin or adoptive brother of Jesus (Lange, art. Jacobus in Herzog's Encyclopædie), or as a son of Joseph by a levirate connection with the widow of Cleophas—the opinion of Epiphanius and Theophylact; or as a son of Joseph by a former marriage—the view of Chrysostom, Hilary, Cave, and Basnage. On the other hand, it is held by many that James, son of Alphæus, and James, brother of our Lord, were distinct persons, the latter being a uterine brother of Jesus, and standing, according to the representation of the gospels, in the same relation with him to their common mother Mary—as in Matt. xii. 47; xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; John ii. 12; Acts i. 14. After some hesitation we are inclined to this hypothesis, but we cannot enter into the question, referring the reader to the previous article, and to that on 'Jesus Christ.' There are also three excellent monographs on the subject. Blom, Theol. Dissert. de rois ἀδελφοῖς κυρίου, Lug. Bat. 1839; Schaff, das Verhältniss des Jacobus Bruders des Herrn, Berlin 1842; Wijbelingh, quis est epistola Jacobi Scriptor? Groning. 1854. For the other side, see Mill on the Mythical Interpretation of the Gospels, p. 219, ed. sec., 1861. Dr. Mill held the perpetual virginity of Mary, or that she was, in ecclesiastical language, ἀειπαρθένος, and thus virtually forecloses the entire investigation. It serves no purpose to sneer at those who hold the opposite theory as having their prototypes in the Antidicomarianites or Helvidians of the 4th century. According to our view, the author of this epistle was the Lord's brother, not an apostle or one of the twelve, but a man of apostolical standing; according to Eusebius, making, along with Paul, fourteen apostles (Comment. ad Jesai. xvii. 5). In Gal. ii. 9 Paul classes him with Peter and John, not as an apostle, but all three as being pillars (στυλοί). He is said by Hegesippus (Euseb. Hist. ii. 23) to have received the government of the church, μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων, not post apostolos, as Jerome wrongly renders it, but 'along with the apostles'—as the natural rendering is—or was received by them into a collegiate relation. In the pseudo-Clementines, and in the Apostolical Constitutions, he is traditionally separated from the apostles. It is quite groundless on the part of Wieseler (Studien u. Kritik, 1842), Stier, and Davidson, to argue that the James mentioned in the first chapter of Galatians is a different person from the James referred to in the second chapter. Again, we have Paul distinctly acknowledging the high position of the brethren of the Lord when he ranges them between 'other apostles' and 'Cephas' in 1 Cor. ix. 5. By universal consent James was called ὁ δίκαιος, and, being martyred, was succeeded by a cousin, Symeon, second of the cousins of the Lord, and a son of Alphæus—ὄντα ἀνεψιὸν τοῦ κυρίου δεύτερον. Thus James was the superintendent of the church at Jerusalem, and, probably on account of continuous residence, possessed of higher influence there than Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, who could only be an occasional visitor. 'Certain from James,' τινὲς ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου, went down to Antioch, before whom Peter prevaricated, as if he had stood in awe of the stricter Judaic principles of James and his party. It seems, therefore, very natural, that one occupying this position in the theocratic metropolis, should write to his believing brethren of the Dispersion. He sympathized so strongly with the myriads of the Jews who believed and yet were zealous of the law—ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου, that for their sakes and to ward off their hostility, he advised the apostle Paul to submit to an act of conformity. This conservative spirit, this zeal for the law at least as the moral rule of life, and this profession of Christianity along with uniform obedience to the 'customs,' seem to us characteristic elements of the epistle before us. This opinion as to the authorship is held by Herder, Clement, De Wette, Neander, Kern, Schaff, Winer, Stier, Rothe, and Alford. Davidson, while holding the opinion that the Lord's brother and James the apostle are different persons, ascribes the epistle to the latter. But the theory seems to violate all the probabilities that may be gathered from the early fathers and historians. That James the Lord's brother is James the apostle, is an opinion maintained by Baronius, Lardner, Pearson, Gabler, Eichhorn, Hug, Guericke, Meier, Giesel, and Theile.

Canonical authority.—The epistle is found in the Syrian Peshito in the 2d century, a version which circulated in the neighbourhood of that country to which James and his readers belonged, and the translator and his coadjutors must have had special historical reasons for inserting James in their canon, as they exclude the Second and Third Epistles of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Apocalypse. There are clauses in Clement of Rome (Ad Cor. xxxii.), and in Hermas (Mandat. xii. 15), which probably may refer to correspondent portions of this epistle, though, perhaps, they may only allude directly to the Septuagint. The quotation from the Latin version of Irenæus (Advers. Haeres. iv. 16) appears to be more direct in the phrase—et amicus Dei vocatus est. But this phrase, found also in Clement, seems to have been a current one, and Philo calls Abraham by the same appellation. We cannot, therefore, lay such immediate stress on these passages as is done by Kern, Wiesinger, and others, though there is a presumption in favour of the opinion that passages in the apostolical fathers, bearing any likeness of style or thought to the apostolical writings, were borrowed from them, are either direct imitations or unconscious reproductions. This epistle is quoted by Origen (In Joan., Opera, vol. iv. p. 306); and the Latin version of Rufinus uses the phrase Jacobus apostolus as a preface to a quotation. This father quotes the epistle also as ascribed to James—ἐν τῇ φερούμενῃ, Ἰακώβου ἐπιστολῇ; though, as Kern remarks, Origen says that the doctrine 'faith without works is dead,' is not received by all—οὐ σύγχωρηθέν. Clement of Alexandria does not quote it, but Eusebius says that he expounded all the Catholic epistles, including, however, in the range of his comments the epistle of Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter. Tertullian seems to make no reference to it, though Credner supposes an allusion to ii. 23 in the second book Adversus Judæos (Opera, ed. Oehler, vol. ii. p. 704). Eusebius places it among the Antilegomena (Histor. Eccles. ii. 23; iii. 25), saying of the epistle, under the first reference, after he had just spoken of its author's death, ιστέον δὲ ὡς νοθεύεται μὲν, etc., 'it is reckoned spurious—not many of the ancients have mentioned it;' subjoining, however, that it and Jude were used in most of the churches. In other places Eusebius quotes James without hesitation, calling the epistle by the sacred title of γραφῇ, and its author ὁ λεγόμενος ἀπόστολος. Jerome is very explicit, saying that James wrote one epistle, which some asserted had been published by another in his name, but that by degrees and in process of time, paullatim tempore procedente, it obtained authority. Jerome's assertion may arise from the fact that there were several persons named James, and that confusion on this point was one means of throwing doubt on the epistle. There seems to be also an allusion in Hippolytus (ed. Lagarde, p. 122) to ii. 13, in the words, ἡ γὰρ κλῆσις ἀνθρώπων ἐστι τῷ μὴ ποιῆσαντι θεός. It was at length received by the council of Carthage in 397, and in this century it seems to have been all but universally acknowledged, both by the eastern and western churches—Theodore of Mopsuestia being a marked exception, because of (v. 11) the allusion in it to the book of Job. At the period of the Reformation, its genuineness was again called into question. Luther, in his preface to the N. T. in 1522, comparing it 'with the best books of the N. T.,' stigmatised it as 'ein recht strohern Epistel denn sie doch kein evangelisch Art an ihr hat.' Cyril Lucar had a similar objection, that Christ's name was coldly mentioned, and that only once or twice, and that it treated merely of morality—sola a la moralita attende—Lettres Anecdotes, p. 85, Amsterdam 1718. Erasmus had doubts about it, and so had Cardinal Cajetan, Flacius, and the Magdeburg centuriators. Grotius and Wetstein shared in these doubts, and they are followed by Schleiermacher, Schott, De Wette, Reuss, the Tübingen critics Baur and Schwegler, and Ritschl in his Entstehung der Alt-kath. Kirche, p. 150. These recent critics deny its apostolic source, and some of them place it in the 2d century, from its resemblance in some parts to the Clementine homilies. But it is plain that the objections of almost all these opponents spring mainly from doctrinal and not from critical views; are rather originated and sustained by the notion formed of the contents of the epistle, than rest on any proper historical foundation. We have not space to go over the several objections—such as the absence of the term 'apostle' from the inscription, though it is not found in several of Paul's epistles; the want of individuality in the document, though this may be easily accounted for by the circumstances of the author in relation to his readers; and the apparent antagonism to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, which we shall afterwards consider. It is or no avail to object, with Wetstein and Theile, that James refers to the apocryphal writings, a practice unknown till a later period, for Theile's array of passages (Prolegom., p. 46) does not prove the statement, as Huther's reply to this and other similar objections has shewn at length, and step by step. Nor, lastly, can it be said that the Greek style of the epistle betrays a culture which the author could not possess. The style is nervous, indeed, and is more Hebraistic in general structure than in its individual phrases, as in its short and pithy clauses, the absence of logical formulæ, the want of elaborate constructions, its oratorical fervour, and the simple and direct outflow of thoughts in brief and often parallelistic clauses. Intercourse with foreign Jews must have been frequent in those days, and there are always minds which from natural propensity are more apt than others to acquire a tasteful facility in the use of a tongue which has not been their vernacular. Taking all these things into account, we have every reason to accept the canonical authority of this epistle, the trial it has passed through giving us fuller confidence in it, since the principal objections are the offspring either of polemical prejudice, or of a subjective criticism based more on æsthetic tendencies than historical results. Rauch has faintly objected to the integrity of the epistle, asserting that the conclusion of ch. v. 12-20, may be an interpolation, because it is not in logical harmony with what precedes; but he has had no followers, and Kern, Theile, Schneckenburger, and others, have refuted him—logical sequence being a form of critical argument wholly inapplicable to this epistle.

The Persons for whom the Epistle is intended.—The salutation is addressed ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς ταῖς ἐν τῇ διασπορᾷ. They were Jews, ἀδελφοί—brethren or believing Jews, and they lived beyond Palestine or in the Dispersion. Such are the plain characteristics, national and religious, of the persons addressed. There are, however, two extremes of erroneous opinion about them. Some, as Lardner, Macknight, Theile, Credner, and Hug, imagine that the epistle is meant for all Jews. But the inscription forbids such a supposition. The tone of the epistle implies that 'the servant of the Lord Jesus Christ' addressed fellow-believers—'brethren'—'begotten' along with himself (ἡμᾶς) 'by the word of truth,' and all of them bearing the 'good name'—καλὸν ὄνομα. The first verse of the second chapter implies also that they held 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of Glory,' and they are exhorted not to hold it inconsistently, along with manifest respect of persons, or shewing unfounded social preferences. They are told besides, in v. 7, to exercise patience, ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου, till the public promised advent of the Lord their Saviour. The rich men denounced in v. 1 may not have belonged to the church in reality, but this startling denunciation carried in it warning to them and comfort to the poor and persecuted. May there not be, in a letter to a church, holy invective against those without it, who annoy and oppress its unresisting members? Dean Alford, after Huther, inclines to include in the διασπορά, Jews also in Palestine—Jerusalem being regarded as the centre. He refers to the phrase, Acts viii. 1, πάντες δὲ διεσπάρησαν κατὰ τὰς χώρας τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Σαμαρείας. But the use of the verb here in its general sense and in an easy narrative cannot modify the popular meaning of διασπορά as the technical or geographic title of Jews beyond Palestine.

On the other hand, it has been maintained by Köster (Studien u. Kritiken, 1831), Kern, Neudecker, and De Wette, that the title in the inscription is a symbolic one, and signifies simply Christians out of Palestine, as the true Israel of God. A modification of this view is held by others—viz., that while the epistle is addressed to believing Jews, believing heathen and unconverted Jews are not excluded. But the phrase in the inscription, as in Acts xxvi. 7, is to be taken in its natural sense, and with no spiritualized meaning or reference. The entire tone and aspect also are Jewish. The place of ecclesiastical meeting is συναγωγή; the law, νόμος, is of supreme authority. The divine unity is a primary and distinctive article of faith, the ordinary terms of Jewish obtestation are introduced, as is also the prophetic epithet symbolising spiritual unfaithfulness, μοιχαλίδες (iv. 4). Anointing with oil is mentioned, and the special regard to be paid (i. 27) to orphans and widows finds its basis in repeated statutes of the Mosaic law. The errors refuted also are such as naturally arose out of Pharisaic pride and formalism, and the acceptance of the promised Christ in a spirit of traditional carnality. The fact that the Dispersion was found principally in the East—that is, in Syria and adjacent countries—countenances the presumption that this epistle is found in the Peshito at so early a period, because it had immediate circulation in that region, and there had proved the fitness and usefulness of its counsels and warning. Josephus says of the Dispersion, the Jews were scattered everywhere, πλείστον δὲ τῇ Συρίᾳ ἀναμεμιγμένον (Bell. Jud. vii. 3. 3). The persons addressed were poor; the rich were their persecutors, their own partialities and preferences were worldly and inconsistent; they wanted perfect confidence in God, and stumbled at the divine dispensations; sins of the tongue were common, eagerness to be public teachers was an epidemic among them; they spoke rashly and hardly of one another; and they felt not the connection between a living faith and a holy life. Society was under a process of apparent disintegration, wars and fightings were frequent, with loss of life and property. Its extremes were the rich and the poor, with no middle class between, for though tradings and journeyings quite in Jewish style are referred to, iv. 13, 14, the principal occupation was husbandry, with no social grade between those who owned and those who reaped the fields.

Time and place of writing the Epistle.—The place most probably was Jerusalem, where James had his residence. Many allusions in the epistle, while they apply to almost any eastern locality, carry in them a presumption in favour of that country, in the metropolis of which James is known to have lived and laboured. These allusions are to such natural phenomena, as parching winds, i. 11; long drought, v. 17, 18; the early and latter rain, v. 7; saline springs, iii. 12; proximity to the sea, i. 6, iii. 4 (Hug's Einleitung, vol. ii. p. 439). Naturally from the holy capital of Judæa goes forth from the 'servant of the Lord Jesus Christ' a solemn circular to all the believing brethren in the Dispersion—for to them James was a living authority to which they bowed, and Jerusalem a holy centre that stirred a thousand loyal associations within them. It is not so easy to determine the time at which the epistle was written. Many place the date about the year 60—close on the martyrdom of James the just, or not long before the destruction of Jerusalem—as Michaelis, Pearson, Mill, Guericke, Burton, Macknight, Bleek, Einleit. p. 547, 1862, and the older commentators generally. Hug and De Wette place it after the epistle to the Hebrews, to which they imagine it contains some allusions—Hug holding that it was written—überlegt—on set purpose against Paul and his doctrine of justification by faith. So also Baur, Paulus, p. 677. But these reasons are by no means conclusive. The great argument that the epistle of James was written to oppose either the doctrine or counteract the abuses of the doctrine of justification by faith has, as we shall see, no foundation. The notion that this epistle is in some sense corrective in its tone and purpose appears plausible to us, as Paul is so usually read by us before James that we gain an earlier acquaintance with him, while James occupies also a later place in the ordinary arrangement of the books of the N. T. But the state of the Judæo-Christians addressed in the epistle is not that which we know to have existed at and before the year 60. There is no allusion to the fierce disputations as to the value and permanence of circumcision, the authority and meaning of the ceremonial law, or the conditions on which Gentile converts should be admitted into the church—the questions discussed at the Council of Jerusalem. Controversies on these points saturated the church

during many years before the fall of Jerusalem, and no one could address Jewish converts at any length without some allusion to them. The myriads who believed, as James said, were 'all zealous of the law'; and that zeal assumed so many false shapes, threw up so many barriers in the way of ecclesiastical relationship, nay, occasionally so infringed on the unconditioned freeness of the gospel as to rob it of its simplicity and power, that no Jew addressing Jewish believers with the authority and from the position of James could fail to dwell on those disturbing and engrossing peculiarities. The inference therefore is, that the epistle was written prior to those keen and universal discussions, and to that state of the church which gave them origin and continuance; prior therefore also to the time when the labours of the apostle Paul among the Gentiles called such attention to their success that 'certain from James came down' to Antioch to examine for themselves and carry back a report to the mother church in Jerusalem. The epistle might thus be written shortly before the Council of Jerusalem—probably about the year 45. Such is the view of Neander, Schneckenburger, Theile, Thiersch, Huther, Davidson, and Alford. The objections of Wiesinger and Bleek admit of easy reply. Both affirm that the interval supposed is too limited for such a growth of Christianity as this epistle implies. But we refer to the scene and results of Pentecost—when the Dispersion assembled at the feast felt the moving power of the Divine Spirit, and went to their distant homes carrying the new religion in their hearts. Then, at the persecution after the martyrdom of Stephen, the members of the church went 'everywhere preaching the word'; or, should this expression be limited by the previous clause 'throughout the regions of Judæa,' then they carried the gospel to the very frontiers; and afterwards, it is affirmed (Acts xi. 19) that the same parties or others at the same period travelled into other countries 'preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only.' It would be rash to affirm that Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch were the only places so visited, for they are mentioned to account for the mission of Barnabas and the introduction of Paul into the scene of active service. The meeting of the churches for worship in places fitted up for the purpose, ii. 2, their being called by the καλὸν ὄνομα, and their having a bench of office-bearers, are tokens of an organization which could surely be set up within the space of twenty years. The same space is sufficient too for the development of such errors in doctrine and practice as are here rebuked, for some of them have their root in human nature, and others of them had a propitious soil in Jewish temperament and education. They might be called by the 'good name' without being designated by the special term coined and applied first at Antioch; and separate places of worship, with appointed presbyters or elders, were the result of secession from the synagogue and the natural imitation of its mode of government, both in name and jurisdiction.

But the great objection advanced by Hug, Wiesinger, Bleek, and others, is, that the discussion in this epistle on the relation of faith and works presupposes, on the part of the writer, an acquaintance with the Pauline doctrine of justification as found both in Romans and Galatians. That there is some correspondence of phrase is evident not only in the use of the terms πίστις, ἔργα, δικαιούσθαι, but in the special diction—ἐξ ἔργου ἐδικαιώθη—δικαιοῦνται καὶ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως—compared with Rom. iii. 20; v. 1; Gal. ii. 16, etc.; and the conclusion is that James wrote, not directly indeed in antagonism to Paul, as some insinuate, but to correct Antinomian perversions of his distinctive doctrine. Now, not to answer in the meantime that the antagonism is apparent and not real, it may be said that surely the doctrine expressed by the terms faith and works was not first introduced by the apostle of the Gentiles. Wherever the gospel was proclaimed those terms must have found some place in the proclamation, for the grand and characteristic doctrine was faith in Christ, the belief that Jesus was the promised Messiah, the Redeemer who had appeared in the fulness of the times. The sermon of Peter at Pentecost inculcates that faith in his Messiahship which all the house of Israel ought to possess, and faith in His name wrought a miracle at the 'gate Beautiful.' Immediately afterwards the church is called 'the multitude of them who believed.' Remission of sins through faith was the point of Peter's preaching to Cornelius. Our Lord Himself insists on faith as the one means of life. If the gospel were faithfully presented, if its distinctive character were fully brought out, then faith must have been the burden of the message; and as faith in itself could not be easily defined, it might be illustrated from its natural contrast with works. So that this nomenclature of faith and works, so far from being peculiar to Paul, must have been as old as the gospel, and as widely known as the publication of it. What should hinder James therefore from using these familiar terms in writing to the believers of the Dispersion, who could not enjoy his personal and more systematic teaching?

What then is the teaching of this epistle? Many attempts have been made, as the phrase is, to harmonise Paul and James; but into a history of such attempts we cannot enter. Suffice it to say, some hold that there are two justifications spoken of, a former and latter, or that Paul speaks of justification before God, and James of justification to one's own heart, or before men—the view of very many. Others, like Bishop O'Brien (Nature and Effects of Faith, p. 517, sec. ed.), imagine that faith is used in two different senses by the two apostles. Others, as Knapp, argue that the term 'works' is employed by them with very different meanings; while others follow Bishop Bull, who, in his famous 'Harmonia,' adopts a theory so decidedly anti-Pauline as to hold that faith is not a single Christian grace, but stands for the 'whole body of Christian graces, or a life according to the gospel'; nay, that faith per se, so far from being the instrument of justification, no more justifies than charity, nay, may actually dwell in an ungodly and unjustified heart. The Bishop moreover does not attempt to bring James, whose allusion to the doctrine is only brief and incidental, into harmony with Paul, who has fully discussed it in formal and frequent arguments, but he labours to bring Paul into harmony with James. See on this subject Knapp, Scripta, p. 511; Reuss, Théologie, ii. p. 524; Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. p. 639; Wardlaw's Sermons; Wood's Theology, vol. ii. p. 408; Watson's Institutes, vol. ii. 614; Lechler, de: Apostol. und nachapostol. Zeitalter, p. 163.

Now, first of all, it may be said with Michaelis, 'no man whose object was merely to prevent the doctrine of another from being falsely understood would express himself in such a manner that his readers might suppose he meant to combat the doctrine itself.' The statements of the two writers are independent, and apparent discrepancy arises from difference in the point of view of each of them. The works which Paul sets aside as a means of justification are such external compliances with the law as are valueless in themselves (Philip. iii. 2-6); the works which James commends are the fruit of inner renovation and life. Works prior to faith, and superseding it or forming a barrier to the possession of it, are reprobated by the one; works springing out of faith, and embodying its living power, are enjoined by the other. The former deals with Jewish self-righteousness, and strips it of all pretension, that it may be argued or wooed into faith; the latter deals with the self-styled faith of Jewish indifference, that it may be shaken off and that spiritual activity may be developed. For a dead faith is no faith, and is unworthy of the name; wherever faith exists it must of necessity prove and put forth its energy. A barren faith differs from true faith, just as a mere cheap wish differs from genuine beneficence, ii. 14-17. Abraham was justified by works, those works being the results of a faith which he had long possessed—for the sacrifice of Isaac was the crowning realization of the divine statement, 'Abraham believed in God.' In and through that faith he had been justified, yet by works his faith was perfected—that is, not merely was its genuineness demonstrated, but in this act of obedience to the Divine will, and by means of it, his faith reached its climax—rose into completeness. The faith which does not sanctify can have had no power to justify—the faith which does not make us righteous cannot have availed to have us pronounced righteous. Similar is the illustration from the history of Rahab. The faith which James declares to be no faith—for it has no fruits—is a mere change of opinion or of party without change of heart; and in the case of those whom he addressed was a belief that Jesus was the promised Messiah, but a belief weakened and neutralized by traditional prepossessions, as if the mere addition of this article to their national creed sufficed of itself to secure their salvation.

Contents.—The errors and sins against which James warns his readers are such as arose out of their situation. Perfection—τέλειότης is a prominent idea, and τέλειος is a frequent epithet—the 'perfect work' of patience, the 'perfect' gift of God, the 'perfect law' of liberty or the new covenant, faith 'made perfect,' and the tongue-governing man, is a 'perfect man.' He writes from a knowledge of their circumstances, does not set before them an ethical system for their leisurely study, but selects the vices of opinion and life to which their circumstances so markedly and so naturally exposed them. Patience is a primary inculcation, it being essential to that perfection which is his central thought. Trials develop patience, and such evils as produce trials are not to be ascribed in a spirit of fatalism to God. Spiritual life is enjoyed by believers, and is fostered by the reception, and specially by the doing, of the word; and true religious service is unworldly and disinterested beneficence. Partial preferences are for-bidden by the royal law—faith without works is dead—tongue and temper are to be under special guard, and under the control of wisdom—the deceits of casuistry are to be eschewed—contentious covetousness is to be avoided as one of the works of the devil, along with censorious pride. Rich oppressors are denounced, and patience is enjoined on all; the fitting exercises in times of gladness and of sickness are prescribed; the efficacy of prayer is extolled and exemplified; while the conclusion animates his readers to do for others what he has been doing for them—to convert them 'from the error of their way' (see Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, p. 297). The epistle contains no allusion to the cardinal doctrines of Christianity, though they are implied. It was not the writer's object either to discuss or defend them. It would be unwarranted, on that account, to say that Christianity had not penetrated his own spiritual life, or that he was only in a transition state between Judaism and Christianity. He might not, indeed, have the free and unnational views of Paul in presenting the gospel. But a true Christianity is implied, and his immediate work lay in enforcing certain Christian duties, which he does in the style of the Master himself.

Style and Language.—The similarity of this epistle in tone and form to the Sermon on the Mount has often been remarked. In the spirit of the great Teacher, he sharply reprobates all externalism, all selfishness, inconsistency, worldliness, ostentation, self-deception, and hypocrisy. Thus in the first chapter as a sample:—comp. i. 2, Matt. v. 10-12; i. 4, Matt. v. 48; i. 5, Matt. vii. 7; i. 9, Matt. v. 3; i. 20, Matt. v. 22, etc. The epistle, in short, is a long and earnest illustration of the final warning given by our Lord in the figures of building on the rock and building on the sand. The composition is the abrupt and stern utterance of an earnest, practical soul—a rapid series of censures and counsels—not entirely disconnected, but generally suggested by some inner link of association. Often a general law is epigrammatically laid down, while a peculiar sin is reprobated or a peculiar virtue enforced—or a principle is announced in the application of it. The style is vigorous—full of imperatives so solemn and categorical as to dispel all idea of resistance or compromise, and of interrogations so pointed that they carry their answer with them. It is also marked by epithets so bold and forcible that they give freshness and colour to the diction. The clauses have a rhetorical beauty and power, and as in men of fervent oratorical temperament, the words often fall into rythmical order, while the thoughts occasionally blossom into poetry. An accidental hexameter is found in i. 17 [provided it be lawful to make the last syllable of δόξαι long]. The Greek is remarkably pure, and it is difficult to account for this comparative purity. Hegesippus, as quoted by Eusebius, says that James's believing brethren desired him to address the crowds assembled at the Passover; for there were brought together—πᾶσαι αἱ φυλαὶ μετὰ καὶ τῶν ἑθνῶν—and Greek must have been the language employed. It is therefore quite preposterous on the part of Bollen, Bertholdt, and Schott to suspect that the Greek of this epistle is a translation from an Aramean original. Resemblances have sometimes been traced between this epistle and the first epistle of Peter, and these may be accounted for by the fact that both authors are somewhat similarly circumstanced in relation to their readers. But Hug's and Bleek's inference is a rash one—that Peter must have read the epistle of James. In a word, the epistle of James is a noble protest against laxity of morals—against supine and easy acquiescence in the truths of the Gospel without feeling their power or acting under their influence, while it presents such ethical lessons as the church, placed in multiple relations to a world of sense and trial, has ever need of to animate and sustain it in its progress toward perfection. Or as Calvin says, Nihil continet Christi apostolo indignum, multiplici vero doctrina scatet, cujus utilitas ad omnes Christianæ vite partes late patet. Among special commentaries on James may be noted—Althamar, Comment., 1527; Baumgarten, Ausleg., 1750; Semler, Paraphras. 1781; Hensler, Der Brief Jac. übers. und Ausleg., 1801; Schultess, *Epist. JANNES AND JAMBRES (Ἰαννης καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς), two of the Egyptian magicians who attempted by their enchantments (כִּסְמִים, occulte artes, Gesenius) to counteract the influence on Pharaoh's mind of the miracles wrought by Moses. Their names occur nowhere in the Hebrew Scriptures, and only once in the N. T. (2 Tim. iii. 8). The Apostle Paul became acquainted with them, most probably, from an ancient Jewish tradition, or, as Theodoret expresses it, 'from the unwritten teaching of the Jews' (τῆς ἀγραφῆς τῶν Ἰουδαίων διδασκαλίας). They are found frequently in the Talmudical and Rabbinical writings, but with some variations. Thus, for Jannes we meet with יָנִים, יִנְנָא, יִנְנָה, יִנְנָה, יִנְנָה. Of these, the three last are forms of the Hebrew יִנְנָה, which has led to the supposition that 'Ἰαννης is a contracted form of the Greek Ἰωάννης. Some critics consider that these names were of Egyptian origin, and, in that case, the Jewish writers must have been misled by a similarity of sound to adopt the forms above-mentioned. For Jambres we find מִמְרֵי, מִמְרֵי, מִמְרֵי, and in the Shalsheth Hakbala the two names are given יִנְנָה וְיִמְבְּרֵס. The Targum of Jonathan inserts them in Exod. vii. 11. The same writer also gives as a reason for Pharaoh's edict for the destruction of the Israelitish male children, that 'this monarch had a dream in which the land of Egypt appeared in one scale and a lamb in another; that on awakening he sought for its interpretation from his wise men; whereupon Jannes and Jambres (יָנִים וְיִמְבְּרֵס) said—'A son is to be born in the congregation of Israel who will desolate the whole land of Egypt.' Several of the Jewish writers speak of Jannes and Jambres as the two sons of Balaam, and assert that they were the youths (נְעָרִים, servants, A. V.) who went with him to the king of Moab (Num. xxii. 22). The Pythagorean philosopher Numenius mentions these persons in a passage preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 8), and by Origen (c. Cel. iv. p. 198.

ed. Spencer); also Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxx. 1). There was an ancient apocryphal writing entitled Jannes and Mambres, which is referred to by Origen (in Matt. Comment. sec. 117; Opera, v. 29), and by Ambrosiaster, or Hilary the Deacon: it was condemned by Pope Gelasius (Wetstenii Nov. Test. Græc. ii. 362; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. Rab. col. 945; Lightfoot's Sermon on Jannes and Jambres; Works, vii. 89; Eruhin, or Miscellanies, ch. xxiv.; Works, iv. 33; Lardner's Credibility, pt. ii., ch. 35; Works, vii. 381.)—J. E. R. [Mr. R. S. Poole (Smith's Dictionary i. 928) traces Jannes to the Egyptian Aan, pronounced Ian, which he shews to have been a proper name in use among the Egyptians. This supports the belief that the names given by Paul are the real names of the parties referred to. For Jambres, however, or, as it is in some codices, Mambres, no satisfactory Egyptian equivalent has been found; all that can be said is that the termination is the Grecised form of Ka, 'sun,' a frequent ending of compound words in Egyptian, as ex. gr. Men-kaw-ra, Μεν-κέρης.] JANOAH (יְנוֹחַ, rest; Ἀνωχ; Alex. Ἰανώχ; Janoa), a town of Northern Palestine, situated apparently between Abel-beth-Maachah and Kedesh, and within the boundaries of Naphtali. It was taken, with several other cities, on the first invasion of Palestine by Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29). It is mentioned by Eusebius, but he strangely confounds it with Janohah, a town of Ephraim; and in this he is followed by Gesenius and others (Onomast. s. v. Janon; Gesenius, The-saurus, s. v.) The site of Janoah has not been identified. The modern village of Hunin, which stands on the brow of a mountain between Abel and Kedesh, and which contains the massive ruins of a large and strong castle, would answer to the situation, and the names Hunin and Janoah, though apparently so unlike, have some slight radical affinity (יְנוֹחַ, חֲנִין) for a description of Hunin, see Handbook for S. and P., 444).—J. L. P.

JANOHAH (יְנוֹחָה, the same as יְנוֹחַ with ה local; Janord; Alex. Ἰανώ; Janoa), a town on the north-eastern border of Ephraim, and consequently in or near the Jordan valley (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). It is only once mentioned in Scripture; but Eusebius and Jerome state that in their time it was still a village in the district of Acrabatane, twelve miles east of Neapolis, the ancient Sichem. Eusebius calls it Ἰανώ (Onomast. s. v. Janon). About three and a half hours (12 miles) east by south of Nabulus, stands the little village of Janân; situated in a vale which descends the eastern slope of the mountains of Ephraim to the Jordan. The village is now mostly in ruins, but it has a few houses inhabited, and its ancient remains 'are extensive and interesting. Entire houses and walls are still existing, but covered with immense heaps of earth and rubbish. The dwellings of the present inhabitants are built upon and between the houses of the ancient Janohah' (Van de Velde, Travels, ii. 303). There can be no doubt that this is the Janon of Jerome, and the Janohah of the Bible. As an example of the minute accuracy of Joshua's topography, it may be remarked that he states, the border of Ephraim 'went down from Janohah to Ataroth.' Janohah being situated on the side of the mountain range, the border 'went down' to Ataroth, which lay in the valley of the Jordan. About a mile up the vale of Janohah is a little fountain, and on a hill above it the prostrate ruins of another ancient town, which is now called Khirbet Yanûn, 'ruined Yanûn' (Robinson, B. R., iii. 297).—J. L. P.

JAPHETH (יָפֶֿתֿ; Ἰάφεθ; Vulg. Japheth), one of the three sons of Noah, of whom 'the whole earth was overspread' (Gen. ix. 19). It is uncertain whether he was the eldest or the second son. When the three are mentioned together, the order invariably is Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and it would be most natural to suppose that they are mentioned in the order of primogeniture. It is clear that Ham was younger than Shem, but it is not absolutely necessary to suppose from Gen. ix. 24 that he was the youngest of the three. Such, however, has been the general supposition, and Josephus writes them in the order Shem, Japheth, Ham (Antiq. i. 4. 1). Nothing can be said in favour of Japheth being the eldest son; for the expression in Gen. x. 21, 'unto Shem, the brother of Japheth the elder,' may, and probably does mean, 'the elder brother of Japheth' (taking יָפֶֿתֿ with יֶֿחֶֿזֶק), and not as the LXX., Symmachus, and Eng. Ver. take it, ἀδελφῷ Ἰάφεθ τοῦ μειστος. There are, indeed, two arguments against this—1. that Japheth is placed first in the genealogy; and 2. that in Gen. v. 32 Noah is said to have begotten sons in his 500th year, one hundred years before the deluge (vi. 11), whereas in xi. 10, Shem becomes father of Arphaxad, two years after the deluge, when he is 100 years old; whence it is inferred that Shem must have been born in the 502d year of Noah, and that Japheth must have been the eldest son. But these arguments are not conclusive. Japheth is placed first in the genealogy (Gen. x.) in order that the thread of the narrative, which continues in the line of Shem, may not be broken; and in Gen. v. 32, since Noah could not have had three sons born in one year, 500 is obviously a round number for 502; so that we conclude unhesitatingly that Japheth was Noah's youngest son (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad Gen. x. 21). This conclusion is important, inasmuch as it best agrees with the ethnological and historical significance of the name Japheth.

2. The name appears to be derived from יָפַת, 'to extend,' in Gen. ix. 27. But as יָפַת is one of those very numerous instances of paronomasia which so strongly characterises the Hebrew writings (cf. Gen. xlviii. 22; Mic. vii. 12; Jer. i. 11; Is. xxi. 11, etc.), we may perhaps consider that no derivation is there intended (das Wortspiel; Ewald, Gesch. d. Volk. Isr. i. 373); and in that case, although no obvious derivation suggests itself, the name may be referred to יָפֶֿתֿ, 'pulcher fuit,'* and may contain an allusion to the beauty of the Japhetic race (Ewald, L.c.; Gesenius, s. v., Thes. iii.

p. 1139). This is the less unlikely since Ham means 'hot,' and Phut and Lubim are names which contain a reference to the darkness of those races. It is clear that throughout the famous ethnographical chart of Gen. x., and perhaps elsewhere in the Bible, the names are rather ethnic and allusive than individual. Unless—of which we have no hint—names were bestowed by a spirit of prophecy in the earliest infancy, it is obvious that in many instances the name by which the founders of families were afterwards known, were names suggested by the subsequent fortunes of themselves or their descendants. The name Japheth does not occur again in the Bible, but is found as the designation of a province, in Judith ii. 25.

3. Of the personal history of Japheth we know nothing beyond the single incident narrated in Gen. ix. 23, in which Japheth seems to have acted upon the suggestion of his elder brother Shem, and therefore only receives the blessing of temporal prosperity, not the loftier privilege of religious truth. If, broadly and generally, we regard Shem as the direct ancestor of the Shemites, and Japheth as the intended representative of the chief Arian nations, this passage shews a marvellous insight into the destinies of those great races, as well as into the fact that reverence, filial piety, and the purity of heart and eye are the main foundations on which the greatness of those mighty civilized races has been built up. The blessing itself received ample historical fulfilment in the extension of Japheth's dominions into the territories of the Shemites, and the participation of the Japhetidae in the religious privileges of their kinsmen of the elder branch.

4. In Gen. x. seven sons are ascribed to Japheth—Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, Tiras. For the significance of these names, as well as of those attributed to their sons, see the separate articles upon them. All that we need here observe is that they are intended to include all the non-Semitic and non-Hamitic nations known to the Jews, and that generally Japheth stands for the nations north of Palestine, as Ham for those to the south, Palestine itself being regarded as a 'navel of the earth' (Ezek. v. 5; Ewald, Gesch. i. 373). Among the most important Japhetic nations are the Bactrians (Gomer), the Scythians (Magog), the Medes (Madai), the Thracians (Tiras), and the Greek (Javan).

5. There are numerous Oriental legends about Japheth. According to Mohammedan writers he was the eldest son of Noah, who gave him a stone (called Giudé Tasch and Seuk Jede, long preserved in the country of the Mogul), upon which was inscribed the name of God, and which enabled him to cause rain at pleasure. They call him Aboulterik, and ascribe to him eleven sons, among whom are Sin, father of the Chinese, Turk of the Turks, and Ros of the Russians—nations wholly unknown to the ancient Hebrews. They ascribe to his sons great wisdom, but say that no prophet was ever born among them (Weil, Biblische Legenden, viii. 46). The resemblance of Japheth with the Greek Ἰάπερος, whether fortuitous or not, is highly remarkable; but the attempts of Bochart, Huet, and others, to identify Japheth with Neptune (Calmet's Dict. Fragm. xix., xx.), have little to rest upon (Bochart, Phaleg. iii. 1; D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. ii. 281; Hottinger, Hist. Orient., p. 37; Buttmann Mythol. i. 222, etc.)—F. W. F.

* This derivation was suggested by Jonathan; Aben Ezra calls it however יָפֶֿתֿ פֶּֿלֶא, 'interpretatio minime pulchra,' on what grounds is not clear. Fuller, Miscell. Sacr., ii. 4; Rosenmüller ad Gen. ix. 37.

JAPHETH B. ALI HA-LEVI (יפת בן עלי), of Bassra, called in Arabic Abu Ali Hassan b. Ali al-Levi al-Basri (أبو علي الحسن بن علي ألكعبري), a very eminent Karaite grammarian and commentator of the O. T. who flourished about 950-990, and who so distinguished himself through his literary labours that he obtained the honourable appellation of המלמד הנורא, the great teacher, and a place among those who are mentioned in the Karaite prayer-book. Though his gigantic commentaries must have exercised great influence on the development of Biblical exegesis, as may be concluded from the fact that Ibn Ezra had them constantly before him when writing his expositions of the O. T., and that he quotes them with the greatest respect, yet they have not as yet been published, and we have still only the fragments which Ibn Ezra gives us. The MSS. of these commentaries, which consist of twenty large volumes, are in Paris and in Leyden. The eminent Orientalist Munk brought in 1841 from Egypt to the royal library at Paris, eleven volumes, five of which are on Genesis, and many sections of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers; two volumes are on the Psalms, one is on Proverbs, and one on the Five Megilloth. The commentaries, which are in Arabic, are preceded by the Hebrew text, and an Arabic translation. The indefatigable Pinsker has examined twenty volumes of these commentaries and made extracts from them (comp. Jost, Israelitische Annalen, Frankfurt-on-the-Maine 1841, p. 76; Bargès, Rabbi Japhet ben Heli Bassorensis Karaite in psal. Commentarii Prefatio, 1846; Pinsker, Lickute Kadmoniot, Vienna 1863, p. 169, supplement, p. 181, etc.; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, vol. v., Magdeburg 1869, p. 342).—C. D. G.

JAPHETH II., B. SAID, a descendant of the foregoing writer, flourished about 1160-1200. Besides the celebrated work in defence of Karaism, entitled Ha-Atakat Ha-Tora, he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch and other books of the O. T. Pinsker supposes, and not without reason, that this is the Japheth whom the Karaites describe as the Rabbi of Ibn Ezra, and has shewn that Ibn Ezra's quotations from the commentary on Exod. iv. 20; viii. 13; ix. 16; x. 5, 21, belong to this Japheth, and not the former. These commentaries are still in MS., both in the Paris and Leyden libraries (comp. Pinsker, Lickute Kadmoniot, Vienna 1860, p. 222, ff., and 185, ff., supplement; Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, vol. vi., Leipzig 1861, p. 305, ff.).—C. D. G.

JAPHIA (יפיה, 'splendid'; Φαγγιά; Alex. Ἰαφαγιά; Japhie), a town on the border of Zebulun, between Daberath and Gittah-hepher (Josh. xix. 12). Eusebius and Jerome identify Japhia with the town on the sea coast, beneath the brow of Carmel, called Sycaminus, and also Hepha (Ἡφά; its modern name is Haifa). This, however, is manifestly an error, for Daberath is situated at the base of Mount Tabor, and from thence Joshua says the border 'goeth up to Japhia'; Japhia must consequently be looked for in the hills near Nazareth. Reland (Pal., p. 826) and Gesenius (Thesaurus, s.v.) follow Eusebius. In a retired valley among the rocky hills, about two miles southwest of Nazareth, lies the little village of Yafa, containing about thirty houses and the ruins of a church. This is unquestionably the ancient town of Japhia; and also the same place which Josephus fortified, with other cities of Galilee, during the Jewish war (Vita, 37 and 45). It was afterwards stormed by Titus, and a vast number of its inhabitants put to the sword. The Italian monks of Nazareth call it San Giacomo, believing it to be the native place of Zebedee, and his sons James and John. (Marinus Sanutus, p. 253; Early Travels in Pal., p. 186; Robinson, B. R., ii. 343; Handbook for S. and P., p. 385).—J. L. P.

JAPHLETI (יפלת) = the Japhletite; τὰ δρια τοῦ Ἀππαλί, Vat.; τοῦ Ἰεφαλί, Alex.; terminus Japhleti, Vulg.) In Josh. xvi. 3 we find 'the border of the Japhletite' ('the coast of Japhleti,' A. V.) mentioned as one of the landmarks on the southern frontier of the tribe of Ephraim. From the form of the word it is evident that we have here the name of one of the many petty tribes or clans that peopled Palestine before its occupation by the children of Israel, of which the topographical details of the book of Joshua contain many traces, e.g., the Archite (Archi, A. V.), in the preceding verse (cf. 2 Sam. xv. 32; xvii. 5); the Ophnite (Ophni, A. V.), Josh. xviii. 24; the Jebusite (Jebusi, A. V.), ver. 28; Adummim, 'the redmen,' Josh. xv. 7, etc. Japhlet occurs (1 Chron. vii. 32, 33) as a descendant of Asher, but the distance between the tribes is too great for us to suppose that the names had any connection.—E. V.

JAPHO. [JOPPA.]

JAREB (ירב; Sept. Ἰαρεμ), supposed by some to be the name of a king, by others that of the place where he was king, whilst others regard the word as an appellative of the king (Hos. v. 13; x. 6). All are agreed that the king meant is the king of Assyria. The first view is followed by the LXX., where the rendering is πρὸς βασιλεία Ἰαρεμ; also by the Syriac and Arabic. Ibn Ezra advocates the second, and says that Jareb was the name of a city of Assyria not elsewhere mentioned; but besides being purely conjectural this explanation is hardly reconcilable with the absence of the article before ירב. Similar to this view is that of Hitzig; for, though he translates ירב by enemy, foe, he regards it as a symbolical name of Assyria, as Rahab is of Egypt; an opinion obnoxious to the same objection as the preceding. Symmachus, who is followed by Jerome, gave ἐδικον or ἐδικυτήρ, ultorem, avenger, as the meaning of the word; Aquila διαζόμενον, and Theodotion κριτήρ, judge. The Targum gives יריתי לאחפער להון, 'who shall come to vindicate (or avenge) them.' In the A. V. the rendering in the text is 'to king Jareb,' in the margin 'to the king of Jareb or to the king that should plead.' The third way of construing the passage is that followed by most recent interpreters: Rosenmüller, 'misique legatos ad regem adversarium'; De Wette, 'Der könig der rächen soll [the king who shall avenge]'; Henderson, 'a hostile king,' etc. In this case ירב is the apocopated future in Hiphil of ירב. Rivet was of opinion that the title 'Avenger' may have been assumed by the potent king of Assyria as the French king assumes that of 'Most Christian,' and the English that of 'Defender of the Faith'

(Glass. Phil. Sac. 4, 3, 17, p. 644). Fürst, who inclines to the second view, suggests the possibility of Jarab being an old Assyrian word.—W. L. A.

JARHA (יֶרְחָא; Sept. Ἰωρχήλ), an Egyptian who was in the service of a Hebrew master named Sheshan, whose daughter he married, and so became his heir, and head of a house of the Jerahmeelites (1 Chron. ii. 31-35). No other case exactly similar to this is mentioned in Scripture. It is supposed by some that the name of Sheshan's daughter whom Jarha married was Ahlai, from the statement in ver. 31 compared with that in ver. 34; but the masculine form of the word, and the use of Ahlai elsewhere (1 Chron. xi. 41) for a man, is adverse to this conclusion. As Sheshan's oldest grandson by this marriage was called Attai, and as the genealogy would run through him, it is supposed by others that Ahlai is a clerical error for Attai; while others think Ahlai (אחלי), 'the disjoiner,' from (אחל) was a name given to Jarha on his incorporation into the family of Sheshan. This last seems to us the most probable view. At what time this marriage occurred we cannot certainly determine, but as Sheshan was the seventh in descent from Hezron, the grandson of Judah, it is probable he lived near the close of the time of Eli or the beginning of that of Samuel. In 1 Sam. xxx. 13 mention is made of an Egyptian who was servant to an Amalekite, and there is no reason why it should seem strange that an Egyptian should also be found in the family of a Hebrew, especially as, being a Jerahmeelite, he had his possessions in the same district as the Amalekites, in the south of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, 10).—W. L. A.

JARMUTH (יֶרְמוּת, 'lofty'; Ἰερμοῦς and Ἰερμοῦς; Jerimoth), an ancient royal city of Canaan, and one of the five which joined in the league against the Gibeonites, and were defeated by Joshua (Josh. x. 3). Its king was hanged with the others at Makkedah (ver. 23; ch. xii. 11). Jarmuth was situated in the Shephelah (A. V. 'Valley') or plain of Philistia, and was assigned to Judah (xv. 35). It was occupied by the Jews after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 29). The geographical position of Jarmuth is not stated in the Bible, farther than that it lay in the Shephelah; but as it is enumerated with Adullam and Socho, we can have no difficulty in identifying it with the modern village of Yarmut (يَرْمُوت), a name almost identical with the Hebrew Jarmuth. It appears to be this city which Eusebius calls Ἰερμοῦς, and Jerome Jerimus, stating that in their day it was a village ten miles distant from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem (Onomast. s. v.) Under Jarimuth, however (which Eusebius writes Ἰαβεθ), Jerome states that it is a city captured by Joshua, given to Judah, and four miles distant from Eleutheropolis towards Eshtao. It would seem to be the same city which is alluded to in both places, but probably some error may have crept into the text of the Onomasticon. Yarmûk is about eight miles from Eleutheropolis, and is situated on the crest of a rugged hill. As the writer saw it from the vales of Bethshemesh and Elah, and again from the ridge of Beit Nettif, perched on its airy site, and clearly defined against the bright sky, he could not but think that it well deserved its name, 'the lofty.' The village is small and poor, but there are a few traces, in the hewn stones and ruins, of past strength and greatness (Handbook for S. and P., p. 281; Robinson, B. R., ii. 17; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 324).

JASHEN (יָשֵׁן; Ἀσάν; Jassen). Of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan appears in the catalogue of the mighty men of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 32). In the corresponding passage (1 Chron. xi. 34), we read, 'the sons of Hashem the Gizonite.' This form of the name is probably correct, as the LXX. in both places give Ἀσάν. In the present corrupt and dislocated state of these catalogues, it is extremely difficult to decide what is the true reading of the whole passage, but a comparison with Chronicles seems to shew that Jonathan has no connection with the B'ne-Jashen, and that a name has dropped out in both places. This name Kennicott believes (Dissertation, vol. i., pp. 201-203) lies concealed in the word rendered 'the Gizonite' in Chronicles, and accordingly proposes to read in both places, 'Gouni, of the sons of Hashem; Jonathan, the son of Shamha the Hararite;' his view being supported by the Alex. copy of the LXX., which reads ἰσὶν Ἀσάν δ' Ἰωνῆ 'Iwadhav uis Szayh d' Apapl. However, the want of the ו before יָשֵׁן, and the י prefixed to the name read by him as Gouni, are objections to this view, and Bertheau may probably be right (Chronik., p. 134), that יָשֵׁן is due to a repetition of the last three letters of the preceding word, 'the Shaalbonite,' הַשְּׁעֲלֹנִי, and that we should simply read Hashem the Gizonite.—E. V.

JASHER, or rather JASHAR, Book of, a work quoted in Josh. x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18. The former passage runs thus: 'And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.' etc. The passage in 2 Sam. is as follows; 'And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul, and over Jonathan his son: (Also he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher.)'

The origin of the name Jashar is obscure. Some have supposed that the book was so called because it celebrated the praises of just or righteous men, יָשָׁר, meaning Just. This is more probable than that the name of its author was given to the book; or that it was so called from beginning with the word יָשָׁר. Bishop Lowth (De sacra poeti, pp. 241, 242, ed. Oxon. 1821), who adopts the latter conjecture, refers to the old Syriac translator who renders the word by אֲשִׁיר, i. e. sang, in one place where it occurs. The fact that Exod. xv. 1, begins with אֲשִׁיר יְהוָה, then sang Moses, does not much favour this assumption. It is true that the different books of the Hebrew Bible derived the names which they bore among the Jews from the initial word; but the custom was scarcely so old as the time of the book of Jashar, except the initial word afforded a clear index to the contents of the poem or book, at the beginning of which it stood. It is against Lowth's opinion that יָשָׁר does not mean he sang. It should have been יָשָׁר. Besides, the article is prefixed to יָשָׁר, יָשָׁר. Ilgen supposes that the phrase means book of dexterity or valour, because the book consisted of poems celebrating examples of dexterity and every warlike virtue of the time, in the same way as the first book of a celebrated Arabic anthology containing poems in praise of heroic deeds, is entitled حماسة, Hamasa, i. e., warlike virtue, valour.

Whatever may have been the origin of the title, there is little doubt that the book was a poetical anthology, or a collection of poetical pieces. As to the time of its origin we are hardly able to ascertain it with probability. David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan was contained in it; and perhaps the collection was not begun earlier than his reign. It may have been enlarged with additions from time to time.

Some of the fathers had singular opinions about the contents of the book. Thus Jerome apparently thought that it was identical with Genesis; an opinion derived from the Jews (Commentar. in Esaiam xlv. 2, and in Ezech. cap. viii.) Others supposed that it included the Pentateuch, or rather that it was the book of the law. Such is the explanation of the Targum, with which agree Kimchi and Abarbanel. Theodoret conceived that the book of Joshua was an extract from that of Jashar, and that the author, fearing his assertion of the sun's standing still would not be credited, referred to the book itself as his authority for the miracle (Quæst. xiv. in Josuam, tom. i., Opp. p. 1). Rabbi Elieser supposed that the book was the same as Deuteronomy; R. Samuel ben Nachman identified it with the book of Judges. Other opinions are enumerated by Wolf (Bibliotheca Hebræa, ii. p. 219, et seq.), and Abicht (Dissertatio de libro Recti, p. 5, etc.)

The old supposition that the book contained a treatise on archery is justly exploded at the present day. The words of 2 Sam. i. 18, 'Also he bade them teach the children of Israel the bow,' mean 'the bow-song,' i. e., a poem in praise of Jonathan's bow, belonging to the book of Jashar. An ancient mode of citing a document consisted in referring to some particular word in it, such as the bow (i. 22).

The book of Jashar has attracted attention because it is appealed to in connection with the account of the sun and moon standing still. The compiler of the book of Joshua refers to it as containing a record of the miracle in question. It is therefore impossible to do justice to our subject without entering into an interpretation of the wonderful phenomenon on which so much ingenuity has been wasted. The mis-spent time which has been devoted to the passage in Joshua makes a critic sad indeed. Instead of looking at the words in their natural and obvious sense, men have been led away by their adherence to the letter into recondite, foolish, and absurd conjectures. One thing is a key to the right interpretation, viz., that the passage recording the miracle is a quotation from the poetical book of Jashar. The only difficulty is to discover where the quotation begins and ends. All must allow that the words of the poetical anthology are found in—

Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon,
And thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon.
And the sun stood still,
And the moon stayed,
Till the people had avenged themselves
Upon their enemies.

It is not easy, however, to say whether the quotation extends farther than this, and includes the following:—

So the sun stood still In the midst of heaven,
And hasted not to go down
About a whole day.
And there was no day like that Before it or after it,
That the Lord hearkened
Unto the voice of a man,
For the Lord fought for Israel.
And Joshua returned,
And all Israel with him,
Unto the camp, to Gilgal.

The point is, whether the question of the historian, 'Is not this written in the book of Jashar?' terminates the quotation by stating whence it is taken; or whether the citation does not proceed to the end of the 15th verse, after this inserted notice. We are inclined to think that the quotation included vers. 12-15. The strongest objection to the view in question is, that the statement of its being taken from the book of Jashar is thus made to stand in the middle of the passage quoted, instead of at the beginning or end, as in Num. xxi. 14, 27. But Keil replies that the cases are not analogous; for that the references to sources at the end of the biographies of the kings of Israel are not appended to verbal extracts from documents; and that the cited work in Num. xxi. 14, 27, as well as 2 Sam. i. 18, though named before the excerpts, is interwoven with the historical narrative itself. Another objection is, that part of the quotation is thus made to consist of prose; for when it is granted that the second half of the 13th and the 14th verses are poetical, the 15th verse still remains. But perhaps the book of Jashar had some prose interwoven with its poetical pieces (see Davidson's Introduction to the O. T., vol. i. p. 431, et seq.)

If this explanation be correct, we have no need to resort to other interpretations. Let us glance at the principal ones, though they are now of merely historical interest.

I. Of those who take the account of the miracle literally, some believe that the sun revolved round the earth, and was stayed in his course. Rejecting the diurnal motion of the earth as inconsistent with Scripture, they reject the Copernican system. One should have thought that this view prevailed among Roman Catholics only. Yet Protestants also held it in the 18th century. Galileo's astronomy had not penetrated their unscientific minds, which clung to the literal, in opposition to enlightened, interpretation. Others have explained the miracle in accordance with the true doctrine of the earth's motion, taking the language in a popular and optical sense, and believing that the earth stood still at the command of Joshua, not the sun. One commentator takes a singular view of the passage, explaining it in accordance with true science, as he things :—'Joshua's mode of expression evidently considers the sun as the great ruler or master in the system, and all the planets moving in their respective orbits at his command. He, therefore, desires him in the name and by the authority of his Creator to suspend his mandate with respect to the earth's motion, and that of its satellite the moon. Had he said earth stand thou still, it could not have obeyed him. Instead of doing so, he speaks to the sun, the cause of all these motions,' etc. (A. Clarke.) The strained, erroneous character of this explanation is apparent.

Maimonides seems to have rejected the idea of a miracle, for he writes that the phrase 'as an entire day,' denotes a very long day, as if the historian had said that the day was to them in Gibeon like a great and long day in summer (More Nevochim, translated by Buxtorf, part ii. xxxv. p. 292). His opinion was followed by Grotius and others. Even Jahn resolved the address of Joshua into a bold poetical figure (Einleitung in die göttlichen Bücher des alten Bundes, ii. p. 176). Hengstenberg himself wrote an able article in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung for November 1832, pointing out the true explanation. This was translated in the American Biblical Repository for 1833, which journal had a good article in 1845 from the pen of Mr. Hopkins.

One would have thought that these writers must have established the right exegesis of the passages; especially as Keil took the same view in his Commentary on Joshua. But it was not so. There are some who must have a real miracle here, and who, unless sun and moon stand still, fear lest Christianity should be destroyed. Hence it continues to be asserted in books that there was a miracle, and that the sacred historian expressly records the event as such. Its very object is also explained, viz., to contribute to the effectual conquest of the idolatrous heathen nations who worshipped the sun and moon. But Deborah sings in her hymn of gratitude (Judg. v.), 'The stars in their courses fought against Sisera:' must this be taken literally, and not rather as a poetical hyperbole? It is only necessary to enter into the spirit of the poetry to take Joshua's words as the language of impassioned desire. The absurd lengths to which some will go in upholding the idea of a miracle in the passage before us, is remarkably shewn by the following, in a popular English book on the Bible: 'An ingenious French philosopher, who has consecrated his geological researches to the elucidation and defence of the sacred volume, has endeavoured to shew that the double day in Palestine, caused by the miracle in Josh. x., must have produced a double night in Europe. He considers that the double night so frequently mentioned by the Latin poets, and connected with the birth of Hercules, was identical with this miracle, which is thus collaterally confirmed by the testimony of ancient profane writers.' Chaubard, Elémens de Géologie, pp. 321-327.

Under the name Book of Jasher, two rabbinical works exist. One was written by Jacob ben Meir, or R. Tam, who died in 1171, and contains a treatise on Jewish ritual questions. It was published at Cracow in 1586, 4to, and again at Vienna 1811, but incorrectly. No translation of it was ever made. The second book was written in Spain and published at Venice 1625, at Cracow 1628, and at Prague 1668. It contains the histories of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, and intermixes many fabulous things. The preface itself relates fictions about Sidrus one of Titus's officers finding the work in a palace when Jerusalem was destroyed, where an old man was shut up who had many Hebrew books, among others, the book of Jasher, which was taken to Spain and preserved there, and thence to Naples, where it was printed. A German version of it, with additions, was published by R. Jacob at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1674, 8vo, with the title יִשָּׁר הַמִּשְׁפָּט, perfect and right.

In 1751 was published 'The Book of Jasher, with testimonies and notes explanatory of the text, to which is prefixed various readings. Translated into English from Hebrew by Alcuin of Britain, who went a pilgrimage into the Holy Land,' 4to. This is a forgery. The preface, purporting to be written by Alcuin, contains an account of the finding of the book in MS. at Gazna in Persia, and the way in which it was translated. Having brought it to England, Alcuin says that he left it among other papers to a clergyman in Yorkshire. After two pages of various readings, the book itself follows, divided into thirty-seven chapters. Testimonies and notes are appended. This silly forgery was the production of Jacob Ilive, a type-founder of Bristol. The editor states in a dedication at the beginning, that he bought the MS. at an auction in the north of England, and affirms that Wickliffe had written on the outside, 'I have read the book of Jasher twice over, and I much approve of it as a piece of great antiquity and curiosity, but I cannot assent that it should be made a part of the canon of Scripture.' It was reprinted at Bristol in 1829, 4to. In an advertisement prefixed, the editor says that since 1751 the MS. was preserved with great care by a gentleman who gave it to him, and that the latter committed it to the press. He studiously omits to state that it had been printed in 1751. Some have made a mistake in saying that there was another reprint in 1833 at London. A prospectus of a new edition was circulated by the Rev. C. R. Bond in that year, but no reprint followed.

In 1840 there appeared at New York, in one volume 8vo, 'סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר, or the book of Jasher, referred to in Joshua and 2 Samuel, faithfully translated from the original Hebrew into English.' This professes to be a translation of the rabbinical book already noticed, which was printed at Venice in 1625. It has a preface by M. M. Noah, a translator's preface, a translation of the Hebrew preface, and the printer's preface. The work itself contains ninety chapters.

In the year 1854 appeared—Jasher. Fragmenta archetypa carminum Hebraicorum in Masoretico Veteris Testamenti textu passim tessellata, collecta, ordinavit, restituit, in unum corpus redegit, Latine exhibuit, commentario instruxit Joannes Gul. Donaldson, S. Theologia doctor, 8vo. In this work the learned author maintained that the anthology called Jashar, in which the religious marrow of the O. T. is contained, was put together in the reign of Solomon, either by himself, or by his advice. The critic undertook, therefore, to collect the scattered parts of the work, and restore them to their primitive order. In pursuance of this task, he distributed the book into seven parts, thus: Part i., shewing that man was made upright (יָשָׁר), but fell into sin by carnal wisdom, consisting of two fragments, viz., a shorter Elohist poem (Gen. i. 27, 28; vi. 1, 2, 4, 5; viii. 21; vi. 6, 3); and a longer Jehovistic fragment (Gen. ii. 7-9, 15-25; iii. 1-19, 21, 23, 24). Part ii., shewing how the descendants of Abraham, as upright (יָשָׁר), are adopted into the number of the sons of God, and the neighbouring nations, Cainites, Ishmaelites, Canaanites, and Edomites are rejected, consists of four fragments, viz., the rejection of the Hamites and Canaanites in general (Gen. ix. 18-27); the rejection of the Cainites (iv. 2-8, 8-16); the rejection of the Hagarenes (xvi. 1-4, 15, 16; xvii. 16, 18-26; xxi. 1-14, 20, 21); the rejection of the Edomites (xxiv. 32-34; xxvii.). Part iii. shews how the pious Israelites, having escaped from Egypt, and spent forty years in the desert, after many vicissitudes of fortune, dedicate a temple to Jehovah, under the peaceful king Solomon, in a land of tranquillity (Gen. viii. 6-12). Part iv. contains divine laws to be observed by the upright people, and consists of three fragments, viz., the ten precepts of probity (Deut. v. 1-19); the marrow of the divine law (Deut. vi. 3-5; x. 12-22; xi. 1-9); the inculcation of obedience (viii. 1-3; vi. 6-25). Part v. contains the benedictions and admonitions of the upright (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiii., xxiv.; Deut. xxxii., xxxiii.). Part vi. contains the wonderful victories and deliverances of the upright people, and consists of Exod. xv. 1-19; Josh. x. 12-13; Judg. v. 1-20. Part vii. Various poems respecting the rule of the good, and the prosperity that characterised the reigns of David and Solomon, viz., 1 Sam. ii. 1-10; 2 Sam. i. 17-27, 33, 34; xxiii. 1-7; Ps. xviii. 1-51; 2 Sam. xxii. 1-51; Ps. xlv. 1-18; lx. 1-14; lxviii. 1-36.

It cannot be denied that the critic has shewn great ingenuity and constructive skill in elaborating his theory. His commentaries on the individual fragments composing the parts often exhibit striking and just remarks, with a right perception of the genius of some portions of the O. T. But we must pronounce the attempt a failure. The leading positions are untenable. Donaldson's arguments are often weak and baseless. Most of the contents which he assigns to the book of Jashar never belonged to it; such as the pieces of Genesis which he selects, etc. But it is needless to enter into a refutation of the hypothesis, ingeniously set forth in elegant Latin, and supported with considerable acuteness. Most of the book of Jashar cited in Joshua and 2d Samuel is lost. It is very improbable that laws, such as those in Deut. vi., x., xi.; or historical pieces like Gen. xvi. 1-4, ever belonged to it. And it is a most unfortunate conjecture that יָשָׁר, in Gen. xlix. 10, is abridged from מְלִיץ, or even if it were, that it furnishes a proof of the poem being written while Solomon was king (p. 27). We are persuaded that the critic gives great extension of meaning to the Hebrew word יָשָׁר, in making it almost, if not altogether, an appellation of the Israelite people. When he assumes that it is contained in יָשָׁר, the notion is erroneous (p. 23).—S. D.

JASHOBEAM (יִשְׁבָּעַם; Sept. Ἰεσβεάδ), son of Hachmoni, one of David's worthies, and the first named in the two lists which are given of them (2 Sam. xxiii. 8; 1 Chron. xi. 11). One of these texts is held to have suffered through the negligence of copyists, and as Jashobeam is not historically known, commentators have been much embarrassed in comparing them. The former attributes to him the defeat of 800, the latter of 300 Philistines; and the question has been whether there is a mistake of figures in one of these accounts, or whether two different exploits are recorded. Further difficulties will appear in comparing the two texts. We have assumed Jashobeam to be intended in both; but this is open to question. In Chronicles we read, 'Jashobeam, the Hachmonite, chief of the captains: he lifted up his spear against 300 men, slain by him at one time;' but in Samuel [margin], 'Josheb-bassebet the Tachmonite, head of the three, Adino, of Ezni, who lifted up his spear against 800 men whom he slew.' That Jashobeam the Hachmonite, and Josheb-besheth the Tachmonite, are the same person is clear; but may not Adino of Ezni, whose name forms the immediate antecedent of the exploit, which, as related here, constitutes the sole discrepancy between the two texts, be another person? Many so explain it, and thus obtain a solution of the difficulty. But a further comparison of the two verses will again suggest that the whole of the last cited must belong to Jashobeam; for not only is the parallel incomplete, if we take the last clause from him and assign it to another, but in doing this we leave the 'chief among the captains' without an exploit, in a list which records some feat of every hero. We incline, therefore, to the opinion of those who suppose that Jashobeam, or Josheb-bassebet, was the title as chief, Adino the proper name, and Hachmonite the patronymic of the same person; and the discrepancy which thus remains, we account for, not on the supposition of different exploits, but of one of those corruptions of numbers of which several will be found in comparing the books of Chronicles with those of Samuel and Kings. [EZNITE.]

The exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem, is ascribed to the three chief heroes, and therefore to Jashobeam, who was the first of the three (2 Sam. xxiii. 13-17; 1 Chron. xi. 15-19).

A Jashobeam is named among the Korhites who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6); but this could scarcely have been the same with the preceding.

We also find a Jashobeam who commanded 24,000, and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan (1 Chron. xxvii. 2). He was the son of Zabdiel; if, therefore, he was the same as the first Jashobeam, his patronymic of 'the Hachmonite' must be referred to his race rather than to his immediate father. This seems likely.—J. K.

JASHUB (יִשׁוּב; Sept. Ἰασούβ), the third son of Issachar, and the head of the family or clan of the Jashubites (Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chron. vii. 1). In this last passage the textual reading is יָשׁוּב, but there is a K'ri יָשׁוּב. In the former passage the Samaritan has יָשׁוּב, but some copies have יָשׁוּב (see Kennicott, Bib. Heb. in loc.) In Gen. xvi. 13 the name appears in the form of יֹצֵב Job. As the two words have the same meaning, 'the returner' (the one from יָשׁוּב, the other from יֹצֵב or אָזַב; Arab. اَوَّج), the one may have been substituted for the other by an oversight.

Another person of this name is mentioned Ezra x. 29.—W. L. A.

JASHUBI-LEHEM (יָשׁוּבִי-לֵחֶם, Returner to Lehem, i. e., Bethlehem; Sept. καὶ ἀπεστρέψεν αὐτοῖς), the last in the list of the sons of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22). According to one Jewish tradition, as presented by the Targum, this was Boaz; but another, as given by Jerome (Quaest. Heb. in Paralip.), represents the words as describing Naomi and Ruth who returned to Bethlehem. The latter tradition explains the whole verse thus:—'Who made the sun to stand, that is, Elimelech, in whose time the sun stood because of those who acted deceitfully by the law, that by so great a miracle they might be converted to God; this failing, a famine ensued, by which they were driven from their country. Men of a lie (Chozeba), that is, Mahlon and Chilion, called here Secure (Joash), and Flaming (Saraph); and who are styled princes of Moab because they married Moabite wives. They who returned to Lehem are Naomi and Ruth; and these are said to be ancient words because they are recorded in the book of Ruth.—W. L. A.

JASON (Ἰάσων, the healer, from ἰάσθαι, to heal), the equivalent of Jesus (Ἰησοῦς). This latter is a name of frequent occurrence in Josephus, and is the Greek form of Joshua or Jeshua, a contraction of Jehoshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, 'whose help is Jehovah,' Gesen.; 'God the Saviour,' Pearson On the Creed, art. ii. p. 129, seq.). The names of Jason and Jeshua each occur twice in the list of the seventy-two elders who were sent to Ptolemy Philadelphus by Eleazar (Aristeas, Hist. ap. Hody, p. 7). Another instance of the interchange of Greek and Hebrew names is in the case of Alcimus or Jacimus ('Ἀλκιμος ὁ καὶ Ἰάκιμος, Joseph. Antiq. xii. 9. 7), which are equivalent to Jakim, Jachin, and Eliakim. The Greek names in Josephus in connection with the Hebrew would seem to indicate that both languages were used indiscriminately by the Jews (see Bell. Jud., v. 4. 1, 2).

1. JASON, THE SON OF ELEAZAR (Ἰάσων υἱὸς Ἐλεαζάρου, 1 Maccab. viii. 17; cf. Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Σιμόν, Exed̄ar, Alex., Ecclus. l. 27), was one of the ambassadors chosen by Judas Maccabæus, in conjunction with Eupolemus, and sent to Rome to make a league of amity and confederacy with the Romans, B.C. 161 (1 Maccab. l. c.; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 10. 6).

2. JASON, THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, who was sent by Jonathan, in conjunction with Numenius, the son of Antiochus, to Rome to renew the former treaty, is, in all probability, the same person as Jason, the son of Eleazar (1 Maccab. xii. 16; xiv. 22).

3. JASON, OF CYRENE, in Africa, was a Hellenist Jew of the race of those Jews whom Ptolemy Soter sent into Egypt (2 Maccab. i.; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 1; Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii., p. 176). He wrote in five books the history of Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, and the principal transactions of the Jews during the reigns of Seleucus IV. Philopator, Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, and Antiochus V. Eupator (B.C. 187-162), from which five books most of the second book of Maccabees is abridged. In all probability it was written in Greek, and from the fact of it including the wars under Antiochus V. Eupator, it must have been written after B.C. 162 [2 MACCABEES.] The sources from which Jason obtained his information are unknown, and it is not certain when either he or his epitomiser lived. His history is contained in the few verses of the 2 Maccab. ii. 19-23 (cf. Winer Real-wörterbuch, s. v. Jason).

4. JASON, THE HIGH-PRIEST, was the second son of Simon II., and the brother of Onias III. His proper name was Jesus, but he had changed it to that of Jason (Ἰασοῦς Ἰάσωνα ταυτὸν μετεώρισεν, Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5. 1). Shortly after the accession of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, Jason offered to the king 440 talents of yearly tribute if he would invest him with the high-priesthood, to the exclusion of his elder brother. Josephus says that Onias III. was dead on the accession of Jason to the high-priesthood, and that Jason received this post in consequence of his nephew, Onias IV., the son of Onias III., being as yet an infant (Antiq. xii. 5. 1). Jason also offered a further 150 talents for the license 'to set him up a place of exercise, and for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen' (2 Maccab. iv. 7-9; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5. 1). This offer was immediately accepted by Antiochus, and Jason built a gymnasium at Jerusalem. The effect of this innovation was to produce a stronger tendency than ever for Greek fashions and heathenish manners, and they so increased under the superintendence of the wicked Jason that the priests despised the Temple and 'hastened to be partakers of the unlawful allowance in the place of exercise, after the game of Discus [Discus] called them forth' (2 Maccab. iv. 14). Some of the Jews even 'made themselves uncircumcised' that they might appear to be Greeks when they were naked (1 Maccab. i. 15; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5. 1). At last, as was the custom of the cities who used to send embassies to Tyre in honour of Hercules (Curt. iv. 2; Polyb. Reliq. xxxi. 20, 12), Jason sent special messengers (θεσποῖς) from Jerusalem, who were the newly-elected citizens of Antioch (Ἀντιοχείς ὄντας, cf. 2 Maccab. iv. 9), to carry three hundred drachms of silver to the sacrifice of that god. The money, however, contrary to the wish of the sender, was not used for the sacrifice of Hercules, but reserved for making triremes, because the bearers of it did not think it proper (διὰ τὸ μὴ καθήκειν) to employ it for the sacrifice (2 Maccab. iv. 19, 20) [HERCULES]. In B.C. 172 Jason also gave a festival to Antiochus when he visited Jerusalem, Jason and the citizens leading him in by torchlight and with great shoutings (2 Maccab. iv. 22). Josephus mentions this visit, but says that it was an expedition against Jerusalem, and that Antiochus, upon obtaining possession of the city, slew many of the Jews, and plundered it of a great deal of money (Antiq. xii. 5. 3). The crafty Jason, however, soon found a yet more cunning kinsman, who removed him from his office in much the same manner as he had done with his brother Onias

III. Menelaus, the son of Simon (Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5. 1; Simon's brother, 2 Maccab. iv. 23), governor of the Temple, having been sent by Jason to Antiochus, knew how through flattery, and by offering three hundred talents more than Jason, to gain the favour of the king. Antiochus immediately gave him the office of high-priest, and Jason was forced to flee into the country of the Ammonites (2 Maccab. iv. 26) [MENELAUS]. In B.C. 170 Antiochus, having undertaken his second expedition into Egypt, there was a rumour that he was dead, and Jason made an attack upon Jerusalem, and committed many atrocities. He was, however, forced again to flee into the country of the Ammonites (2 Maccab. v. 5-7). At length, being accused before Aretas, king of the Arabians, he was compelled 'to flee from city to city, pursued of all men, and being held in abomination as an open enemy of his country and countrymen,' and eventually retired into Egypt (2 Maccab. v. 8). He afterwards retired to take refuge among the Lacedæmonians, 'thinking there to find succour by reason of his kindred' (2 Maccab. v. 9; cf. 1 Maccab. xii. 7. 21; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 4. 10; Prieux, Connection, vol. ii., p. 140), and perished miserably 'in a strange land.' His body remained without burial, and he had 'none to mourn for him' (2 Maccab. v. 9, 10).

5. JASON OF THESSALONICA was the host of Paul and Silas at that city. In consequence his house was assaulted by the Jews in order to seize the apostle, but not finding him, they dragged Jason and other brethren before the ruler of the city, who released them on security (Acts xvii. 5-9). He appears to have been the same as the Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21 as one of the kinsmen of St. Paul, and probably accompanied him from Thessalonica to Corinth. He was not one of those who accompanied the apostle into Asia, though Lightfoot conjectures that Jason and Secundus were the same person (Acts xx. 4). Alford says Secundus is altogether unknown (Acts, l.c.) According to tradition Jason was Bishop of Tarsus. (Fabric. Lux. Evang., pp. 91, 92; Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v. Jason).—F. W. M.

JASPER. [YASPEH.]

JASPIS, GOTTFRIED SIEGMUND, a German theologian, was born at Meissen, April 8, 1766. He received his education there from 1779 till 1785, when he repaired to Leipzig, where he enjoyed the advantages of Morus's lectures. The influence of this teacher upon him was beneficial and lasting. In 1792 he became pastor at Püchau, and in 1814 deacon of the Nicolaikirche in Leipzig, to which office he was recommended by Tittmann, Tschirner and Goldhorn. He died at Leipzig, February 15, 1823. Jaspis is best known by his excellent Latin translation of the apostolic Epistles, Lipsæ 1793-1795, and new ed. 1821, 8vo. His homiletic and polemical writings have passed into oblivion. He was a man of pure aims and cheerful piety, a good scholar and preacher.—S. D.

JATTIR (יַתִּיר, and יַתִּיר, 'height' יַעֲרֵב and אֲדָמָה, etc.; Yether), an ancient Canaanitish town situated in the mountains of Judah, and assigned to the priests (Josh. xv. 48; xxi. 14). Its inhabitants appear to have been friendly to David, for he sent them a present out of the spoils of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 27). After this time we hear no more of it in Scripture; but Eusebius and Jerome describe it as 'a very large village, twenty miles distant from Eleutheropolis, in Darom, towards Malatha, inhabited wholly by Christians' (Onomast. s. v. Yether). Malatha, we know lay about twenty miles due south of Hebron. Between these two places, and twelve miles from the latter, stands the village of Attir, which, though the name is different (عَتِير, the ع taking the place of the י, a very unusual change), is unquestionably identical with the ancient Jattir. It is situated on a 'height,' as the old name implies; and grouped round it at the distance of a few miles are Socoh, Anab, and Eshtemoah, which are connected with it in Joshua's list (xv. 48-50; see Robinson, B. R., ii. 494; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i. 353).—J. L. P.

JAVAN (יָוָן; Sept. Ἰωάν). 1. The fourth in order of the sons of Japheth, and the father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (Gen. x. 2, 4). 2. In later books the designation of a place, which is coupled with Tarshish, Pul, Lud, Tubal, and 'the isles afar off,' as among the nations to which Israel should be scattered (Is. lvi. 19); and with Tubal and Meshech as carrying on traffic with the Tyrians, and especially as supplying them with slaves (Ezek. xxvii. 13). This renders it probable that Javan was the name given by the Hebrews to Greece, with its dependencies; and this rises to certainty when we find the term employed to designate the Macedonian empire in Greece (Dan. viii. 21), and find the enemies over whom the Jews were to triumph called B'ney-Javan, whether we understand this of the soldiers of Antiochus, who were Greek by descent ('Hebraei omnes illos Syriæ Ægyptique reges יְהוּדִים locant,' Grotius), or of the Greeks as representing generally the Gentile world. When we find that this name, or its analogue, is found as a designation of Greece not only in all the Shemitic dialects, but also in the Sanscrit, the Old Persian, and the Egyptian (Knobel, Völkertafel, p. 78, ff.); when we find it in the form of Yacian, or Yanun, in the cuneiform inscriptions, as designating the country to which the Cyprians belonged (Rawlinson's Herod. i. 474); when we remember that in the form 'Idowes,' appears in Homer as the designation of the early inhabitants of Attica (Il. xiii. 685), that Æschylus and Aristophanes make their Persian interlocutors call the Greeks 'Idowes' (cf. Æsch. Pers. 174, 555, 911, etc.; Aristoph. Acharn. 104, 106), and that the Scholiast on the latter of these passages from Aristophanes expressly says, ἰδωὶ τοὺς Ἑλλήνας 'Idowes of βάρβαροι ἐκδιδούω, there can remain no reasonable doubt that by Javan the Hebrews designated Greece. On this has been founded the hypothesis, that Javan, the son of Japheth, was the source of the Greek peoples, but the foundation here is slippery; for it remains a question whether the Oriental nations derived the term Javan as applied to Greece from 'Idowes, the designation of those of the Greeks with whom they came into contact, or the Greeks of Attica derived the name 'Idowes from a traditionary recollection of Javan as their progenitor. The former, it is presumed, is the more probable hypothesis. 3. A place mentioned Ezek. xxvii. 19 as supplying Tyre with sword-blades, cassia, and calamus. The nature of these products indicates that the Javan of this verse must be different from the Javan of ver. 13, which, indeed, the separate mention of the two of itself suggests. The natural productions mentioned are from Arabia, and from it also came the famous sword-blades of Yemen. Now, in the Kamoos, there is a place mentioned of the name of Javan in Yemen; and if for מ'oozal, something spun, thread, from אזל, we read מ'oozal (may-oozal, from Uzal), which seems to be the correct reading (see Hävernicks, in loc.), we have here another place in Yemen mentioned along with it (comp. Gen. x. 27; see Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. pt. i. bk. ii. c. 21; Rosenmüller, Bib. Geogr. iii. 296, 305). All this renders it almost certain that an Arabic Javan is here intended. Tuch suggests (Genesis, p. 210) that the name may have been derived from a Greek colony having settled there; which is not improbable).—W. L. A.

JAVELIN. [ARMS.]

JEALOUSY, WATER OF. [See vol. i. p. 74; and OFFERING, vol. iii. p. 355.]

JEARIM, MOUNT (יְעָרִים), 'the mount of thickets,' Sept. Ἰαρίμ; Alex. Ἰαρίμ; Montis Jearim), one of the landmarks on the northern border of Judah:—'The border compassed from Baalah westward unto Mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of Mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, and went down to Bethshemesh' (Josh. xv. 10). Baalah is another name for Kirjath-jearim (ver. 9), now identified with Kuryet el-Enab; between it, therefore, and Bethshemesh, Mount Jearim must have been situated. Behind Kuryet el-Enab, on the south-west, is a steep hill, and south of this hill is the deep glen called Wady Ghurab, running from east to west. About two miles farther south is the parallel Wady Isma'il. Between the two Wadys is a high and rugged ridge, on the crest of which stands Keslu, the ancient Chesalon; and about six miles south-west of the latter are the ruins of Bethshemesh, in a valley. The ridge on which Keslu stands is doubtless Mount Jearim. Perhaps the hill behind Kuryet el-Enab may be Mount Seir: from it the border 'passed over (Wady Ghurab) to the shoulder (תֹּבֶר אל־כְּתִי) of Mount Jearim . . . and then went down to Bethshemesh' (Josh. xv. 10). The topography of Joshua here, as elsewhere, is wonderfully accurate. It may be that a considerable district of the mountains in this locality was called Jearim, for Baalah is called Kirjath-jearim ('the town of Jearim'); and if so, then we can see the reason why the explanatory phrase is added, 'Mount Jearim, which is Chesalon,' to limit the more general appellative to the narrow ridge between the two wadys. (See Keil on Joshua, ad loc.; Robinson, B. R., ii. 11, 12; Handbook for S. and P., p. 285).—J. L. P.

JEBB, JOHN, D.D., was born at Drogheda Sept. 27, 1775. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in July 1791, was ordained deacon in Feb. 24, 1799, and in the following July became curate of Swanlibar, in the diocese of Kilmore. He received priest's orders in December of the same year, and in 1801 took his degree of A.M. In the beginning of 1804 he removed to the neighbourhood of Cashel, and in June 1810 became rector of Abington in the county of Limerick. In 1820 he was presented to the archdeaconry of Emly by the archbishop of Cashel, in the following year received the degree of D.D., and in Jan. 1823 was consecrated bishop of Limerick. He died Dec. 9, 1833. His reputation as a writer rests on the following work: Sacred Literature, comprising a review of the principles of composition laid down by the late Robert Lowth, D.D., Lord Bishop of London, in his Prolections and Isaiahs, and an application of the principles so reviewed to the illustration of the N. T.; in a series of critical observations on the style and structure of that Sacred volume; 8vo, Lond. 1820, 2d ed. 1831. The design of this work is to prove that the structure of the N. T. is often modelled after the poetical parts of the Old, and although the writer has often pressed his principle to an extreme, and exalted mere rhetorical antitheses into the parallelisms of Hebrew poetry, the force and beauty of many passages in the N. T. are exhibited with great clearness and interest.—S. N.

JEBERECHIAH (יְבֶרְכִּיָּה), Bapaxlas; Barachias). In Is. viii. 2 we find Jeberemiah mentioned as the father of a certain Zechariah, selected by Isaiah, together with a priest named Uriah, as witnesses to attest his prediction. Both the LXX. and the Vulgate give the name in its ordinary form, Barachiah, and as we do not find it elsewhere, the initial ' is probably an error, which may be accounted for by supposing the preceding word בְּנֵי to have been originally plural, בְּנֵי, the two witnesses being both sons of Barachiah, and the final letter, by a mistake of the copyist, to have been prefixed to the following word.

The same pair of names seems to have been of no unfrequent occurrence in the priestly houses. Zechariah the prophet was son of Berechiah (Zech. i. 1), and we have 'Zacharias, son of Barachias' (Matt. xxiii. 3, 5). Josephus also (Jell. Jud. iv. 5, 4) mentions another Zacharias, son of Baruch.—E. V.

JEBUS (יְבוּס), 'a place trodden down,' perhaps 'a threshing-floor,' Sept. Ἰεβούς; Jebus), the name of the ancient Canaanitish city which stood on Mount Zion, one of the hills on which Jerusalem was built. In Judg. xix. 10 it is identified with Jerusalem.—'And came over against Jebus, which is Jerusalem; and in 1 Chron. xi. 4, 5, the only other passage in which the name occurs, it is identified with the castle of Zion, subsequently called the castle or city of David.—'And David and all Israel went to Jerusalem, which is Jebus; where the Jebusites were, the inhabitants of the land. And the inhabitants of Jebus said to David, thou shalt not come hither. Nevertheless David took the castle of Zion, which is the city of David.' The sides of Zion descended precipitously on the west and south into the deep valley of Hinnom, and on the east into the Tyropœan, which separated it from Moriah. On the north side the upper part of the Tyropœan swept round it; and here was a ledge of rock on which a massive tower was afterwards founded, perhaps on the site of an older one. Jebus was thus naturally a place of great strength; and being strongly fortified besides, it is not strange that the Jebusites should have gloried in it as impregnable, and that the capture of it by David should have been considered one of his most brilliant achievements (2 Sam. v.

8). Even after Jebus was captured, and Jerusalem founded and made the capital of Israel, Zion was separately fortified. It seems that in addition to the 'castle' on the summit of the hill there was a lower city or suburb, perhaps lying in the bottom of the adjoining valleys; for we read that the children of Judah had captured and burned Jerusalem (Judg. i. 7, 8), while afterwards it is said 'the Benjamites did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem' (ver. 21). The Jebusites still held the 'castle' which was within the allotted territory of Benjamin, but the children of Judah drove them out of the lower town which was situated within their borders. This is in substance the explanation given by Josephus (Antiq. v. 2. 2 and 5). An attempt has recently been made to represent Jebus and Zion as distinct, and to identify Zion and Moriah (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Jerusalem, vol. i., p. 1026), but this is plainly at variance with 1 Kings viii., where, after the building of the temple on Moriah, Solomon assembled the elders 'that they might bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is Zion' (see also 2 Chron. v. 2-7). Of course if Zion and Moriah were identical this statement would be inaccurate [ZION]. But again, as has been stated above, Jebus and the 'castle of Zion, which is the city of David,' are clearly identified in 1 Chron. xi. 4, 5. While the Jebusites had their castle or citadel upon one hill they had their threshing-floors upon another adjoining it, Mount Moriah, a thing very often seen in Syria at the present day (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24, with 2 Chron. iii. 1).

Jebus was the stronghold and capital of the powerful tribe of the Jebusites, who were descended from one of the sons of Canaan (Gen. x. 16). We cannot tell whether the city took its name from the man who founded it, or whether the tribe took its name from the peculiar character of the hill on which their chief city was built. [JEBUSITE].—J. L. P.

JEBUSITE (יְבוּסִי; Ἰεβουσαῖος; Jebuseus).

The genealogy of this ancient tribe is given, with numerous others, in that invaluable 10th chapter of Genesis. At ver. 15, we read, 'And Canaan begat Sidon, his first-born, and Heth, and the Jebusite.' It is worthy of note, that while the two first names are those of individuals, the third and all that follow denote tribes—the Jebusite, etc. (הַיְבוּסִי). The only instance in which the individual name appears is as applied to the city Jebus. [JEBUS.] The Jebusites are always mentioned among the tribes who possessed Canaan before the Exodus. They dwelt in that country during the time of Abraham (Gen. xv. 21). When the twelve spies were sent by Moses from the wilderness of Paran 'to spy out the land,' they reported on their return that 'the Amalekites dwell in the land of the south; and the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites, dwell in the mountains,' etc. (Num. xiii. 29). Jerusalem, the capital of the Jebusites, stands on the very crest of the mountain range. On Mount Zion they built their great stronghold (1 Chron. xi. 4, 5), and doubtless they occupied a considerable section of the surrounding hills. The Jebusites were a warlike tribe, and their king appears to have exercised extensive influence, as he was the head of the league formed against the Gibeonites (Josh. x. 1). The Israelites conquered them, seized their land, and reduced them to tribute; but the Jebusites still held their castle on Zion, and dwelt among the Benjamites until David attacked their fortress, and Joab succeeded in scaling its cliffs and walls. Then the tribe was dispersed; though it would seem that a few of them were permitted to remain around their old capital, since David bought from Araunah the Jebusite, the threshing-floor on Moriah on which the Temple was afterwards built. From the narrative of David's remarkable interview with Araunah, it would seem that the latter was of the royal family of the Jebusites (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25; 1 Chron. xxi. 15-30). Josephus tells us that Araunah was 'a particular friend of David's; and for that cause it was that, when he overthrew the city, he did him no harm' (Antiq. vii. 13. 4; and 3. 3). This is the last notice we have of the Jebusites.—J. L. P.

JECAMIAH (יְעָמְיָה; Sept. Ἰεκεμία; Alex.

Ἰεκεμία), one of seven who are mentioned as sons of Jeconiah in the line of David (1 Chron. iii. 18). By some the first in the list Shealtiel (A. V. Salathiel) alone is regarded as the son of Jeconiah, the other six being reckoned sons of Shealtiel. It is in favour of this that Zerubbabel, who appears here as the son of Pedaiah (ver. 19), is elsewhere called the son of Shealtiel (Ezra iii. 2; Hag. i. 12; Matt. i. 12); which he might be if his father Pedaiah was the son of Shealtiel, but not if he was his brother. There is a difficulty, however, in the way of this, arising from the use of the copula in ver. 18, which evidently connects Malchiram, Pedaiah, etc., with Shealtiel, as sons of Jeconiah. May not Shealtiel have been childless, and the oldest son of his brother Pedaiah be adopted by him, and appear in the genealogies as his son? We find Shealtiel or Salathiel himself appearing as the [legal] son of Neri (Luke iii. 27), though [really] the son of Jeconiah [GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST]. With the exception of Shealtiel, none of these sons of Jeconiah is mentioned elsewhere.—W. L. A.

JECONIAH, another form of Jehoiachin, king of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 16, 17; Jer. xxiv. 1; xxvii. 20; xxviii. 4; xxix. 1; Esth. ii. 6). The name is further abbreviated into Coniah.

JEDAIAH. By this word are represented in the A. V. two distinct Hebrew names. The one of this is יְדֵיָהּ, Jah knows (Sept. Ἰωβὰδ, Ἰεδωκ, Ἰαδίδ). Three persons of this name, apparently, are mentioned in Scripture:—

1. The head of the second course of priests according to the arrangement of David (1 Chron. xxiv. 7). In Neh. xi. 10 Jedaiah is made the son of Joiarib; but there is here an evident clerical error; for Jedaiah and Joiarib were heads of different priestly courses (comp. 1 Chron. ix. 10). A portion of those who returned from the captivity are described as the 'sons of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua' (Ezra ii. 36; Neh. vii. 39). Jewish tradition makes this Jeshua the famous high-priest in the time of Zerubbabel; but this may be a mistake. 2. The head of another priestly family in the time of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 7, 21). 3. A priest in the time of Jeshua (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

The other Hebrew name which Jedaiah represents is יְהִיָּה, Praise Jah, or Praiser of Jah (Sept. 'Iedad; Alex. 'Edid, 'Iedata). Two men of this name are mentioned:—1. An ancestor of Ziza, the head of a family in the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 37). 2. The son of Harumaph, who is mentioned as one who builded over against his house in the repairing of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).—W. L. A.

JEDIAEL (יְדִיֵּאֵל, God-known). 1. (Sept. 'Iedihl; Vulg. Jadid, Jadihel). One of the lineal descendants of Benjamin, and founder of one of the leading Benjamite clans (1 Chron. vii. 6, 10, 11). On the difficulties connected with the genealogies of the tribe of Benjamin, see art. BECHER.

2. (I'edihl; Vulg. Jedihel). One of David's valiant men (1 Chron. xi. 45). Perhaps the same as the following; but this is altogether uncertain.

3. (P'wdihl; Alex. 'Iedihl; Vulg. Jedihel). One of the chief military officers of the tribe of Manasseh, who joined the army of David when the latter was retiring to Ziklag after the Philistines had refused to allow him to go up with them against Saul (1 Chron. xii. 20).

4. (I'adihl; Vulg. Jadihel). A Korahite (קִרְיָהּ) appointed to be one of the doorkeepers of the temple in accordance with the arrangements made by David in the last year of his life (1 Chron. xxvi. 2). He was the second son of Meshelemiah, the son of Kore (קֹרֵה).—S. N.

JEDIDIAH (יְדִידְיָהּ; Sept. 'Ieddeid; Alex. 'Iedida; Amahils Domino, 'darling of Jehovah').

The name bestowed on the newly-born Solomon by the prophet Nathan, by God's appointment, as a token of His love for the child, and His restored favour towards his father David, 'because of the Lord,' 'eò quod diligeret eum Dominus,' Vulg., 2 Sam. xii. 25. Ewald remarks (Geschichte iii. 215) on the happy omen the imposition of such an auspicious name, formed then for the first time for this express purpose, by Divine authority, must have been considered by the penitent and sorrowful David, and how naturally a child, born under such circumstances, and so pointedly owned of God, would become the best beloved of his father, and be marked out for the royal succession.

It must not be overlooked that the same root יָדָה, amare, appears both in David and Jedidiah, which would doubtless increase the significance in the father's mind. Ewald remarks (l. c. note 1) that it is still a common custom among the Orientals to give children a second name in addition to that imposed at birth, of a higher character, belonging to the man in a religious aspect.—E. V.

JEDUTHUN (יְדֻתָּן, sometimes יְדִיתָּן; Sept. 'Ιδουθών, 'Ιδιθούν, 'Ιδιθούμ), a Levite of the family of Merari, and one of the great masters of the temple music. That he was a Merarite, is proved (1) from the fact that his son Hosah (1 Chron. xvi. 38; comp. 42) was a descendant of Merari (xxvi. 10); (2) by the consideration that, as the appointment of three masters of song in the temple was determined by a regard to the three sons of Levi, and as Asaph represented the descendants of Gershon, and Heman those of Kohath, Jeduthun must be regarded as representing those of Merari; and (3) when we compare 1 Chron. xv. 17, 19, with xvi. 41, 42; xxv. 1, 3, 6; and 2 Chron. xxxv. 15, it will appear that Jeduthun and Ethan are names of the same person; from which it follows, that as Ethan is expressly called a Merarite (1 Chron. xv. 17; vi. 29 [A. V. 44]), Jeduthun must also be such. This identification with Ethan enables us further to trace his genealogy; he was the son of Kishi, or Kushai, and was 13th in descent from Levi. The department superintended by Jeduthun and his colleagues in the temple service was that of the 'instruments of the song of God' (כְּלֵי שִׁיר אֱלֹהִים), by which are intended the nebel or psalter, the kinnor or harp, and the metsiltaim or cymbals (xv. 16). In 2 Chron. xxxv. 15 Jeduthun is called 'the king's seer,' which would seem to indicate that he was the medium of divine guidance to David. The name occurs in the title of Pss. xxxix., lxii., lxxvii., where some have thought that it indicates some special kind of composition, and others some instrument of music, but without reason.—W. L. A.

JEEZER (יִזְעָר; Sept. 'Αχιζερ), the eldest son of Gilead, and grandson of Manasseh, from whom sprang the family of the Jeezerites (Num. xxvi. 30). In Josh. xvii. 2 he is called Abiezer (אַבְיִזְעָר), and those descended from him the Abiezerites (Judg. vi. 11). One of these names is supposed to be the result of a clerical mistake; but whether the ז has been inserted in the one, or omitted in the other, remains uncertain. The LXX. would seem to have read Ἀχιζερ, but it is remarkable that in Josh. xvii. 2 they give 'Ιεζρ. This seems to countenance the suggestion that Jeezer is a contracted form of Abiezer (Simonis, Onomast. p. 451).—W. L. A.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (יְגָר שְׁהַדוּתָא; Chaldee, 'The heap of witness'; Sept. Βουνὸς τῆς μαρτυρίας; tumulum testis), the name given by Laban in his native Chaldee dialect to the heap of stones raised by Jacob on the spot where he made the covenant with Laban in Gilead. Laban called it Jegar-Sahadutha, but Jacob called it Galed. And Laban said, This heap (גָּל, gal) is a witness (עֵד, ed) between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Galed (Gen. xxxi. 46-48). It would seem from this remarkable interview that Jacob while in Mesopotamia had kept up the pure Hebrew dialect, and had trained his wives, children, and servants to the use of it. Laban and his followers, however, only understood, or at least were more familiar, with the Chaldee. Both Jacob and Laban were anxious not only to ratify the covenant between themselves personally, but also to have its solemnity deeply impressed upon their followers, and its terms fully understood by them all. Hence the different names given to that 'heap' which was, as it were, the seal of the covenant. The names Jegar-Sahadutha and Galed are not quite synonymous; the difference is accurately represented in the Septuagint, Βουνὸς τῆς μαρτυρίας and Βουνὸς μαρτύριος; and in the Old Latin Acervum testimonii and Acervum testis; but Jerome has just reversed the two in the Vulgate, Tumulum testis and Acervum testimonii (Sabatier, Bibl. Sac. Latina Versiones, ad loc.) An account of the covenant and the situation of the 'heap' are given under GILEAD.—J. L. P.

JEHIEL (יְהִיֵּל; Sept. 'Ιειήλ; Vulg. Jehiel, less frequently Jehiel). 1. One of the lineal descendants of Gershon, by his son Laadan, and the founder of one of the great patriarchal houses of the Levites (1 Chron. xxiii. 8). The members of this family or clan are termed Jehieli (יְהִיֵּלִי, 1 Chron. xxvii. 21, 22).

2. A Levite, and one of the singers appointed to accompany the ark from the house of Obededom (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20), and subsequently to minister before it in the tabernacle which David had prepared for it in Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi. 5).

3. The representative of the family of the Jehieli in the reign of David, to whom were entrusted the precious stones contributed by the princes of Israel towards the erection of the temple (1 Chron. xxix. 8). Jehiel was probably his surname only, or title of rank, his personal name being Zetham (1 Chron. xxvii. 22).

4. (Sept. 'Ιειήλ; Alex. 'Ιερηήλ). Son of Hachmoni (יְחֻמֹּנִי, rendered in the A. V. 'an Hachmonite,' 1 Chron. xi. 11), and one of the officers of David's household, described as 'with the king's sons;' probably he was their tutor (1 Chron. xxvii. 32).

5. Son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 2).

6. A Levite of the branch of Kohath, and a descendant of Heman the singer. He took an active part in the religious reformation originated by Hezekiah, and was appointed one of the overseers of the free-will offerings given for the maintenance of the priests (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

7. A Levite, and one of the rulers of the house of God (בְּנֵי בֵּית אֱלֹהִים) in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 8).

8. The father of Obadiah, the head of the Benei-Joab in the time of Ezra (Ezra viii. 9). In the book of Esdras (viii. 32) he is called Jezelus ('Ιεζήλος).

9. The father of Shechaniah, one of the contemporaries of Ezra (Ezra x. 2). He is described as one of the sons of Elam. In the book of Esdras he is styled 'one of the sons of Israel' (1 Esd. viii. 92).

10. (Sept. 'Ιαιήλ; Alex. 'Αειήλ; 1 Esd. 'Ιεζ-μιήλος.) One of the Benei-Elam who, at the exhortation of Ezra, agreed to put away his strange wife (Ezra x. 26; 1 Esd. ix. 27).

11. A priest of the course of Harim, who also made public acknowledgment of his transgression in marrying a strange wife (Ezra x. 21; also 1 Esd. ix. 21, which reads 'Ιερεήλ).—S. N.

JEHIEL (יְהִיֵּל, but according to the Keri יְהִיֵּל = JEIEL). 1. (Sept. 'Ιειήλ; Alex. 'Ιειήλ; Vulg. Jehiel). The chief of a Benjamite family which settled at Gibeon, and one of the ancestors of Saul (1 Chron. ix. 35, see also viii. 29).

2. ('Ιειήλ; Vulg. Jehiel). Son of Hotham the Areonite and one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. xi. 44).—S. N.

JEHIZKIAH (יְהִיזְכִּיָּה; Sept. 'Εζεκίας), one of the princes or chiefs of the tribe of Ephraim who, at the instigation of the prophet Oded, withstood the retaining in captivity of those whom the host of Israel under Pekah had carried away out of Judah, and succeeded, after clothing and feeding them out of the spoils, in restoring them to their own land.—W. L. A.

JEHOAHAZ (יְהוֹאָחָז, God-sustained; Sept. 'Ιωδαχάφ). 1. Son of Jehu, king of Israel, who succeeded his father in B.C. 856, and reigned seventeen years. As he followed the evil courses of the house of Jeroboam, the Syrians under Hazael and Benhadad were suffered to prevail over him; so that, at length, he had only left of all his forces fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and 10,000 foot. Overwhelmed by his calamities, Jehoahaz at length acknowledged the authority of Jehovah over Israel, and humbled himself before him; in consideration of which a deliverer was raised up for Israel in the person of Jehoash, his son, who was enabled to expel the Syrians and re-establish the affairs of the kingdom (2 Kings xiii. 1-9, 25).

2. Otherwise called SHALLUM, seventeenth king of Judah, son of Josiah, whose reign began and ended in the year B.C. 608. After his father had been slain in resisting the progress of Pharaoh Necho, Jehoahaz, who was then twenty-three years of age, was raised to the throne by the people, and received at Jerusalem the regal anointing, which seems to have been usually omitted in times of order and of regular succession. He found the land full of trouble, but free from idolatry. Instead, however, of following the excellent example of his father, Jehoahaz fell into the accustomed crimes of his predecessors; and under the encouragements which his example or indifference offered, the idols soon re-appeared. It seems strange that in a time so short, and which must have been much occupied in arranging plans for resisting or pacifying the Egyptian king, he should have been able to deserve the stigma which the sacred record has left upon his name. But there is no limit except in the greatness of the divine power to the activity of evil dispositions. The sway of Jehoahaz was terminated in three months, when Pharaoh Necho, on his victorious return from the Euphrates, thinking it politic to reject a king not nominated by himself, removed him from the throne, and set thereon his brother Jehoiakim. This reign was the shortest in the kingdom of Judah, although in that of Israel there were several shorter. The deposed king was at first taken as a prisoner to Riblah in Syria; but was eventually carried to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings xxiii. 30-35; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1-4; 1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 10-12).

The anointing of this king has drawn attention to the defect of his title as the reason for the addition of that solemn ceremony. It appears from 1 Chron. iii. 15 that Josiah had four sons, of whom Johanan is expressly said to have been 'the first-born.' But he seems to have died before his father, as we nowhere find his name historically mentioned, while those of the other brothers are familiar to us. If, therefore, he died childless, and Jehoahaz were the next son, his claim would have been good. But he was not the next son. His name, as Shallum, occurs last of the four in 1 Chron. iii. 15; and from the historical notices in 2 Kings xxiii. and 1 Chron. xxxvi. we ascertain that when Josiah died the ages of the three surviving sons were, Eliakim (Jehoiakim) twenty-five years, Jehoahaz (Shallum) twenty-three years, Mattaniah (Zedekiah) ten years; consequently Jehoahaz was preferred by the popular favour above his elder brother Jehoiakim, and the anointing, therefore, was doubtless intended to give to his imperfect claim the weight of that solemn ceremony. It was also probably suspected that, as actually took place, the Egyptian king would seek to annul a popular election unsanctioned by himself; but as the Egyptians anointed their own kings, and attached much importance to the ceremony, the possibility that he would hesitate more to remove an anointed than an unanointed king might afford a further reason for the anointing of Jehoahaz. [ANOINTING.]

Jehoahaz is supposed to be the person who is designated under the emblem of a young lion carried in chains to Egypt (Ezek. xix. 3, 4).—J. K.

JEHOASH. [JOASH.]

JEHOHANAN (יהוחנן), whom Jehovah bestows = Θεοδωπος, Ges., or rather, he to whom Jehovah is gracious, or the grace of Jehovah: LXX. Ἰωανᾶν, Ἰωάν, Ἰωδδᾶν; Vulg. Johanan). The name of several persons.

1. A military leader under Jeshophat, next to Adnah, who was first in command (2 Chron. xvii. 15; also xxiii. 1). The number of troops assigned to each commander in this connection is obviously an exaggeration.

2. The father of Azariah, who was one of the 'heads of the children of Ephraim,' who seconded the prophet Oded in opposing the retention of the two hundred thousand captives of Judah taken by Pekah, king of Israel, declaring that they should not be brought into Samaria to add to the sins of Israel; and who, in common with other chiefs, 'clothed those that were naked among them' out of the spoils, and 'gave them to eat and drink, and anointed them, and carried all that were feeble among them upon asses, and brought them back as far as Jericho, the city of palm trees' (2 Chron. xxviii. 6-15).

3. The sixth son of Meshelamiah or Shelemiah, a porter of the family of the Kohrites (1 Chron. xxvi. 3).

4. The son of Amariah, a priest, in the days of Joiakim, the high-priest (Neh. xii. 13).

5. The son of Shechaniah, the father-in-law of Tobiah, and who had married the daughter of Meshullam, the son of Berechiah, whose interest, therefore, was sufficiently powerful to support Tobiah (Neh. vi. 18).

6. The son of Eliashib, who had a chamber about the Temple, where Ezra bewailed the transgressions of the people of the captivity in the matter of the strange wives (Ezra x. 6; Neh. xii. 22, 23).

7. One of the four sons of Behai who had taken strange wives (Ezra x. 28).

8. A priest who took part in the joyful festivities of the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by the returned captives (Neh. xii. 42).

In the A. V. the form of the name in Nos. 3, 5, 6, is Johanan. The name is of very frequent occurrence in later Jewish history. Its form in Josephus is Ἰωάννης = John.—I. J.

JEHOIACHIN (יהויכין, appointed by Jehovah; Sept. Ἰωαχμ), by contraction JECONIAH and CONIAH, nineteenth king of Judah, and son of Jehoiakim. When his father was slain, B.C. 599, the king of Babylon allowed him, as the rightful heir, to succeed. He was then eighteen years of age according to 2 Kings xxiv. 8; but only eight according to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. Many attempts have been made to reconcile these dates, the most usual solution being that he had reigned ten years in conjunction with his father, so that he was eight when he began his joint reign, but eighteen when he began to reign alone. There are, however, difficulties in this view, which, perhaps, leave it the safest course to conclude that 'eight' in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, is a corruption of the text, such as might easily occur from the relation of the numbers eight and eighteen.

Jehoiachin followed the evil courses which had already brought so much disaster upon the royal house of David, and upon the people under its sway. He seems to have very speedily indicated a political bias adverse to the interests of the Chaldean empire; for in three months after his accession we find the generals of Nebuchadnezzar again laying siege to Jerusalem, according to the predictions of Jeremiah (xxii. 18-xxiv. 30). Convinced of the futility of resistance, Jehoiachin went out and surrendered as soon as Nebuchadnezzar arrived in person before the city. He was sent away as a captive to Babylon, with his mother, his generals, and his troops, together with the artificers and other inhabitants of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand. Few were left but the poorer sort of people and the unskilled labourers, few, indeed, whose presence could be useful in Babylon or dangerous in Palestine. Neither did the Babylonian king neglect to remove the treasures which could yet be gleaned from the palace or the temple; and he now made spoil of those sacred vessels of gold which had been spared on former occasions. These were cut up for present use of the metal or for more convenient transport; whereas those formerly taken had been sent to Babylon entire, and there laid up as trophies of victory. Thus ended an unhappy reign of three months and ten days. If the Chaldean king had then put an end to the show of a monarchy and annexed the country to his own dominions, the event would probably have been less unhappy for the nation. But still adhering to his former policy, he placed on the throne Mattaniah, the only surviving son of Josiah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiv. 1-16; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, 10; Jer. xxix. 2; xxxvii. 1).

Jehoiachin remained in prison at Babylon during the lifetime of Nebuchadnezzar; but when that prince died, his son, Evil-merodach, not only released him, but gave him an honourable seat at his own table, with precedence over all the other de-throned kings who were kept at Babylon, and an allowance for the support of his rank (2 Kings xxv. 27-30; Jer. lii. 31-34). To what he owed this favour we are not told; but the Jewish commentators allege that Evil-merodach had himself been put into prison by his father during the last year of his reign, and had there contracted an intimate friendship with the deposed king of Judah.

The name of Jeconiah re-appears to fix the epoch of several of the prophecies of Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 2), and of the deportation which terminated his reign (Ezra. ii. 6). In the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 11) he is named as the 'son of Josias' his grandfather.—J. K.

JEHOIADA (יהויָדָע, known by Jehovah; Sept. Ἰωδαῖ). Several persons of this name are mentioned in the O. T., of whom the one most deserving notice is he who was high-priest in the times of Ahaziah and Athaliah. He is only known from the part which he took in recovering the throne of Judah for the young Joash, who had been saved by his wife Jehoshebah from the massacre by which Athaliah sought to exterminate the royal line of David. The particulars of this transaction are related under other heads. [ATHALIAH; JOASH.] Jehoiaida manifested much decision and forecast on this occasion; and he used for good the great power which devolved upon him during the minority of the young king, and the influence which he continued to enjoy as long as he lived. The value of this influence is shown by the misconduct and the disorders of the kingdom after his death. He died in B.C. 834, at the age of 130, and his remains were honoured with a place in the sepulchre of the kings at Jerusalem (2 Kings xi. 12; 2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv.) [For the other persons of this name see 2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 27; 1 Chron. xxvii. 34 (where for 'Jehoiaida the son of Benaiah,' we should probably read 'Benaiah the son of Jehoiaida'); 2 Kings xxv. 18; Jer. xxix. 25-29; Neh. iii. 6.]

JEHOIAKIM (יהויקים), established by Jehovah;

Sept. Ἰωακίμ), originally ELIAKIM, second son of Josiah, and eighteenth king of Judah. On the death of his father the people raised to the throne his younger brother Jehoahaz; but three months after, when the Egyptian king returned from the Euphrates, he removed Jehoahaz, and gave the crown to the rightful heir, Eliakim, whose name he changed to Jehoiakim. This change of name often took place in similar circumstances; and the altered name was in fact the badge of a tributary prince. Jehoiakim began to reign in B.C. 608, and reigned eleven years. He of course occupied the position of a vassal of the Egyptian empire, and in that capacity had to lay upon the people heavy imposts to pay the appointed tribute, in addition to the ordinary expenses of government. But, as if this were not enough, it would seem from various passages in Jeremiah (Jer. xxii. 13, etc.) that Jehoiakim aggravated the public charges, and consequently the public calamities, by a degree of luxury and magnificence in his establishments and structures very ill-suited to the condition of his kingdom and the position which he occupied. Hence much extortion and wrong-doing, much privation and deceit; and when we add to this a general forgetfulness of God and proneness to idolatry, we have the outlines of that picture which the prophet Jeremiah has drawn in the most sombre hues.

However heavy may have been the Egyptian yoke, Jehoiakim was destined to pass under one heavier still. In his time the empire of Western Asia was disputed between the kings of Egypt and Babylon; and the kingdom of Judah, pressed between these mighty rivals, and necessarily either the tributary or very feeble enemy of the one or the other, could not but suffer nearly equally, whichever proved the conqueror. The kings of Judah were therefore placed in a position of peculiar difficulty, out of which they could only escape with safety by the exercise of great discretion, and through the special mercies of the God of Israel, who had by his high covenant engaged to protect them so long as they walked uprightly. This they did not, and were in consequence abandoned to their doom.

In the third year of his reign Jehoiakim, being besieged in Jerusalem, was forced to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, and was by his order laden with chains, with the intention of sending him captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6); but eventually the conqueror changed his mind and restored the crown to him. Many persons, however, of high family, and some even of the royal blood, were sent away to Babylon. Among these was Daniel, then a mere youth. A large proportion of the treasures and sacred vessels of the temple were also taken away and deposited in the idol-temple at Babylon (Dan. i. 1, 2). The year following the Egyptians were defeated upon the Euphrates (Jer. xlvi. 2), and Jehoiakim, when he saw the remains of the defeated army pass by his territory, could not but perceive how vain had been that reliance upon Egypt against which he had been constantly cautioned by Jeremiah (Jer. xxxi. 1; xlv. 1). In the same year the prophet caused a collection of his prophecies to be written out by his faithful Baruch, and to be read publicly by him in the court of the temple. This coming to the knowledge of the king, he sent for it and had it read before him. But he heard not much of the bitter denunciations with which it was charged, before he took the roll from the reader, and after cutting it in pieces threw it into the brasier which, it being winter, was burning before him in the hall. The counsel of God against him, however, stood sure; a fresh roll was written, with the addition of a further and most awful denunciation against the king, occasioned by this foolish and sacrilegious act. 'He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat and in the night to the frost' (Jer. xxxvi.) All this, however, appears to have made little impression upon Jehoiakim, who still walked in his old paths.

The condition of the kingdom as tributary to the Chaldeans probably differed little from that in which it stood as tributary to the Egyptians, except that its resources were more exhausted by the course of time, and that its gold went to the east instead of the south. But at length, after three years of subjection, Jehoiakim, finding the king of Babylon fully engaged elsewhere, and deluded by the Egyptian party in his court, ventured to withhold his tribute, and thereby to throw off the Chaldean yoke. This step, taken contrary to the earnest remonstrances of Jeremiah, was the ruin of Jehoiakim. It might seem successful for a little, from the Chaldeans not then having leisure to attend to the affairs of this quarter. In due time, however, the land was invaded by their armies, accompanied by a vast number of auxiliaries from the neighbouring countries, the Edomites, Moabites, and others, who were for the most part actuated by a fierce hatred against the Jewish name and nation. The events of the war are not related. Jerusalem was taken, or rather surrendered on terms, which Josephus alleges were little heeded by Nebuchadnezzar. It is certain that Jehoiakim was slain, but whether in one of the actions, or, as Josephus says, after the surrender, we cannot determine. His body remained exposed and unlamented without the city, under the circumstances foretold by the prophet—'They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, my brother! or, Ah, sister! They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, lord! or, Ah, his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem' (Jer. xxii. 18, 19; 1 Chron. iii. 15; 2 Kings xxiii. 34-37; xxiv. 1-7; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4-8).

It was not the object of Nebuchadnezzar to destroy altogether a power which, as tributary to him, formed a serviceable outpost towards Egypt, which seems to have been the great final object of all his designs in this quarter. He therefore still maintained the throne of Judah, and placed on it Jehoiachin, the son of the late king. He, however, sent away another body, a second corps of the nobles and chief persons of the nation, three thousand in number, among whom was Ezekiel, afterwards called to prophesy in the land of his exile.—J. JEHOIARIB (יְהוֹיָרִיב), abbreviated to JOI-ARIB (יֹרִיב; Sept. Ἰωάριβ; Alex. Ἰωαρείβ, Ἰαρείβ; 1 Maccab. ii. 1, Ἰωαρείβ), head of the first of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided according to David's arrangement (1 Chron. xxiv. 7). Of these courses only four are mentioned as having returned from Babylon, those of Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim (Ezra ii. 36-39; Neh. vii. 39-42); and Jewish tradition says that each of these was divided into six, so as to preserve the original number with the original names (Talm. Hierosol. Taanith, c. 4, p. 68, col. 1, in ed. Bomberg). This might account for our finding at a later period Mattathias described as of the course of Joarib (1 Maccab. ii. 1), even though this course did not return from Babylon (Prideaux, Connection, i. 136, 8th ed.) We find, however, that some of the descendants of Jehoiarib did return from Babylon (1 Chron. ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10 [JEDAHIAH]); we find also that in subsequent lists other of the priestly courses are mentioned as returning, and in one of these that of Jehoiarib is expressly mentioned (Neh. x. 2-8; xii. 1-7), and mention is made of Mattenai as chief of the house of Joarib in the days of Jeshua (xii. 19). The probability therefore is that the course of Jehoiarib did go up, but at a later date perhaps than those four mentioned Ezra ii. 36-39 and Neh. vii. 39-42. To the course of Joarib Josephus tells us he belonged (Antiq. xi. 6. 1; Life, sec. 1).—W. L. A.

JEHONADAB. [JONADAB.]

JEHONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן; Sept. Ἰωανᾶδς), the full form of the name which elsewhere appears as JONATHAN. It is used in the A. V. of three persons:—1. The officer who had charge of 'the storehouses' of David 'in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages, and in the castles,' i.e., the revenues of the king drawn from his property out of Jerusalem (1 Chron. xxvii. 25). 2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people in the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xvii. 8). 3. A priest, chief of the family of Shemaiah in the time of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 18).—†

JEHORAM I. (יְהוֹרָם, exalted by Jehovah; Sept. Ἰωραμ), eldest son and successor of Jehoshaphat, and fifth king of Judah, who began to reign (separately) in B.C. 889, at the age of thirty-five years, and reigned five years. It is indeed said in the general account that he began to reign at the age of thirty-two, and that he reigned eight years; but the conclusions deducible from the fact that his reign began in the seventh year of Joram, king of Israel, shew that the reign thus stated dates back three years into the reign of his father, who from this is seen to have associated his eldest son with him in the later years of his reign.

Jehoram profited little by this association. He had unhappily been married to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel; and her influence seems to have neutralized all the good he might have derived from the example of his father. One of the first acts of his reign was to put his brothers to death and seize the valuable appanages which their father had in his lifetime bestowed upon them. After this we are not surprised to find him giving way to the gross idolatries of that new and strange kind—the Phœnician—which had been brought into Israel by Jezebel, and into Judah by her daughter Athaliah. For these atrocities the Lord let forth his anger against Jehoram and his kingdom. The Edomites revolted, and, according to old prophecies (Gen. xxvii. 40), shook off the yoke of Judah. The Philistines on one side, and the Arabians and Cushites on the other, also grew bold against a king forsaken of God, and in repeated invasions spoiled the land of all its substance; they even ravaged the royal palaces, and took away the wives and children of the king, leaving him only one son, Ahaziah. Nor was this all; Jehoram was in his last days afflicted with a frightful disease in his bowels, which, from the terms employed in describing it, appears to have been malignant dysentery in its most shocking and tormenting form. After a disgraceful reign, and a most painful death, public opinion inflicted the posthumous dishonour of refusing him a place in the sepulchre of the kings. Jehoram was by far the most impious and cruel tyrant that had as yet occupied the throne of Judah, though he was rivalled or surpassed by some of his successors (2 Kings viii. 16-24; 2 Chron. xxi.).

JEHORAM II., king of Israel. [JORAM.]—J. K.

JEHOSHAPHAT (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, whom Jehovah judges; Sept. Ἰωσαφάτ), the fourth king of Judah, and son of Asa, whom he succeeded in B.C. 914, at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. He commenced his reign by fortifying his kingdom against Israel; and having thus secured himself against surprise from the quarter which gave most disturbance to him, he proceeded to purge the land from the idolatries and idolatrous monuments by which it was still tainted. Even the high places and groves, which former well-disposed kings had suffered to remain, were by the zeal of Jehoshaphat in a great measure destroyed. The chiefs, with priests and Levites, proceeded from town to town, with the book of the law in their hands, instructing the people, and calling back their wandering affections to the religion of their fathers. This was a beautiful and interesting circumstance in the operations of the young king. Other good princes had been content to smite down the outward show of idolatry by force of hand; but Jehoshaphat saw that this was not of itself sufficient, and that the basis of a solid reformation must be laid by providing for the better instruction of the people in their religious duties and privileges.

Jehoshaphat was too well instructed in the great principles of the theocracy not to know that his faithful conduct had entitled him to expect the divine protection. Of that protection he soon had manifest proofs. At home he enjoyed peace and abundance, and abroad security and honour. His treasures were filled with the 'presents' which the blessing of God upon the people, 'in their basket and their store,' enabled them to bring. His renown extended into the neighbouring nations, and the Philistines, as well as the adjoining Arabian tribes, paid him rich tributes in silver and in cattle. He was thus enabled to put all his towns in good condition, to erect fortresses, to organise a powerful army, and to raise his kingdom to a degree of importance and splendour which it had not enjoyed since the revolt of the ten tribes.

The weak and impious Ahab at that time occupied the throne of Israel; and Jehoshaphat, having nothing to fear from his power, sought, or at least did not repel, an alliance with him. This is alleged to have been the grand mistake of his reign; and that it was such is proved by the consequences. Ahab might be benefited by the connection, but under no circumstance could it be of service to Jehoshaphat or his kingdom, and it might, as it actually did, involve him in much disgrace and disaster, and bring bloodshed and trouble into his house. His fault seems to have been the result of that easiness of temper and overflowing amiability of disposition, which the careful student may trace in his character; and which, although very engaging attributes in private life, are not always among the safest or most valuable qualities which a king in his public capacity might possess.

After a few years we find Jehoshaphat on a visit to Ahab, in Samaria, being the first time any of the kings of Israel and Judah had met in peace. He here experienced a reception worthy of his greatness; but Ahab failed not to take advantage of the occasion, and so worked upon the weak points of his character as to prevail upon him to take arms with him against the Syrians, with whom, hitherto, the kingdom of Judah never had any war or occasion of quarrel. However, Jehoshaphat was not so far infatuated as to proceed to the war without consulting God, who, according to the principles of the theocratic government, was the final arbiter of war and peace. The false prophets of Ahab poured forth ample promises of success, and one of them, named Zedekiah, resorting to material symbols, made him horns of iron, saying, 'Thus saith the Lord, with thee shalt thou smite the Syrians till they be consumed.' Still Jehoshaphat was not satisfied; and the answer to his further inquiries extorted from him a rebuke of the reluctance which Ahab manifested to call Micaiah, 'the prophet of the Lord.' The fearless words of this prophet did not make the impression upon the king of Judah which might have been expected; or, probably, he then felt himself too deeply bound in honour to recede. He went to the fatal battle of Ramoth-Gilead, and there nearly became the victim of a plan which Ahab had laid for his own safety at the expense of his too confiding ally. He persuaded Jehoshaphat to appear as king, while he himself went disguised to the battle. This brought the heat of the contest around him, as the Syrians took him for Ahab; and if they had not in time discovered their mistake, he would certainly have been slain. Ahab was killed, and the battle lost [AHAB]; but Jehoshaphat escaped, and returned to Jerusalem.

On his return from this imprudent expedition he was met by the just reproaches of the prophet Jehu. The best atonement he could make for this error was by the course he actually took. He resumed his labours in the further extirpation of idolatry, in the instruction of the people, and the improvement of his realm. He now made a tour of his kingdom in person, that he might see the ordinances of God duly established, and witness the due execution of his intentions respecting the instruction of the people in the divine law. This tour enabled him to discern many defects in the local administration of justice, which he then applied himself to remedy. He appointed magistrates in every city, for the determination of causes civil and ecclesiastical; and the nature of the abuses to which the administration of justice was in those days exposed, may be gathered from his excellent charge to them:—'Take heed what ye do, for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment. Wherefore now let the fear of the Lord be upon you; take heed and do it; for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts.' Then he established a supreme council of justice at Jerusalem, composed of priests, Levites, and 'the chiefs of the fathers;' to which difficult cases were referred, and appeals brought from the provincial tribunals. This tribunal also was inducted by a weighty but short charge from the king, whose conduct in this and other matters places him at the very head of the monarchs who reigned over Judah as a separate kingdom.

The activity of Jehoshaphat's mind was then turned towards the revival of that maritime commerce which had been established by Solomon. The land of Edom and the ports of the Elanitic Gulf were still under the power of Judah; and in them the king prepared a fleet for the voyage to Ophir. Unhappily, however, he yielded to the wish of the king of Israel, and allowed him to take part in the enterprise. For this the expedition was doomed of God, and the vessels were wrecked almost as soon as they quitted port. Instructed by Eliezer, the prophet, as to the cause of this disaster, Jehoshaphat equipped a new fleet, and having this time declined the co-operation of the king of Israel, the voyage prospered. The trade was not, however, prosecuted with any zeal, and was soon abandoned [COMMERCE].

In accounting for the disposition of Jehoshaphat to contract alliances with the king of Israel, we are to remember that there existed a powerful tie between the two courts in the marriage of Jehoshaphat's eldest son with Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab; and, when we advert to the part in public affairs which that princess afterwards took, it may well be conceived that even thus early she possessed an influence for evil in the court of Judah.

After the death of Ahaziah, king of Israel, Joram, his successor, persuaded Jehoshaphat to join him in an expedition against Moab. This alliance was, however, on political grounds, more excusable than the two former, as the Moabites, who were under tribute to Israel, might draw into their cause the Edomites, who were tributary to Judah. Besides, Moab could be invaded with most advantage from the south, round by the end of the Dead Sea; and the king of Israel could not gain access to them in that quarter but by marching through the territories of Jehoshaphat. The latter not only joined Joram with his own army, but required his tributary, the king of Edom, to bring his forces into the field. During seven days' march through the wilderness of Edom, the army suffered much from want of water; and by the time the allies came in sight of the army of Moab, they were ready to perish from thirst. In this emergency the pious Jehoshaphat thought, as usual, of consulting the Lord; and hearing that the prophet Elisha was in the camp, the three kings proceeded to his tent. For the sake of Jehoshaphat, and for his sake only, deliverance was promised; and it came during the ensuing night, in the shape of an abundant supply of water, which rolled down the exhausted wadys, and filled the pools and hollow grounds. Afterwards Jehoshaphat took his full part in the operations of the campaign, till the armies were induced to withdraw in horror, by witnessing the dreadful act of Mesha, king of Moab, in offering up his eldest son in sacrifice upon the wall of the town in which he was shut up.

This war kindled another much more dangerous to Jehoshaphat. The Moabites, being highly exasperated at the part he had taken against them, turned all their wrath upon him. They induced their kindred, the Ammonites, to join them, obtained auxiliaries from the Syrians, and even drew over the Edomites; so that the strength of all the neighbouring nations may be said to have been united for this great enterprise. The allied forces entered the land of Judah and encamped at Engedi, near the western border of the Dead Sea. In this extremity Jehoshaphat felt that all his defence lay with God. A solemn fast was held, and the people repaired from the towns to Jerusalem to seek help of the Lord. In the presence of the assembled multitude the king, in the court of the temple, offered up a fervent prayer to God, concluding with—"O our God, wilt thou not judge them, for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon thee." He ceased; and in the midst of the silence which ensued, a voice was raised pronouncing deliverance in the name of the Lord, and telling them to go out on the morrow to the cliffs overlooking the camp of the enemy, and see them all overthrown without a blow from them. The voice was that of Jahaziel, one of the Levites. His words came to pass. The allies quarrelled among themselves and destroyed each other; so that when the Judahites came the next day they found their dreaded enemies all dead, and nothing was left for them but to take the rich spoils of the slain. This done, they returned with triumphal songs to Jerusalem. This great event was recognised even by the neighbouring nations as the act of God; and so strong was the impression which it made upon them, that the remainder of the good king's reign was altogether undisturbed. His death, however, took place not very long after this, at the age of sixty, after having reigned twenty-five years, B.C. 896. He left the kingdom in a prosperous condition to his eldest son Jehoram, whom he had in the last years of his life associated with him in the government.

Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart, was the character given to this king by Jehu, when, on that account, he gave to his grandson an honourable grave (2 Chron. xxii. 9). And this, in fact, was the sum and substance of his character. The Hebrew annals offer the example of no king who more carefully squared all his conduct by the principles of the theocracy. He kept the Lord always before his eyes, and was in all things obedient to his will when made known to him by the prophets. Few of the kings of Judah manifested so much zeal for the real welfare of his people, or took measures so judicious to promote it. His good talents, the benevolence of his disposition, and his generally sound judgment, are shown not only in the great measures of domestic policy which distinguished his reign, but by the manner in which they were executed. No trace can be found in him of that pride which dishonoured some and ruined others of the kings who preceded and followed him. Most of his errors arose from that dangerous facility of temper which sometimes led him to act against the dictates of his naturally sound judgment, or prevented that judgment from being fairly exercised. The kingdom of Judah was never happier or more prosperous than under his reign; and this, perhaps, is the highest praise that can be given to any king.—J. K.

[Four other persons bearing this name are mentioned in the O. T. See 2 Sam. viii. 16, and 1 Kings iv. 3; 1 Chron. xv. 24; 1 Kings iv. 17; 2 Kings ix. 2, 14.]

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (יְהוֹשָׁפָט בְּעֵמֶק; κοιλίς Ἰωσαφάτ; vallis Josaphat).

In one of the sublime prophecies of Joel, when describing the events which would occur after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, he represents the Lord as saying: 'I will gather all the nations, and bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there, on account of my people, and Israel mine inheritance, whom they have scattered among the nations' (iii. 2, in the Hebrew iv. 2). The nations referred to appear to be those which oppressed Israel and aided in their overthrow. These then, including the Sidonians, Tyrians, and Phoenicians generally (ver. 4), were to be brought down into this valley and judged (ver. 12). The act is clearly symbolical, and in that case we can scarcely think that reference is made to any specific locality. The valley appears to have been intended to symbolise those bloody battle-fields where the hostile nations contiguous to Judæa had signal vengeance inflicted on them. The phrase יְהוֹשָׁפָט בְּעֵמֶק, literally signifies 'The valley where Jehovah judgeth'; and may thus have been intended to represent any scene of divine judgment. This is supported by the

Targum, where the words are rendered מִישַׁר פְּלִיגוֹן בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'the plain of the distribution of judgment'; and by the translation of Theodotion, τὴν χώραν τῆς κρίσεως, 'the place of judgment' (Henderson, Minor Prophets, ad loc.)

The interpretations of this passage have been both numerous and conflicting (see Poli Synopsis Crit. Sac. ad loc.) Many think a definite place is referred to, and some say it is the 'valley of Bera-chah' where Jehoshaphat obtained the signal victory over Ammon and Moab (2 Chron. xx. 26). Some again affirm that the valley of the Kidron is meant—that deep valley or glen which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. This may be regarded as the traditional interpretation both among Jews and Christians. Eusebius says κοιλὰς Ἰωσαφάτ lay between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives (Onomast., s. v. Coelās), and from his time until the present day this is the common name given to the Kidron; and this reference of the prophet Joel has given rise to the current belief among Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, that the last judgment will take place there (Robinson, B. R. i. 269). For this identification, however, there is not the slightest ground, either in the writings of Scripture or in Josephus. The name universally given to the glen is Kidron (2 Sam. xv. 23; 1 Kings ii. 38; John xviii. 1; Joseph. Bell. Jud. v. 2. 3, etc.). Not only so, but the word מַקְדָּוֹן, translated 'valley,' is altogether inapplicable to the Kidron; it signifies a low tract of land of wide extent, such as suited a battle-field (Job xxxix. 10, 21; Josh. xv. 8). The Kidron is always termed נַחַל, 'torrent valley' or 'glen,' and the Septuagint and Josephus render it χεῖμαρρος, and this is the word used in John xviii. 1. Josephus also applies the word φάραγξ to the Kidron. The Kidron is a narrow rocky ravine [KIDRON], and wholly unsuitable for such an event as is referred to by Joel; and even though we could believe that the prophet referred to a specific valley this could not be the one.—J. JEHOSHEBAH (יְהֹשֶׁבֶת; Ἰωσαβητ; Josaba; 2 Kings xi. 2; 2 Chron. xxii. 11. JEHOSHABEATH, יְהֹשָׁבֶעֱת; Ἰωσαβηθ; Josabeth; Ἰωσαβηθ, Joseph. Jehovah's oath), daughter of Joram, king of Judah, sister of Ahaziah, but probably by a secondary wife, and so not the daughter of Athaliah, wife of the high-priest Jehoiada, 2 Chron. xxii. 11. When Athaliah had the whole of the seed royal massacred with a view to the usurpation of the throne, Jehoshebah discovered her infant nephew Joash and his nurse concealed under the heaps of corpses (Joseph. Antiq. ix. 7. 1), which covered the pavement of the palace, and, conveying him away secretly, hid him in one of the bedchambers annexed to the Temple, in whose sacred precincts he was brought up by her and her husband Jehoiada among their own children.

The view that she was not the daughter of Athaliah appears to be confirmed by Josephus, who calls her Ὁμοφάτριος ἀδελφή, and is in keeping with the subsequent measures taken by her husband Jehoiada for the death of the usurping queen. Needless doubt has been thrown upon her marriage with Jehoiada (Newman, Heb. Monarch., p. 195), which is not expressly mentioned in Kings, as 'a fiction of the chronicler to glorify his greatness.' This, however, is certainly assumed in 2 Kings xi. 3, and is accepted by Ewald, Geschichte iii. 575, as perfectly authentic.—E. V.

JEHOSHUA (יְהֹשֻׁעַ), the full form of the name which usually appears as JOSHUA. It occurs twice in the A. V. of the leader of Israel (Num. xiii. 16; 1 Chron. vii. 27), in the latter case with a final ā. The LXX. in the former give Ἰησοῦς, in the latter Ἰησοῦς.—† pointed, this word appears as יְהוָה, but, as is well known, these are the points appropriate to אֱלֹהֵינוּ, and are affixed to יְהוָה in order that in reading, the former may be substituted for the latter, so as to avoid the utterance of the peculiar name of God, which to the Jews appears irreverent.* For the same reason, where these two words occur together, the latter is pointed יְהוָה that it may be pronounced as אֱלֹהִים. In consequence of this usage, the proper pronunciation of יְהוָה has been entirely lost from traditional recollection, and can be recovered with probability only from etymological research.

JEHOVAH (יְהוָה), the proper and incommunicable name of the Most High God. As usually

1. Etymology of the word.—Passing over some fantastic and baseless conjectures on this head, we go at once to the passage in which we have what was undoubtedly regarded by the ancient Hebrews as the etymon of the word, Exod. iii. 14. In reply to the request of Moses that God would announce to him his name, 'God said unto Moses, I am that I am (אֲנִי אֲנִי אֲנִי); and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you.' Again, in ch. vi. 2, we read, 'And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am Jehovah (יְהוָה).' According to this the word must be referred to the substantive verb יהיה, of which the earlier form was יהוה; and of this יהוה would be the regular form of the third person sing. masc. of the future. In this case the punctuation would regularly be יְהוָה Yih'veh, or יְהוֹה Yehveh; and such is regarded by some as the original and proper pronunciation of the word. This etymology preserves the connection between the peculiar name of God and the name by which He told Moses He would be made known to the Israelites; and it falls in with the representation of Scripture that to be is the special characteristic of God (Ps. cii. 12, 26, 27; Is. xliii. 13; Rev. iv. 8, etc.) On this hypothesis also can be best accounted for the abbreviated forms of the word found in proper names, יהוה and יה; the h becomes ' as in יהוה for יהוה (Eccles. xi. 3), and after the elision of the He the Vau may easily assume the O sound; so also from יה is formed יה, as in the apocopate form יהי, and this in composition becomes יהי, as in יהושע (Fürst, H. W. B. in verb.) Gesenius and Ewald prefer to punctuate and pro-

* Among those of Israel who shall not obtain eternal life, Abba Shaul includes, 'Him who shall pronounce the name by its own letters' (Sanhedrin, ch. xi. sec. 1, in the edit. of the Mishna by Surenhusius, vol. iv. p. 159. Comp. Philo, De Vita Mosi; Theodoret, Quest. xv. in Exod.) This disuse of the word must have begun very early, as it is not employed in the LXX. or the Apocryphal writings. Jewish tradition states that in later times the name was pronounced in the temple only by the priest on pronouncing the blessing commanded by God in the law. According to Maimonides this usage terminated with Simon the Just, or, according to others, when the temple was destroyed. Cf. Drusii Tetragrammaton, in Reland's Decas Exercitationum Phil. de vera pronun. nominis Jehova.

nounce the word יהוה Yahveh; but the only reason apparently that can be produced for this is that Epiphanius gives 'Iaβé as the Hebrew name for God, and Theodoret (Quaest. in Exod. xv.), says that so the word was pronounced by the Samaritans; to which much importance cannot be attached, as we do not know what were the means of information possessed by these writers, as they partially contradict each other, and as other writers who have sought to express the Hebrew word in Greek letters have given it otherwise, ex. gr., 'Iaóv (Clemens Alex., Strom. v. p. 666), 'Ieúv (Porphy. ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. i. 9, 21), 'Iaú (Diodor. Sic. i. 94; Porphy. [quoting Sanchoniatho] ap. Theodoret Cur. Græc. Affect. ii. 28. 15, p. 77, ed. Gaisford; Origen, ad. Johan. i. 1; Euseb., Dem. Evang. x. p. 494, ed. Colon. 1688). Jerome gives it also (on Ps. viii. 2) as Jaho, for which we should probably read Jahvo. Irenæus (adv. Hæc. ii. 353) writes it Jaoth, where Knobel suggests that the θ in the Greek text probably was meant to represent the Heb. ה. These varieties have given ground for other modes of pointing and pronouncing the original word besides those above given. Thus several prefer יהוה Yahvah, where the hard sound of the Kamets, as usually pronounced by the Jews, passes into that of Cholem, and the word becomes Yah'voh, the form given by Jerome, and which Fürst regards as the form represented by the 'Ieúv of Porphyry (probably pronounced Yeuvo), as the יהו would become 'Ieu.

We are precluded from attaching much importance to these Greek representations of the Hebrew word, not only by the reasons above assigned, but by the consideration that it is by no means certain that the word was pronounced by all the Shemitic peoples alike, or that it was the same word which they have all sought to represent. Probably the 'Iaóv of Diodorus Siculus and others is rather יהו than יהוה, and 'Iaβé may have been the Samaritan pronunciation, while that of the Jews was different, as indeed Theodoret (loc. cit.) attests; or it may have been, as Knobel suggests, an unhebraic form given to the word from some confusion of the Hebrew name for God with the Phœnician God 'Iaó (see Mover's Phonizier, i. p. 539, ff.) If we hold fast the derivation of the word from יהו we can adopt only a form such as may be legitimately obtained from this stem. Now, neither יהוה Yahveh, nor יהוה Yahvah, meets this test. The same objection applies to יהוה Yahvoh, which Capellus suggests. The suggestion of Mercer and Cornelius a Lapide that we should point and read יהוה is not exposed to this objection; but it is to the objection that from this we could not get such an abbreviated form as the frequently recurring יהו in words like חלקיהו (Hilkiah), etc. Some have even sought to defend the common punctuation as that proper to the word; but that this is utterly untenable has been fully shewn by the writers whose treatises are collected by Reland; the fact that when יהוה and יהוה occur together the latter has the points belonging to Elohim is sufficient to refute it. Usage, however, has established a prerogative for the pronunciation Jehovah, and it would be pedantic now to employ any other (Reland, Decas Exercitationum philologicarum de vera pronuntiatione nominis Jehova, 1707).

2. Significance of the term.—If the etymology above indicated be adopted, this of itself will in great measure determine the meaning and force of the word. According to the analogy of futures used as proper names (comp. ירמו, ירמו, ירמו, etc.), it must be regarded as expressing the concentration, in the Being to whom it is applied, of the quality expressed by the simple verb; that is, in this case, the quality of being or existence. This term, therefore, as applied to God, intimates that to be is his peculiar characteristic; that He is in a sense in which no other being is; that He is self-existent, and cannot but be; that He is the source of all being, the unchangeable, infinite, eternal essence. With this explanation of the word all the passages in Scripture in which stress is laid on it as a designation of the Almighty accord. It is because this is his name that He changes not (Mal. iii. 6); that He is king of the whole earth, reigning for ever (Ps. x. 16; xcix. 1; cxlvi. 10); that He is the author of creation and the ruler of the universe (Amos v. 8; ix. 6; Ps. lxxviii. 4; Jer. xxxii. 27; comp. also the often recurring phrase יהוה צבאות, Lord of Hosts); that his people may with confidence call on Him as ever present and as having all things in his hand (Jer. xxxiii. 2; l. 33, 34); and that in this lies a security for his forgiving grace enduring from generation to generation (Exod. xxxiv. 5-7). Worthy of notice also is it, that the most solemn oath of the Jews was by Jehovah as the Living One (Jer. v. 2). In the opinion that in this lies the significance of the name, the ancient Jews and most scholars of eminence have concurred. R. Bechai (in Exod., fol. 65, col. 4, quoted by Buxtorf, Lexicon in verb.) says, 'The blessed God rules in the three times, past, present, and future, and the name alone (יהוה) embraces these three times;' and again, 'בשם המיוחד, in the appropriated name (יהוה) are comprehended these three times, as is known to all' (comp. also the Targum Jonathan on Exod. iii. 14); Buxtorf: Nomen Dei proprium ipsum ab essentia sua denominans, q. d. ens, existens ab æterno et in æternum; Hottinger: Nomen יהוה est essentiale, i. e. simplicissimum, infinitum et æternam Dei essentiam significantissime exprimit. 'The meaning,' says Knobel (Exeget. Hdb. s. Exod. p. 30), 'cannot be doubtful. The LXX. render אלהים אשר אלהים by ἐγώ εἰμι ὁ ὢν, and the following אלהים by ὁ ὢν, and the Greco-Venet. by ὁ ὄντων. Theodotion gives τὸ ὢν as the rendering of יהו. Hesychius explains ἀλληλοῦσα by αὐτος τὸ ὄντι αὐτὸς, and Theodoret (Quaest. ad Paralipom. l.) explains 'Iaó as meaning ὁ θεὸς ὢν, as also on Ps. cx. 1, יה א ὢν. Recent writers also, as Hitzig (on Is. i. 2) and Maurer (W. B.), embrace this meaning. Jehovah calls Himself THE BEING in contradistinction to the Gods of the nations, which, as gods, had no being, but were mere fictions and pretences, and therefore non-entities; He thus denotes Himself as the true and only God. Many regard this being as unchangeable and eternal (Gesén., Rosenm., Hengstenb., Reinke, Herder. Geist. der Eb. Poes. i. p. 108; Tuch. Genes. p. xxxv.; von Coelln. Bibl. Theol. i. p. 100), and accordingly give Eternal as its meaning. This is intimated already by the ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἔσθι καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος of Apoc. i. 4, 8, and the ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ of ch. xi. 17, and xvi. 5; also by the $\delta\omega\kappa\alpha\iota\delta\epsilon\pi\chi\beta\upsilon\epsilon\nu\omicron\varsigma$ of Clement, and the $\delta\epsilon\ \eta\nu\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\epsilon\iota\ \omega\kappa$ of Epiphanius; but how this idea lies in a derivative from יהוה, to be, does not appear' (Book cited, p. 30). The difficulty hinted at in this concluding clause may be easily obviated. If the tetragrammaton conveys the idea of absolute essence, then, as this is not separable either in reality or in thought from eternal self-existence, it must include also the latter. It has been objected to this, that the idea thus conveyed of God is too abstract to be suited to the genius of the ancient Hebrews. To meet this Gesenius has suggested (Thes. in voc.) that we may read the word יהוה as the fut. in

Hiphil = He who causes to be, the Creator. This is ingenious but purely conjectural, as the verb does not occur in the Hiphil; and besides the idea of creativeness does not predominate in the usages of the word. Havernick (Introd., p. 51, E. T.) says, 'this name denotes the essence of the Godhead in its concrete relation to mankind, the revelation of the living God Himself;' and again (p. 60), that 'it does not assign so much the abstract idea of eternal existence as that rather of the concrete existence of God, and his disposition towards Israel, his permanent relationship to them.' But, though it is as Jehovah that God enters into covenant relations with men, it does not follow from this that such is the meaning of the word; rather it is because He is Jehovah, the self-existent, that such relations subsist. The proper answer to the objection is that it proceeds on an assumption which is quite gratuitous; the ancient Hebrews were not so destitute of abstract notions as it presumes. Modern Jewish translators generally prefer a rendering equivalent to Eternal. Since the version of Olivetan all the French versions translate the word L'Eternel; some German versions follow this and give Der Ewige (see Bunsen, Bibelwerk, I. p. lxxxviii.) By some recent writers stress is laid on the fact of the future tense being used, and a meaning corresponding to this has been attached to the word. Thus Baumgarten says (Theol. Com. I. p. 410), 'We must go to יהוה from the words אֱלֹהִים אֲשֶׁר יֵהוֹוָה, and thus Jehovah is, as He Himself declares, the historical God, the God of Abraham. The reference becomes clear when with Aquila and Theodotion we give the mood its usual, i. e., futuritive meaning. Since the repetition of אֱלֹהִים cannot be tautological, we translate: I shall be who I will and should be ('Ich werde sein der ich sein will und soll'). We have thus here the reference to the promise to the fathers, which ever points to a future manifestation of Jehovah.' Delitzsch adopts substantially the same view (Genesis, p. 32): 'Creation,' says he, 'is the beginning, and the bringing of every thing created perfectly to its idea is the end. The kingdom of power must become the kingdom of glory. Between lies the kingdom of grace, a long history, whose essential content is Redemption. יהוה is the Lord who mediates the beginning and the end in the lapse of this history, in one word, God the Redeemer.' That the idea here suggested is substantially true cannot be questioned; God the everlasting is from that very fact God who is ever revealing Himself to His creatures, and in the sphere of this fallen world ever revealing Himself as the Restorer and Redeemer; but that his reason for taking to Himself the name Jehovah was to convey this truth, or that this is to be found in the futuristic form of the word seems altogether without ground.*

This idea has been carried still farther by Mr. Tyler (Jehovah the Redeemer God, etc., Lond. 1861), by Mr. Macwhorter (Biblioth. Sac., Jan. 1857), and by Mr. Macdonald (Introduction to the Pentateuch); by whom the term Jehovah is made to bear reference to the future manifestation of God the Saviour in Jesus Christ. What has been advanced in illustration of their view by these writers, contains much that is ingenious, interesting, and instructive; but their entire theory seems to us to want a basis in fact on which to rest. Mr. Macwhorter renders the exclamation of Eve on the birth of her son Cain, thus: 'I have gotten a man, even him who is to be' or 'to come;' with this Mr. Tyler substantially coincides, and on this their theory rests. Now, is such a rendering grammatically possible? Can a single instance be adduced of a verb not already recognised as a proper name being placed in apposition with a preceding clause by means of וְ? And, with respect to the whole class to which this view belongs, may we not ask whether it be not liable to the objection of conveying to us unworthy views of God, as if He, the immutable and eternal, should give as his peculiar name—the symbol conveying the true concept of Him—a word which expresses rather what He is to become, as manifested to men, than what He is in Himself?

On the whole, we accept as that best sustained, the old view, that by this name God would convey to us the idea that PURE BEING is his peculiar and characteristic quality.

3. Relation of Jehovah to Elohim.—As both of these are designations of the one God, it is not surprising that we should find sometimes the one, sometimes the other, and sometimes both together, used by the sacred writers. It is remarkable, however, that usually where the writer employs the one he does not in the same section or context employ the other. [See article GOD.] This has excited notice, and has led to much investigation, some contending that the use of the one term or the other is determined by the suitability of its significance to the subject of the context in which it occurs; others finding in the distinctive use of the terms traces and evidences of separate authorship of the sections; while others see in this nothing but one of the accidents of composition. This is not the place to enter fully into this subject, which will be better discussed where the question becomes one of practical value as bearing on the authenticity and integrity of certain books of Scripture; but a few general observations may not be out of place here.

1. The two first of the hypotheses just stated have been generally put forth as directly antagonist

* One may cite Delitzsch here against himself. Writing of nouns formed from the future (or as he calls it, the imperfect) of verbs, he says (Jaegoe in Gram. et Lex. Ling. Heb.), 'In nm. formandis ad habitum quondam, vel actionis vel status qui personæ vel rei inhaerescat significandum imperfecta verba adhiberi.' This is fully supported by the usage of the language; in all such nouns it is the eminence or predominance of the quality in the object, and not progressiveness or continued development of that quality, which the form of the word is designed to convey.

to each other. Should we not, however, rather say that both rest really on the same fundamental assumption—that, namely, of such a distinction in the meaning of the two terms as renders it proper that the one and not the other should be used in certain connections? This is avowedly the assumption of those who advocate the former of the two; but it is not less by implication involved in the latter. For if the difference of usage is traceable to difference of authorship, then as each author must have had a reason for preferring the one name to the other, and as the only reason that could have dictated such a preference is one arising from the signification of the word, we are as much on this hypothesis as on the other thrown back on the inquiry whether any such distinction of signification can be established as will account for the one name being used in any given connection rather than the other. We say the only reason that could have led different writers to use the one word rather than the other is such a distinctive difference of sense as rendered the one word proper and the other not in the connection; for to what else can the preference of the one to the other be referred? It cannot be pretended that both names were not equally familiar to every Hebrew writer; and if it be said that mere accident determined it, a cause is assumed which will account for the diversity as well on the hypothesis of one writer throughout, as on that of several; which is a virtual giving up of the latter hypothesis entirely. We conclude, then, that the assumption we have specified is essential to both hypotheses. The question thus comes to be, can such a distinction of meaning be established? That the two words in their primary etymological sense are distinguishable from each other lies on the surface; but this is not the question here. The question is, Are they so distinct that a correct writer would feel in some connections he could use only the one, and in other connections only the other? To this question no satisfactory answer has been yet given. Many suggestions have been offered as to the distinctive difference of the two words; but they can be regarded in no other light than as the a priori guesses of learned and ingenious men. As yet no attempt has been made to discover by a careful induction what is the conclusion which the usage of Scripture authorises on this point. 2. Sufficient care does not seem to have been taken to eliminate passages which can contribute nothing to the settlement of the question at issue—to ‘purge the instances,’ if we may use the language of Bacon. Of the many cases in which Elohim is used, a very large number prove nothing whatever as to any preference on the part of the writer for that name rather than Jehovah, simply because the grammatical conditions of the sentence preclude the use of a proper name such as Jehovah. In all cases, for instance, where a pronoun or adjective has to be used along with the appellation of God, the writer lies under a necessity of using Elohim and not Jehovah. On the other hand, there are cases where Jehovah could alone be used; as, for instance, when Jacob says (Gen. xxviii. 21), ‘then shall Jehovah be my God,’ or when Pharaoh asks (Exod. v. 2), ‘Who is Jehovah that I should obey his voice?’ or when Moses said to Pharaoh that he would pray Jehovah to send a judgment on him that he might know that the earth is Jehovah’s (Exod. ix. 29), or when Moses cried when he saw the people offering idolatrous homage to the calf, ‘Who is on the side of Jehovah?’ (Exod. xxxii. 26), and a multitude of similar instances, where from the very circumstances of the case only a proper name could be used. Such instances are obviously to be abstracted from; and when this is done with due care it will be found that a very large proportion of the cases in which either word is used is accounted for without the aid of either of the hypotheses above stated. 3. Due regard does not seem to have been paid to the bearing of exceptive cases on the question at issue. It is a rule of the inductive method that where any hypothesis is found irreconcilable with any ascertained fact, which, if true, it ought to embrace, it must be set aside as thereby invalidated: Data instantia cadit inductio. Now there are instances of the use both of Jehovah and of Elohim in the O. T. which cannot be brought under either of these hypotheses; and from this it follows that both are logically unsound; each involves the fallacy of an ‘undistributed middle.’ Such exceptional passages, for instance, in relation to the Document hypothesis are found in Gen. iv., which is said to be Jehovistic, but in which at ver. 25 we find Elohim used; in Gen. vi. 1-6, where Jehovah and Elohim are both used; in Gen. xx., where Elohim is chiefly used, but where in ver. 4 and ver. 18 we have Jehovah. Such instances are plainly utterly irreconcilable with the hypothesis of original Elohist documents with which Jehovistic documents have at a later period been interwoven. Equally irreconcilable with both hypotheses are those passages in which the narrative is plainly uniform and continuous, but where the Document hypothesis would require us violently to dislocate the whole, and where it is impossible to discover any such differences of reference and application in the portions where the two divine appellations are used respectively as a regard to the Sense hypothesis would demand. To this objection we have never seen a fair and tenable answer. It is easy to say the passages are interpolated, or to suggest the agency of a second, third, or seventh reviser; but to men of scientific habits of research such expedients only serve the more to condemn the hypothesis they are adopted to save. 4. It would be well before setting to work to frame hypotheses affecting the integrity and genuineness of the sacred books, were some attempt made to settle on a solid basis the criteria by which questions of this sort are to be determined. Especially in relation to such a case as that before us, it would be well to settle with some degree of precision, and by means of a large induction from the phenomena of literature, what kind and what degree of variety in phraseology and style afford a safe criterion of diversity of authorship. At present it seems to be chiefly the critic’s own subjectivity that determines his conclusion; the consequence of which is that different men arrive at conflicting conclusions, all of which are alike without any solid ground on which they can be rested. It would be well, before we dispute further on such points, that some organon of the higher criticism were in recognised use among critics.

These remarks are designed to point towards the desirableness of a reconsideration of the subject of the relation of Elohim to Jehovah in the usage of the sacred writers, from a more strictly scientific point of view than has hitherto been assumed. Learning has done its utmost in regard to this matter; all the facts of the case have been collected and elucidated by scholars of the first eminence; it is only from a juster application of the method of scientific investigation to these facts that any further light can be hoped for. As things stand now the prevalence of the one term in a context rather than the other can be regarded in no other light than as one of those accidents of composition for which we are unable to account.

4. It yet remains to inquire at what time 'Jehovah' became known as the proper appellation of God. Here the question resolves itself very much into an inquiry into the meaning of Exod. vi. 3. Is this to be regarded as intimating the first revelation of the name as a name? or is the import of the statement that though the patriarchs before this time may have known the word as a designation of God, they had not had the means of realising the full meaning of the appellation—that not before this had all which lies involved concerning God in that word been fully made known to them. The former of these views is probably that which the first reading of the passage would suggest; but it is exposed to such serious difficulties that it seems untenable. How on this view are we to account for such a statement as that in Gen. iv. 1, that in Gen. vi. 26, that in Gen. xii. 8, and many similar passages? To say that in these passages the word is used by prolepsis, is to resort to a very arbitrary and violent expedient for escaping from a difficulty. In such a proper name also as Moriah (מֹרְיָה), we have evidence of early acquaintance with the name Jehovah; while from the name of the mother of Moses, Jochbed (יֹכְבֵד), we learn that among his maternal ancestry this name was known. In the family of Jacob also we have such names as Ahijah and Abiah (Abijah), to which may be added the names of the two wives of Ezra or Ezer, Hodiah and Bithiah (1 Chron. ii. 25; vii. 8; iv. 18), all indicating a familiarity with the peculiar name of God before the time of Moses. In the face of these facts, the opinion that the name Jehovah was for the first time made known to Moses on the occasion referred to cannot be retained. Adopting the other view, the statement 'by my name Jehovah was I not known to thee' is best explained by a reference to Exod. xxxiii. 19, Ps. lxxvi. 1, etc. (Hengstenberg, Die Auth. des Pentateuch, i. 268, ff.; Kurz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, ii., p. 98, 215; Delitzsch, Genesis, p. 26). 'The name Jehovah,' says Kurz, 'was (or rather became) undoubtedly a new one then, but only in the sense in which Christ said (John xiii. 34) 'a new commandment give I unto you'; whereas he merely repeated one of the primary commandments which we find in the O. T., and meet with on every hand in the laws of Moses. It was a commandment, however, the fulness and depth, the meaning, force, and value of which were first unfolded by the Gospel. And just as the greatest act of love which the world ever witnessed provided a new field for the exemplification of this command in greater glory than was possible under the law, and thus the old commandment became a new one; so did the new act of God in the redemption of Israel from Egypt furnish a new field in which the ancient name of God struck fresh and deeper roots, and thus the ancient name became a new one.'

5. Attempts have been made by some to find a heathen origin for the name Jehovah; but the futility of these have been so amply exposed, and the hypothesis is now so generally repudiated by scholars, that it seems needless to occupy space by detailing them (see Tholuck, Ueb. die Hypothese des Ursprungs des Namens Jehovah aus Aegypten Phœnicien oder Indien in his Verm. Schriften, i. 377-405; Gesenius, Thes., s. v.)

6. In composition the word יהוה is abbreviated into יהו Jeho, יי Ji, יי Ji, יהו Jahu. The name יה, Jah, is also an abbreviation of the telegraphmaton, chiefly used in poetry and in devotional ejaculations.

The name appears entire also in some proper names, viz.—

JEHOVAH JIREH (יהוה יֵרֵא), the name given by Abraham to the place where the angel of the Lord appeared to him when about to offer up his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 14). The words mean 'Jehovah will see,' i. e., see to something, provide for it; and have evident allusion to ver. 8, where, in answer to Isaac's question, Abraham says, 'My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering.' The name thus given to the place did not continue, but seems to have given place to Moriah (מֹרְיָה = מִרְיָה, sheum of Jehovah, the place indicated by Him), which was probably also the earlier name (ver. 2). The circumstance, however, gave rise to a proverb, 'In the mountain of Jehovah it will be seen,' i. e., foreseen, provided for; so that it became a belief among the Jews that, in the place which God had pointed out as his holy mountain, the place where He would be worshipped, there should be provision for the guidance of his people; the place of worship should be the place of revelation. Mount Moriah became in after times the site of the Temple (2 Chron. iii. 1); and then did these earlier intimations receive their full accomplishment; in the place where sacrifice could alone be made Jehovah revealed Himself, and men knew that they might come and inquire in his holy temple. The LXX. render this clause by ἐν ᾧ ὁ θεὸς κύριος ὁφείλει, which would indicate that they read the text כֹּה־יֵרֵא יהוה, 'in the mountain Jehovah was seen.'

JEHOVAH NISSI (יהוה נִסִּי, Jehovah my banner), the name given by Moses to an altar which he erected in celebration of the great victory obtained by the Israelites over the Amalekites (Exod. xvii. 15). The design of this erection is stated in ver. 16, the meaning of which is very imperfectly brought out in the A. V. The literal rendering is, 'And he said, For a hand upon the throne (כַּסֵּא, καθ᾽ ἑλγόμενον) of Jah, war to Jehovah with Amalek, from generation to generation.' Hand (יָד) may be taken here either as the symbol of an oath (comp. Gen. xiv. 22), or in the sense of memorial (1 Sam. xv. 12; Is. lvi. 5). Luther adopts the latter sense, and renders, 'Es ist ein Malzeichen bey dem Stuhl des Herrn.' If the conjectural emendation of Le Clerc, נִסִּי for כַּסֵּא, be adopted, the meaning may be, 'The hand upon the banner,' etc., i. e., Let not the banner of Jehovah be ever furled as if peace had come, but let there be war, etc.

JEHOVAH SHALOM (יהוה שָׁלוֹם, J. is peace), the name given by Gideon to an altar which he had erected to commemorate the appearance to him of the angel of the Lord who commissioned him to deliver Israel from the Midianites, and who, when Gideon was alarmed on discovering with whom he had been conversing, assuaged his fears by saying, 'Peace be with thee' (Judg. vi. 11-24). This altar was erected at Ophrah of the Abiezites, so designated to distinguish it from Ophrah in Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17); and which is afterwards called Gideon's city (Judg. viii. 27). [OPHRAH.]

JEHOVAH SHAMMAH (יְהוָה שָׁמָּה, Jehovah is there), the name of the future Jerusalem, the church of God (Ezek. xlvi. 35). Hävernick, following Hengstenberg (Christology, i. 257, E. T.), contends that שָׁמָּה properly means thither, and remarks that 'here this meaning is alone appropriate, for Jehovah dwells not in Jerusalem properly, but in the strictest and highest sense in his sanctuary. Thence He looks forth on Jerusalem, thitherward He turns, that is, with the fulness of his grace and love. What makes Jerusalem a true city of God is the fully-turned love of God on her, his pleasure resting on her; in which complete communion with God, her sure defence, her eternal continuance, is firmly secured' (Comment, p. 746).

JEHOVAH TSIDQENU (יְהוָה צִדְקֵנוּ), the name that shall be given to a king whom God will raise up to David (Jer. xxiii. 6). That the king so promised is the Messiah, is the opinion of all the best interpreters, Jewish and Christian; but all are not agreed as to the meaning of the appellation. By some it is regarded as ascribing to the Messiah the name Jehovah, and asserting that He is or brings righteousness to man; while others think that the appellation here given to the Messiah is, like that given by Moses to the altar he erected, and which he called Jehovah-Nissi, simply a concise utterance of the faith of Israel, that by means of the Messiah God will cause righteousness to flourish. The strongest argument in favour of the latter is derived from Jer. xxxiii. 16, where the same name is given to the city of Jerusalem, and where it can only receive such an explanation. JEHOZABAB (יְהוֹזָבָב). 1. (Sept. Ἰωζαβὰβ; Alex. Ἰωζαβὰδ). One of the sons of Obbedom, to whom was intrusted the care of the council chamber connected with the temple (בֵּית אֲסָפִים), Beyth-Asuppim, the house of the gatherings; LXX. οἶκος Ἐσέφου; A. V. House of Asuppim, 1 Chron. xxvii. 4, 15). 2. (Sept. Ἰωζαβὰδ; Joseph. Ὀζαβάρως). One of the captains of Jehoshaphat, who had under him 180,000 men of the tribe of Benjamin (2 Chron. xvii. 18). 3. (Sept. Ἰεζεβοὺθ, Ἰωζαβὰδ). The son of Shomer or Shmirith, a Moabitess who conspired with Jozachar or Zabad, the son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess, to slay Joash king of Judah (2 Kings xii. 21; 2 Chron. xxiv. 26). —W. L. A.

JEHOZADAK (יְהוֹזָדָק, Jehovah is righteous; Sept. Ἰωσαδάκ, Ἰωσεδάκ; Josedec), the son of Seraiah, the last high-priest who ministered in Solomon's temple. Although he succeeded to the high-priesthood after the slaughter of his father at Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 18-21), he had no opportunity of performing the functions of his office (Selden, De success. in Pont., Op. ii. 104). He was carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron. vi. 15); and evidently died in exile, as on the return from the captivity his son Joshua is mentioned as the high-priest (Ezra iii. 2). In our A. V. the name appears in three forms: Jehozadak, 1 Chron. vi. 15; Jozadak throughout Ezra and Nehemiah; Josedech in Haggai and Zechariah. —H. C. G.

JEHU (יְהוּ, Jehovah is; Sept. Ἰού; Cod. Alex. Εἰηού), tenth king of Israel, and founder of its fourth dynasty, who began to reign in B.C. 884, and reigned twenty-eight years.

Jehu held a command in the Israelite army posted at Ramoth Gilead to hold in check the Syrians, who of late years had made strenuous efforts to extend their frontier to the Jordan, and had possessed themselves of much of the territory of the Israelites east of that river. The contest was in fact still carried on which had begun many years before in the reign of Ahab, the present king's father, who had lost his life in battle before this very Ramoth Gilead. Ahaziah, king of Judah, had taken part with Joram, king of Israel, in this war; and as the latter had been severely wounded in a recent action, and had gone to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds, Ahaziah had also gone thither on a visit of sympathy to him.

In this state of affairs a council of war was held among the military commanders in camp, when very unexpectedly one of the disciples of the prophets, known for such by his garb, appeared at the door of the tent, and called forth Jehu, declaring that he had a message to deliver to him. He had been sent by Elisha the prophet, in discharge of a duty which long before had been confided by the Lord to Elijah (1 Kings xix. 16), and from him had devolved on his successor. When they were alone the young man drew forth a horn of oil and poured it upon Jehu's head, with the words, 'Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord, even over Israel. And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master, that I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel' (2 Kings ix. 7, 8). Surprising as this message must have been, and awful the duty which it imposed, Jehu was fully equal to the task and the occasion. He returned to the council, probably with an altered air, for he was asked what had been the communication of the young prophet to him. He told them plainly; and they were obviously ripe for defection from the house of Ahab, for they were all delighted at the news, and taking him in triumph to 'the top of the stairs,' they spread their mantles beneath his feet, and proclaimed him king by sound of trumpet in the presence of all the troops.

Jehu was not a man to lose any advantage through remissness. He immediately entered his chariot, in order that his presence at Jezreel should be the first announcement which Joram could receive of this revolution.

As soon as the advance of Jehu and his party was seen in the distance by the watchmen upon the palace-tower in Jezreel, two messengers were successively sent forth to meet him, and were commanded by Jehu to follow in his rear. But when the watchman reported that he could now recognise the furious driving of Jehu, Joram went forth himself to meet him, and was accompanied by the king of Judah. They met in the field of Naboth, so fatal to the house of Ahab. The king saluted him with 'Is it peace, Jehu?' and received the answer, 'What peace, so long as the whoredoms (idolatries) of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?' This completely opened the eyes of Joram, who exclaimed to the king of Judah, 'There is treachery, O Ahaziah!' and turned to flee. But Jehu felt no infirmity of purpose, and knew that the slightest wavering might be fatal to him. He therefore drew a bow with his full strength and sent forth an arrow which passed through the king's heart. Jehu caused the body to be thrown back into the field of Naboth, out of which he had passed in his attempt at flight, and grimly remarked to Bidkar his captain, 'Remember how that, when I and thou rode together after Ahab his father, the Lord laid this burden upon him.' The king of Judah contrived to escape, but not without a wound, of which he afterwards died at Megiddo [AHAZIAH]. Jehu then entered the city, whither the news of this transaction had already preceded him. As he passed under the walls of the palace Jezebel herself, studiously arrayed for effect, appeared at one of the windows, and saluted him with a question such as might have shaken a man of weaker nerves, 'Had Zimri peace who slew his master?' But Jehu was unmoved, and instead of answering her, called out, 'Who is on my side, who?' when several eunuchs made their appearance at the window, to whom he cried, 'Throw her down!' and immediately this proud and guilty woman lay a blood-stained corpse in the road, and was trodden under foot by the horses [JEZEBEL]. Jehu then went in and took possession of the palace.

He was now master of Jezreel, which was, next to Samaria, the chief town of the kingdom; but he could not feel secure while the capital itself was in the hands of the royal family, and of those who might be supposed to feel strong attachment to the house of Ahab. The force of the blow which he had struck was, however, felt even in Samaria. When therefore he wrote to the persons in authority there the somewhat ironical but designedly intimidating counsel, to set up one of the young princes in Samaria as king and fight out the matter which lay between them, they sent a very submissive answer, giving in their adhesion, and professing their readiness to obey in all things his commands. A second letter from Jehu tested this profession in a truly horrid and exceedingly Oriental manner, requiring them to appear before him on the morrow, bringing with them the heads of all the royal princes in Samaria. A fallen house meets with little pity in the East; and when the new king left his palace the next morning, he found seventy human heads piled up in two heaps at his gate. There, in the sight of these heaps, Jehu took occasion to explain his conduct, declaring that he must be regarded as the appointed minister of the divine decrees, pronounced long since against the house of Ahab by the prophets, not one of whose words should fall to the ground. He then continued his prescriptions by exterminating in Jezreel not only all in whose veins the blood of the condemned race flowed, but also—by a considerable stretch of his commission—those officers, ministers, and creatures of the late government, who, if suffered to live, would most likely be disturbers of his own reign. He then proceeded to Samaria. So rapid had been these proceedings that he met some of the nephews of the king of Judah, who were going to join their uncle at Jezreel, and had as yet heard nothing of the revolution which had taken place. These also perished under Jehu's now fully-awakened thirst for blood, to the number of forty-two persons.

On the way he took up into his chariot the pious Jehonadab the Rechabite, whose austere virtue and respected character would, as he felt, go far to hallow his proceedings in the eyes of the multitude. At Samaria he continued the extirpation of the persons more intimately connected with the late government. This, far from being in any way singular, is a common circumstance in eastern revolutions. But the great object of Jehu was to exterminate the ministers and more devoted adherents of Baal, who had been much encouraged by Jezebel. There was even a temple to this idol in Samaria; and Jehu, never scrupulous about the means of reaching objects which he believed to be good, laid a snare by which he hoped to cut off the main body of Baal's ministers at one blow. He professed to be a more zealous servant of Baal than Ahab had been, and proclaimed a great festival in his honour, at which none but his true servants were to be present. The prophets, priests, and officers of Baal assembled from all parts for this great sacrifice, and sacerdotal vestments were given to them, that none of Jehovah's worshippers might be taken for them. When the temple was full, soldiers were posted so that none might escape; and so soon as the sacrifice had been offered, the word was given by the king, the soldiers entered the temple, and put all the worshippers to the sword. The temple itself was then demolished, the images overthrown, and the site turned into a common jakes.

Notwithstanding this zeal of Jehu in exterminating the grosser idolatries which had grown up under his immediate predecessors, he was not prepared to subvert the policy which had led Jeroboam and his successors to maintain the schismatic establishment of the golden calves in Dan and Beth-el. The grounds of this policy are explained in the article JEROBOAM, a reference to which will shew the grounds of Jehu's hesitation in this matter. This was, however, a crime in him—the worship rendered to the golden calves being plainly contrary to the law; and he should have felt that He who had appointed him to the throne would have maintained him in it, notwithstanding the apparent dangers which might seem likely to ensue from permitting his subjects to repair at the great festivals to the metropolis of the rival kingdom, which was the centre of the theocratical worship and of sacerdotal service. Here Jehu fell short: and this very policy, apparently so prudent and far-sighted, by which he hoped to secure the stability and independence of his kingdom, was that on account of which the term of rule granted to his dynasty was shortened.

For this, it was foretold that his dynasty should extend only to four generations; and for this, the divine aid was withheld from him in his wars with the Syrians under Hazael on the eastern frontier. Hence the war was disastrous to him, and the Syrians were able to maintain themselves in the possession of a great part of his territories beyond the Jordan. He died in B.C. 856, and was buried in Samaria, leaving the throne to his son Jehoahaz.

There is nothing difficult to understand in the character of Jehu. He was one of those decisive, terrible, and ambitious, yet prudent, calculating, and passionless men, whom God from time to time raises up to change the fate of empires and execute his judgments on the earth. He boasted of his zeal—'come and see my zeal for the Lord'—but at the bottom it was zeal for Jehu. His zeal was great so long as it led to acts which squared with his own interests, but it cooled marvellously when required to take a direction in his judgment less favourable to them. Even his zeal in extirpating the idolatry of Baal is not free from suspicion. The altar of Baal was that which Ahab had associated with his throne, and in overturning the latter he could not prudently let the former stand, surrounded as it was by attached adherents of the house which he had extirpated (2 Kings ix. x.)

2. The son of Hanani, a prophet, who was sent to pronounce upon Baasha, king of Israel, and his house, the same awful doom which had been already executed upon the house of Jeroboam (1 Kings xvi. 1-7). The same prophet was, many years after, commissioned to reprove Jehoshaphat for his dangerous connection with the house of Ahab (2 Chron. xix. 2).—J. K.

JEHUD (יְהוּד; Sept. 'Aḡúp; Alex. 'Ιουῦθ), a town pertaining to Dan. It is not noticed in the Onomasticon; but it has been conjecturally identified with a village called d'Yehudijeh, about five miles to the north of Lydd (Robinson, B. R., iii. 45; Van de Velde's map).—†

JEHUDAH B. BALAAM. [IBN BALAAM.]

JEHUDAH B. DAVID. [CHAJUG.]

JEHUDAH B. KOREISH. [IBN KOREISH.]

JEHUDAH (ARJE LOEB) B. ZEBI (HIRSH), was born at Krotoschin about 1680, and afterwards became rabbi at Carpentras and Avignon. He wrote

(1) A Hebrew Lexicon, entitled אוֹרֵי יְהוּדָה, the tents of Judah, which consists of two parts; the first part, called שֵׁם עוֹלָם, the everlasting name, treats especially upon proper names; the second part, denominated יְרֵשׁ וְשֵׁם, place and name, takes up the words omitted in the first part. This work partakes of the nature of a concordance as well as of a lexicon, inasmuch as it gives the places in Scripture in which every word is to be found. It was printed in Jesnitz 1719. (2) A Hebrew

Grammar, called חֵלֶק יְהוּדָה, the portion of Judah; of this work the introduction only, called יסוד לשון הקודש, the foundation of the Sacred Language, has been published, Wilmersdorf 1721; it contains fifteen canons and paradigms, with a German translation; and (3) A Concordance, entitled נֹעַ יְהוּדָה, the stem of Judah, it only goes as far as the root

JEHUDAH (LEV.) DE MODENA. [MODENA.]

JEHUDAH HA-LEVI B. SAMUEL, called in Arabic ABULHASSAN, by Ibn Ezra and other Jewish writers יְהוּדָה הַלֵּוִי הַסְפָּרָדִי. This distinguished Hebraist, poet, and moral philosopher, was born in Castile about 1086, and displayed his mastery of the Hebrew language as well as his great poetical genius at the early age of fourteen or fifteen (circa 1100), when he wrote at Lucena some charming songs to celebrate the nuptials of his friends Ibn Migash and the birth of Baruch Ibn Albalia's first son. He spent his manhood at Toledo, where he founded a college, and had many disciples. Here he issued those sacred and secular poems in Hebrew which are to the present day the pride of Israel; and here too he laboured at and completed in his fifty-fifth year (circa 1141) that remarkable apology of the Jewish religion commonly called Cusari (כּוֹזָרִי), more properly Khozari, which he published in Arabic under the title of כְּתָאב אֱלֵחָנָה וְאֶלְלִיל מִי נֹכַר אֱלֵלִיל אֶלְלִיל, the book of evidence and argument in apology of the despised religion, i.e., of Judaism, in reply to some of his disciples who asked him how he justified Rabbinic Judaism, and repelled the objections brought against it by philosophers, Mohammedans, Christians, and Karaites. To understand the nature of this most important work, which created a new epoch in Jewish literature, it is necessary to remark that it is founded upon the conversion of the King of Khozars to Judaism. The Khozars, a Finnish tribe, related to the Bulgarians, Avarians, and Ugrians, or Hungarians, settled down on the boundaries of Asia and Europe, and founded a dominion on the mouth of the Volga on the Caspian Sea, in the neighbourhood of Astrachan. After the destruction of the Persian empire, they invaded the Caucasus, made inroads into Armenia, conquered the Crimea, exacted tribute from the Byzantine emperors, made vassals of the Bulgarians, etc., and compelled the Russians to send annually to their kings a sword and a costly fur. Like their neighbours, the Bulgarians and Russians, they followed a species of idolatry which was connected with gross sensuality and licentiousness, but became acquainted with Christianity and Mohammedanism, through commercial intercourse with the Greeks and Arabs, and with Judaism through the Greek Jews who fled from the religious persecutions of the Byzantine emperor Leo (A.D. 723). The Jews who found refuge in the Khozarian dominions soon distinguished themselves as merchants, physicians, and councillors of state; and so great was the admiration of the Khozars for the Jewish religion when contrasted with the then corrupt Christianity and Mohammedanism, that King Bulan, the officials of state, and the majority of the people embraced Judaism, A.D. 731.* Now it is upon this fact that Jehudah Ha-

* This most important fact in Jewish history, which has only lately been established beyond the shadow of a doubt (comp. Vivien de St. Martin, Les Khasars, mémoire lu à l'academie des inscriptions et des belles lettres, Paris 1851; Caismoly

Levi based his work. He represents this King of Khozaris as being shaken in his idolatry, and earnestly desirous to find the true religion, for which cause he sends for two philosophers, a Christian and a Mohammedan, listens to the expositions of their respective creeds, and as they all refer to the Jews as the fountain head, he at last sends for an Israelite to propound his religious tenets, becomes convinced of their divine origin, and embraces the Jewish religion. What makes this work so important to the Biblical student, is the fact, that in the course of these discussions all subjects bearing upon the exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures, Jewish literature, history, philosophy, etc., are in turn reviewed. Thus, for instance, synagogal service, feasts, fasts, sacrifices, the Sanhedrim, the development of the Talmud, the Massora, the vowel points, the Karaites, etc., etc., are all minutely discussed in this work, which De Sacy has pronounced to be one of the most valuable and beautiful productions of the Jewish pen. It is to this work that Ibn Ezra frequently refers (comp. commentaries on Exod. iv. 10; ix. 1; xiii. 11; xxiv. 11; xxvii. 3; Deut. xiv. 20; xxvi. 17; xxix. 19; xxxiii. 5; Zech. viii. 4; Ps. xviii. 5; xxx. 8; xlix. 21; lxxiii. 25; lxxxii. 8; cxxxix. 14; cl. 1; Dan. ix. 1), and to which Kimchi alludes in his Lexicon, art. לָחַק. It was translated into Hebrew by Jehudah Ibn Tibbon, who named it סֵפֶר הַכּוֹזָרִי, the book of Khozari, after the hero of it, and it was first published in Fano 1506, then in Venice 1547, with an introduction and commentary by Muscato, Venice 1594; with a Latin translation and dissertations by Jo. Buxtorf, fil., Basle 1660; a Spanish translation by Abendana without the Hebrew text, Amsterdam 1663; with a commentary by Satorow, Berlin 1795; with a commentary, various readings, index, etc., by G. Brecher, Prague 1838-1840; and lastly, with a German translation, explanatory notes, etc., by Dr. David Cassel, Leipzig 1853, which is the most useful edition.

After finishing this gigantic work (circa 1141), Jehudah Ha-Levi was seized with a longing desire to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, set sail for Egypt, accompanied by some of his disciples, wrote some sublime hymns when tossed on the sea, was obliged to take refuge in Alexandria in consequence of a great storm, went to Egypt (1142) in accordance with the entreaties of Samuel Ha-Nagid, the celebrated philosopher and philologist, who was at that time the prince of the Jewish community in the land of their former bondage, then wrote at Damascus his celebrated elegy on Zion צִיּוֹן הָלֵא תִשָּׁאֵל, at the recital of which in the synagogue, in the month of Ab, when the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus is commemorated, every Jewish heart is filled with the deepest emotions; and died, most probably without seeing the land of his fathers. The year of his death and the place of his burial are alike unknown. Tradition says that he was murdered by an Arab as he was lying on his face under the walls of Jerusalem and mourning over the ruins of Zion; and that he was buried at Kephrah Kabul. Comp. JEHUDIJAH (יְהוּדִיָּה), 'Aḏia; Alex. 'Idia; Ju-daia). Though this appears as a proper name in the E. V., 1 Chron. iv. 18, as well as in the LXX., there can be little doubt that it is really an appellative, and should be translated 'the Jewess,' as in the margin. The same person is perhaps intended by 'Hodiah,' E. V. (Idovia, Odaia), in ver. 19, where the Alexandrine copy of the LXX. renders it ἡ ἑβραῖος τῆς Ἰουδαίας. The whole genealogy, vers. 17-19, appears to be so dislocated and corrupt that it is almost impossible to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion. It would however become intelligible and consistent with itself if we supposed that Mered the son of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah, had two wives, one an Egyptian, 'Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh,' ver. 18 (for though the difficulty in the way of supposing a daughter of the royal house of Egypt to have become the wife of an Israelite is considerable, it is utterly improbable that the title 'Pharaoh' should have been borne as a proper name by a Hebrew), and the other a Jewess. The sons of the Egyptian wife we may conceive to be given by the latter clause of ver. 17. Adopting the conjecture of Michaelis (accepted by Bertheau, Chronik, p. 41) that the closing words of ver. 18, 'And these are the sons of Bithiah,' etc., should be read before 'And she bare Miriam,' etc., ver. 17, the remaining portions of vers. 18, 19, would then define the Jewish wife by the mention of her brother Naham, the father of the inhabitants of Keilah and Esh-temoa, and name her sons, Jered, Heber, and Jekuthiel [BITHIAH; HODIAH.]

It may be remarked that Bertheau argues against identifying Hodiah, ver. 19, with Jehudijah, ver. 18, regarding it as the name of a man, and reading the sons of the wife of Hodiah, 'which wife was the sister of Naham,' etc. Vatablus in loc. adopts the view that they were the same.—E. V.

JEKABZEEL (יְכָאֲבָזֵאֵל), Neh. xi. 20. [KARZEEL.]

JEKUTHIEL (יְכֻתִּיֵּאל), God is my hope; LXX. Ἰεκθυήλ, Xerthā; Vulg. Icuthiel), a proper name occurring 1 Chron. iv. 18. This passage, as it now stands, is in utter confusion. To remedy this, Michaelis and others have proposed to transfer the last clause of ver. 18 to the middle of ver. 17, which in some measure answers the purpose. Jekuthiel then appears as the son of Mered by Jehudijah, or rather, the Jewess, to distinguish her from Mered's other wife, Bithiah, a daughter of Pharaoh (see BITHIAH). Yet, much as this conjectural emendation helps to clear the passage, it is not wholly satisfactory, for it still leaves the 19th verse isolated and meaningless. The probability is, that the words Bithiah and Mered have fallen out of the text in ver. 17; which being supplied before 'Miriam,' the confusion is removed, and any disturbance of the text rendered unnecessary—'And Bithiah bore to Mered,' etc. Then his Jewish wife and children are named, after which the annalist adds the latter part of the 18th and 19th verses as an emphatic repetition.*

The Targum of Rabbi Joseph on Chronicles makes Jekuthiel to be Moses. The passage is so curious as to deserve transcription:—'And his wife (Ezra's) brought up Moses when he was drawn out of the water, and called his name Jered, because he made manna to descend for Israel; Prince of Gedor, because he restored (or built up) the desolation of Israel; and Cheber, because he united Israel to their Father who is in heaven; Prince of Socho, because he overshadowed the house of Israel with his justice (or purity); and JEKUTHIEL, because Israel waited on the God of heaven in his days forty years in the wilderness; Prince of Zanoach, because God remitted the sins of Israel for his sake. By these names the daughter of Pharaoh called him, in the spirit of prophecy, for she became a proselyte, and Mered took her to himself for a wife. This is Caleb, so called, because he opposed the purpose or counsel of the spies.'

In the prayers of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, a curious reference to Jekuthiel occurs:—'O may Elijah the prophet come to us speedily, with Messiah, the son of David, to whom tidings of peace were delivered by the hand of Jekuthiel' (Allen's Mod. Jud., p. 229, 2d ed.)—I. J.

JEKUTHIEL B. ISAAC BLITZ (יְקוּתִּיאֵל בֶּן יִצְחָק בליץ), also called by his father's name only, Isaac Blitz, was corrector of the press at the printing establishment of Uri Phöbus, and has the honour of being the first Jew who translated the whole O. T. into German. It was published under the title תנ"ך בלשון אשכנז, the four-and-twenty books translated into German, with תועלות הרלב"ג (Rabbi's Usus on Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, and a threefold introduction, viz., a Hebrew introduction by the translator, a Latin diploma from the Polish king John Sobieski III., a Judæo-German introduction by Uri Phöbus, the publisher, and a German introduction by the translator, Amsterdam 1676-1678. JEKUTHIEL B. JEHUDAH COHEN, also called Salman Nakdon, i. e., the Punctuator, and by contraction Iehavi (יְהוֹבִי = יהודה בן יהודה), a distinguished Massorite and editor of the Hebrew Scriptures, who flourished in Prague about A.D. 1250-1300. He edited a very correct text of the Pentateuch and the Book of Esther, with the vowels and accents, and used, in preparing it, six old Spanish codices, which he denominates א"ז, א"ט, א"ח, א"ב, א"ק, ת"א, and which Heidenheim explains to mean קדמון, חשוב, מסוריות, טוב, זקן, תיקון אחד, the prefix א denoting Spain (comp. on Num. xxxiv. 28). Jekuthiel embodied the results of his critical labours in a work which he called עין קורא, the eye of the reader, and in which he quotes Ben-Naphtali, Ben-Asher, Chajug, Ibn Ganach, Ibn Ezra, Parchon, Tam, Samuel, etc., as well as the book הוריות הקורא, by an anonymous writer. Connected with this is a grammatical treatise, denominated דרכי הנקוד or כללי הנקוד, the laws of the vowel points, which is divided into sections (שערים), treating upon the quiescent letters (שער נוח התיבות), the vowels (שער הניקוד), the Dagesh (שער הדיגש), the accents (שער מצב הניגונים), the heavy and light Metheg (שער

JENNINGS, DAVID, D.D., an eminent Dissenting minister and tutor, son of one of the ejected Nonconformists, was born at Kibworth, Leicester, in 1691, and died in 1762. He studied under Dr. Chauncy in London; and after certain minor appointments, became assistant pastor of the Congregational Church of Old Gravel Lane, Wapping, where he continued forty years. In 1740 he wrote against Dr. Taylor in defence of original sin. In 1744 he was appointed theological tutor in Coward's College, in which office he exhibited great adaptation for his work, and had great success. In 1747 the university of St. Andrews conferred on him the degree of D.D. His principal work, and the only one which here requires notice, is—Jewish Antiquities; or a Course of Lectures on the Three First Books of Godwin's Moses and Aaron. To which is annexed a Dissertation on the Hebrew Language, 2 vols. 8vo, 1766. It is divided into three books, treating respectively of persons, places, and times. JEPHTHAH (יִפְתָּח, opener; Sept. Ἰεφθάς), ninth judge of Israel, of the tribe of Manasseh. He was the son of a person named Gilead by a concubine. After the death of his father he was expelled from his home by the envy of his brothers, who refused him any share of the heritage, and he withdrew to the land of Tob, beyond the frontier of the Hebrew territories. It is clear that he had before this distinguished himself by his daring character and skill in arms; for no sooner was his withdrawal known than a great number of men of desperate fortunes repaired to him, and he became their chief. His position was now very similar to that of David when he withdrew from the court of Saul. To maintain the people who had thus linked their fortunes with his, there was no other resource than that sort of brigandage which is accounted honourable in the East, so long as it is exercised against public or private enemies, and is not marked by needless cruelty and outrage. Even our different climate and manners afford some parallel in the Robin Hoods of former days; in the border forays, when England and Scotland were ostensibly at peace; and—in principle, however great the formal difference—in the authorised and popular piracies of Drake, Raleigh, and the other naval heroes of the Elizabethan era. So Jephthah confined his aggressions to the borders of the small neighbouring nations, who were in some sort regarded as the natural enemies of Israel, even when there was no actual war between them.

Jephthah led this kind of life for some years, during which his dashing exploits and successful enterprises procured him a higher military reputation than any other man of his time enjoyed. The qualities required to ensure success in such operations were little different from those required in actual warfare, as warfare was conducted in the East before fire-arms came into general use; and hence the reputation which might be thus acquired was more truly military than is easily conceivable by modern and occidental readers.

After the death of Jair the Israelites gradually fell into their favourite idolatries, and were punished by subjection to the Philistines on the west of the Jordan, and to the Ammonites on the east of that river. The oppression which they sustained for eighteen years became at length so heavy that they recovered their senses and returned to the God of their fathers with humiliation and tears; and he was appeased, and promised them deliverance from their affliction (B.C. 1143).

The tribes beyond the Jordan having resolved to oppose the Ammonites, Jephthah seems to occur to every one as the most fitting leader. A deputation was accordingly sent to invite him to take the command. After some demur, on account of the treatment he had formerly received, he consented. The rude hero commenced his operations with a degree of diplomatic consideration and dignity for which we are not prepared. The Ammonites being assembled in force for one of those ravaging incursions by which they had repeatedly desolated the land, he sent to their camp a formal complaint of the invasion, and a demand of the ground of their proceeding. This is highly interesting, because it shows that even in that age a cause for war was judged necessary—no one being supposed to war without provocation; and in this case Jephthah demanded what cause the Ammonites alleged to justify their aggressive operations. Their answer was, that the land of the Israelites beyond the Jordan was theirs. It had originally belonged to them, from whom it had been taken by the Amorites, who had been dispossessed by the Israelites: and on this ground they claimed the restitution of these lands. Jephthah's reply laid down the just principle which has been followed out in the practice of civilized nations, and is maintained by all the great writers on the law of nations. The land belonged to the Israelites by right of conquest from the actual possessors; and they could not be expected to recognise any antecedent claim of former possessors, for whom they had not acted, who had rendered them no assistance, and who had themselves displayed hostility against the Israelites. It was not to be expected that they would conquer the country from the powerful kings who had it in possession, for the mere purpose of restoring it to the ancient occupants, of whom they had no favourable knowledge, and of whose previous claims they were scarcely cognizant. But the Ammonites re-asserted their former views, and on this issue they took the field.

When Jephthah set forth against the Ammonites he solemnly vowed to the Lord, 'If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering.' He was victorious. The Ammonites sustained a terrible overthrow. He did return in peace to his house in Mizpeh. As he drew nigh his house, the one that came forth to meet him was his own daughter, his only child, in whom his heart was bound up. She, with her fair companions, came to greet the triumphant hero 'with timbrels and with dances. But he no sooner saw her than he rent his robes, and cried, 'Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low; . . . for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and cannot go back.' Nor did she ask it. She replied, 'My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which has proceeded out of thy mouth; forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, the children of Ammon.' But after a pause she added, 'Let this thing be done for me: let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows.' Her father of course assented; and when the time expired she returned, and, we are told, 'he did with her according to his vow.' It is then added that it became 'a custom in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in the year.'

The victory over the Ammonites was followed by a quarrel with the proud and powerful Ephraimites on the west of the Jordan. This tribe was displeased at having had no share in the glory of the recent victory, and a large body of men belonging to it, who had crossed the river to share in the action, used very high and threatening language when they found their services were not required. Jephthah, finding his remonstrances had no effect, re-assembled some of his disbanded troops and gave the Ephraimites battle, when they were defeated with much loss. The victors seized the fords of the Jordan, and when any one came to pass over, they made him pronounce the word Shibboleth [an ear of corn], but if he could not give the aspiration, and pronounced the word as Sibboleth, they knew him for an Ephraimite, and slew him on the spot. This is a remarkable instance of the dialectical differences, answering to the varieties in our provincialisms, which had already sprung up among the tribes, and of which other instances occur in Scripture.

Jephthah judged Israel six years, during which we have reason to conclude that the exercise of his authority was almost if not altogether confined to the country east of the Jordan.

Volumes have been written on the subject of 'Jephthah's rash vow'; the question being whether, in doing to his daughter 'according to his vow,' he really did offer her in sacrifice or not. The negative has been stoutly maintained by many able pens, from a natural anxiety to clear the character of one of the heroes in Israel from so dark a stain. But the more the plain rules of common sense have been exercised in our view of Biblical transactions; and the better we have succeeded in realizing a distinct idea of the times in which Jephthah lived and of the position which he occupied, the less reluctance there has been to admit the interpretation which the first view of the passage suggests to every reader, which is, that he really did offer her in sacrifice. The explanation which denies this maintains that she was rather doomed to perpetual celibacy; and this, as it appears to us, on the strength of phrases which, to one who really understands the character of the Hebrew people and their language, suggest nothing more than that it was considered a lamentable thing for any daughter of Israel to die childless. To live unmarried was required by no law, custom, or devotion among the Jews: no one had a right to impose so odious a condition on another, nor is any such condition implied or expressed in the vow which Jephthah uttered. To get rid of a difficulty which has no place in the text, but arises from our reluctance to receive that text in its obvious meaning—we invent a new thing in Israel, a thing never heard of among the Hebrews in ancient or modern times, and more entirely opposed to their peculiar notions than any thing which the wit of man ever devised—such as that a damsel should be consecrated to perpetual virginity in consequence of a vow of her father, which vow itself says nothing of the kind. If people allow themselves to be influenced in their interpretations of Scripture by dislike to take the words in their obvious meaning, we might at least expect that the explanations they would have us receive should be in accordance with the notions of the Hebrew people, instead of being entirely and obviously opposed to them. The Jewish commentators themselves generally admit that Jephthah really sacrificed his daughter; and even go so far as to allege that the change in the pontifical dynasty from the house of Eleazar to that of Ithamar was caused by the high-priest of the time having suffered this transaction to take place.

It is very true that human sacrifices were forbidden by the law. But in the rude and unsettled age in which the judges lived, when the Israelites had adopted a vast number of erroneous notions and practices from their heathen neighbours, many things were done, even by good men, which the law forbade quite as positively as human sacrifice. Such, for instance, was the setting up of the altar by Gideon at his native Ophrah, in direct but undesignated opposition to one of the most stringent enactments of the Mosaic code.

It is certain that human sacrifice was deemed meritorious and propitiatory by the neighbouring nations [SACRIFICE]; and, considering the manner of life the hero had led, the recent idolatries in which the people had been plunged, and the peculiarly vague notions of the tribes beyond the Jordan, it is highly probable that he contemplated from the first a human sacrifice, as the most costly offering to God known to him. It is difficult to conceive that he could expect any other creature than a human being to come forth out of the door of his house to meet him on his return. His house was surely not a place for flocks and herds, nor could any animal be expected to come forth 'to meet him,' i. e., with the purpose of meeting him, on his return. We think it likely that he even contemplated the possibility that his daughter might be the person to come forth, and that he took merit to himself for not expressly withholding even his only child from the operation of a vow which he deemed likely to promote the success of his arms. His affliction when his daughter actually came forth is quite compatible with this notion; and the depth of that affliction is scarcely reconcilable with any other alternative than the actual sacrifice.

If we again look at the text, Jephthah vows that whatsoever came forth from the door of his house to meet him 'shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering,' which, in fact, was the regular way of making a thing wholly the Lord's. Afterwards we are told that 'he did with her according to his vow,' that is, according to the plain meaning of plain words, offered her for a burnt-offering. Then follows the intimation that the daughters of Israel lamented her four days every year. People lament the dead, not the living. The whole story is consistent and intelligible, while the sacrifice is understood to have actually taken place; but becomes perplexed and difficult as soon as we begin to turn aside from this obvious meaning in search of recondite explanations.

The circumstances of this immolation we can never know. It probably took place at some one of the altars beyond the Jordan. That it took place at the altar of the tabernacle, and that the high-priest was the sacrificer, as painters usually represent the scene, and even as some Jewish writers believe, is outrageously contrary to all the probabilities of the case.

Professor Bush, in his elaborate note on the text, maintains with us that a human sacrifice was all along contemplated. But he suggests that during the two months, Jephthah might have obtained better information respecting the nature of vows, by which he would have learned that his daughter could not be legally offered, but might be redeemed at a valuation (Lev. xxvii. 2-12). This is possible, and is much more likely than the popular alternative of perpetual celibacy: but we have serious doubts whether even this meets the conclusion that 'he did with her according to his vow.' Besides,

In this case, where was the ground for the annual 'lamentations' of the daughters of Israel, or even for the 'celebrations' which some understand the word to mean? Addendum.—In this article the opinion that Jephthah offered up his daughter as a burnt-offering to the Lord is supported by the usual arguments, but the reasons for the other view hardly receive justice. It may be well, therefore, briefly to state them. 1. Jephthah, in making his vow, must have distinctly contemplated the possibility, or rather the probability, that the first thing that should come forth from his house to meet him on his return would be a human being. He must, therefore, have clearly intended to offer to the Lord in some way a human being, in case such was the first to come forth. 2. It is improbable that he deliberately purposed to slay and offer as a burnt-offering to the Lord one of his fellow-creatures, in case such should be the first to come forth to meet him. We have no reason to regard Jephthah as a barbarian or as a heathen, though he led a roving and warlike life. He was a worshipper of Jehovah, as his vow indicates, and if he knew anything of the true God at all he must have known that a human sacrifice would be abominable to him. We may presume, also, that his own feelings would have revolted from such an act. It is not until idolatry had taken firm hold of the Israelites that we find such sacrifices regarded by them otherwise than with horror. When the king of Moab in his extremity slew his son as a sacrifice to his God, the deed filled the Israelites with anger and abhorrence (2 Kings iii. 27): can we suppose that one of their own judges would deliberately purpose and actually offer a similar sacrifice? 3. According to the Mosaic law a man might vow to the Lord persons or animals (Lev. xxvii. 1-13); the former being redeemable, the latter not, except in the case of unclean animals. Now Jephthah seems to have distinctly contemplated this alternative in his vow,

וְיִהְיֶה לַיהוָה וְהָעֵלִיתִי וְלֹאֵלֶּהָ, which may be rendered 'It shall be to the Lord, or I will offer it for an offering.' It is true that this is not the usual meaning of the conj. ו, but it is sometimes so used, and the context seems to require such rendering here; for as everything devoted to the altar was given to the Lord, it would have been superfluous to add this had not an alternative been contemplated. In making his vow, therefore, Jephthah probably intended to offer in sacrifice only an animal in case that should be the first to meet him; in the case of a human being his vow bound him to devote him or her irredeemably to the Lord. 4. Jephthah did to his daughter according to his vow. But it is not said that he offered her in sacrifice; and in so singular a case it can hardly be supposed that the writer would have failed to say this had it really been done. 5. Jephthah's daughter requested to be allowed to go with her companions for two months up and down among the mountains to bewail her virginity. Now, if it was to death she was doomed, why mourn her virginity? or, if by this is meant merely her young life, why not spend her last hours in her father's house? why go to lonely and unfrequented places with her companions to utter her wail? why not enjoy all the comfort she could so long as life was allowed her? If, on the other hand, it was to perpetual virginity she was doomed, what more natural than that, with her virgin associates, she should mourn this which, in her estimation and theirs, would appear a sacrifice as great as that of life, and should select for this a solitary scene far from the inspection or hearing of the other sex? 6. If Jephthah's daughter was put to death, what need was there for adding that 'she knew no man?' As she was a virgin at the time of the vow, have not these words a prospective sense, and intimate that though she lived after this she never ceased to be a virgin? 7. The A. V., following the older versions, says that 'the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah.' But is לָחֹנֵת properly rendered by lament? For this the usage of the word gives no authority. In Piel the verb denotes to praise, celebrate, rehearse in eulogy (comp. Judg. v. 11), so that the proper rendering of the passage is, 'The daughters of Israel went yearly to celebrate the daughter of Jephthah.' But why so if she was offered in sacrifice? On the other hand, if she was devoted to perpetual virginity, her virtue would merit perpetual celebration (comp. Eurip., Hippol., 1425, ff., especially the words δὲ τοῦ σπονδίου ἐλς αὐτὴν παρθένων ἔσται μέριμνα). See the article JEPHTA by Cassel in Herzog's Real Cycl.—W. L. A.

JEPHUNNEH (יִפְנֵה). 1. (Sept. Ἰεφοννη)

The father of Caleb the spy. The name occurs in the form Jephunna in the A. V. of Eccles. xlv. 7. 2. (Sept. Ἰεφνᾶ). The eldest son of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38).—†

JERAH (יֵרָח, month, from the same root as יָרַח, the moon; Sept. Ἰαρᾶχ; Alex. Ἰαρᾶδ; Jarc), a son of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20). As he is placed next in succession to Hazarmaveth, we may conclude that the region colonized by him was in or near the province of Hadhramaut [HAZARMAVETH]. To determine it with greater precision requires a more accurate knowledge of Arabia than we possess at present. The conclusions of Bochart (Phaleg, ii. xix.) and Michaelis (Spicil. ii., p. 161), although approved by eminent critics, seem precarious. Bochart, looking to the Hebrew derivation of the word, considers Jerah to be the Hebrew translation of the name of the Alilæi of the ancient geographers (Diod. Sic. iii. 45), whom he asserts to have been thus called on account of their worshipping the moon. In proof of this being their practice he appeals to the testimony of Herodotus (iii. 8) that the Arabs in their language 'call Bacchus Orotal, and Urania, Alilat.' The Alilæi he further identifies with the Bene Helal (Niebuhr, Arabia, sec. xviii., c. v.), Helal, in Arabic, signifying the new moon, a tribe dwelling in the north of Yemen, not far from Chaulan, and distinguished from the inhabitants of Djidda and Yemen by dialect and peculiar religious usages. But it seems fatal to this hypothesis that Arabian writers themselves assign an Ishmaelitic origin to the Bene Helal (Knobel, Völkertafel, p. 195). The view of Michaelis is less liable to objection. He also takes the word to be the Hebrew translation of an Arabic name; and he finds traces of it in 'the mountain of the moon (kamar)' and 'the coast of the moon (kamar)', localities mentioned by Edrisi as near Hadhrumaut (Winer, Realw. s. v.) However, there is no evidence of the existence at any time of a people bearing this name. The most satisfactory identification yet given seems to be that of Mr. E. S. Poole (Smith's Dict. s. v.) with the fortress of Yerakh, belonging to the district of the Nijjad.—H. C. G.

JERAHMEEL (יְרַחְמֵל, Jerachmed; Sept. Ἰεραχμὴλ). 1. The eldest son of Hezron, and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 9, 25-27, 33, 42). From him descended the JERAHMEELITES (1 Sam. xxvii. 10). 2. A Levite of the house of Merari, head of the family of Kish in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiv. 29). 3. The son of Hammelech (τὸν βασιλέως, LXX.) who was commanded, along with others, by Jehoiakim, to seize Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

JERED (יֶרֶד, Sept. Ἰάρεδ; Jared). 1. The son of Mahalaleel, of the line of Seth (Gen. v. 15), where the name in the A. V. appears as Jared. The supposed similarity between this name and that of the Cainite Irad, which has been used as an argument for the original identity of the two family lists given in the 4th and 5th chapters of Genesis, vanishes when the Hebrew original is inspected. The two words differ essentially in form and signification; Jered, יֶרֶד, signifying 'descent,' and Irad, עִירָד, 'wild ass.'

2. According to the arrangement generally adopted of the text of the very confused passage 1 Chron. iv. 17-19 [BITHIAH], the son of Mered by his Jewish wife, and the head or leader of the clan which settled in Gedor.—H. C. G.

JEREMIAH (יֵרֵמְיָהּ and יְרֵמְיָה, raised up or appointed by God; Sept. Ἰερεμίας). 1. LIFE. The prophet Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin [ANATHOTH]. Many have supposed that his father was the high-priest of the same name (2 Kings xxii. 8), who found the book of the law in the eighteenth year of Josiah (Umbreit, Praktischer Commentar über den Jeremia, p. x; see Carpzov, Introd. part iii., p. 130). This, however, seems improbable on several grounds:—first, there is nothing in the writings of Jeremiah to lead us to think that his father was more than an ordinary priest ('Hilkiah [one] of the priests,' Jer. i. 1);—again, the name Hilkiah was common amongst the Jews (see 2 Kings xviii. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 45, xxvi. 11; Neh. viii. 4; Jer. xxix. 3);—and lastly, his residence at Anathoth is evidence that he belonged to the line of Abiathar (1 Kings ii. 26-35), who was deposed from the high-priest's office by Solomon: after which time the office appears to have remained in the line of Zadok. Jeremiah was very young when the word of the Lord first came to him (ch. i. 6). This event took place in the thirteenth year of Josiah (B.C. 629), whilst the youthful prophet still lived at Anathoth. It would seem that he remained in his native city several years, but at length, in order to escape the persecution of his fellow-townsmen (ch. xi. 21), and even of his own family (ch. xii. 6), as well as to have a wider field for his exertions, he left Anathoth and took up his residence at Jerusalem. The finding of the book of the law, five years after the commencement of his predictions, must have produced a powerful influence on the mind of Jeremiah, and king Josiah no doubt found him a powerful ally in carrying into effect the reformation of religious worship (2 Kings xxiii. 1-25). During the reign of this monarch, we may readily believe that Jeremiah would be in no way molested in his work; and that from the time of his quitting Anathoth to the eighteenth year of his ministry, he probably uttered his warnings without interruption, though with little success (see ch. xi.) Indeed, the reformation itself was nothing more than the forcible repression of idolatrous and heathen rites, and the re-establishment of the external service of God, by the command of the king. No sooner, therefore, was the influence of the court on behalf of the true religion withdrawn, than it was evident that no real improvement had taken place in the minds of the people. Jeremiah, who hitherto was at least protected by the influence of the pious king Josiah soon became the object of attack, as he must doubtless have long been the object of dislike, to those whose interests were identified with the corruptions of religion. We hear nothing of the prophet during the three months which constituted the short reign of Jehoahaz; but 'in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim' the prophet was interrupted in his ministry by 'the priests and the prophets,' who with the populace brought him before the civil authorities, urging that capital punishment should be inflicted on him for his threatenings of evil on the city unless the people amended their ways (ch. xxvi.) The princes seem to have been in some degree aware of the results which the general corruption was bringing on the state, and if they did not themselves yield to the exhortations of the prophet they acknowledged that he spoke in the name of the Lord, and were quite averse from so openly renouncing his authority as to put his messenger to death. It appears, however, that it was rather owing to the personal influence of one or two, especially Ahikam, than to any general feeling favourable to Jeremiah, that his life was preserved; and it would seem that he was then either placed under restraint or else was in so much danger from the animosity of his adversaries as to make it prudent for him not to appear in public. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B.C. 606) he was commanded to write the predictions which had been given through him, and to read them to the people. From the cause, probably, which we have intimated above, he was, as he says, 'shut up,' and could not himself go into the house of the Lord (ch. xxxvi. 5). He therefore deputed Baruch to write the predictions after him, and to read them publicly on the fast-day. These threatenings being thus anew made public, Baruch was summoned before the princes to give an account of the manner in which the roll containing them had come into his possession. The princes, who, without strength of principle to oppose the wickedness of the king, had sufficient respect for religion, as well as sagacity enough to discern the importance of listening to the voice of God's prophet, advised both Baruch and Jeremiah to conceal themselves, whilst they endeavoured to influence the mind of the king by reading the roll to him. The result shewed that their precautions were not needless. The bold self-will and reckless daring of the monarch refused to listen to any advice, even though coming with the professed sanction of the Most High. Having read three or four leaves 'he cut the roll with the penknife and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed,' and gave immediate orders for the apprehension of Jeremiah and Baruch, who, however, were both preserved from the vindictive monarch. Of the history of Jeremiah during the eight or nine remaining years of the reign of Jehoiaquim we have no certain account. At the command of God he procured another roll, in which he wrote all that was in the roll destroyed by the king, 'and added besides unto them many like words' (ch. xxxvi. 32). In the short reign of his successor Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, we find him still uttering his voice of warning (see ch. xiii. 18; comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 12, and ch. xxii. 24-30), though without effect. It was probably either during this reign, or at the commencement of the reign of Zedekiah, that he was put in confinement by Pashur, the 'chief governor of the house of the Lord.' He seems, however, soon to have been liberated, as we find that 'they had not put him into prison' when the army of Nebuchadnezzar commenced the siege of Jerusalem. The Chaldeans drew off their army for a time, on the report of help coming from Egypt to the besieged city; and now feeling the danger to be imminent, and yet a ray of hope brightening their prospects, the king entreated Jeremiah to pray to the Lord for them. The hopes of the king were not responded to in the message which Jeremiah received from God. He was assured that the Egyptian army should return to their own land, that the Chaldeans should come again, and that they should take the city and burn it with fire (ch. xxxvii. 7, 8). The princes, apparently irritated by a message so contrary to their wishes, made the departure of Jeremiah from the city, during the short respite, the pretext for accusing him of deserting to the Chaldeans, and he was forthwith cast into prison. The king seems to have been throughout inclined to favour the prophet, and sought to know from him the word of the Lord; but he was wholly under the influence of the princes, and dared not communicate with him except in secret (ch. xxxviii. 14, 28); much less could he follow advice so obnoxious to their views as that which the prophet gave. Jeremiah, therefore, more from the hostility of the princes than the inclination of the king, was still in confinement when the city was taken. Nebuchadnezzar formed a more just estimate of his character and of the value of his counsels, and gave a special charge to his captain Nebuzar-adan, not only to provide for him but to follow his advice (ch. xxxix. 12). He was accordingly taken from the prison and allowed free choice either to go to Babylon, where doubtless he would have been held in honour in the royal court, or to remain with his own people. We need scarcely be told that he who had devoted more than forty years of unrequited service to the welfare of his falling country, should choose to remain with the remnant of his people rather than seek the precarious fame which might await him at the court of the king of Babylon. Accordingly he went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, whom the Babylonian monarch had appointed governor of Judæa; and after his murder, sought to persuade Johanan, who was then the recognised leader of the people, to remain in the land, assuring him and the people, by a message from God in answer to their inquiries, that if they did so the Lord would build them up, but if they went to Egypt the evils which they sought to escape should come upon them there (ch. xlii.) The people refused to attend to the divine message, and under the command of Johanan went into Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch along with them (ch. xliii. 6). In Egypt the prophet still sought to turn the people to the Lord, from whom they had so long and so deeply revolted (ch. xliv.); but his writings give us no subsequent information respecting his personal history. Ancient traditions assert that he spent the remainder of his life in Egypt. According to the pseudo-Epiphanius he was stoned by the people at Taphnæ (ἡ Τάφνας), the same as Taphanhes, where the Jews were settled (De Vitis Prophet. tom. ii. p. 239, quoted by Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus V. T. tom. i. p. 1110). It is said that his bones were removed by Alexander the Great to Alexandria (Carpov. Introd. part iii. p. 138, where other traditions respecting him will be found).

Jeremiah was contemporary with Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Ezekiel, and Daniel. None of these, however, are in any remarkable way connected with him, except Ezekiel. The writings and character of these two eminent prophets furnish many very interesting points both of comparison and contrast. Both, during a long series of years, were labouring at the same time and for the same object. The representations of both, far separated as they were from each other, are in substance singularly accordant; yet there is at the same time a marked difference in their modes of statement, and a still more striking diversity in the character and natural disposition of the two. No one who compares them can fail to perceive that the mind of Jeremiah was of a softer and more delicate texture than that of his illustrious contemporary. His whole history convinces us that he was by nature mild and retiring (Ewald, Propheten des Alt. Bund. p. 2), highly susceptible and sensitive, especially to sorrowful emotions, and rather inclined, as we should imagine, to shrink from danger than to brave it. Yet, with this acute perception of injury, and natural repugnance from being 'a man of strife,' he never in the least degree shrinks from publicity; nor is he at all intimidated by reproach or insult, or even by actual punishment and threatened death, when he has the message of God to deliver. Kings and priests, princes and people, are opposed with the most resolute determination, and threatened, if they disobey, in the most emphatic terms. When he is alone, we hear him lamenting the hard lot which compelled him to sustain a character so alien to his natural temper; but no sooner does the divine call summon him to bear testimony for God and against the evils which surrounded him, than he forgets his fears and complaints, and stands forth in the might of the Lord. He is, in truth, as remarkable an instance, though in a different way, of the overpowering influence of the divine energy, as Ezekiel. The one presents the spectacle of the power of divine inspiration acting on a mind naturally of the firmest texture, and at once subduing to itself every element of the soul; whilst the other furnishes an example, not less memorable, of moral courage sustained by the same divine inspiration against the constantly opposing influence of a love of retirement and strong susceptibility to impressions of outward evil. Ezekiel views the conduct of his countrymen as opposed to righteousness and truth, Jeremiah thinks of it rather as productive of evil and misery to themselves—Ezekiel's indignation is roused at the sins of his people, Jeremiah's pity is excited by the consequences of their sins—the former takes an objective, the latter a subjective view of the evils by which both were surrounded.

II. WRITINGS.—The style of Jeremiah corresponds with this view of the character of his mind; though not deficient in power, it is peculiarly marked by pathos. He delights in the expression of the tender emotions, and employs all the resources of his imagination to excite corresponding feelings in his readers. He has an irresistible sympathy with the miserable, which finds utterance in the most touching descriptions of their condition. He seizes with wonderful tact those circumstances which point out the objects of his pity as the objects of sympathy, and founds his expostulations on the miseries which are thus exhibited. His book of Lamentations is an astonishing exhibition of his power to accumulate images of sorrow. The whole series of elegies has but one object—the expression of sorrow for the forlorn condition of his country; and yet he presents this to us in so many lights, alludes to it by so many figures, that not only are his mournful strains not felt to be tedious reiterations, but the reader is captivated by the plaintive melancholy which pervades the whole. 'Nullum, opinor,' says Lowth (De Sacra Poesi Heb., ed. Michaelis, p. 458), 'aliud extat poema ubi intra tam breve spatium tanta, tam felix, tam lecta, tam illustris adjunctorum atque imaginum varietas eluceat. Quid tam elegans et poeticum, ac urbs illa florentissima pridem et inter gentes princeps, nunc sola sedens, afflicta, vidua; deserta ab amicis, prodita a necessariis; frustra tendens manus, nec inveniens qui eam consoletur. . . . Verum omnes locos elegantes proferre, id sane esset totum poema exscribere.' The style of Jeremiah is marked by the peculiarities which belong to the later Hebrew, and by the introduction of Aramaic forms (Eichhorn, Einleitung, vol. iii. p. 122; Gesenius, Geschichte der Heb. Sprache, p. 35). It was, we imagine, on this account that Jerome complained of a certain rusticity in Jeremiah's style. Lowth, however, says he can discover no traces of it, and regards Jeremiah as nearly equal in sublimity in many parts to Isaiah (De Sacra Poesi Heb., p. 426).

The genuineness and canonicity of the writings of Jeremiah in general are established both by the testimony of ancient writers, and by quotations and references which occur in the N. T. Thus the son of Sirach refers to him as a prophet consecrated from the womb, and quotes from Jer. i. 10, the commission with which he was intrusted ('αὐτὸς ἐν μήτρᾳ ἠγιάσθη προφήτης ἐκρίζουν καὶ κακοῦν καὶ ἀπολλύνειν, ὡσαύτως οἰκοδομεῖν καὶ καταφτυνεῖν,' Ecclus. xlix. 7). In 2 Maccab. ii. 1-8, there is a tradition respecting his hiding the tabernacle and the ark in a rock, in which he is called Ἱερεμίας ὁ προφήτης. Philo speaks of him as προφήτης, υἱόςτης, ἱεροφάντης, and calls a passage which he quotes from Jer. iii. 4, an oracle, χρησμὸν (Eichhorn, Einleitung, vol. i. p. 95). Josephus refers to him by name as the prophet who predicted the evils which were coming on the city, and speaks of him as the author of Lamentations (μῆλος θρήνη-τικόν) which are still existing (Antiq., lib. x. 5. 1). His writings are included in the list of canonical books given by Melito, Origen (whose words are remarkable, Ἱερεμίας σὺν θρήνοις καὶ τῇ ἐπιστολῇ ἐν ἐν), Jerome, and the Talmud (Eichhorn, Einleitung, vol. iii. p. 184). In the N. T. Jeremiah is referred to by name in Matt. ii. 17, where a passage is quoted from Jer. xxxi. 15, and in Matt. xvi. 14; in Heb. viii. 8-12, a passage is quoted from Jer. xxxi. 31-34. There is one other place in which the name of Jeremiah occurs, Matt. xxvii. 9, which has occasioned considerable difficulty, because the passage there quoted is not found in the extant writings of the prophet. Jerome affirms that he found the exact passage in a Hebrew apocryphal book (Fabricius, Cod. Pseudep. i. 1103); but there is no proof that that book was in existence before the time of Christ. It is probable that the passage intended by Matthew is Zech. xi. 12, 13, which in part corresponds with the quotation he gives, and that the name is a gloss which has found its way into the text (see Olshausen, Commentar über N. T., vol. ii. p. 493).

Much difficulty has arisen in reference to the writings of Jeremiah from the apparent disorder in which they stand in our present copies, and from the many disagreements between the Hebrew text and that found in the Septuagint version; and many conjectures have been hazarded respecting the occasion of this disorder. The following are the principal diversities between the two texts:—
1. The prophecies against foreign nations, which in the Hebrew occupy chs. xvi.-li. at the close of the book, are in the Greek placed after ch. xxv. 14, forming chs. xxvi.-xxxi.; the remainder of ch. xxv. of the Heb. is ch. xxxii. of the Sept. The following chapters proceed in the same order in both chs. xlv. and xlv. of the Heb. forming ch. li. of the Sept.; and the historical appendix, ch. lii., is placed at the close in both. 2. The prophecies against the heathen nations stand in a different order in the two editions, as is shown in the following table:—

Hebrew.	Sept.
Egypt.	Elam.
Philistines.	Egypt.
Moab.	Babylon.
Ammon.	Philistines.
Edom.	Edom.
Damascus.	Ammon.
Kedar.	Kedar.
Elam.	Damascus.
Babylon.	Moab.

3. Various passages which exist in the Hebrew are not found in the Greek copies (e.g., ch. xxvii. 19-22; xxxiii. 14-26; xxxix. 4-14; xlviii. 45-47). Besides these discrepancies, there are numerous omissions and frequent variations of single words and phrases (Movers, De utriusque Vaticiniumum Jeremia recensionis indole et origine, pp. 8-32). To explain these diversities recourse has been had to the hypothesis of a double recension, an hypothesis which, with various modifications, is held by most modern critics (Movers, ut supra; De Wette, Lehrbuch der Hist.-Crit. Einleitung in

A.T., p. 303; Ewald, Propheten des Alt. Bund. vol. ii. p. 23).

The genuineness of some portions of the book has been of late disputed by German critics. Movers, whose views have been adopted by De Wette and Hitzig, attributes ch. x. 1-16, and chs. xxx., xxxi., and xxxiii., to the author of the concluding portion of the book of Isaiah. His fundamental argument against the last-named portion is, that the prophet Zechariah (ch. viii. 7, 8) quotes from Jer. xxxi. 7, 8, 33, and in ver. 9 speaks of the author as one who lived 'in the day that the foundation of the house of the Lord of hosts was laid.' He must, therefore, have been contemporary with Zechariah himself. This view obliges him, of course, to consider ch. xxx. 1, with which he joins the three following verses, as a later addition. By an elaborate comparison of the peculiarities of style he endeavours to shew that the author of these chapters was the so-called pseudo-Isaiah. He acknowledges, however, that there are many expressions peculiar to Jeremiah, and supposes that it was in consequence of these that the prediction was placed among his writings. These similarities he accounts for by assuming that the later unknown prophet accommodated the writings of the earlier to his own use. Every one will see how slight is the external ground on which Movers' argument rests; for there is nothing in ver. 7, 8, of Zechariah to prove that it is intended to be a quotation from any written prophecy, much less from this portion of Jeremiah. The quotation, if it be such, is made up by joining together phrases of frequent recurrence in the prophets picked out from amongst many others. Then, again, the mention of prophets is evidence that Zechariah was not referring to the writings of one individual; and, lastly, the necessity of rejecting the exordium, without any positive ground for suspecting its integrity, is a strong argument against the position of Movers. Hitzig (Jeremia, p. 230) is induced, by the force of these considerations, to give up the external evidence on which Movers had relied. The internal evidence arising from the examination of particular words and phrases—a species of proof which, when standing alone, is always to be received with great caution—is rendered of still less weight by the evidence of an opposite kind, the existence of which Movers himself acknowledges, 'quumque indicia usus loquendi tantummodo Jeremiae peculiaris haud raro inveniantur' (p. 42). And this evidence becomes absolutely nothing, if the authenticity of the latter portion of Isaiah is maintained;* for it is quite likely that prophecies of Jeremiah would, when relating to the same subject, bear marks of similarity to those of his illustrious predecessor. We may mention also that Ewald, who is by no means accustomed to acquiesce in received opinions as such, agrees that the chapters in question, as well as the other passage mentioned ch. x. 1-16, are the work of Jeremiah. The authenticity of this latter portion is denied solely on internal grounds, and the remarks we have already made will, in substance, apply also to these verses. It seems, however, not improbable that the Chaldee of ver. 11 is a gloss which has crept into the text—both because it is (apparently without reason) in another language, and because it seems to interrupt the progress of thought. The predictions against Babylon in chs. I. and li. are objected to by Movers, De Wette, and others, on the ground that they contain many interpolations. Ewald attributes them to some unknown prophet who imitated the style of Jeremiah. Their authenticity is maintained by Hitzig (p. 391), and by Umbreit (pp. 290-293), to whom we must refer for an answer to the objections made against them. The last chapter is generally regarded as an appendix added by some later author. It is almost verbally the same as the account in 2 Kings xxiv. 18; xxv. 30, and it carries the history down to a later period probably than that of the death of Jeremiah: that it is not his work seems to be indicated in the last verse of ch. li.

It is impossible, within the limits assigned to this article, even to notice all the attempts which have been made to account for the apparent disorder of Jeremiah's prophecies. Blayney speaks of their present disposition as a 'preposterous jumbling together of the prophecies of the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah,' and concludes that 'the original order has, most probably, by some accident or other, been distributed' (Notes, p. 3). Eichhorn says that no other explanation can be given than that the prophet wrote his oracles on single rolls, larger or smaller as they came to his hand, and that, as he was desirous to give his countrymen a copy of them when they went into captivity, he dictated them to an amanuensis from the separate rolls without attending to the order of time, and then preserved the rolls in the same order (Eini. iii. 134). Later critics have attempted in different ways to trace some plan in the present arrangement. Thus Movers supposes the whole collection to have consisted of six books—the longest being that written by Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 2, 32), which was taken by the collector as his foundation, into which he inserted the other books in such places as seemed, on a very slight glance at their contents, to be suitable. All such theories, however, proceed on the presumption that the present arrangement is the work of a compiler, which, therefore, we are at liberty to alter at pleasure; and though they offer boundless scope for ingenuity in suggesting a better arrangement, they serve us very little in respect to the explanation of the book itself. Ewald adopts another principle, which, if it be found valid, cannot fail to throw much light on the connection and meaning of the predictions. He maintains that the book, in its present form, is, from ch. i. to ch. xlix., substantially the same as it came from the hand of the prophet, or his amanuensis, and seeks to discover in the present arrangement some plan according to which it is disposed. He finds that various portions are prefaced by the same formula, 'The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord' (vii. 1; xi. 1; xviii. 1; xxi. 1; xxv. 1; xxx. 1; xxxi. 1; xxxiv. 1, 8; xxxv. 1; xl. 1; xlv. 1), or by the very similar expression, 'The word of the Lord which came to Jeremiah' (xiv. 1; xvi. 1; xvii. 1; xlix. 34). The notices of time distinctly mark some other divisions which are more or less historical (xxvi. 1; xxvii. 1; xxxvi. 1; xxxvii. 1). Two other portions are in themselves sufficiently distinct without such indication (xxix. 1; xlv. 1), whilst the general introduction to the book serves for the section contained in ch. i. There are left two sections (ch. ii. iii.), the former of which has only the shorter introduction, which generally designates the commencement of a strophe; while the latter, as it now stands, seems to be imperfect, having as an introduction merely the word 'saying.' Thus the book is divided into twenty-three separate and independent sections, which, in the poetical parts, are again divided into strophes of from seven to nine verses, frequently distinguished by such a phrase as 'The Lord said also unto me.' These separate sections are arranged by Ewald so as to form five distinct books:—I. The introduction, ch. i.;—II. Reproofs of the sins of the Jews, ch. ii.-xxiv., consisting of seven sections, viz.—1. ch. ii., 2. ch. iii.-vi., 3. ch. vii.-x., 4. ch. xi.-xiii., 5. ch. xiv.-xvii., 6. ch. xviii. 19^a-xx., 7. ch. xxi.-xxiv.;—III. A general review of all nations, the heathen as well as the people of Israel, consisting of two sections, 1. ch. xlv.-xlix. (which he thinks have been transposed), 2. ch. xxv., and an historical appendix of three sections, 1. ch. xxvi., 2. ch. xxvii., and 3. ch. xxviii.-xxix.;—IV. Two sections picturing the hopes of brighter times, 1. ch. xxx.-xxxii., and 2. ch. xxxiii.-xxxv., to which, as in the last book, is added an historical appendix in three sections, 1. ch. xxxiv. 1-7, 2. ch. xxxiv. 8-22, 3. ch. xxxv.;—V. The conclusion, in two sections, 1. ch. xxxvi., 2. ch. xlv. All this, he supposes, was arranged in Palestine, during the short interval of rest between the taking of the city and the departure of Jeremiah with the remnant of the Jews, to Egypt. In Egypt, after some interval, Jeremiah added three sections, viz., ch. xxxvii.-xxxix., xl.-xliii., and xlv. At the same time, probably, he added ch. xlv. 13-26 to the previous prophecy respecting Egypt, and, perhaps, made some additions to other parts previously written. We do not profess to agree with Ewald in all the details of this arrangement, but we certainly prefer the principle he adopts to that of any former critic. We may add that Umbreit (Praktischer Comm. üb. d. Jeremia, p. xxvii.) states, that he has found himself more nearly in agreement with Ewald, as to arrangement, than with any one else.

The principal predictions relating to the Messiah are found in ch. xxiii. 1-8; xxvi. 31-40; xxxiii. 14-26 (Hengstenberg's Christologie, vol. iii. pp. 495-619).—F. W. G.

JEREMIAH. Besides the prophet, seven other persons bearing this name are mentioned in Scripture, viz.—Jeremiah of Libnah, the father of Hamutal, wife of king Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 31); the head of one of the houses of Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 24); three of the warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4, 10, 13); a priest, one of those who sealed the covenant along with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 2, 8), and after whom one of the courses of the priests under Zerubbabel was named (xii. 1, 12); the father of Jazaniah, a contemporary of the prophet (Jer. xxxv. 3).

JEREMIAH, THE EPISTLE OF, one of the apocryphal writings, purporting to proceed from the pen of the prophet Jeremiah.

1. Title and position.—This apocryphal piece, which derives its title ἐπιστολὴ Ἱερემίου (Sept., Vulg., Syriac, etc.) from purporting to be an epistle sent by the prophet Jeremiah 'to them which were to be led captive to Babylon,' has different positions in the different Codd. It is placed after the Lamentations in Origen's Hexaplas, according to the Syriac Hexapla codex in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in the cod. Alex., the Arabic versions, etc.; in some editions of the Sept., in the Latin, and the Syriac, which was followed by Luther, the Zurich Bible, Coverdale, the Geneva Version, the Bishops' Bible, and the A. V., it constitutes the sixth chapter of the apocryphal book of Baruch, whilst Theodoret, Hilary of Poitiers, and several MSS. of the Sept. entirely omit it. It is, however, an independent production, and has nothing to do with Baruch.

2. Design and contents.—The design of this epistle is to admonish the Jews who were going into captivity with the king, to beware of the idolatry which they would see in Babylon. It tells the people of God not to become idolaters like the strangers, but to serve their own God whose angel is with them (1-7), and it exposes in a rhetorical declamation the folly of idolatry (8-72), concluding every group of verses, which contains a fresh proof of its folly, with the reiterated remarks 'seeing that they are no gods, fear them not' (vers. 16, 23, 29, 66), 'how can a man think that they are gods?' (vers. 40, 44, 56, 64, 69), 'how can a man not see that they are not gods?' (vers. 49, 53).

3. Author, date, original language, canonicity, etc.—The inscription claims the authorship of this epistle for Jeremiah, who, it is said, wrote it just as the Jews were going to Babylon, which is generally reckoned to be the first year of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, i. e., A. M. 3398, or B. C. 606. This is the general opinion of the Roman Church, which, as a matter of course, regards it as canonical. But modern critics, both Jewish and Christian, who deny the power to any church to override internal evidence, and defy the laws of criticism, have shewn satisfactorily that its original language is Greek, and that it was written by Hellenistic Jews in imitation of Jeremiah, chaps. x. and xxix. This is corroborated by the fact that this epistle does not exist in the Hebrew, was never included in the Jewish canon, is designated by St. Jerome, who knew more than any father what the Jewish canon contained, as Ψευδεπίγραφος (Pseum. Comment. in Hierom.), was marked with obeli by Origen in his Hexapla, as is evident from the note of Cod. Chisianus (Βαρύχθλος ὠβελίσταται κατὰ τοὺς ὀβ.), and was passed over by Theodoret, though he explained the Book of Baruch. The date of this epistle cannot be definitely settled. It is generally supposed that 2 Maccab. ii. 2 alludes to this epistle, and that it must, therefore, be older than this book of Maccabees. Herzfeld (Geschichte d. V. Israel vor d. Zerstörung d. ersten Tempels, Brunswick 1847, p. 316) infers from it the very reverse, namely, that this epistle was written after the passage in 2 Maccab., whilst Fritzsche and Davidson are utterly unable to see the appropriateness of the supposed reference. It is most probable that the writer lived towards the end of the Maccabæan period.

JEREMOTH (ירמיות, loftinesses). 1. (LXX.

'Iarimōth; Vulg. Jerimoth.) A lineal descendant of Mushi, son of Merari, and founder of one of the twenty-four (?) patriarchal houses of the Levites (1 Chron. xxiii. 23). He is called Jerimoth, chap. xxiv. ver. 30.

2. (LXX. 'Arimōth; Alex. 'Iarimōth; Vulg. Jerimoth.) A Benjamite, one of the 'heads of the fathers' of the Beni-Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 14).

3. (LXX. 'Ierimōth; Vulg. Jerimoth.) A Levite, son of Heman the singer, who was one of those who were chosen to preside respectively over the twenty-four courses of musicians instituted by David for the service of song in the house of the Lord. In the distribution of the courses by lot, the fifteenth was assigned to Jeremoth (1 Chron. xxv. 22). In verse 4 of the same chapter he is called Jerimoth.

4. (LXX. 'Iarimōth; Alex. 'Ierimōth; Vulg. Jerimoth.) One of the Beni-Elam, who, at the exhortation, publicly agreed to put away his strange wife (Ezra x. 26). In Esdras his name occurs under the form Hieremoth (Ἱερεμώθ, 1 Esd. ix. 27).

5. (LXX. 'Arimōth; Alex. 'Iarimōth; Vulg. Jerimoth.) One of Beni-Zattu, and another of those who had married strange wives, and joined in the public expression of their penitence (Ezra x. 27).

6. The name, according to the written text, of one of the Beni-Bani, who also took part in the same public acknowledgment of guilt (Ezra x. 29). The marginal note (Ἀρι) reads, 'and Rainoth'

(רַיְנוֹת), and this is followed by the LXX. (Ρῆνιμώθ) and Vulgate (Rainoth). In Esdras the name is Hieremoth (Ἱερεμώθ, 1 Esd. ix. 30).—S. N.

JERICOH (יריחו, יריחו, and יריח), the first form of the name would signify 'city of the moon,' but the second, 'a fragrant place'; 'Ierimōth; Jericho), a well-known city of Canaan, situated in the valley of the Jordan, about eight miles from the mouth of that river. Nothing is known of the origin of Jericho. It is first mentioned in connection with the approach of the Israelites to Palestine. The Israelites 'pitched in the plains of Moab, on this side Jordan by Jericho' (Num. xxii. 1). It was then a large and strong city, and must have existed for a long period. The probability is, that on the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire from heaven, Jericho was founded, and perhaps by some who had resided nearer the scene of the catastrophe, but who abandoned their houses in fear. Had the city existed in the time of Abraham and Lot, it would scarcely have escaped notice when the latter looked down on the plain of Jordan from the heights of Bethel (Gen. xiii.) From the manner in which it is referred to, and the frequency with which it is mentioned, it was evidently the most important city in the Jordan valley at the time of the Exodus (Num. xxxiv. 15; xxxi. 12; xxxv. 1, etc.) It was then encompassed by groves of palms, which attracted the special attention of the Israelites as they looked down upon its plain from the heights of Moab, and led them to call it the 'city of palm trees' (Deut. xxxiv. 3). Jericho was the first city captured by the Israelites west of the Jordan, and the story of the two spies who were sent to it, and of its subsequent siege and destruction, forms one of the most wonderful and romantic episodes in sacred history (Josh. ii. 6). Scarcely less remarkable was the curse pronounced upon the city by Joshua—'Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho; he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it' (vi. 26). It is evident this was no hasty or causeless anathema. The sin of Sodom appears to have clung to the spot, perhaps in some measure owing to the relaxing nature of the climate and the great productiveness of the soil, generating habits of idle luxury. On the division of the land among the tribes, Jericho was one of the marks on the border of Benjamin, whose territory extended down in a narrow point to the Jordan (Josh. xvi. 1-7). But though the Benjamites possessed the site of the city (xviii. 21), and though a few inhabitants gathered round it to cultivate the plain (Judg. iii. 13; 2 Sam. x. 5), the ban of Joshua lay upon it for nearly five centuries. We read that, in the reign of Ahab, 'Hiel the Bethelite built Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord' (1 Kings xvi. 34). Jericho thus became once more a large and important city; and notwithstanding the curse of Joshua and the fatality attendant on its rebuilding, the prophets gathered round it, established a famous school, and gave it a name for sanctity and learning which it retained down to the commencement of our own era. Doubtless the visit of Elijah and Elisha, the translation of the former on the opposite bank of the Jordan, and the miraculous healing of the poisonous fountain by the latter, contributed much to the celebrity of the place (2 Kings ii.) With the exception of two incidental references (2 Kings xxv. 5; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15), we hear nothing more of the city till after the captivity. Of 'the children of Jericho three hundred and forty and five' returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 34), and aided in rebuilding Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 2). In the interval between the O. T. and N. T. histories, Jericho was a place of note. It was one of the towns fortified by Bacchides, a general of Demetrius Soter, when defeated by the Jews under Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Maccab. ix. 50; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. i. 3). Pompey encamped here on his way to Jerusalem in B. C. 63 (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 4. 1; Bell. Jud. i.

6. 6). Antony gave Jericho with nearly all Palestine to Cleopatra (Antiq. xv. 4. 2), and there is an old tradition that she caused slips of the balsam shrub, for which the gardens of Jericho were famous, to be taken to Egypt and planted at Heliopolis (Brocardus, Descriptio Terra Sancta, xiii.) From Cleopatra Jericho and its plain were farmed by Herod the Great (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 4. 2), who adorned them with splendid palaces, castles, and theatres. The city became one of his favourite places of residence, and in it he died (Bell. Jud. i. 21. 4 and 9; Antiq. xvii. 8).

The history of Jericho is incomplete. It appears that its site was changed; but at what period or for what reason we cannot tell. The city destroyed by Joshua and rebuilt by Hiel stood beside Elisha's fountain. This we infer from the narrative in 2 Kings ii. 19-21; and Josephus says, 'In the immediate vicinity of Jericho is a copious spring of great virtue in irrigation. It bursts forth near the ancient town, the first in the land of the Canaanites which yielded to the arms of Israel' (Bell. Jud. iv. 8. 3). There can be no doubt that the spring here mentioned is that now called Ain-es-Sultan, and also sometimes 'Elisha's fountain,' which is situated about a mile and a half north-west of the village of Rîha. Now, from the Jerusalem Itinerary we learn that the Jericho of the 4th century, which was identical with that of the first, stood at the base of the mountains, on the right of the place where the road from Jerusalem enters the plain, and nearly two miles south of the fountain. After describing the fountain, the author of the Itinerary says, 'Ibi fuit civitas Hiericho, cujus muros gyrauerunt cum arca Testamenti filii Israel et ceciderunt muri' (Vetera Romanorum Itineraria, ed. Wesseling).

The writer of this article was acquainted with these facts before he visited the plain of Jericho, and was hence led to make a careful survey. The substance of the following sentences was written on the spot. The ancient, and indeed the only practicable road from Jerusalem zigzags down the rugged and bare mountain side, close to the south bank of Wady el-Kelt, one of the most sublime ravines in Palestine. In the plain, half a mile from the foot of the pass, and a short distance south of the road to Rîha, is an immense reservoir, now dry, and round it are extensive ruins, consisting of mounds of rubbish and ancient foundations. Riding northward similar remains were seen on both sides of Wady el-Kelt. Half a mile farther north we enter cultivated ground, interspersed with clumps of thorny nubb ('lote-tree') and other shrubs; another half mile brings us to Ain-es-Sultân, a large fountain bursting forth from the foot of a mound. The water though warm is sweet, and is extensively used in the irrigation of the surrounding plain. The whole plain immediately around the fountain is strewn with ancient ruins and heaps of rubbish. There can be no doubt that this is the fountain healed by Elisha, and that the ruins beside it are those of the city captured by Joshua and rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite; while the ruins lying at the foot of the pass, and on the banks of the Kelt, mark the site of the Jericho of the N. T.

The more modern city thus lay on the direct route from Peræa to Jerusalem. Our Lord followed this route. On approaching Jericho he appears to have cured one blind man (Luke xviii. 35); and on leaving it on the opposite side he cured another (Mark x. 46). Then, proceeding on his journey, a vast crowd having gathered round him, he saw Zaccheus up in the sycamore tree, went into his house, probably a villa in the gardens near the road, and having rested there for a time, and related the parable of the Ten Pounds, 'he went forward, ascending up (by the steep wild mountain road) to Jerusalem' (Luke xix. 1-28). At this period the environs of Jericho must have been exceedingly rich and beautiful. The abundant waters of Elisha's fountain, and of other larger fountains at the foot of the mountains northward, were conducted by aqueducts and canals, and distributed far and wide over the vast plain. The gardens and orchards abounded in spices, shrubs, and fruit trees of the rarest kinds, and were dotted besides with the palaces of the Jewish princes and nobles (Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 5. 2; xviii. 13. 1; Bell. Jud. i. 21, 4-9; iv. 8. 2 and 3).

The subsequent history of Jericho contains little worthy of note. It was made the head of one of the toparchies of Palestine under Vespasian (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 5). Eusebius and Jerome state that it was destroyed during the siege of Jerusalem (Onomast., s. v. Jericho). It afterwards contained a considerable Christian population, and was for a long period the seat of a bishopric (S. Paul, Geogr. Sacra, ed. Holsten. p. 306; Reland, Palæstina, p. 215). A church and hospice were built here by the Emperor Justinian (Procopius, De Edific. Justiniani, 5, 9); but these buildings and the city appear to have been destroyed during or soon after the Mohammedan conquest, for Adamnanus at the close of the 7th century describes the site as deserted, with the exception of Rahab's house (De Locis Sanctis, 2, 13). During the rule of the Saracens, Jericho again in some measure revived; the old aqueducts were repaired, and the plain rendered fruitful. But it would seem that the site was again changed, and the new town or village built where the little hamlet of Rîha now stands (Jacob de Vitry in Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 1076; see also Robinson, B. R., i. 561). When the Crusaders conquered Palestine the plain of Jericho was one of the most fertile regions in the country, and was assigned to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (William of Tyre in Gesta Dei, xi. 15). After the close of the Crusades Jericho again gradually declined, and it has never since revived (Brochardus, chap. vii.; Maundrell, March 29; Pococke, ii. 1, p. 31).

Rîha (written in Arabic رِيحَا, Ertha = Heb. יְרִיחוֹ), the only modern representative of the ancient royal city of Jericho, is a small, poor, filthy

hamlet. The houses consist of rough walls of old building stones, roofed with straw and brushwood. Each has in front of it an enclosure for cattle fenced with branches of the thorny nubk; and a stronger fence of the same material surrounds the whole village, forming a rude barrier against the raids of the Bedawin. Not far from the village is a little square castle or tower, evidently of Saracenic origin, but now dignified by the title of 'the house of Zaccheus.' This village, though it bears the name of Jericho, is, as has been stated, about a mile and a half distant both from the Jericho of the prophets and that of the Evangelists. Very probably it may occupy the site of Gilgal [GILGAL]. The soil of the plain is unsurpassed in fertility; there is abundance of water for irrigation, and many of the old aqueducts are almost perfect; yet nearly the whole plain is waste and desolate. The few fields of wheat and Indian corn, and the few orchards of figs, are enough to show what the place might become under proper cultivation. But the people are now few in number, indolent, and licentious. The palms which gave the ancient city a distinctive appellation are gone; even that 'single solitary palm' which Dr. Robinson saw, exists no more. The climate of Jericho is exceedingly hot and unhealthy. On the 13th of May the thermometer rose to 102° Fahr. in Dr. Robinson's tent beside the village; and the writer can testify that he never suffered so severely from the effects of intense heat as during two days he spent in the plain of Jericho in April 1858. The heat is accounted for by the depression of the plain, which is about 1200 feet below the level of the sea. The reflection of the sun's rays from the bare white cliffs and mountain ranges which shut in the plain, and the noisome exhalations from the lake, and from the numerous salt springs around it, are enough to poison the atmosphere.

Jericho owed its ancient wealth and importance to a variety of circumstances. First, The site is one of nature's own making. Water is the first grand requisite for an eastern city. Here the stream of the Kelt, issuing from a sublime ravine, flows across an alluvial plain. A little more than a mile northward is the large fountain of Eli-ha; and still farther the fountain of Dûk. Three copious streams thus combined by the aid of a little human skill and industry to convert a parched plain into a paradise. No more fitting site could have been chosen for a great city.

Second, The climate of this plain is different from that of any other part of Palestine; it is in fact tropical. The people of the country soon found that the fruits, spices, and perfumes of other climes could be grown there in great abundance. The palms of Jericho equalled those of Egypt. The gardens of Jericho produced the sweet-smelling heina, called 'camphire' (Heb. כַּמְפִיר, in the English version of Cant. i. 14; also the useful myrobalan, known to the Arabs as zukkûm; and the rare and fragrant balsam, or 'balm of Gilead,' which was in ancient times so highly esteemed both as a perfume and a medicine (Gen. xliii. 11; Jer. viii. 22; xlv. 11). The balsam was peculiar to Palestine (Strabo, xvi. 2; Pliny, xii. 25, 54); and Josephus informs us that it was chiefly produced in the environs of Jericho (Antiq. xiv. 4. 1; xv. 4. 2). In addition to these the ordinary fruits grew more luxuriantly, and ripened sooner, in the plain of Jericho than elsewhere. Josephus is lavish in his praises of its amazing fertility. He calls it the most fertile tract in Judæa—a divine region (θεῖον χωριον, Bell. Jud. iv. 8. 3).

Third, After the destruction of Sodom and its rich plain, the site of Jericho was the only one in the southern section of the Jordan valley adapted for a great city. Fugitives from the surrounding country would naturally concentrate here, and Jericho, when founded, would become what Sodom had been, the capital of the Arabah.

Fourth, The principal parts of the lower Jordan are opposite Jericho. The valley is bounded on the west by a steep and rugged line of mountains which form a great natural barrier to that division of Palestine. The two main passes through this barrier—to Jerusalem, and to Bethel—converge at Jericho; and a strong city built there would thus form the key of Palestine. So Joshua found it; and when Jericho fell the way was opened into the whole country.

The forest gardens and verdant fields and meadows of Jericho must have been a glorious sight to the Israelites from the mountain sides of Moab, and to Moses from the top of Pisgah. After the bare rocks of Sinai, and the bare valley of Arabah, and the bare downs of Moab, the waving palm groves, and broad plains sparkling with streams, and the wide sea would seem an earthly paradise. And desolate as the plain has now become, it is still beautiful to the eye of the pilgrim, after his six hours' weary march down through the white and parched wilderness of Judæa. The glory of the 'city of palm-trees' has long since passed away; but the beauty of the site is perennial.—J. L. P.

JERIMOTH (ירמיות; Vulg. Jerimoth). 1.

(Ἰερμιώθ.) A lineal descendant of Mushi, son of Merari, and founder of one of the Levitical families (1 Chron. xxiv. 30). [See JEREMOTH, 1.]

2. (Ἰερμιούθ.) One of the Benei-Bela, and founder of one of the patriarchal houses of the Benjamites (1 Chron. vii. 7).

3. (ירמיות; Ἰερμιούθ.) One of the Benei-Becher, and founder of another of the Benjamite families (1 Chron. vii. 8).

4. (Ἀρμιούθ; Alex. Ἰαρμιούθ; Vulg. Jerimuth.) A Benjamite, one of the ambidextrous warriors who joined the party of David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

5. (Ἰερμιώθ.) Son of Heman, and leader of the fifteenth course of musicians (1 Chron. xxv. 4). [See JEREMOTH, 3.]

6. (Ἰερμιώθ.) Son of Azriel, and ruler, (נָּיִד) or prince (שָׂר) of the tribe of Naphtali, in the latter part of the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).

7. (Ἰερμιούθ; Alex. Ἐρμιούθ.) Son of David, and the father of Mahalath, the wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 18). The name of his mother is not known.

8. (Ἰερμιώθ.) A Levite, one of the officers appointed by Hezekiah to the oversight of the free-will offerings given for the maintenance of the priests and Levites (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).—S. N.

JERIOTH (יריח); Sept. Ἰεριώθ, the wife or concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 18). Her descendants are not mentioned, but they probably stood in the genealogy, and were omitted by the chronicler for some reason. If we knew nothing from other sources of Achsah, the isolated mention of her at ver. 49 would be analogous to the mention of Jerioth here. The Vulg. makes Jerioth the daughter of Azubah, Caleb's wife; and some of the older interpreters regard Jerioth as another name of Azubah; but both expedients are arbitrary.—W. L. A.

JEROBOAM I. (ירבעם; Sept. Ἰερωβόδαμ), the son of Nebat, and first king of Israel, who became king B.C. 975, and reigned 22 years.

He was of the tribe of Ephraim, the son of a widow named Zeruiah, when he was noticed by Solomon as a clever and active young man, and was appointed one of the superintendents of the works which that magnificent king was carrying on at Jerusalem. This appointment, the reward of his merits, might have satisfied his ambition, had not the declaration of the prophet Ahijah given him higher hopes. When informed that, by the divine appointment, he was to become king over the ten tribes about to be rent from the house of David, he was not content to wait patiently for the death of Solomon, but began to form plots and conspiracies, the discovery of which constrained him to flee to Egypt to escape condign punishment. The king of that country was but too ready to encourage one whose success must necessarily weaken the kingdom which had become great and formidable under David and Solomon, and which had already pushed its frontier to the Red Sea (1 Kings xi. 26-40).

When Solomon died, the ten tribes sent to call Jeroboam from Egypt; and he appears to have headed the deputation which came before the son of Solomon with a demand of new securities for the rights which the measures of the late king had compromised. It may somewhat excuse the harsh answer of Rehoboam, that the demand was urged by a body of men headed by one whose pretensions were so well known and so odious to the house of David. It cannot be denied, that in making their applications thus offensively, they struck the first blow; although it is possible that they, in the first instance, intended to use the presence of Jeroboam for no other purpose than to frighten the king into compliance. The imprudent answer of Rehoboam rendered a revolution inevitable, and Jeroboam was then called to reign over the ten tribes, by the style of 'King of Israel' (1 Kings xii. 1-20).

The general course of his conduct on the throne has already been indicated [ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF], and need not be repeated in this place. The leading object of his policy was to widen the breach between the two kingdoms, and to rend asunder those common interests among all the descendants of Jacob, which it was one great object of the law to combine and interlace. To this end he scrupled not to sacrifice the most sacred and inviolable interests and obligations of the covenant people, by forbidding his subjects to resort to the one temple and altar of Jehovah at Jerusalem, and by establishing shrines at Dan and Beth-el—the extremities of his kingdom—where 'golden calves' were set up as the symbols of Jehovah, to which the people were enjoined to resort and bring their offerings. The pontificate of the new establishment he united to his crown, in imitation of the Egyptian kings. He was officiating in that capacity at Beth-el, offering incense, when a prophet appeared, and in the name of the Lord announced a coming time, as yet far off, in which a king of the house of David, Josiah by name, should burn upon that unholy altar the bones of its ministers. He was then preparing to verify, by a commissioned prodigy, the truth of the oracle he had delivered, when the king attempted to arrest him, but was smitten with palsy in the arm he stretched forth. At the same moment the threatened prodigy took place, the altar was rent asunder, and the ashes strewed far around. This measure had, however, no abiding effect. The policy on which he acted lay too deep in what he deemed the vital interests of his separate kingdom, to be even thus abandoned: and the force of the considerations which determined his conduct may in part be appreciated from the fact that no subsequent king of Israel, however well disposed in other respects, ever ventured to lay a finger on this schismatical establishment. Hence 'the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he sinned and made Israel to sin,' became a standing phrase in describing that iniquity from which no king of Israel departed (1 Kings xii. 25-33; xiii.)

The contumacy of Jeroboam eventually brought upon him the doom which he probably dreaded beyond all others—the speedy extinction of the dynasty which he had taken so much pains and incurred so much guilt to establish on firm foundations. His son Abijah being sick, he sent his wife disguised to consult the prophet Ahijah, who had predicted that he should be king of Israel. The prophet, although he had become blind with age, knew the queen, and saluted her with—'Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam, for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.' These were not merely that the son should die—for that was intended in mercy to one who alone, of all the house of Jeroboam, had remained faithful to his God, and was the only one who should obtain an honoured grave—but that his race should be violently and utterly extinguished: 'I will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone' (1 Kings xiv. 1-18).

The son died so soon as the mother crossed the threshold on her return; and as the death of Jeroboam himself is the next event recorded, it would seem that he did not long survive his son. He died in B.C. 954 (1 Kings xiv. 20).

Jeroboam was perhaps a less remarkable man than the circumstance of his being the founder of a new kingdom might lead us to expect. The tribes would have revolted without him; and he was chosen king merely because he had been pointed out by previous circumstances. His government exhibits but one idea—that of raising a barrier against the re-union of the tribes. Of this idea he was the slave and victim; and although the barrier which he raised was effectual for its purpose, it only served to show the weakness of the man who could deem needful the protection for his separate interests which such a barrier offered.

JEROBOAM II., thirteenth king of Israel, son of Joash, whom, in B.C. 824, he succeeded on the throne, and reigned forty-one years. He followed the example of the first Jeroboam in keeping up the idolatry of the golden calves. Nevertheless the Lord had pity upon Israel, the time of its ruin was not yet come, and this reign was long and flourishing. Jeroboam brought to a successful result the wars which his father had undertaken, and was always victorious over the Syrians. He even took their chief cities of Damascus and Hamath, which had formerly been subject to the sceptre of David, and restored to the realm of Israel the ancient eastern limits from Lebanon to the Dead Sea. He died in B.C. 783 (2 Kings xiii. 13; xiv. 16, 23-29).

The Scriptural account of this reign is too short to enable us to judge of the character of a prince under whom the kingdom of Israel seems to have reached a degree of prosperity which it had never before enjoyed, and was not able long to preserve.—J. K.

JEROHAM (יֶרֶחָם, who finds mercy; LXX.

Ἰερεμήα, Ἰεροβοάμ, Ἰωπόμ, Ἰεπόμ, Ἰεπαδμ; Vulg. Jeroham). Several persons bear this name.

1. The father of Elkanah, and grandfather of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 27, 34). His father's name is variously given: Elihu (1 Sam. i. 1), Eliab (1 Chron. vi. 27), Eliel (1 Chron. vi. 34).

2. The father of Adaiah, a priest of the returned captives, and son of Pashur, whose brethren are described as 'very able men for the work of the service of the house of God' (1 Chron. ix. 12, 13. It is surely the same who is mentioned Neh. xi. 12, notwithstanding the discrepancy).

3. The father of Azareel, who was a prince of the tribe of Dan in the days of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 22).

4. The father of Azariah, one of the 'captains of hundreds' who aided Jehoiada to put down the infamous Athaliah, and place Josiah, the rightful heir, on the throne (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

5. A man of Benjamin, the father of six sons, who were of 'the heads of the fathers, by their generations, chief men' (1 Chron. viii. 27).

6. A man of Benjamin, the father of Ibneiah, who with his brethren lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 8).

7. A man of Gedor, whose sons, described as 'mighty men, helpers in the war,' although they were 'of Saul's brethren of Benjamin,' yet united themselves with David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 1, 2, 7).—I. J.

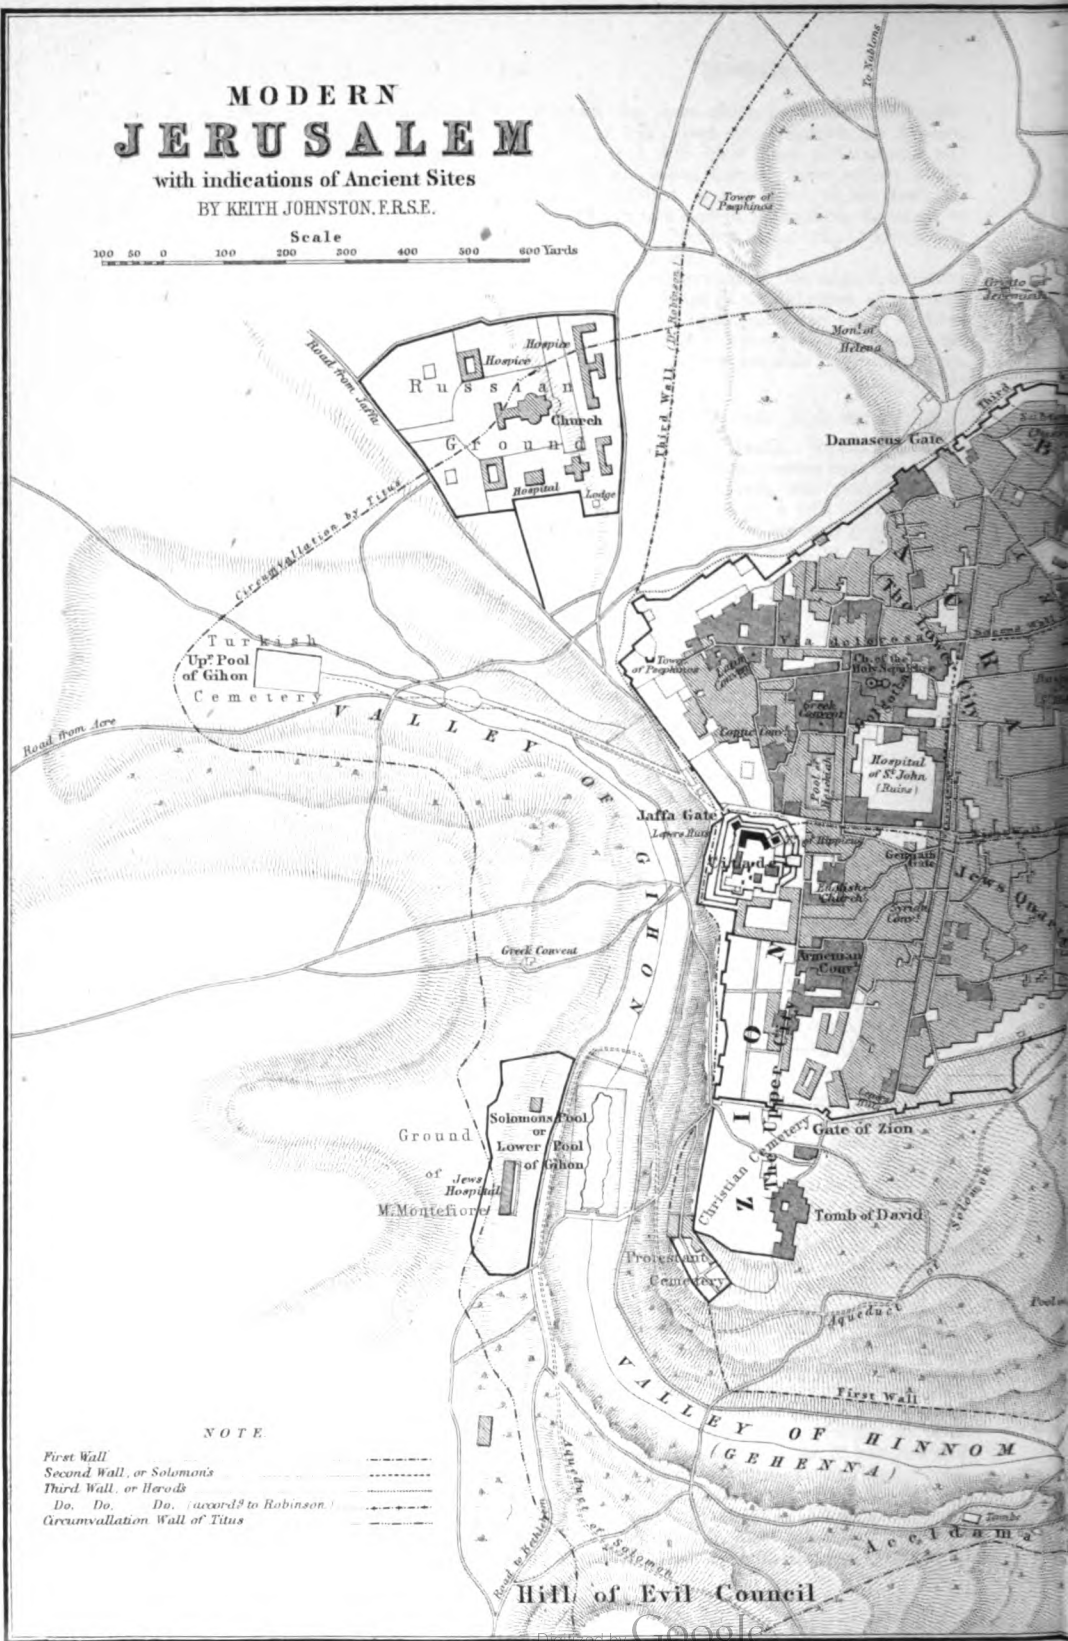

JEROME, EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS SOPHRONIUS, one of the greatest and most learned of the Latin fathers, was born at a place called Stridon, in Dalmatia, about A.D. 346. He died at Bethlehem, Sept. 30, 420. The name of his father, who was a wealthy man and a Christian, was Eusebius. At the age of 18, Jerome was sent to Rome, where he studied under the grammarian Donatus. He does not appear to have been baptised till he was about 20, and, according to his own admissions, he fell afterwards into a course of dissipation, though not to the extent that Augustine had so deeply to deplore. After a residence of some years at Rome, he travelled into Gaul, Germany, and Britain. At Treves he commenced the study of theology, and in order to prosecute it, retired into a cell in the desert of Chalcis, near Antioch, where for four years he devoted himself to a life of penance and study. Here he acquired that skill in the Hebrew language for which he afterwards became so celebrated, and which he turned to such good account. He also visited Palestine and Constantinople, where he formed a friendship with Gregory Nazianzen, at that time bishop there, and the only man who, since St. John, had won the title of 'the Divine.' Jerome calls him his father, preceptor, and catechist. It was here that he translated the chronicle of Eusebius and 14 homilies of Origen. In 382 a council was called at Rome by Damasus. Jerome attended it and stayed there till the death of Damasus in 385. It is not clearly known why he left Rome, but he does not seem to have gained the affection of the bishop who succeeded Damasus. On leaving Italy he retired to Bethlehem, where he continued till his death.

His works are partly exegetical and partly explanatory. He took part in the controversies against the Arians, Sabellians, Luciferians, and Pelagians; wrote commentaries on Ecclesiastes, Canticles, the Prophets, greater and less, St. Matthew, and St. Paul's Epistles; also Questionum Hebraicarum in Genesim liber and De Viris illustribus, and 35 short notices of defenders of the faith, beginning with Peter and James and ending with himself; but the great work for which he is chiefly renowned is the translation of the Scriptures from the Hebrew, which is the only one sanctioned by the Council of Trent, and is known as the Vulgate. It is uncertain what help he derived in this work from the Hexapla and the older Italic versions that are supposed to have existed. The first complete edition of Jerome was that by Erasmus, Basle 1516, 9 vols. fol. There is also the Benedictine edit. 1693-1706, 5 vols. fol.; and that of Vallarsi, Verona 1734-42, 11 vols. fol., reprinted and improved, Venice 1766, 11 vols. 4to.—S. L.

JERUBBAAL (יִרְבֵּעַל; Sept. Ἰεροβάαλ; Alex. δικάσθησιον τοῦ Βααλ), the name given to Gideon in consequence of his destroying the altar of Baal at Ophrah (Judg. vi. 32). The name is a compound of ירב and בעל, and may signify either, Let Baal contend, or Be it contended with Baal; the addition כִּי shews that here the former meaning is to be adopted. In the A. V. the giving of the name is assigned to Joash, the father of Gideon; but instead of 'he gave,' it is better to use the indefinite form 'they gave,' i. e., the name was given to him by common consent. Instead of Jerubbaal we have in 2 Sam. xi. 21 the name Jerubbesheth (יִרְבֵּשֶׁת), in which בָּשֶׁת = נִשֶּׁת is a term used by the Jews as a substitute for Baal; comp. אִשְׁבַּעַל Eshbaal, 1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 39 for the אִשְׁבֶּשֶׁת, Ish-bosheth, of the books of Samuel; מֵרִיב־בַּעַל Merib-baal, 1 Chron. viii. 34, for מִפְּיִבֶשֶׁת, Mephibosheth, etc. The name Jerubbaal appears in the Grecised form of Hierombal (Ἱερομβάλος) in a fragment of Philo-Byblius preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. i. 9); but the identity of name does not authorise us to conclude that it is Gideon who is there referred to. In the Palmyrene inscriptions, ʿIaḥḥbōlos appears as the name of a deity (Gesenius, Monum. Phœnic. 229; Movers, Phöniciæ, i. 434).—W. L. A.

JERUBBESHETH. [JERUBBAAL.]

JERUEL, WILDERNESS OF (יְרֻעַל; מְדִבְרָא יְרֻעַל)

Sept. ἡ ἐρήμος Ἰερουζαλ, the scene of the discomfiture of the Ammonites, Moabites, and other Arab tribes who invaded Judæa in the reign of Jehoshaphat

(2 Chron. xx. 16). Although not mentioned elsewhere, the situation of this region may be determined with tolerable precision from the circumstantial details given in the chapter cited. The invading tribes having marched round the south of the Dead Sea had encamped at Engedi. The road thence to Jerusalem ascends from the shore by a steep and 'terrible pass' (Walcott, Bib. Sac. i. p. 69), and thence leads northwards, passing below Tekoa (Robinson, Bib. Res. i. 501, 508). Jehoshaphat, by the direction of Jahaziel, goes forth from Jerusalem to the wilderness of Tekoa. He is told that the invaders are coming up by the ascent of Ziz (or Hazziz, Sept. Ἰαζίζ; Alex. Ἀζαί; comp. Bertheau, ad loc.), evidently the difficult pass just mentioned,* and that he should find them 'at the end of the brook before the wilderness of Jeruel.' Three days having been consumed in spoiling the dead, he leads his army to the valley of Berachah (Bereikût) to offer thanks for the deliverance. The wilderness of Jeruel must therefore have been traversed by the road from Engedi to Jerusalem, adjacent to the wilderness of Tekoa, and distant by a short march from Bereikût. In all these respects the large tract of table land called el-Husasah from a wady on its northern side (Robinson, i. 527), and extending 'in verdant slopes' to the hill country about Tekoa (Walcott, l. c.), satisfies the requirements of the narrative.—H. JERUSALEM (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, habitation or foundation of peace; Sept. Ἱερουσαλὴμ; Vulg. Hierosolyma; Arab. القُدس, El Kuds), the Jewish capital of Palestine.

PART I.—NAME AND HISTORY.—This famed and most sacred of all cities has a name which at once suggests inquiry as to its meaning and origin. The old traditions and natural prepossessions both of Jews and Christians connect it with that Salem of which Melchizedek, the priest of the Most High God, was king, and there is no doubt that it is the place which the Psalmist had in view when he sung—"In Judah is God known; his name is great in Israel. In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion." It is also worthy of note that, at the conquest of Canaan by the descendants of Abraham, the king of Jerusalem had a name, Adonizedek (Lord of Righteousness), almost identical in meaning with that of Melchizedek (King of Righteousness), who was king of Salem in the time of Abraham.

Josephus, writing in Greek, endeavours to clothe the Jewish notions on the subject in a Greek dress, by saying that the city having been formerly called Σόλυμα, received the name of Ἱεροσόλυμα, or the sacred Solyma, from its Hebrew captors. This would be an easy explanation of the change of name from Salem to Jerusalem, if there was anything in the prefixed syllables of the Hebrew word, יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, to convey that idea of sacredness which is asserted by the Greek prefix Ἱερο. It is needless to say that such is not the case. Various opinions are entertained as to the meaning of the Hebrew prefix, but none of them quite satisfactory or quite consistent with the rules of Hebrew etymology. We may dismiss, almost without consideration, supported though it be by Lightfoot, the rabbinical notion that the word Jerusalem is derived from Jireh, the name given to the place by Abraham (Gen. xxii. 14), and Shalem, the name which it received from Shem, whom they hold to be the same person as Melchizedek. Of the derivations enumerated by Gesenius, and which would give to the word the several meanings of fearing peace, fearing Salem, possession of peace, Salem a possession, house of peace, foundation of peace, he prefers the last, expressing this name in German by the word Friedensgrund. There is also something in the latter part of the word which is suggestive of inquiry. Though the letters are the same as those of the word Salem, the vowel-points are different, the one being written שָׁלֵם, Shalem, and the other שְׁלַם, Shalaim, and in some places with the insertion of a י, שְׁלַיִם, Shalaimim. This gives to the word a dual character, which has been considered referable to the two cities, the one on a height and the other in a valley, of which it consisted. Nor is it unnatural to suppose that the original name of the place having been Salem, it might in the course of time, when it embraced more ground within its circuit, and became a double city, have acquired a pronunciation which described to the ear its local form and character. At the conquest of Canaan the place was known by quite another name. It was called Jebus or Jebusi, which simply means the city of the Jebusite, just as we find innumerable French towns of the present day with names derived from tribes enumerated by Cæsar. Thus we may imagine such a combination of words as Salem Jebus, or Salem Jebusi, with a meaning analogous to that of Lutetia Parisiorum; and as Paris is the only portion of this appellation which has been retained, we can conjecture how Jebus may have usurped the place of Salem at the time of Joshua. Some, indeed, have supposed that the word Jebus still lies concealed in the first syllables of the word Jerusalem, while others are led by St. Jerome to identify the Salem of Melchizedek with that 'Shalem, a city of Shechem,' upwards of seventy miles to the north of Jerusalem, in the neighbourhood of Scythopolis (or Bethshan), to which Jacob came after he had left Padanaram (Gen. xxxiii. 18). There is little, however, beyond the mere assertion of St. Jerome to contradict the uniform tradition both of Jews and Christians; and the inference we are disposed to draw from the above considerations is that Jerusalem was originally the Salem of Melchizedek, that the place was afterwards familiarly known as Jebusi or Jebus, from the name of the people who occupied it, while its older name was still kept in memory; and that it received the name of Jerusalem when it was finally conquered by David, partly in memory of its ancient founder, partly to indicate the secure enjoyment of peace which the acquisition of so important a fortress seemed to promise. The use of the word in Joshua and Judges, either by itself or as an equivalent of Jebus, was probably in anticipation of the name which it afterwards received. The dual form of its termination, which was first embodied in the letters of the word by the prophet Jeremiah 400 years after its conquest by David, may have crept gradually into use; and be now indicated by the Masoretic vowel-points wherever the word occurs, because it had long since been established as its proper form when those points were invented (A.D. 500).

The position of Jerusalem was such as to make it a place of leading importance at the time of the invasion of the land by Joshua; and we accordingly find Adonizedek its 'king' summoning four other chieftains of the land to punish Gibeon for having made peace with Israel. Its great strength also appears in the fact that it was not one of the places sacked by Joshua after he had slain Adonizedek and the other four kings who had gone up with him against Gibeon, and that the Jebusites continued to hold it for so long a period afterwards. We are told in Joshua (xv. 63) that the children of Judah could not, and in Judges (i. 21), after an account of the taking and burning of Jerusalem by the children of Judah, that the children of Benjamin did not, drive out the Jebusites; and it is added in the former verse, 'but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah,' and in the latter, 'but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day.' The difficulty of dislodging the Jebusites, followed as it is by the account of the sacking and burning of Jerusalem, and again by the repetition of the statement that the Jebusites continued to dwell with the children of Israel in Jerusalem, point clearly to the fact of the natural division of the place into an upper and lower town. Of the upper town, inclosed within powerful defences and forming the stronghold of Zion, the Jebusites no doubt maintained possession while the rest of the city was in flames, and they continued to dwell there after the children of Benjamin had established themselves in the valley at its foot, or on contiguous but lower heights. This view is confirmed by the authority of Josephus, from whom we also learn that the children of Judah, disappointed in their attempt upon the upper town, withdrew to Hebron, about thirty miles to the south of Jerusalem. This would naturally give the tribe of Benjamin an opportunity for occupying the ruined town which Judah had abandoned; as the boundary line which separated the northern edge of the territory apportioned to Judah from the southern edge of that apportioned to Benjamin passed through, or close to Jerusalem, possibly at the foot of Zion* (comp. Josh. xv. 8, and xviii. 28, with Ps. xlviii. 2).

The stronghold of Zion, which was thus maintained by the Jebusites in this first recorded siege of Jerusalem (B.C. 1443) continued in their hands throughout the whole of the troubled times of the judges, and the early days of the kingdom of Israel. It was about 400 years afterwards, according to the chronology of the A. V.—though not more than 200 according to another computation †—that David the man of Judah, having finally triumphed over the house of Saul the Benjamite, and being firmly established on the throne of the kingdom of all Israel as well as Judah. (B.C. 1048), in that Hebron which had been the chief city of the tribe of Judah ever since its first ineffectual attempt on the stronghold of Zion, gathered together his forces for a fresh attempt on the fortress which had hitherto baffled the efforts of its Hebrew invaders. Great as was the reputation of David, the confidence of the men of Jebus was still greater. As the Hebrew armies lay round about them, they shouted insultingly from their walls: 'Except thou take away the blind and the lame thou shalt not come in hither.' The simplest interpretation of this insult seems to be that the lame and the blind, the most infirm and helpless of the place, were exhibited on the walls as a sufficient defence against its besiegers. Others have thought that the idols of the Jebusites were so displayed, and that the words lame and blind were used ironically and derisively in allusion to the terms in which those idols were spoken of by the Israelites. This futile taunt, however, only served to rouse the indignation of the divinely assisted hero whom the giant of Gath had once so vainly cursed by his gods, threatening to give his flesh to the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field. A fresh impulse was added to the zeal of the besiegers, and the hill of Zion was taken.

Jerusalem was now made the capital of the united kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and Zion its stronghold, henceforth dignified by the name of the City of David, became the residence of the king, and the site of that royal palace, for the building of which 'cedar trees, and carpenters and masons' were furnished by Hiram, king of Tyre. The position of the new capital, with reference to the territories of the several tribes, was eminently suited to give it a commanding influence among them. It rested on the southern edge of that grand and lofty plateau which—interrupted only by the valley of Esdraelon crossing it mid-way between its northern and southern extremity—occupies the entire area of the Holy Land between the valley of the Jordan and the low lands bordering on the Mediterranean Sea. And yet it did not occupy, like Hebron, Shechem, and other great cities of Israel, the crest of one particular hill, but was seated at a height of some 3000 feet above the level of the sea, at a point on the eastern edge of the great southern table-land which is protected on its south and east sides by two deep valleys or ravines running down from the west and north, and joining at its south-east corner, where they form the head of a deep winding cleft rather than valley, which reaches to the Dead Sea, and forms the dry bed of the Kedron. This stream also gives its name to the ravine which comes from the north and protects Jerusalem on the east, while the southern ravine is known as the valley of Hinnom. Jerusalem being thus defended against invaders on the south and east, and partly on the north, by these ravines, is open and able to extend itself, and hold ready communication with the whole country towards the west and north-west over the undulating height of the plateau on which it rests. This peculiarity of position is the key to much of its subsequent history.

But Jerusalem was something more than the civil capital of the kingdom. It was the place which had been fore-ordained by the wisdom of God to be its spiritual centre, the Holy City to which the tribes of the Lord were to go up every year to celebrate at different seasons their three great festivals. David accordingly proceeded to invest it with that sacredness of character which it was to possess throughout all future ages. The ark of the covenant, that mysterious testimony of God's favour and presence which had been constructed according to his express directions in the wilderness, was still resting at Kirjath-jearim, where it had remained ever since the high-priesthood of Eli and those terrible manifestations of its sanctity which fell both on Philistines and Israelites after its removal from the tabernacle at Shiloh. This sacred receptacle with its mysterious contents David now resolved to carry to Jerusalem. But its progress to its intended shrine was again arrested by the anger of God, which burst with fatal violence on the head of Uzzah, a man who had ventured to steady it with his hand as it tottered with the motion of the cart which bore it on its way. The revered and dreaded object, left once more in charge of a private person, became a blessing to those who sheltered it with reverence, and David was again encouraged to carry out his purpose. This time a troop of Levites was employed to bear it with staves on their shoulders, according to the directions of the law of Moses, and David himself headed a great procession, which conducted it in triumph, with music, and singing, and dancing, to the tabernacle prepared for it on Mount Zion. We then find David performing the functions of priest as well as king, offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and blessing the people in the name of the Lord. He also appointed certain Levites to minister before the ark continually, and to 'record, and to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel.'

In the meantime the building of Jerusalem, and its enclosure within walls of wider circuit than those which had surrounded the Jebusite city, was carried on with that zeal which distinguished all the actions of the poet king. But he could not see the contrast between his own palace, adorned with kingly magnificence, and the slight structure which sheltered the ark, without fervent desires to build for it a temple more suited to the majesty of God. Besides which, the divine oracles seemed to point at a centralization of his worship which was not yet realized; for while the 'ark of the covenant' was enshrined in the City of David, the tabernacle of the Lord was at Gibeon, and there the whole ritual of the Mosaic law continued to be observed by the high-priest and his attendant priests and Levites.

His pious wish was made known to the prophet Nathan, who at first applauded the design, but was afterwards instructed by special revelation to forbid its present accomplishment, while he foretold the perpetual establishment of the house of David, and the birth of a son who would carry out his father's purpose in more peaceful times.

There are many passages in the life of David which one cannot read without feeling how deeply we are indebted to the teaching of our Lord and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on his church for the purity of Christian morals. For while David has left on record in his Psalms the fullest evidence of that fervour of devotion and confidence in God, and that deep humility and penitence which made him the man after God's own heart, we find him living in the unrestrained practice of such habits as are now universally felt to weaken the moral sense and deteriorate the character. Already while he reigned at Hebron, the number of his wives and concubines was considerable, and we read that he took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem after he was come from Hebron. This was in direct disobedience to the law of Moses (Deut. xvii. 17), and with it was connected much of the sin and sorrow of his subsequent history. We need only refer to his evening walk 'on the roof of the king's house,' followed by the crimes of adultery and murder, to the incest committed by Amnon, and the murder committed by Absalom—too faithful imitators of their father's errors—and to the revolt of Absalom, and his incestuous intercourse with his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel, on the same spot which had been the scene of David's temptation and sin. These melancholy transactions, interspersed with victories over the Philistines and other heathen nations, and terminated by his sorrowful triumph over his own misguided son, occupied about twelve years, and brought David to the sixty-third year of his age.

Our next scene in the history of Jerusalem is one of affecting interest. About six years after the last event, David was moved, contrary to the advice of Joab, to make a census of the people of Israel and Judah, either for the purpose of taxation or to ascertain the number of fighting men he could command. By so doing he incurred the displeasure of God, who, to punish him for his fault, destroyed 70,000 of his subjects by a pestilence of three days' duration. The destroying angel was standing over Jerusalem on Mount Moriah, his hand was uplifted and ready to fall upon the city, when the Lord said, 'It is enough, stay now thine hand.' This occurred near the threshing-floor of Ornan or Araunah, a Jebusite, and probably of the blood royal of that race; at the same place, according to Jewish tradition, where Abraham had his knife unsheathed to slay his son. David himself saw the angel standing between earth and heaven with the drawn sword in his hand, and by his command, conveyed through the prophet Gad, he set up an altar on the threshing-floor of Araunah, the site of which he purchased for 600 shekels of gold (having given 50 shekels of silver for the threshing-floor itself with the oxen and materials for sacrifice). This spot thus distinguished by these two instances of God's sparing mercy, and about to be still further honoured by its near proximity to the place of the great sacrifice for the sin of the world, was selected by the Lord as the site of his future temple. David recognised the divine purpose in the fire which came down from heaven to consume his burnt-offering, and he devoted the short remainder of his life to the collection of materials for a fabric of exceeding magnificence to be reared on the spot after his death by his son Solomon.

Solomon was very young when he succeeded his father (B. C. 1015). Josephus, followed by Lightfoot, says twelve, but he was probably a few years older. No prince could display greater wisdom and magnificence than he did in the works which occupied him during the first twenty years of his reign. The Temple, for which he made preparations, with the help of Hiram, king of Tyre, during three years, and of which another Hiram, born in Tyre, but of Hebrew descent, was architect, occupied seven years and a half in building, and was completed and dedicated B. C. 1004. The ark of the covenant was brought with imposing ceremonies, and placed in the Holy of Holies beneath the wings of the cherubim. The tabernacle also, and all its sacred vessels, were conveyed thither from Gibeon, and probably deposited as sacred memorials within its walls (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5; Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 2063). The name of the high-priest at this time was Azariah; he was a descendant, perhaps grandson (cf. 1 Kings vi. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 8-10), of Zadok, who was high-priest at Gibeon when David brought the ark from Kirjath-jearim, and was of the house of Eleazar, the eldest son of Aaron—the high-priesthood of the house of Ithamar, Aaron's younger son, having been forfeited through the sins of Hophni and Phineas, and having terminated in Abiathar, from whom it was taken by Solomon for his share in the revolt of Adonijah (1 Kings ii. 35). After the completion of the Temple, Solomon surrounded Jerusalem with strong walls and towers, and filled it with magnificent structures—his own palace, the vast establishment for his chariots and horses, the palace which he built for Pharaoh's daughter, and the palace of the forest of Lebanon. In the mean time other cities were built in different parts of his dominions; he formed alliances with powerful princes, and carried on a lucrative commerce with Egypt by land, with Eastern Africa and India by the Red Sea, and with Spain and Western Africa by the Mediterranean. By his wealth and influence, and the prestige of his power, he extended the range of his dominion from the Euphrates to the Nile (1 Kings iv. 21; 2 Chron. ix. 26). At the beginning of his reign he organised a government, at the head of which was Azariah, the son (or grandson) of Zadok, who was afterwards high-priest. Lightfoot says that his office was that of chief of the Sanhedrim. This ancient and venerable council is supposed to have originated in the seventy elders appointed by Moses to help him to govern the people in the wilderness, and is believed by some to have continued throughout the whole period of the Jewish history, while others contend that it existed as a national council only from the time of the Maccabees.

But Solomon, who filled the world with the fame of his wisdom, and received so many testimonies of the favour of God during his youth and manhood, was at length insatuated by the same seductions which brought so much sorrow on his father. Towards the close of his reign—

His heart, though large,

To idols foul;

and he built temples for Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom on the right hand (i. e., the south side) of the Mount of Corruption (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). There can be no doubt that this means on one or more of the four hills lying to the east of Jerusalem, on the opposite side of the valley of the Kedron, and constituting together what we know as the Mount of Olives. The name Corruption (Hammashchith) seems to have been given to this range of hills on account of its desecration by Solomon, and to be a sort of play upon the word Hammishchah, which means unclean, and which it may be supposed to have derived from the olives for which it was famous. These temples continued to give a character of unholiness to the ground which was afterwards made so holy by the footsteps of our Lord, till Josiah removed them, about 360 years afterwards. The same dishonour was done to the Valley of Hinnom on its south side, by the establishment there of the worship of Molech (2 Kings xxiii. 10).

Grievous troubles fell upon Solomon as a punishment for these sins, the worst of them all being the threatened disruption of his kingdom under his son and successor Rehoboam. Egypt, the old enemy of Israel, was the fosterer of this revolution; Jeroboam, who had been announced by prophecy as its instrument, having sought shelter there from the expected indignation of Solomon. After Solomon's death, the separation of the kingdoms took place through Rehoboam's weakness and folly, and it was followed (B. C. 972), in the fifth year of his reign, by an invasion of his kingdom, and a siege of Jerusalem by Shishak, king of Egypt. Rehoboam made no attempt to withstand him, but cowered within the walls of the city, which Shishak plundered of all its treasures. He then retired without doing further injury to its inhabitants.

His grandson Asa was a thoughtful and high-minded prince, who did much by his zeal and influence to banish idolatry and its attendant gross immorality from Jerusalem. He repelled a vast Cushite army which invaded his kingdom, and enriched himself with its spoils, much of which he devoted to the service of the Temple, in place of the treasures of which it had been rifled by Shishak. But he made use of these same dedicated treasures to purchase the help of Benhadad, king of Syria, against Baasha, king of Israel, who made war upon him, B. C. 930, and imprisoned the prophet Hanani, who reproached him with this sin.

His son Jehoshaphat was an upright and most powerful monarch, who promoted religion and the administration of justice, and gained great influence over neighbouring nations; but he acted inconsistently in making alliances both with Ahab and Ahaziah, the wicked kings of Israel, and married his son Joram to Athaliah, Ahab's daughter. The influence of this wretched marriage pervaded the three following reigns of Joram, Ahaziah, his son by Athaliah, and Athaliah herself, who made her way to the throne by destroying all the princes of the house of Judah except the infant Joash, her own grandchild, who was snatched out of her hands, and educated in the Temple till he was seven years old. She and her sons (2 Chron. xxiv. 7)—Lightfoot interprets natural sons, and Hales adherents—partially destroyed the Temple, and took from it the holy things, which they dedicated to the service of Baal. But she was overthrown and put to death by Jehoiada, the high-priest and guardian of young Joash, B. C. 878.

The temple and worship of Baal were immediately destroyed, and as long as Jehoiada lived, Joash submitted himself to his guidance, and did much for the good of his people and the restoration of the house of the Lord. But he was a weak prince, and on Jehoiada's death fell into idolatry, and put Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, to death, for his testimony against it. He bought off Hazael from an invasion of Jerusalem by the gift of the treasures of the Temple, and perished by the hands of his own servants, B. C. 839.

His son and successor Amaziah made war against Joash, king of Israel, who defeated and took him prisoner, broke down 400 cubits of the wall of Jerusalem, and plundered the Temple. He died the victim of a conspiracy, B. C. 810.

Uzziah, his son, was very successful in war, and greatly strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, which he furnished with engines for throwing great stones and arrows. His long reign of fifty-two years was the age of the prophets Hosea, Joel, Amos, and Isaiah, and was marked by the occurrence of three terrible judgments, which had been the subject of prophetic warnings—an earthquake;

a plague of locusts, caterpillars, and cankerworms; and an extreme drought. Uzziah died a leper for having dared to burn incense on the altar of incense in the Temple, B.C. 758.

The reigns of Jotham and Ahaz followed—the former a good prince, who built the gate between the king's house and the Temple; the latter an idolater, who caused his sons to pass through the fire to Molech, and by trying to gain the help of the Assyrians against Israel gave them a footing in Jerusalem. Isaiah and Micah continued to prophesy during these reigns.

Hezekiah succeeded Ahaz, and was an eminent reformer of religion and restorer of the Temple and temple worship, not only destroying every vestige of idolatry in Judah, but inviting all the people of Israel, in spite of the laughter and derision of many of them, to come up and keep the passover in Jerusalem.

Assyria was now at the height of her glory and ambition. She had already, B.C. 721, taken possession of Samaria and carried the ten tribes into captivity. She had acquired an ascendancy over Judah, and was endeavouring to subjugate Egypt. Hezekiah, however, had resisted her authority, and Sennacherib, the Assyrian monarch, stopped in his progress towards Egypt to reassert his supremacy over Judah and obtain tangible proofs of submission from her king. Hezekiah was alarmed, and once more the Temple was stripped of its treasures to avert the anger of a heathen conqueror. But Sennacherib, so far from being appeased by this gift, sent his messenger Rabshakeh, not improbably an apostate Jew, to threaten Jerusalem with destruction unless its inhabitants would submit to his dictation and consent to migrate where he pleased. After the delivery of this message Rabshakeh retired, and the consternation of the people was only relieved by the assurance of Divine aid given to them by the prophet Isaiah. It was probably after this that Hezekiah constructed his famous works for drawing the waters of the Gihon from their source into the city to supply the citizens, and distress the enemy, in the event of a siege.

After Sennacherib's attempt on Egypt he returned towards Jerusalem, approaching it from the west, and this time encamped his whole vast army near its walls, in a place which was known long afterwards as the camp of the Assyrians. It was made famous by his terrible and complete discomfiture, 185,000 of his host having died by the visitation of God in one night. Hezekiah, meanwhile, had recovered, by Divine interposition, from a disorder of great malignity; and the report of his danger and miraculous restoration having spread as far as Babylon, Merodach-Baladan, its viceroy under the Assyrian king, sent messengers to congratulate him on the event. Hezekiah, in the thoughtless exuberance of his feelings, showed them all his treasures. The treasures of Jerusalem seem at all times to have been famous, quickly replaced after spoliation, and ever offering a fresh bait to the cupidity of invaders; but it is probable that objects were displayed at this time which had hitherto escaped notice.

By this act of ostentation Hezekiah incurred the severe displeasure of God, and was forewarned by the prophet that all these things, together with many of his own descendants, would one day be carried captive to Babylon. This prophecy received a partial fulfilment in the reign of his son Manasseh, who re-established idolatry under its most repulsive forms, for he was himself carried captive to Babylon by the Assyrians, and there repented of his sin. After a captivity of twelve years he was released, and on his return to Jerusalem strengthened the fortifications of the city and laboured to extirpate the idolatry which he had established. His son Amon, however, revived it, and continuing impenitent, was killed through a conspiracy of his own servants (B.C. 641).

Josiah his son began his reign at eight years of age, under the tutelage of the high-priest. He was one of the best kings of Judah, and began at an early age to seek after the God of his father David. Before he was eighteen he had destroyed the idols and places of idolatrous worship throughout all the land of Israel as well as Judah; and then began to repair the breaches of the house of the Lord. The discovery of the books of the law by Hilkiah the high-priest, during the progress of these repairs, led to the celebration of a passover in strict accordance with the Mosaic rule, after a neglect of centuries. But Jerusalem and its kings were to become involved in the mighty struggle which at this time agitated the rival powers of the East. The Medes and Babylonians had risen against Assyria and were besieging Nineveh; and the Egyptian Pharaoh Necho took advantage of the distress of Assyria to make an attempt on Carchemish—one of its important posts on the Euphrates. As he was advancing from the sea coast, through the valley of Esdraelon, for this purpose, Josiah encountered him at Megiddo, and there received his death wound. He was, however, carried to die at Jerusalem. Of the three sons whom he left—Eliakim, Jehoahaz or Shallum, and Zedekiah—Jehoahaz was elected king by the people; but Pharaoh Necho deposed him, and carried him captive into Egypt on his return from his expedition into Assyria, having taken Carchemish (B.C. 608). He also placed his elder brother Eliakim upon the throne, changing his name to Jehoiakim; and he imposed a heavy fine upon the people.

The next visit paid to Jerusalem was that of Nebuchadnezzar. It is doubtful at what time, but probably after the victory which he in his turn obtained over Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish (B.C. 605), in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. He obliged Jehoiakim to acknowledge himself his subject, and took some treasure and captives to Babylon, among the rest Daniel and the 'three Hebrew children.' But Jehoiakim rebelling three years afterwards, Jerusalem was beset by the tributaries of Nebuchadnezzar, who carried on a harassing warfare against it until his death, in the eleventh year of his reign. His son Jehoiakim succeeded him, and Jerusalem being now besieged by Nebuchadnezzar in person, he came out with his mother, servants, princes, and officers, and delivered himself into his hands. Then it was that Nebuchadnezzar took possession of all the treasures of the king's house and of the Temple, and carried away from Jerusalem all the princes and chief men, as well as all the ingenious craftsmen and artificers, and all that were strong and apt for war, leaving only the poorest of the people; and over these he set an uncle of Jehoiachin to whom he gave the name of Zedekiah, and 'made him swear by God' that he would remain his subject (Ezek. xvii. 14). This oath Zedekiah (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13) broke, trusting in the help of Pharaoh Hophra, king of Egypt; and thereby not only provoked the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar but incurred the anger of God. Nebuchadnezzar invested Jerusalem on the tenth day of the tenth month (B.C. 588), in the ninth year of Zedekiah. Engines of war raised on heights about the walls hurled weighty missiles into the city, the walls were battered with rams, and famine and pestilence prevailed within them. There was a temporary lull in the siege, during which the Chaldean army went to meet the Egyptians who were coming to the relief of Jerusalem, but the Egyptians returned back without an encounter, and the siege was resumed. The wall was broken on the ninth day of the fourth month of the second year of the siege, and Zedekiah secretly took flight, passing over the Mount of Olives towards the Jordan; but he was taken near Jericho and conveyed to Riblah in Coele-Syria, on the extreme north of Palestine, where Nebuchadnezzar was watching from afar the siege of Tyre. There his two sons were slain before his eyes, and he was deprived of sight and carried to Babylon. There also were slain Seraiah the chief priest and Zephaniah the second priest, three doorkeepers of the Temple, five officers of the court, two of the army, and sixty persons of note who were found in Jerusalem. The rest of the people, with the remaining treasure of the Temple—some of it broken in pieces for facility of removal, including the great brazen sea and the two pillars Jachin and Boaz—were carried away. This was the third great deportation of captives and treasure from Jerusalem to Babylon. It was effected by Nebuzaradan about a month after the siege. He completed his work by burning the Temple and the city, and razing the walls to the ground. From this time the land 'enjoyed her sabbaths' till the end of the seventy years.

Sacred and profane history agree with the general tradition of the East, and the testimony of ancient inscriptions, in asserting the fact that in the latter part of the 6th century before Christ a prince named Cyrus, of the hitherto unimportant state of Persia, conquered the greater part of Asia. This prince, whom the Lord by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah had named as his 'shepherd' and his 'anointed one' 200 years before, wrested Babylon out of the hands of Belshazzar (538 B.C.) at the very moment when he was profaning the vessels of the Lord's house by using them at his impious revels. The successes of this conqueror had been foretold in the ancient writings of a people whom he found in captivity within its walls, and he was glad to co-operate with the Divine Being who had thus singled him out as his instrument in restoring that people to their own land and enabling them to raise again the Temple and the city on which their hearts still dwelt with such tender recollection.

From a comparison of Ezra i. 1 with Daniel ii. 1 we may infer that after the capture of Babylon Cyrus set 'Darius the Mede' upon the throne, perhaps conjointly with himself, giving him the dignity of the position while he undertook its toils and responsibilities. Certain it is, that in the first year of his own reign he invited any among the Jews who might feel so disposed to go up to Jerusalem and build the house of the Lord God of Israel, and directed all those that remained to assist them liberally with treasure, while he restored to them all the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from the Temple. Joshua and Zerubbabel were the leaders of the noble band of 42,360, comprising within it members of the royal family, priests, Levites, servants of the Temple, and private persons, which set out from Babylon to re-colonise the country of their forefathers.

Seven months were spent in the necessary work of settling themselves in the different cities of the holy land to which their families belonged, after which they all collected together at the ruins of Jerusalem. Their first work on arriving there was to set up an altar to the Lord, their next to lay the foundation of the Temple. They were soon hindered by the officious zeal of some of their neighbours, who first proposed to assist them in their work and afterwards represented it as a source of danger to the Persian empire. Other casualties, incident to all new settlements, delayed their operations, and at length the representations of their enemies led to a stoppage of the works by order of Artaxerxes (the pseudo-Smerdis who succeeded Cambyses, B.C. 522); but, urged by the exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah, who reproached the people with living in 'ceiled houses' while the Temple lay waste, Zerubbabel and Joshua began the work again in the second year of Darius Hystaspes; and on a report of their proceedings being sent to that prince by Tatnai, the Persian governor of the province, he caused a search to be made, and the original decree of Cyrus for the building of the Temple being discovered, he not only ordered it to proceed, but directed Tatnai and his subordinate officers to co-operate heartily in the work; which went on so prosperously that it was completed, and the feast of its dedication kept, in the sixth year of his reign (B.C. 515).

An interval of fifty-eight years follows, of which we have no account, but, on the first day of the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (457 B.C.), Ezra, a priest of the line of Eleazar, with a small party of seventeen or eighteen hundred men of all classes, left Babylon furnished with a commission from Artaxerxes to collect money for the temple service, and inquire into the state of the Jews at Jerusalem. His journey occupied four months, and on his arrival he found it necessary to effect an important and very difficult reform among the people who were already settled in the land; for priests, Levites, and persons of all classes had broken the Mosaic law by connecting themselves with women of heathen parentage. The matter was solemnly brought before the Lord and the assembled people with prayers, humiliations, and confessions of sin. A plan of examination into the several cases was agreed upon, and the evil was put an end to by the voluntary submission of those who had transgressed.

Eleven years afterwards Jerusalem was visited by another eminent reformer, Nehemiah, a great Jewish officer of the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Morally and externally the Holy City was at this time in a lamentable condition, its walls unbuilt, its houses in ruins, and mixed marriages and other bad practices continued. A report of the state of things determined Nehemiah, with the sanction and credentials of his royal master, who appointed him Tirshatha, or governor of the district, to visit Jerusalem. His arrival caused dismay to the principal foreigners, one of whom had a daughter married into the high-priest's family. On the third day after his arrival he made a secret inspection of the walls by night, and soon afterwards called all the people together, and exhorted them to lay themselves out with one accord for the work of rebuilding them; and they undertook this work with so much system, zeal, and perseverance, that in spite of the opposition, both open and secret, of the powerful foreigners, which obliged them to build with arms in their hands and be ready at any moment for a hostile interruption, the whole wall was finished in fifty-two days. Other work was done in the meantime, usury renounced, restitution made, a genealogical enumeration of the people recorded, and strict and self-denying economy introduced. Public readings and explanations of the law by Ezra, and an appointed staff of priests and Levites, were set on foot. The Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated for the first time since the days of Joshua (Neh. viii. 17), a solemn fast with confession of sin was held, and a covenant of obedience made and signed in the name of the people, of princes, priests, and Levites. The numbers who were to live at Jerusalem were appointed, and an unceasing effort made by the great and good Nehemiah to correct, by his personal influence, every practice inconsistent with the character of the people of God.

In the last chapter of the book of Nehemiah, which closes the inspired records, we learn that one of the sons, i.e., grandsons, of Joiada the son of Eliashib, the high-priest, was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite. This disposition to an admixture with powerful foreigners on the part of the rulers of the people is a key to much of their subsequent history.

Eliashib was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his son Joiada, and he in time by his son Jonathan or Johanan (Neh. xii. 11, 22), who killed his own brother Joshua in the Temple for having endeavoured through Persian influence to supplant him in his office. Jonathan had two sons, Jaddua and Manasseh. It was Manasseh who had married the daughter of the Horonite. He seems notwithstanding this to have had at one time some share in the high-priesthood at Jerusalem (Josephus), but being obliged to give it up, probably through the same influence which caused the expulsion of Tobiah from the Temple (Neh. xiii. 8), he became the first priest of the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim. Jaddua succeeded Jonathan. He is the high-priest who is said to have met Alexander the Great, with a company of priests in white robes, when he came from the siege of Tyre with hostile intentions to Jerusalem. Jaddua had refused to assist him against Tyre on account of his allegiance to Darius, but he obtained his favour and important immunities for the Jews by shewing him the prophecies concerning himself in the book of Daniel. Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I. the year before the death of Alexander.

The short-lived empire which Alexander raised on the ruins of the empire of Persia split at his death into four kingdoms (Dan. xi. 1-4), governed by four of his generals. These were Thrace, ruled by Lysimachus, Asia Minor by Antigonius, Syria by Seleucus Nicator, and Egypt by Ptolemy Soter. In 320 B.C. Ptolemy Soter made an incursion into Syria and took Jerusalem, his conquest being facilitated by the refusal of the Jews to fight on the Sabbath. They suffered severely afterwards, and multitudes of the people were carried captive to Egypt and Northern Africa.

The possession of Jerusalem was secured to the Ptolemies by the defeat of Antigonius at Ipsus, B.C. 301, and remained in their hands for more than 100 years. In the following year Simon the Just succeeded Onias I. in the high-priesthood. He adorned the Temple, extended and deepened its foundations, and strengthened the walls of the city. Under the peaceful rule of the Ptolemies Jerusalem increased in wealth and prosperity.

Philadelphus, the immediate successor of Soter, caused the Hebrew Bible to be translated into Greek [SEPTUAGINT.] He also made many presents to the Temple. This was during the high-priesthood of Eleazar, who had succeeded his brother Simon the Just, B.C. 291; Eleazar, the brother, was succeeded by Manasseh, the uncle, and he by Onias II., the son of Simon the Just. Onias II. was of a mean and covetous disposition; he allowed the tribute payable to Egypt to fall into arrear for a long time, and when Ptolemy Euergetes sent to reclaim it, he allowed his nephew Joseph to go to Egypt and plead for its remission. Joseph not only succeeded in this object, but obtained from the court of Egypt for himself and his family the valuable privilege of farming the revenues of Judaea, Samaria, Phœnicia, and Cœle-Syria. This was a source of such great wealth to his house that it soon rivalled that of the high-priest in power and influence, while the quarrels and intrigues which this rivalry occasioned provoked the interference of the ruling state.

From Onias II. the high-priesthood descended successively to Simon II. his son, and Onias III. his grandson. During the high-priesthood of Simon II., Ptolemy Philopator, who had succeeded Euergetes (B.C. 221), visited Jerusalem, and offered a sacrifice in the court of the Temple, but to his extreme indignation was prevented by Simon from entering the sanctuary. This offence cost the Jews a good deal of persecution and the loss of many immunities which they had previously enjoyed.

But the power soon passed into other hands. Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, the great grandson of Alexander's general Seleucus Nicator, had already endeavoured without success to wrest from Ptolemy Philopator the provinces of Phœnicia, Palestine, and Cœle-Syria, which he claimed as belonging to his own kingdom. The attempt was renewed with various results, when Philopator was succeeded by Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old (B.C. 105), but it was not till B.C. 198 that he was finally successful. In that year he gained a decisive victory over Scopas the Egyptian general. Jerusalem opened her gates to receive him, and the Jews were glad to help him in reducing the garrison which Scopas had the year before set over their city.

As long as Antiochus lived, and in the first year of his son Seleucus Philopator, Jerusalem enjoyed great prosperity under its excellent high-priest Onias III. But Seleucus was induced by a wretched informer named Simon to attempt to gain possession of the treasures of the Temple. His own treasurer Heliodorus, who afterwards murdered him, was sent to execute this act of spoliation, but was deterred from its performance by a terrible appearance, which is recorded in 2 Maccab. iii. But the whole story is rendered doubtful by the silence of Josephus.

Seleucus Philopator was succeeded by his brother, the detestable Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 175. Onias III., who was then high-priest, had two brothers, Joshua, and another also named Onias. Joshua changed his name to Jason, and having purchased the high-priesthood from Antiochus, forced his brother out of the office, and did his utmost to introduce into Jerusalem the morals and customs of a Greek city. He established a gymnasium, and induced his young countrymen to practise the Grecian games, and to pay court to the king by calling themselves Antiochians. Jason was in his turn ousted from the high-priesthood by the third brother Onias, who took the name of Menelaus, and robbed the temple to pay to Antiochus the price of his office. Thence ensued party riots and merciless slaughter. Antiochus vengeance on the partizans of Pompey. Massacre and pillage followed. The Temple was once more robbed of its treasures, and a great train of captives carried to Antioch. Two years afterwards there was a fresh attack upon Jerusalem. Fresh slaughter, fresh pillage, and burning of the city. A Syrian garrison seized and fortified a height within the city called the Acra.* The Temple was profaned by idolatrous rites, enactments were made against the practice of the Jewish ritual, persecution and martyrdom followed.

All this led to an insurrection, which was begun at some distance from Jerusalem by an aged man of priestly family named Mattathias, the father of five sons. His noble opposition to the tyrant aroused a war of independence, in the first year of which he died. But he left behind him a family of heroes. His son Judas gained signal victories over the Syrians, and thereby obtained for himself and his race the surname of Maccabeus, from the Hebrew word Makkab, a hammer. Having conquered Lysias, a general of Antiochus, at Bethzur (B.C. 165), he repaired to Jerusalem, and found the sacred enclosures of the Temple encumbered with ruins, the altar of burnt-offering surmounted by an altar to Jupiter, the sanctuary open and empty, and the whole place overgrown with shrubs and herbage.

He cleansed and repaired it, and it was once more dedicated to God (B.C. 165), three years after its desecration. He also fortified the Temple, and placed in it a Jewish garrison, the Syrian garrison retaining possession of the Acra, and annoying the people by frequent sallies. Judas attempted the siege of this place the year after, but was withdrawn from it by an attack made on Bethzur, one of his own strongholds, by Antiochus Eupator, who had just succeeded his father Epiphanes. His small force was defeated, and his brother Eleazer killed by one of the elephants of the king's army near Bethzur, and he was himself obliged to retire within the fortress of the Temple. There he was besieged for a considerable time, but at last accepted the terms offered to him by Antiochus, who was called away to resist the claim of his cousin Demetrius to the throne of Syria. Demetrius, who was in fact the lawful heir, was successful, and Antiochus and his general Lysias were slain. Representations against Judas were immediately made to the new king by Alcimus (Eliakim), a Hellenizing Jew of priestly descent, who, by the influence of Lysias, had been appointed high-priest on the death of Menelaus. Demetrius sent him back to Jerusalem with Bacchides, one of his own officers, and a large force, to act against Judas. But nothing was accomplished beyond the murder of sixty of the pious Jews who trusted themselves to Alcimus, because he was high-priest and of the family of Aaron. Demetrius sent another army against Judas under the Syrian general Nicanor, but Judas was now victorious, and Nicanor obliged to take refuge in the Acra. From that stronghold he sallied out on one occasion and cruelly interrupted the worshippers in the Temple, but having obtained reinforcements, and again met Judas in the field, he was beaten and killed, and his head and right arm carried away and nailed up in Jerusalem. Judas Maccabeus died B.C. 161, leaving his brothers Jonathan and Simon to carry on the work he had begun.

There were now two parties at Jerusalem—the pious Jews or Chasidim, a word Grecised into built, was the original Mount Sion. The former lay to the north, the latter to the west, of Mount Moriah, a hill of lower elevation, which was occupied by the Temple and its precincts, and is sometimes called the 'Mountain of the House of the Lord.'

Assidæi, connected with the Maccabees, and the so-called impious or Hellenizing faction, under the lead of Alcimus, who, acting with Bacchides, strengthened the Acra, and placed within it as hostages the children of some of the principal families of Judæa. He was on the point of making some objectionable alteration in the structure of the Temple when he died; after which Bacchides returned to Antioch, and things remained quiet at Jerusalem for some years, the Syrian garrison, however, still holding the Acra and retaining the hostages.

In 153 B.C. there was a new claimant for the throne of Syria—Alexander Balas, calling himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. This added to the power of the Maccabees, for both parties courted them; so that Jonathan was able to release the hostages from the Acra, to repair the city, and fortify Mount Sion. He was also appointed to the high-priesthood by Alexander; while Demetrius, recognising Jerusalem as 'holy and free,' and renouncing all right to the Acra, not only freed the Temple from taxation, but richly endowed it and authorised its repair, and promised that Jerusalem should be fortified at his own expense.

Jonathan, however, was so mixed up for some years with the contentions for the throne of Syria, and so enormous was the strength of the Acra, that it was not till 142 B.C.—two years after his death—that it was forced by famine to capitulate. Simon, who was now high-priest, having thus fully accomplished the independence of Judæa, demolished the Acra and lowered the height on which it stood. He also built a very strong tower—the Baris, afterwards called Antonia—close to the wall of the Temple, to command its site, and in this tower he resided with his followers. No event of importance occurred at Jerusalem till his death, B.C. 135. He was treacherously killed, with two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, by his son-in-law Ptolemy, just as he had succeeded in resisting an attempt of Antiochus VII., second son of Demetrius Soter, to regain possession of Judæa. Simon was succeeded as high-priest and chief by John Hyrcanus, his remaining son; and Antiochus immediately repeated his attempt upon Judæa. Jerusalem was invested; a hundred towers were raised on its north side to hurl projectiles into the city, and a deep ditch made in front of the towers to impede the sallies of the besieged. Hyrcanus was induced, by a failure of water and the prospect of a long siege, to send all the aged and infirm out of the city; and on the approach of the Feast of Tabernacles he requested Antiochus to grant a truce for its celebration. The request was complied with, and further negotiations led to an honourable capitulation and a peace, B.C. 133. Hostages and a heavy payment were required by Antiochus, and the city walls were dismantled. But the walls were afterwards repaired, and Hyrcanus ruled in great peace and prosperity for many years. He had belonged originally to the sect of the Pharisees, but he afterwards became a Sadducee, and took their part strongly against his former friends. During the wars of his long government, he subdued the Idumeans—whom he obliged to conform to the laws and customs of the Jews—and Samaria, which he razed to the ground. He died B.C. 106.

A short pedigree of the descendants of John Hyrcanus will here be useful:—

Aristobulus was the first of the Maccabees who assumed the title of king. He was a promoter of Greek habits and manners, as his name and surname indicate. His death was hastened by remorse for the murder of his brother Antigonus, whom he caused to be put to death in a subterraneous passage between the Baris and the Temple. During the reign of his brother, Alexander Jannæus, who was chiefly engaged in distant wars, Jerusalem was a scene of fierce strife between Pharisees and Sadducees; and once, at the instigation of the Pharisees, Alexander himself was pelted with citrons while performing the high-priest's office during the Feast of Tabernacles. This led to cruel retaliation, and 6000 citizens were put to death. On a subsequent occasion, 800 of his opponents were crucified, and their wives and children slain before their eyes, while he and his concubines feasted in their presence. But, perceiving that the Pharisees were the more powerful of the two sects, he directed his queen Alexandra, to whom he bequeathed his authority, to join their party. She thus secured to herself the peaceable possession of the throne at his death, while Hyrcanus took the high-priesthood, and Aristobulus the command of the army. At her death Hyrcanus claimed the crown, but yielded it to his brother after a few months' possession. He was, however, persuaded by Antipater, an Idumean noble who had been brought up at his father's court, to seek the protection and help of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea. Aretas, at his instigation, invaded Judæa and besieged Jerusalem, B.C. 65, but was interrupted by Scaurus, one of Pompey's lieutenants, whose aid Aristobulus had purchased by a gift of 400 talents. It was in the same year that Antiochus XIII. was conquered, and Syria constituted a Roman province by Pompey, and the rival brothers appeared to plead their cause before the great Roman general. Aristobulus saw that Pompey was disposed to favour Hyrcanus, and returned to Jerusalem to prepare for resistance; but thinking it hopeless, went to meet Pompey as he approached the city, and offered to surrender. Pompey sent on Gabinius to take possession, but he was refused admittance, and Aristobulus was carried there a prisoner. The city was now in possession of Hyrcanus, who received Pompey with open arms; but the Temple was occupied by the friends of Aristobulus, who sustained a determined and most severe siege with admirable courage and magnanimity. The temple-worship was carried on all the time with the greatest exactness, and had it not been for the opportunity they gave their assailants to make their approaches and repair their engines on the Sabbath, the Roman battering-rams might never have been brought to bear against the works. But a breach was made at the end of three months, and, after great slaughter, the Temple was taken by Pompey, who was amazed, on exploring the Holy of Holies, to find there no image of any God. He left the sacred things and treasures untouched, but imposed a tribute upon the city and demolished its walls, B.C. 63. Hyrcanus was allowed to govern as high-priest, but without the title of king, and Aristobulus and his sons, Alexander and Antigonus, were carried to Rome. Hyrcanus governed peacefully for a great many years under the favour of Rome, and by the advice of Antipater the Idumean, and about the year 47 B.C. received the title of Ethnarch from Julius Cæsar, together with confirmation in the high-priesthood, for help given to his ally Mithridates. Cæsar also made Antipater procurator of Judæa, and allowed the walls of Jerusalem to be rebuilt.

But some events of importance had happened in the meantime. Crassus had visited Jerusalem, and rifled the Temple of its treasures on his way to Parthia; and Gabinius, who had been made proconsul of Syria, had established in Jerusalem one of the five Sanhedrims or Senates, by which the country was to be governed. Four years later Antipater was poisoned by Malichus, a man who owed him his life. Malichus was in his turn assassinated by order of Herod, the young son of Antipater. This young man had been made governor of Galilee when his father was made procurator of Judæa. He had early displayed his arrogance when brought before the Sanhedrim to answer the charge of having put Jewish citizens to death without a trial, and he now bid defiance to the friends of Malichus, who sought to expel him and his brother Phasael from Jerusalem. About this time Antigonus, the only surviving son of Aristobulus, appeared in Judæa to assert his claim to the throne, and a Parthian army under Pacorus, son of Arsaces XIV., encouraged by the distracted state of the Roman commonwealth after the death of Cæsar, invaded Syria. Antigonus applied for help to the Parthian, and, with the aid received, penetrated into Jerusalem, took Phasael prisoner, forced Herod to fly, and being himself made king, bit off the ear of the aged Hyrcanus while he knelt before him as a suppliant—to prevent him by this mutilation from ever again acting as high-priest (B.C. 40).

Herod fled to Rome, and through the influence of Antony and Octavius (afterwards the Emperor Augustus), obtained a decree of the senate, appointing him king of Judæa. He soon appeared with an army before the walls of Jerusalem, but events called him away, and it was not till B.C. 37 that he began the siege, which was conducted much as Pompey's had been twenty-six years before. The invading army approached from Jericho, but attacked the city from the level country on the north. Similar works were carried on, similar courage displayed by the besieged. Herod absented himself for a time to celebrate his marriage with Mariamne, the granddaughter both of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and the niece of Antigonus, but returned with renewed zeal, and an army of 50,000 men under Sosius, the Roman governor of Syria.

The Temple and city, all except the impregnable Baris, where Antigonus lay concealed, were taken by storm. There was dreadful slaughter, and Herod had to stand with a drawn sword at the door of the sanctuary to prevent its plunder and desecration by the Roman soldiers. Antigonus obtained his life from Sosius, but he was afterwards put to death by Antony. Herod also put to death all the chiefs of the Asmonean party, including the whole Sanhedrim except the two great Hebrew doctors, Hillel and Shammai. He appointed to the high-priesthood a Babylonian Jew named Ananel, but displaced him afterwards, at the earnest solicitation of Mariamne, in favour of her brother Aristobulus, a boy of sixteen. The people hailed the appointment of the young Asmonean with too much pleasure; he was therefore put to death while bathing, and Ananel reinstated in his dignity.

B.C. 34 Jerusalem was visited by Cleopatra on her return from the Euphrates. Three years later a great part of the city was destroyed, and ten or twenty thousand persons killed, by an earthquake. In B.C. 30 Herod put Hyrcanus to death, and in the next year Mariamne. Soon afterwards he built a theatre and instituted quinquennial games. This innovation nearly cost him his life by assassination. He enlarged and strengthened the Baris, and named it Antonia in honour of Antony. In B.C. 25 there was a famine in Judæa, and Herod sacrificed great treasure to procure corn from Egypt, for distribution among the people, and for seed. He married a second Mariamne, the daughter of an obscure priest named Simon, whom he raised to the high-priesthood. He built and fortified a new palace, and, after two years' preparation, laid the foundation of his magnificent Temple, the principal buildings of which were completed B.C. 9. He also built three towers of immense strength and size, which he called Hippicus, Mariamne, and Phasaelus, at the north-west corner of the city, where it was most exposed to attack, and one, which he called Psephinus, as an outwork, a little to the north. B.C. 7 he fixed a large golden eagle (as an emblem of the Roman rule) over the entrance to the sanctuary. This, as a breach of the second commandment, was most offensive to the Jews, and it was torn down in open day at the instigation of two of the chief Rabbis, who were in consequence burnt to death by Herod's orders. His sons, Aristobulus and Alexander, were put to death on pretence of plotting against him, B.C. 6, and his son Antipater, who did plot against him, five days before his own, which occurred a few months after the birth of our Lord, in B.C. 4 of our era. The succession of high-priests during Herod's reign was Ananel, Aristobulus, Ananel a second time, Jesus son of Faneus, Simon son of Boethus, Matthias son of Theophilus, Jozarus son of Simon.

Archelaus (the son of Malthace) now reigned in the room of his father Herod, though he never received or assumed the title of king. He began his rule with great moderation. But this encouraged the people to make demands for a remission of taxes and liberation of prisoners. The crowds who had assembled for the Passover made these demands more formidable, and they were not put down without recourse to arms, and the massacre of 3000 persons. Another disturbance, accompanied by fresh slaughter and plunder of the sacred treasures, took place soon afterwards, while Archelaus was at Rome, whither he had gone to obtain the ratification of his father's will.* He was appointed ethnarch† by the senate, and on his return made Eleazar high-priest, instead of his brother Jozar; but was himself deposed, and banished to Vienne in Gaul, on account of his tyranny, A.D. 6, mainly at the instigation of his brothers, Herod Antipas and Philip. Judæa now became a Roman province under the governor of Syria, and was administered by a procurator or lieutenant-governor of its own. But the procurator resided at Cæsarea, leaving the affairs of Jerusalem to be managed by the high-priest and Sanhedrim—an arrangement which greatly tended to promote its peace and quiet for the next twenty years. Quirinus, called by St. Luke Cyrenius, was governor of Syria, and Coponius procurator of Judæa, immediately after the deposition of Archelaus. Coponius was followed by M. Ambivius, Annus Rufus, Val. Gratus, and Pontius Pilate, in succession. The latter departed from the custom of his predecessors in bringing his troops to winter quarters at Jerusalem, and a riot was the immediate consequence. The eagles and images of the emperor on the Roman standards excited such commotion, that Pilate was obliged to withdraw them, and the same thing happened in the case of some shields consecrated to heathen deities, and inscribed with their names,

* It is to this circumstance—Archelaus going to Rome to be confirmed in the kingdom left to him by his father—that our Lord alludes in the parable, Luke xix. 12.

† This word, which means ruler of a nation, and tetrarch, which means ruler of the fourth part of a country, were given by the Romans to the native princes of tributary states which were not of sufficient importance to be governed by kings. They bore much the same relations to the Roman government which the great Zemindars of India bear to our own. Tetrarch is an ancient Greek title, and was originally applied to the several rulers of the four districts of Thessaly, Phthiotis, Histiaotis, Thessalotis, and Pelasgiotis.

which were hung up in the palace at Jerusalem. Another disturbance was occasioned by the appropriation of a large sum of money, dedicated to God by voluntary offering [CORBAN; see Mark vii. 11], to the construction of an aqueduct.

The received and most probable date of our blessed Lord's crucifixion is A.D. 29 [CHRONOLOGY], when—dating his birth B.C. 4—he would be thirty-three years of age.* The succession of high-priests up to this date from Eleazar, who was appointed by Archelaus, was as follows:—Jesus son of Sie, Jozar a second time, Ananus (called Annas in N. T.), Ishmael son of Phabi, Eleazar son of Ananus, Simon son of Kamith, † Caiaphas, called also Joseph. Ananus was appointed by Quirinus, and his successors by the contemporary procurators of Judæa. It was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, the brother of Archelaus, who was at Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion.

Pontius Pilate was removed from his office on account of his tyrannical conduct A.D. 36, and thereupon Vitellius, the governor of Syria, visited Jerusalem and conferred some benefits upon the people.

The Emperor Tiberius was succeeded by Caligula, A.D. 37; with him Herod Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, had formed an intimacy at Rome, where, like many others of his family, he resided in his youth. On the accession of Caligula he received from him several of the Syrian tetrarchies, and was able by his influence to save Jerusalem from the dishonour of having a statue of the emperor set up in the Temple. On the accession of Claudius, who had been his schoolfellow, Judæa and Samaria were added to his dominions (A.D. 41), and one of his first acts in coming to take possession of his kingdom was to visit the Temple, where he offered sacrifice, and dedicated a gold chain which had been given to him by Caligula.‡

Herod Agrippa, like his grandfather Herod the Great, added greatly to the outward magnificence of Jerusalem. His chief work was to increase the size of the city by encircling with a massive wall an important suburb called Bezetha, which had sprung up on its northern side. The work was interrupted for a time by orders from Rome, but was afterwards completed, and some of the great stones of which it was built are still to be seen in their original position. But an evil fame attends him for his treatment of the Christians. He began by killing James, and proceeded to take Peter, hoping perhaps in this way to exterminate the whole sect, when he was stopped by Divine interposition. His own death, under fearful circumstances, soon followed (A.D. 44), Acts xii. During this and the following years Jerusalem was visited with a severe famine, which was alleviated by the contributions of the Christians of Antioch, and of Helena, widow of Monobazus, king of Adiabene, who had become a convert to Judaism.

Herod Agrippa, at his death, left a son aged seventeen, who was then receiving his education at the court of Claudius; but as he was too young to take the government of so troubled a kingdom, Cuspius Fadus was made procurator of Judæa, while the superintendence of the Temple and the right of appointing the high-priest was conferred on Herod, king of Chalcis, the brother of the late king of Judæa. Cuspius Fadus was succeeded about A.D. 46 by Tiberius Alexander, the Alabarch, or chief magistrate of the Jews at Alexandria, and he in A.D. 48 by Ventidius Cumanus.

A strong feeling of jealousy had long been growing up between the Jews and Romans. The former would not tolerate the overbearing interference which the latter would exercise in the details of their religion. It was with great difficulty that they retained in their hands the custody of the high-priest's robes, and this year the Roman policy of placing a cohort in the portico (or cloisters) of the Temple to prevent disturbance at the Passover led to a frightful tumult and destruction of life, the people trampling on one another in their endeavour to escape through the narrow streets from the great body of troops which Cumanus thought it right to bring up and place in the Antonia after the first outbreak.

Herod, king of Chalcis, died in the same year, and a year or two later the younger Agrippa succeeded him in that kingdom, as well as in the government of the Temple. He afterwards resigned Chalcis for the tetrarchies which had been held by Lysanias and Philip, but was still honoured with the title of king (Acts xxv. 13). In A.D. 52 Cumanus was removed from the procuratorship of Judæa, being unable or unwilling to check the growing disturbances, and Felix was appointed in his place.

Brigandage, impostures, and assassinations were now rife. High-priests and priests quarrelled for their share of the tithes, and acts of violence ensued, which were referred to Rome. Jerusalem was infested with a banditti (Sicarii), who cloaked their murders and robberies with a pretended zeal for Jewish interests. Felix aggravated rather than repressed these disorders, exercising his almost unlimited powers for the gratification of his own cupidity and malice with a mean and servile disposition [TACITUS]. He was superseded by Porcius Festus, A.D. 60.

The troubles continued. Agrippa gave great offence by erecting in the palace of the Herods a chamber at such an elevation that he could see from it what took place in the courts of the Temple. The priests in their turn built a wall which shut out the view, not only from him, but from the station at which the Romans kept guard at the great festivals. This dispute was referred to Nero, who decided in favour of the priests, through the influence of Poppæa, but Agrippa deprived the high-priest of his office, and he was afterwards beheaded at Cyrene. Festus died in 61 or 62, and

* Blair adopts A.D. 33 as the date of the crucifixion, making our Lord thirty-seven years of age at the time. Dr. Hales adopts March 27, 31, placing his birth in autumn, B.C. 5.

† His mother. She is said to have had seven sons who all served in the office of high-priest, whence the Rabbinical proverb, 'All meal is meal, but Kamith's meal is fine flour' (Lightfoot). The actual high-priest might often be under the necessity of having his office performed by another person. Thus Caiaphas appears to have been assisted during his high-priesthood by Annas, his father-in-law, who had been high-priest some years before (Luke iii. 2).

‡ He had been imprisoned by Tiberius for expressing a wish that Caligula might soon succeed him, and Caligula, on his accession, presented him with a gold chain of the same weight as the iron one he had worn in prison.

Albinus was appointed to succeed him, but before his arrival at Jerusalem Annas the high-priest had summoned the Sanhedrim and condemned to death St. James and other Christians. On this Agrippa deposed Annas, and appointed Jesus, son of Damneus, in his place.

Albinus busied himself in putting down the banditti, but was too ready to accept ransom from those whom he got into his power, while Jesus, son of Damneus, who in his turn was deposed from the high-priesthood; Jesus, son of Gamaliel, the new high-priest; and Annas, the former one, had each his party of banditti at command. The quarrel about tithes continued, and a new subject of discussion arose among the priests from a permission granted by Agrippa to the Levites to wear, for the first time, a distinctive dress. Things were in this state of ferment when 18,000 workmen were put out of employment by the completion of the repairs of the Temple.

The appointment of Gessius Florus to succeed Albinus brought matters to a crisis. His cruelty and rapacity, and the impunity enjoyed by plunderers who were willing to give him a share of their spoils, were intolerable, and produced a representation to Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, which Florus treated with contempt. He sent from Cæsarea to demand seventeen talents out of the treasury of the Temple, and when a large body of the people came to meet him as he approached Jerusalem, he not only put them to flight, but the next day insisted that they should be given up to him for punishment, and, when this was refused, he commanded a general pillage and massacre by his soldiers. A few days afterwards he provoked a fresh outrage and inflicted fresh vengeance. But he failed in his object of penetrating into the Temple for plunder, as the Jews, by breaking down the cloisters of the Temple, interrupted the passage of communication between it and the Antonia Tower. Three thousand six hundred persons were slaughtered on this occasion, and the cruelty of the punishments which he inflicted on the noblest of the Jewish citizens drew Bernice from the palace of the Asmonæans to plead for them in vain with prayers and tears and bare feet at his tribunal.

After Florus had returned to Cæsarea, Agrippa visited Jerusalem, hoping to quiet the people, and he prevailed on them to restore the communication between the Antonia and the Temple, and to pay their arrears of tribute; but on his proposing that they should submit themselves to Florus till another procurator was appointed, they were filled with fury, and treated him with such violence that he was obliged to leave the city. Scarcely was he gone, when Eleazar the son of Ananias the high-priest, who was at that time captain of the Temple, raised the standard of revolt by refusing to offer the customary sacrifice for the emperor and the Roman people. Immediate notice of this bold act was given to Agrippa and to Florus by the more aged and wiser citizens, that they might stifle the sedition at its birth. Florus paid no attention to the message, but Agrippa sent 3000 horse, who, acting with those who wished to preserve peace, held possession of the upper town while Eleazar and his adherents, among whom was a large body of bandits who had returned to Jerusalem after surprising and murdering the Roman garrison at Masada on the Dead Sea, occupied the Temple and the lower town. For seven days there was a fierce contest, which ended in the triumph of the rebels. The house of the high-priest and the palace of Agrippa and Bernice were set on fire. Fire was also carried to the Chamber of Archives to gain the debtors to their side by destroying the evidences of their debts. Another three days' struggle ended in the burning of the Antonia, and the slaughtering of the small Roman garrison (September 6, A.D. 66). Herod's palace was next taken, and there the high-priest Annas was found and slain, while the Roman soldiers who had kept it first took refuge in the three great towers, and afterwards, on their surrender, were put to the sword.

It was now time for Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, to interfere. He came from Antioch with the twelfth legion, burnt on his way the town of Lidda, and at Bethhoron engaged without result a large body of the rebels who had gone to meet him. He afterwards pushed on towards the city, and encamped for three days at Scopus, a few furlongs off, hoping that the moderate party would propose conditions of surrender. He then made his way into the new suburb, which he occupied, forcing the Jews to take refuge within the walls surrounding the Temple and the inner city. For six days he assaulted the wall without success, and then, apparently without cause, but, as Josephus hints, through the secret influence of Florus, withdrew his whole force back to Scopus. Thither he was followed by the now exulting rebels, who spoiled his camp, carried off his war engines, and killed 5000 of his troops.

The Jews now began an organized resistance to the sovereign state, and the most important posts throughout the country were assigned to their bravest and best citizens. Josephus, son of Gorion, and the high-priest Ananus had the command at Jerusalem, Josephus the historian in Galilee, and Eleazar in Iturea. And, Cestius Gallus and Florus being both dead, Nero gave the government of Syria to Vespasian, who desired his son Titus to come to him from Egypt with the seventh and tenth legions.

Father and son met at Ptolemais in the winter of A.D. 66-7, and during the following summer and autumn the important places of the country fell one after another into their hands. Among the rest Jotapata, with its governor Josephus the historian, who was made prisoner, but treated with respect; and Giscala, whose chief, John, the subsequently famous John of Giscala, escaped to Jerusalem. That unhappy city in the meantime became the most frightful scene of civil strife and violence. It comprised two great parties, those who wished for order and peace, and those who, guided by wild fanaticism or rapacity, thirsted only for deeds of violence. These latter were now known by the general name of zealots, and were not less dreaded by the quieter citizens than the Romans themselves, while they were ever ready to split into new factions and fall upon one another like wild beasts. This was the state of things in the summer of 68, when Vespasian, who had now approached Jerusalem, hearing of the death of Nero, sent Titus for fresh orders from his successor Galba. It was about the same time that the quieter party in Jerusalem, unable to bear the excesses of the zealots led by Eleazar and by John of Giscala, invited Simon, son of Gioras, the leader of a band of marauding Galileans, to come to their assistance. In the middle of the following year Vespasian himself was made emperor and went to Rome. Titus devoted the remainder of it to active preparations for the siege, and, when the city was crowded with the multitudes who came up for the Feast of the Passover, which was to occur in April A.D. 70, he drew up his forces and placed them on the heights which lay to the north and east of Jerusalem, three legions on Scopus and one on the Mount of Olives. When the ground between Scopus and the city was cleared of obstruction, and made fit for the march of an army, the three legions advanced forward, and bearing to the west, made their attack on one of the western faces of Agrippa's wall, in order, as Cestius had done three years and a half before, to break into the new suburb. But the besieged were now better prepared for resistance, and what Cestius seems to have accomplished by escalade, was not done without the aid of catapult and battering-ram and the erection of mounds surmounted by lofty towers, from which the assailants could cast their arrows at the defenders, who on their side sallied out from the gates, fought from the walls, and made good use of the engines they had taken from the Antonia and the camp of Cestius Gallus. At length, however, they were driven back by the missiles discharged from the Roman towers, a breach was made in the wall on the fifteenth day of the siege, the gates were thrown open, and the whole of the Assyrian camp and Bezetha suburb were in the hands of Titus.

This suburb occupying the ground on the north of the city, Titus had three points of attack before him—the upper city facing him on the west, the Temple and its precincts on the east, and the lower city protected by the second wall, cropping out towards him in the middle. Within this second wall Simon had retired. The same efforts were now repeated by both parties as at the first wall. The Jews sallied out and attacked their invaders with desperate bravery, the Romans drove them back with equal courage. This went on for five days, and at length a breach was made in the second wall. Titus did as little harm as he could, hoping the people would now surrender, but he entered with a thousand picked men. They were met with determined obstinacy by constantly increasing numbers in the narrow streets and lanes of the lower city, and were at length obliged to retreat. But Titus repeated his efforts, an entrance was once more effected, and this time he took care to demolish the whole wall, and become master of all that portion of the city which was not surrounded by the first (or innermost) wall, i.e., the Temple with the Antonia and the adjoining structures, and the upper city. The engines on the Mount of Olives had been hurling their huge projectiles on the Temple and its precincts since the beginning of the siege, and four great mounds were now erected within the suburb, two facing the Temple and two facing the upper city, to act upon these places from the north. But the two mounds opposite the Temple had been undermined and sunk by the skill and untiring efforts of John of Giscala, and the engines on the other two had been burnt by the no less pertinacious bravery of Simon and his men. This disheartened the Romans a good deal. But in the meantime famine had begun its horrors, and many daily crept out of the city on the sides where it was not invested to seek for food. Great numbers of these wretched people were caught by the Roman soldiers and cruelly scourged and crucified in the sight of their fellow-citizens. At last, to shut out all hope of escape, Titus determined to surround the city with a wall. This was completed in three days by the united efforts of the whole Roman army; and the siege was then recommenced with fresh vigour.

The whole strength of the besiegers was now directed against the Antonia and the Temple. The Antonia lay before them to the east, a strong and lofty tower, within a square inclosed by strong walls. Behind the Antonia, stretching farther to the east, lay the much larger square of 'the mountain of the Lord's house;' this too was protected with strong walls lined on the inside by lofty pillared cloisters, the flat roof of which ran nearly on a level with the top of the wall. Within this large square was another inclosure of an oblong shape, also protected by walls of great strength, cloistered like the others on the inside, and containing within them the sacred courts of the Lord's house and the holy edifice itself. The whole of this ground was called the Temple, and with it the Antonia was connected by a passage opening upon the cloisters of the great square at its north-west corner. Titus began by raising four fresh mounds to act against the Antonia. These mounds were of great size, and it took twenty-one days to complete them. They seem to have been erected as a support for the engines by which projectiles were thrown into the fortress, while the battering-rams acted against its walls. Some sallies were in the meantime made by the besieged, but not with as much vigour as before, nor did they interfere much with the progress of the besiegers; and such was the effect of one day's battering upon the wall, the foundations of which had been already loosened by the mine which had destroyed the first mounds, that it fell in the night. It was then discovered that the besieged had built a second wall within, and the ruins of the first had fallen against it, and formed a sort of bank by which it might be scaled. A forlorn hope of twelve men, fired by the exhortations of Titus, and the example of their leader, sprung forward, but perished in their attempt to dislodge the enemy. Two nights afterwards another party of twelve stole in over the ruins, killed the guards of the Antonia Tower, and let in the Romans. Then followed a scene of terrible struggling and bloodshed, while Roman and Jew fought together in a space too narrow for the action of great numbers, both parties urged forward from behind and the places of the slain perpetually filled up by fresh men, the Romans striving to press through the passage from the Antonia into the Temple, the Jews thrusting them back. That day's fight accomplished nothing, and Titus resolved to clear a passage through the Antonia precincts for the main body of his troops. In the meantime he strove to win the Jews to submission by sending them proposals of peace, and graciously receiving those who placed themselves in his power, while famine and its usual attendants, death, pestilence, and horrible rapacity, added force to his persuasions. But they were met with obstinate refusal and contempt by the heads of the fighting party, while the unhappy sufferers could do nothing. On the 17th Tammuz (June 23), about the time of the first attack upon the Temple, the daily sacrifice ceased for want of priests to offer it, and from that day to the 9th Ab (July 14), was the last death-struggle of Jerusalem. Titus hemming in the holy places closer and closer, every inch of the way to the inner courts disputed, and again and again recovered, the wall of the great court taken and its cloisters burnt, the inner court invested, its walls battered in vain, its silver-plated gates forced by fire, its cloisters and encircling chambers burnt piece by piece. Onward still went the flames making their way round the court of the priests, burning down cloister and sacred chamber, while the holy fane itself still reared its 'polished corners' in all their glory, resplendent with gold and marble, before the astonished eyes of its besiegers, still sheltered its ministering priests, its priceless treasures, and its objects of mysterious sanctity. Titus anxiously desired to preserve it; but a Roman soldier flung a burning brand through a window which opened into its exterior chambers. The fire once kindled never ceased to rage till the whole was a ruin, and the roar of its burning was mingled with cries of agony, terror, and despair.

On the south side of the great inclosure of the Temple were two gates, which led by a bridge across the deep valley of the cheesemongers (Tyropæon) to the upper city. Along this way now rushed the crowd of fighting men, leaving 10,000 of the more helpless, who had sought shelter in the Temple, to be butchered by the Roman soldiers, who, when the work of destruction was over, set up their standards before the east gate of the Temple, paid them divine honours, and saluted Titus as Emperor. After this, the conqueror, still anxious to spare the people and the city, held a parley with the chiefs of the insurrection, the two parties standing at opposite ends of the bridge. Titus required an unconditional surrender, but promised them their lives and kind treatment. This they refused, requiring permission to leave the city with their wives and children. Titus thereupon directed its plunder and destruction. This was not the work of a day, nor was it accomplished without a valorous resistance. But at length the whole city was reduced to ashes, except the three great towers on the western wall, and all its inhabitants put to the sword, except those who were reserved for slavery or to grace the triumph of the conqueror.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and the occupation of a military post among its ruins by a Roman garrison, we hear nothing of any consequence connected with the city till A.D. 130. In that year the Emperor Hadrian took some first steps with a view to the rebuilding of Jerusalem for his own purposes. Stringent laws had been made for the control of the Jews, and a heavy tribute exacted from them immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, and violent outbreaks had occurred among them in various parts of the empire, at Cyrene, in Egypt, in Cyprus, in Mesopotamia; and it was obviously important that Rome should have a powerful centre of dominion in the midst of them, and that a race possessing so much vitality and so turbulent a spirit should be prevented from seizing it themselves. He was interrupted in this design by a more serious outbreak than any previous one, which led to another long Jewish war, and which cost Rome so much blood that the victory by which it was finally suppressed was not considered a subject for congratulation. The leader of the insurrection was Ben Coziba, a bandit chief, who proclaimed himself to be the Messiah, and changed his name to Barchochab or Barchocheba (son of a star), in allusion to the star foretold by Balaam. He took possession of Jerusalem, stamped money there with his own insignia, and was so bold and specious an impostor that Rabbi Akibah, a president of the Sanhedrim,* was induced to join him and become his armour-bearer. Julius Severus was summoned from Britain in this emergency, and two years were spent in various attempts to suppress the insurrection before Jerusalem was taken, after an obstinate defence, and Barchocheba slain. The insurgents then betook themselves to Bether (otherwise written Bitter and Beth Tar), a strong place near Jerusalem, which was also taken with terrible slaughter after great sufferings from famine and disease, A.D. 135. R. Akibah was made prisoner, and after a close confinement of two years, cruelly put to death.

Hadrian's first work after this victory was the utter demolition of all remains of the old Jerusalem; his next was to build a new city with a new name, and occupying a site rather more to the north than the former one, so as to exclude the suburb of Ophel, to the south of the Temple, and a portion of what had been the upper city. To this new city he gave the name of Ælia Capitolina, from his own name, Publius Ælius Hadrianus, and that of Jupiter Capitolinus. All persons of Jewish descent were excluded from it by peremptory decree. They were not even to approach it within a distance of three miles; and to extinguish

* This body, which originally held its sittings in a chamber of the Temple, continued to exist, and was treated with some favour by the Romans, after the destruction of Jerusalem. It sat first at Japhne, afterwards at Tiberias. It was a school of education rather than a centre of government. But its influence was considerable, and it became wealthy by the exaction of a small tax, which was readily paid by the Jews.

all affectionate remembrance of the place, everything was done to give it the character of a heathen city. A temple of Jupiter Capitolinus and statues of the emperor occupied the site of the Lord's House; a temple of Astarte, the ancient Ashtoreth or Syrian Venus, was built on the place afterwards recognised as the holy sepulchre. The worship of Serapis was introduced from Egypt; and the military ensigns of Rome were sculptured over the gates.

But though Jews were so rigorously excluded from Rome, Christians of Gentile descent were allowed to reside there; and consequently we find that the return of the Christian church of Jerusalem from Pella—where, according to our Lord's forewarning, it had taken refuge before the siege by Titus—and the appointment of the first Gentile bishop, were contemporaneous with the foundation of the new Roman colony of Ælia Capitolina. From St. James, the first bishop, to Jude II., who died A. D. 136, there had been a series of fifteen bishops of Jewish descent; and from Marcus, who succeeded Simeon, to Macarius, who presided over the church of Jerusalem under Constantine, there was a series of twenty-three bishops of Gentile descent, but beyond a bare list of their names, little is known of the church or of the city of Jerusalem during the whole of this latter period.

The adoption of Christianity as the religion of the empire, which dates from the edict of Milan, A. D. 313 (the year in which Macarius began his episcopate), produced a great change in the circumstances of Jerusalem. Pilgrimages had already been made to the holy places in the previous centuries. In the year 326 they were visited by the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, then in her eightieth year. At this visit the true cross is said to have been discovered under the temple dedicated to Astarte, during the progress of its demolition. It is certain that noble Christian churches now took the place of the heathen temples by which the holy city had previously been defiled; and, A. D. 335, a council was held at Jerusalem for their dedication. It was at this council that Arius, abetted by Eusebius of Nicomedia, had a temporary triumph over Athanasius. Twenty-seven years later an attempt was made by the Emperor Julian, the apostate, to falsify the predictions of our Lord by rebuilding the Temple and re-establishing the Mosaic ritual. The plan was adopted with enthusiasm by the Jews, who thought no sacrifice too costly to promote the work. It was, however, interrupted, tradition says by whirlwind, earthquake, and fire, which destroyed the workmen and consumed their tools. After the death of Julian, the Jews were again rigorously excluded from Jerusalem, except on the anniversary of its capture, when they were allowed to enter the city and weep over it. Their appointed wailing-place remains, and their practice of wailing there continues to the present day.

During the two following centuries little is known of Jerusalem beyond the part taken by its bishops in councils, which determined various ecclesiastical and theological questions. At the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, Jerusalem was made an independent patriarchate; and a synod held at Jerusalem, A. D. 536, affirmed the twofold nature of our Lord. In A. D. 529, Justinian built a church in honour of the Virgin Mary on the site of the ancient temple, founded several convents in or near Jerusalem and Jericho, and at least one hospital for pilgrims. But the peace of Jerusalem was to be interrupted by a fresh storm of invasion. The Persian dynasty, which had originated in Ardechyr, the son of Sassan, A. D. 226, had long struggled, first with the Roman, and afterwards with the Greek empire, for the dominion of the East, and now its reigning monarch Chosroes II. conducts a victorious army—swelled by 24,000 Jews eager to emerge from their state of subjection and to be avenged on their oppressors—from Syria to Palestine. The combined forces stormed Jerusalem, A. D. 614. The churches were sacked and plundered, the Christian inhabitants put to the sword without mercy, and the supposed true cross carried away. But as Chosroes advanced towards Constantinople, he was met by the Emperor

Heraclius, who defeated him, and after further triumphs came to Jerusalem as a pilgrim, bearing the true cross on his shoulders, rebuilt the churches which had been destroyed, and re-enacted Hadrian's law, forbidding the Jews to come within three miles of the city.

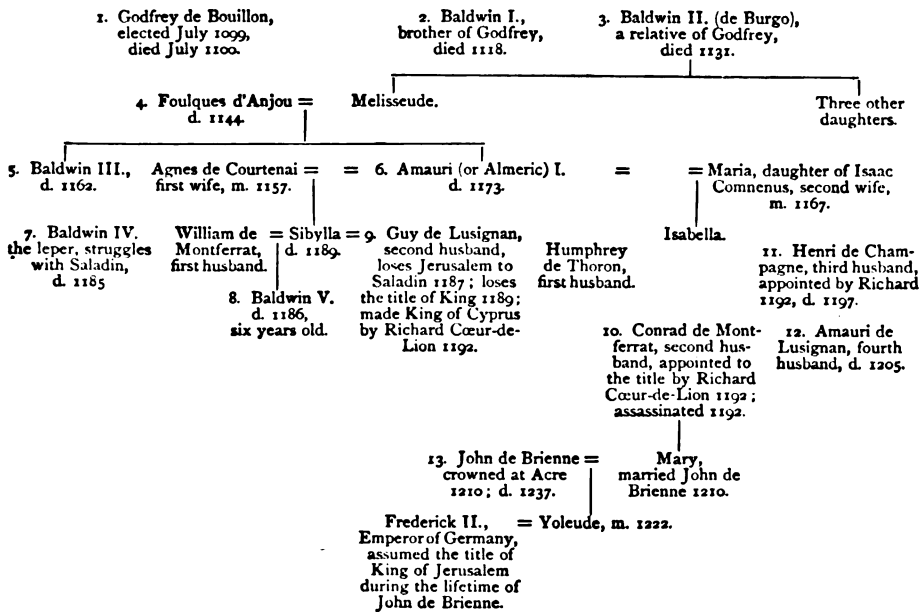

But a new power, and one more formidable than that of Persia, was now springing up—the religion and rule of the impostor Mohammed. He died A. D. 632, and then the work of spreading his system through the world was taken up with ardour by his followers, whose successive leaders received the title of khalif or vicegerent of the prophet. Omar, the second of the khalifs, a man of singular austerity, enthusiasm, and elevation of character, having conquered Arabia, Syria, and Egypt, sent his forces against Jerusalem. The valour with which they were met won the admiration of the besiegers, but the inhabitants were at length obliged to yield, and Omar himself, at the request of the patriarch Sophronius, proceeded there on a red camel, which also carried his simple provisions—a bag of corn, a bag of dates, a wooden dish, and a bottle of water—to ratify the terms of capitulation, which secured to the Christians their liberty to worship in the churches they already possessed. This done, he entered the city, conversed freely with the patriarch on its antiquities, and knelt for prayer on the steps of the church built by Constantine. The Mosque of Omar is an existing record of his conquest, and of his desire to raise a temple to the honour of God in a place regarded so sacred both by Jews and Christians.

After the conquest of Jerusalem by Omar, it passed to the different Arab powers which successively had dominion in the East, and was from time to time snatched out of their hands by the Turks, the general name by which all the Tartar tribes called themselves. Finally, in the year 1076 it was taken from the Fatimite Arabs, who then possessed it, by Acsis, an officer of the Sultan Malek Shah, of the race of the Seljouk Turks. Previously to this it had been visited by many pilgrims, and had once been the scene of an interchange of courteous messages between Haroun-el-Raschid, the great Eastern ruler, and Charlemagne, the emperor of the West. But its Seljouk masters, a barbarous and cruel race, heaped wrongs and insults upon the Christians, and these wrongs and insults awakened throughout Christendom that burning desire to possess the holy city which, during a period of 200 years, gave rise to seven crusades, conducted by the monarchs, the nobles, and the people of Europe, to effect or maintain its conquest. Jerusalem was taken by the first Crusaders, A. D. 1099, after a fearful slaughter of its defenders—now again the Fatimites of Egypt, who had expelled the Seljouks eleven months before.

Godfrey de Bouillon was elected to be its king, notwithstanding the opposition of the bishops, who said—non debere ibi eligi Regem, ubi Deus passus et coronatus est; the feudal system was adopted, and a code of laws, called the Assize of Jerusalem, drawn up for the government of its people. Godfrey was the first of a dynasty of thirteen Latin kings, nine of whom—ending in Guy de Lusignan, husband of Sybilla, great-grand-daughter of Baldwin II.—reigned successively in Jerusalem, till it was taken by Saladin, Oct. 2, 1187.

* The third elected king.

LATIN KINGS OF JERUSALEM.

The possession of Jerusalem during this period by a Christian power gave birth to the two great orders of knighthood, that of the Temple and that of St. John of Jerusalem; the former of which was distributed throughout Europe, and the latter—known also under the name of Knights Hospitallers—first fixed themselves at Rhodes, and afterwards dwindled down into the little society of the Knights of Malta. The Teutonic order sprung up at Acre in 1191, and its grand masters, who became hereditary, were the ancestors of the house of Brandenburg, and the kings of Prussia. The capture of the city by Saladin produced the third crusade, but it was never retaken by the Christians, and the remaining kings of the series—ending in Jean de Brienne—were only titular, and resided at Tyre, Acre, or elsewhere in Palestine. In 1229—during the lifetime of Jean de Brienne—the Emperor Frederic II. of Germany entered and took possession of Jerusalem by virtue of a treaty with the Sultan of Egypt; but ten years later it fell once more, through neglect, into the hands of the Mohammedans. In 1241 it was again given up to the Christians by the Sultan of Damascus, to induce them to help him against Egypt, but three years afterwards it was taken, after a battle of two days' duration, and the loss of the grand masters and most of the knights of the two great orders, by the Kharismians, a Tartar horde driven out of their country by more powerful tribes. The Kharismians were themselves dispossessed of Jerusalem, and driven back to the Caspian Sea by the Mohammedans of Syria, A.D. 1247.

The Ottoman Sultan Selim I. took possession of Jerusalem with the rest of Syria and Egypt in 1517, and his successor, Soliman the Magnificent, built its present walls in 1542. In 1832 Jerusalem became subject to Mohammed Ali, the Pasha of Egypt, receiving him without resistance within its gates. In 1841 he was deprived of all his Syrian possessions by European interference, and Jerusalem was again subjected to the government of the Ottoman Porte, and in the same year a bishopric of the Anglican church was established there by the combined movement of England and Prussia.

In 1850 a dispute about the guardianship of the holy places between the monks of the Greek and Latin churches, in which Nicholas Emperor of Russia sided with the Greeks, and Louis Napoleon, Emperor of the French, with the Latins, led to a decision of the question by the Porte, which was unsatisfactory to Russia, and which resulted in a war of considerable magnitude between that country, on the one side, and the allied forces of England and France on the other.

PART II.—TOPOGRAPHY. 1. Site of the City.—Jerusalem lies near the summit of a broad mountain-ridge. This ridge, or mountainous tract, extends, without interruption, from the plain of Esdraelon to a line drawn between the south end of the Dead Sea and the south-east corner of the Mediterranean; or, more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far south as to Jebel Arâif in the Desert, where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau.

This tract, which is everywhere not less than from 20 to 25 geographical miles in breadth, is, in fact, high uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; while towards the west it sinks down by an offset, into a range of lower hills, which lie between it and the great plain along the coast of the Mediterranean. The surface of this upper region is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is, moreover, cut up by deep valleys which run east or west on either side towards the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or water-shed, between the waters of these valleys—a term which here applies almost exclusively to the waters of the rainy season—follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge; yet not so but that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, for example, a valley which descends to the Jordan, often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea.

From the great plain of Esdraelon onwards towards the south, the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract anciently known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah; until, in the vicinity of Hebron, it attains an elevation of nearly 3000 Paris feet [ab. 3,200 Eng.] above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further north, on a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea towards the true west, the ridge has an elevation of only about 2500 Paris feet [ab. 2,700 Eng.]; and here, close up to the water-shed, lies the city of Jerusalem. Its mean geographical position is in lat. $31^{\circ} 46' 35''$ N., and long. $35^{\circ} 18' 30''$ E. from Greenwich.

Six or seven miles N. and N.W. of the city is spread out the open plain or basin round about el-Jib (Gibeon), extending also towards el-Bireh (Beeroth); the waters of which flow off at its S.E. part through the deep valley here called by the Arabs Wady Beit Hanina; but to which the monks and travellers have usually given the name of the 'Valley of Turpentine,' or of the Terebinth, on the mistaken supposition that it is the ancient Valley of Elah. This great valley passes along in a S.W. direction, an hour or more west of Jerusalem; and finally opens out from the mountains into the western plain, at the distance of six or eight hours S.W. from the city, under the name of Wady es Sûrâr. The traveller, on his way from Ramleh to Jerusalem, descends into and crosses this deep valley at the village of Kulônîeh on its western side, an hour and a half from the latter city. On again reaching the high ground on its eastern side, he enters upon an open tract sloping gradually downwards towards the east; and sees before him, at the distance of about two miles, the walls and domes of the holy city, and beyond them the higher ridge or summit of the Mount of Olives. The traveller now descends gradually towards the city along a broad swell of ground, having at some distance on his left the shallow northern part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; close at hand on his right the basin which forms the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom. Further down both these valleys become deep, narrow, and precipitous; that of Hinnom bends south and again east nearly at right angles, and unites with the other, which then continues its course to the Dead Sea. Upon the broad and elevated promontory within the fork of these two valleys lies the holy city. All around are higher hills; on the east the Mount of Olives; on the south the Hill of Evil Counsel, so called, rising directly from the Vale of Hinnom; on the west the ground rises gently, as above described, to the borders of the great Wady; while on the north, a bend of the ridge, connected with the Mount of Olives, bounds the prospect at the distance of more than a mile. Towards the S.W. the view is somewhat more open; for here lies the plain of Rephaim, commencing just at the southern brink of the Valley of Hinnom, and stretching off S.W., where it runs to the western sea. In the N.W., too, the eye reaches up along the upper part of the valley of Jehoshaphat; and from many points can discern the mosque of Neby Samwîl, situated on a lofty ridge beyond the great Wady, at the distance of two hours.

The surface of the elevated promontory itself, on which the city stands, slopes somewhat steeply towards the east, terminating on the brink of the Valley of Jehoshaphat. From the northern part, near the present Damascus gate, a depression or shallow wady runs in a southern direction, having on the west the ancient hills of Akra and Zion, and on the east the lower ones of Bezetha and Moriah. Between the hills of Akra and Zion another depression or shallow wady (still easy to be traced) comes down from near the Jaffa gate, and joins the former. It then continues obliquely down the slope, but with a deeper bed, in a southern direction, quite to the pool of Siloam and the Valley of Jehoshaphat. This is the ancient Tyropæon. West of its lower part Zion rises loftily, lying mostly without the modern city; while on the east of the Tyropæon and the valley first mentioned, lie Bezetha, Moriah, and Ophel, the last a long and comparatively narrow ridge, also outside of the modern city, and terminating in a rocky point over the pool of Siloam. These three last hills may strictly be taken as only parts of one and the same ridge. The breadth of the whole site of Jerusalem, from the brow of the Valley of Hinnom, near the Jaffa gate, to the brink of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, is about 1020 yards, or nearly half a geographical mile; of which distance 318 yards are occupied by the area of the great mosque el-Haram esh-Sherîf. North of the Jaffa gate the city wall sweeps round more to the west, and increases the breadth of the city in that part.

The country around Jerusalem is all of limestone formation, and not particularly fertile. The rocks everywhere come out above the surface, which in many parts is also thickly strewed with loose stones; and the aspect of the whole region is barren and dreary; yet the olive thrives here abundantly, and fields of grain are seen in the valleys and other places, but they are less productive than in the region of Hebron and Nablus. Neither vineyards nor fig-trees flourish on the high-ground around the city, though the latter are found in the gardens below Siloam, and very frequently in the vicinity of Bethlehem.

This description of the site of the city, written by Dr. Robinson in 1838 (Bib. Researches, vol. I., pp. 258-260), is so perspicuous and so minutely accurate, that few later travellers have attempted to improve upon it. The second visit of Dr. Robinson in 1852, while more fruitful in the discussion of particular physical features of the Holy City, made no additions to his first description of its general topography. Stanley calls attention to the central situation of the city with regard to the territory of which it was the capital. 'Jerusalem was on the ridge, the broadest and most strongly marked ridge of the back-bone of the complicated hills which extend through the whole country from the Desert to the plain of Esdraelon. Every wanderer, every conqueror, every traveller who has trod the central route of Palestine from north to south, must have passed through the table-land of Jerusalem. It was the water-shed between the streams, or rather the torrent-beds, which find their way eastward to the Jordan, and those which pass westward to the Mediterranean' (Sinai and Palestine, p. 175). This double promontory, with its twin steps, Zion and Moriah, separated upon three sides by deep ravines from the surrounding mountains, some of which are slightly above its own level, answers to the Psalmist's picture of Jerusalem as at once founded upon the mountains and encompassed by them: 'His foundation is in the holy mountains.' 'Beautiful for situation is Mount Zion—the mountain of his holiness.' 'As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people.'

2. Topography of the Ancient City.—The foregoing description by Dr. Robinson incidentally assumes as settled certain points in the interior topography of Jerusalem, such as the position of Akra, and the course of the Tyropœon, which are yet in controversy. Indeed, hardly any point in the topography of the city as described by Josephus, which has a bearing upon questions of ecclesiastical tradition, can be regarded as settled beyond dispute; so that, as Isaac Taylor has said, in making what at first appears to be so simple a thing as a plan of ancient Jerusalem, one must 'take position upon a battle-field; and he must prepare himself to defend, by all available means, every inch of that position; he must, in fact, make himself a party in an eager controversy, which has enlisted, and which continues to enlist, feelings and prepossessions of no ordinary depth and intensity' (Traill's Josephus, note cxxi.). It is possible, however,—and this is the design of the present article,—to survey this battle-field as spectators, and even to reconnoitre it minutely as engineers, without taking a position as combatants. Every reader of Scripture feels a natural anxiety to form some notion of the appearance and condition of Jerusalem as it existed in the time of Christ, or rather as it stood before its destruction by the Romans. There are unusual difficulties in the way of satisfying this desire, although it need not be left altogether ungratified. The principal sources of these difficulties have been indicated by different travellers, and by none more forcibly than by Richardson (Travels, ii. 251). 'It is a tantalizing circumstance, however, for the traveller who wishes to recognise in his walks the site of particular buildings, or the scenes of memorable events, that the greater part of the objects mentioned in the description, both of the inspired and of the Jewish historian, are entirely razed from their foundation, without leaving a single trace or name behind to point out where they stood. Not an ancient tower, or gate, or wall, or hardly even a stone remains. The foundations are not only broken up, but every fragment of which they were composed is swept away, and the spectator looks upon the bare rock with hardly a sprinkling of earth to point out her gardens of pleasure, or groves of idolatrous devotion. A few gardens still remain on the sloping base of Mount Zion, watered from the pool of Siloam: the gardens of Gethsemane are still in a sort of ruined cultivation; the fences are broken down and the olive-trees decaying, as if the hand which dressed and fed them were withdrawn: the Mount of Olives still retains a languishing verdure, and nourishes a few of those trees from which it derives its name;* but all round about Jerusalem the general aspect is blighted and barren: the grass is withered: the bare rock looks through the scanty sward, and the grain itself, like the starving progeny of famine, seems in doubt whether to come to maturity or die in the ear.'

It is impossible for the Christian traveller to look upon Jerusalem with the same feelings with which he would contemplate the ruins of any other city which the world ever saw. There is in all the doings of the Jews, their virtues and their vices, their wisdom and their folly, a height and a depth, a breadth and a length, that angels cannot fathom; their whole history is a history of miracles; the precepts of their sacred book are the most profound, and the best adapted to every station in which man can be placed: they moderate him in prosperity, sustain him in adversity, guide him in health, console him in sickness, support him at the close of life, travel on with him through death, live with him throughout endless ages of eternity, and Jerusalem lends its name to the eternal mansions of the blessed in heaven which man is admitted to enjoy through the atonement of Christ, who was born of a descendant of Judah.

In determining the topography of Jerusalem, 'the chief diversities of opinion have arisen in endeavouring to apply the descriptions of Josephus to the present physical features of the Holy City. Thus it is the valley of the Tyropœon, the hills Akra and Bezetha, the course of the second wall, the place of the ancient bridge, the extent of the Temple area, and the relation to it of the fortress Antonia, it is these which have formed the chief topics of inquiry, and the themes of disquisition, sometimes anything but tranquil. Nor is it wonderful that the subject should be environed with difficulties. Ever since Jerusalem became the capital of the chosen people, she has been subjected to calamities, to revolutions, to overthrows, almost without number. Even of old, in the time of the exile, it was predicted, that 'the city should be builded upon her own heap;' and how often has she since been thus rebuild'd? Her walls and dwellings, her fortresses, palaces, and temple, have been laid in ruins, and have crumbled into dust. The ruins and rubbish of nearly thirty centuries are strewn over her surface; and no wonder that her hollows and ravines are filled up, and her hills made low' (Robinson, iii. 204). Some notion of this may be formed from the fact that in seeking a foundation for the Protestant church on Mount Zion, superincumbent rubbish to the depth of fifty feet was dug through before reaching the solid rock (Olin, ii. 254). Not only a very minute survey, but numerous excavations would be necessary to the ends of a really satisfactory investigation.

Of late years increasing facilities have been afforded for such explorations through the relaxing of Mohammedan prejudices against the infidel Franks. The fanatical jealousy which once held such strict surveillance over the approaches to the mosque of Omar, and threatened with death any non-Mussulman invader of its holy precincts, has so far subsided that, with proper pains and courtesy, the traveller may gain admittance to the interior. Barclay and Thomson have had free access, where Robinson and Stanley were denied, and where Catherwood ventured only in disguise and at the risk of his life. The anticipation of Isaac Taylor begins to be fulfilled: 'that in the almost inevitable progress of European affairs Palestine must come under the wing of one of the great European states; that this land will receive ere long a Christian and civilized government—will have a police—will afford a secure and tranquil liberty of travel and of residence—a liberty of wandering and strolling about, even as one does in the highlands of Scotland, or in the valleys of Switzerland; that it will give leisurely opportunity to dig and to trench, to upturn and to excavate.'

'When such a time comes, or within a period of five years after it has come, Palestine—a region not more extensive than any three adjoining English counties—will have opened its long hidden secrets to antiquarian eyes; its few square miles of soil, teeming with historic materials, will have been, if not sifted, yet turned over, or pierced here and there, and especially the lowest basements of the Holy City will have been moved from their places, or sufficiently exposed to view.'

'Such a time will not pass without yielding evidence enough for constructing an authentic plan of ancient Jerusalem; and may it not be well until then to hold in suspense our opinion, whatever it may be, on matters which at present cannot be conclusively determined. Let the Turk retire and the topographer may step forward' (Traill's Josephus, II., cxxi.)

The Mohammedan jealousy of the exploration of Jerusalem by the Franks is due mainly to two causes,—the apprehension that a military survey of the city will thus be secured as a guide in some future assault, and the suspicion that the Franks by some divining art have ascertained the locality of hidden treasures, and intend to deprive the Moslem of unknown spoils. These, with a religious aversion toward Christians, and a constitutional aversion to innovation, have created a formidable barrier to topographical research in Jerusalem. Resident foreigners, by patience, kindness, watchfulness, and firmness, can do much to overcome this prejudice, and to further such investigation. In this respect the long residence of Dr. Barclay at Jerusalem in the capacity of a medical missionary was of much service, and we shall have occasion in this article to profit by his personal researches (City of the Great King, pp. 456-512).

As the ground plan of the topography of ancient Jerusalem we have the following description by Josephus:—'It was built upon two hills, one part facing the other (ἀντιπροσώτως, face to face), separated by an intervening valley, at which, one upon another (i.e., crowded together), the houses ended. Of these hills, that on which the upper city stood was much the higher and straighter in its length. Accordingly, on account of its strength, it was called the fortress of King David, the father of Solomon, by whom the Temple was originally built, but by us it is called the upper market-place. The other hill, called Akra, which sustains the lower city, was curved on each side (ἀμφικυρτός, gibbous). Over against this was a third hill, naturally lower than Akra, and formerly separated from it by another broad ravine. Afterwards, however, when the Asmonæans were in power, desiring to connect the city with the Temple, they filled in this ravine, and, cutting down the summit of Akra, they reduced its elevation so that the Temple might appear above it. The valley called Tyropæon, which we have said separated the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, extends as far as Siloam, for so we call a fountain whose waters are both sweet and abundant. From without (i.e., exterior to the city) the two hills of the city were encompassed by deep ravines, and because of the precipices on both sides there was nowhere any approach' (Joseph. Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1).

The main features of this description are confirmed by the terse and graphic picture which Tacitus gives of the siege of the city:—'Two hills of immense height were inclosed by walls projecting outward or retiring inward. The extremities of the rock were abrupt. . . . The Temple was like a citadel, with walls of its own. . . . Thus Jerusalem, by nature difficult of approach, was fortified by works which would have been a sufficient defence had the city stood upon a plain' (Tac. Hist., v. 10, 11, 12).

Leaving out of view all details as to the interior of the modern city, and all questions of the sacred places, and regarding only the general face of the country, it seems not difficult to project upon paper a ground-plan of Jerusalem as Josephus describes it. We first lay down upon the map a lofty craggy hill, or rather a bold promontory, with steep declivities upon three sides. Facing this at some part, with a valley intervening, we lay down a second hill, somewhat lower than the first, but like it steep and craggy upon its outer side. Opposite to this must now be placed a third hill—the site of Solomon's Temple. But at what point? In designating the three hills the Jewish historian gives no hint of their relations to the points of the compass; but elsewhere, in describing the gates of the Temple, he gives a clue to the relative position of the first and third hills. 'In the western parts of the enclosure stood four gates, one leading over to the royal palace, the valley between being intercepted to form a passage, two leading to the suburb, and the remaining one into the other city being distinguished by many steps down into the valley, and from this up again upon the ascent, for the city lay over against the Temple in the manner of a theatre, being encompassed by a deep valley on all its southern quarter.' This statement places the third or Temple-hill upon the east, and the first or Palace-hill upon the west, of a dividing valley, and bounds the Palace-hill, or Zion, by another 'deep valley' upon the south. In this first rough draft of the topography of Jerusalem we therefore have two hills—Zion and Moriah, or the upper city and the Temple-hill—proximately determined; and the problem of ascertaining the position of Akra, a hill opposite to both these and separated from each by a valley. Had Josephus or any other competent authority anywhere stated that Akra lay north of Zion and west of the Temple-hill, or east of Zion and north of the Temple-hill, there could have been no difficulty in identifying its site. But the absence of any such definite statement leaves the position of Akra a question of uncertainty and of superabundant controversy. The general outline and the relative position of Zion and Moriah are agreed upon by nearly all archaeologists. The southernmost and westward knob of the double promontory already mentioned as marking the site of Jerusalem is Mount Zion, the sharper, narrower eastward ridge is Moriah, or the Temple-hill with the pointed elongation of Ophel. The valley of Hinnom bounds Zion on the west, and passing around its southern extremity unites with the valley of Jehoshaphat, which bounds Moriah upon the east. These two valleys define the promontory upon which the city was built. Between Zion and Moriah, it is also agreed, is the valley known anciently as the Tyropœon, extending northward from the Pool of Siloam. Over this valley passed the viaduct leading from the Temple-gate to the royal palace. Thus far all is plain. But above the point where it separates Zion from Moriah, the Tyropœon also separated Zion from Akra; and the topographical puzzle is to ascertain the proper starting-point of this valley. If it began at or near the present Jaffa gate, then Akra lay north of Zion, between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, and while facing Zion with a valley between, it also stood 'over against the Temple, with the valley that extends southward from the Damascus gate separating it from Moriah.' This fulfils the conditions of Josephus. On the other hand, if the Tyropœon began at the Damascus gate, Akra lay upon its eastern side, facing Zion (which must then be made to include in whole or in part the ridge of the 'Christian Quarter'), and consequently it lay north of the Temple-hill, or the present Haram, from which it was separated by a valley, the traces of which are now hardly discernible. This also fulfils the conditions of Josephus; and upon either supposition the city, as comprising Zion and Akra, 'lay over against the Temple in the manner of a theatre.'

288. Zion and the Temple-hill.

The accompanying sketch exhibits at a glance these two theories. Zion and the Temple-hill, with the intervening section of the Tyropœon, are marked as definite; the situation of Akra and the upper part of the Tyropœon are hypothetical; the Jaffa and Damascus gates are indicated as modern landmarks.

Upon a superficial view of the locality, the claims of the Damascus valley to be the continuation of the Tyropœon are altogether the most striking. One cannot cross the city from west to east, or look down into it from the walls, without noting this deep depression; whereas the Jaffa valley is now but a gentle descent, hardly perceptible to the eye; though excavations have been made through rubbish at a point near the gate to the depth of about 40 feet before reaching the natural soil. Even Dr. Robinson, who strenuously contends that 'the beginning of the Tyropœon must be sought near the Jaffa gate,' admits that first impressions are against this view. 'When the traveller first enters Jerusalem, with the description of Josephus before his mind, and sees the most marked valley of the city to be that extending southward from the Damascus gate to Siloam, he is naturally led, at the first glance, to inquire whether this valley is not the Tyropœon. Such was my own experience, and has, doubtless, been that of very many others' (iii. 207). But Dr. Robinson rejects this first impression of the topography of the ancient city, because 'the position thus assumed for the Tyropœon would require Akra to be on the north of the Temple, and would separate it from Zion, not by a single valley only, but by two large depressions with a rocky ridge between.' He therefore makes this ridge itself—lying between the obvious valley running down from the Damascus gate, and the valley supposed to have begun at a point near the Jaffa gate—the Akra of Josephus. And indeed this has been the prevailing view of scholars and Biblical geographers, from Reland downward. Some recent visitors, however, transfer Akra to the northern section of the Temple-hill; and one, at least, regards the hill Akra as nearly identical with the citadel of the same name, situated on the northern side of the Temple. But, unless Zion is made to include the ridge between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, this view greatly circumscribes the area of the ancient city. Hence a theory has been started which makes the valley running down from the Damascus gate the Tyropœon, places Akra upon the east of this and north of the Haram, and extends Zion northwards, so as to include as a spur of its own the ridge commonly designated as the Akra of Josephus. This brings Akra and Zion face to face, and so meets the objection made above by Dr. Robinson to locating Akra east of the Damascus valley.

In this diversity of opinions—we had almost said conjectures—are there no other landmarks given by the Jewish historian which may serve to fix the relative position of these hills? The closing sentence of the passage already quoted from Josephus is significant, 'from without, the two hills of the city were encompassed by deep ravines, and because of the precipices on both sides there was nowhere any approach.' The hills here spoken of are unquestionably Zion and Akra; but this description cannot apply to the ridge between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, for there is at that point no ravine exterior to the city. Ritter regards this passage as almost decisive for locating Akra upon the eastern side of the Damascus gate valley.

The 'inaccessible sides,' described by Josephus, can be found nowhere upon the north; indeed, in that quarter the city was so assailable from without that it was fortified with a triple wall. The 'steep declivities upon both sides' can be identified only with the valley of Jehoshaphat upon the east, and that of Hinnom upon the south and west; and therefore the one hill can only be Zion with its prolongation towards the north, and the other,

Akra, must be the section bounded on the east by the valley of Jehoshaphat, and which extends southward as the Temple-hill, which Josephus describes as a third hill, by nature lower than Akra. The Tyropœon, which separated the two hills as the upper and lower city, must then be sought in the direction of the present Mill Street, i.e., running from north to south, from the Damascus gate to Siloam (Erdkunde, xvi. 407).

289. Wall of Jerusalem.

If this view can be maintained, it conforms to the ground-plan of the city as sketched by Josephus, and at the same time enlarges its dimensions more nearly to the demands of its estimated population. Ritter's inference from this statement of Josephus touching the 'steep declivities upon both sides,' Dr. Robinson—whom we quote as ablest advocate of the westward location of Akra—seeks to obviate by taking the expression the two hills as 'by synecdoche for the whole city.' He says, 'if the historian here means the two particular hills of Zion and Akra (as the insertion of the Greek article might seem to imply), the language is not literally exact; but if, as is more probable, this is a mere form of expression intended to embrace the whole city, then it presents no difficulty' (i. 281). A better solution seems to be that Josephus, having already mentioned the filling up of the valley between Akra and Moriah, treats these hills as practically one. 'The city,' he says, 'was fortified by three walls, wherever it was not encircled by impassable ravines: for in that part there was but one wall.' Now, we know also from Josephus that this old first wall encompassed the Temple-hill upon the south and the east, and that the third wall, or the wall of Agrippa, intercepted it north of the Temple, at or in the valley of the Kidron (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 2). Of course, then, when he speaks of the city as a whole as fortified by three walls, Josephus includes the Temple as part of the city; and does not here, as elsewhere, distinguish between them.

The city, i.e., the whole area within the walls, he describes in general terms as 'built upon two hills, with a valley between them'—the Tyropœon. These two hills were the upper city, or Zion, and Akra or the lower city. But opposite to Akra there was also a third hill, formerly separated from it by a broad valley, which, in the time of the Maccabees, was filled in so as to connect the city with the Temple—the crown of Akra being levelled so that the Temple might appear above it. Thus Akra and the Temple-hill were virtually made one. Hence the city, including the Temple within its walls, could be spoken of in a general way as built upon two hills. The Tyropœon, extending down to Siloam, separated within the city the upper and lower hills; but from without the two hills of the city were encompassed by deep valleys; and because of the steep declivities on both sides, there was nowhere any approach. If Akra and Moriah are taken as one hill, the former valley between them being almost obliterated, this description is intelligible and literally exact. Then Zion is bounded on the south-west by the steep ravine of Hinnom; and Akra, taken in connection with the Temple-hill, is bounded on the east by the steep ravine of the Kidron. Such, apparently, was the picture before the mind of Tacitus, 'two hills of immense elevation,' with steep rocky sides. It is therefore credible at least that Akra was an elevation north of the Temple-hill, and that the two were sometimes spoken of as one.

Another element for determining this question is the situation of the tower of Hippicus. This is commonly identified with the tower of David, near the Jaffa gate. Hippicus is, with Josephus, the starting-point in describing the course of the several walls, and it evidently stood at the north-west angle of the first wall—the original enclosure of Mount Zion. The third wall began at Hippicus, and ran in a north-westerly direction to the tower of Psephinos, where it turned to the east, and, passing in face of the monument of Helena and the tombs of the kings, terminated in a junction with the old wall, at the brink of the Kedron valley. The great octagonal tower of Psephinos stood in the extreme north-west corner of this wall. 'Over against' this, in the corresponding angle of the first wall, and at the junction of the first wall with the third, stood the tower Hippicus; and on a line with this, built also on the north side of the old or first wall, were two other towers, Phasaëlus and Mariamne. To determine the position of Hippicus it is necessary to keep in mind its relation to these several towers. For this purpose, the position of Psephinos becomes important, though this tower belonged to the third wall, which was not built until several years after the death of Christ. From Psephinos 'could be seen Arabia towards the rising sun, and the inheritance of the Hebrews quite to the sea. This shews that it must have stood upon the high swell of ground which extends up north-north-west from the north-west corner of the present city. In this quarter there are traces of ancient substructions, apparently of towers or other fortifications.' This is at a distance of 700 feet from the north-west corner of the present city. The position of Psephinos being thus proximately determined, we must seek for Hippicus in nearly a direct line southward from it, 'over against,' or answering to it. This could hardly be said of the so-called castle of David, near the Jaffa gate, which is too far eastward from the supposed site of Psephinos, and too remote for the proper distribution of such a line of military defences. Besides, this tower is in a re-entering angle, whereas Hippicus was a projecting corner. Moreover, the measurement of the inner tower of the present castle far exceeds that of the Hippicus of Josephus. He describes Hippicus as a square tower, measuring twenty-five cubits, or about thirty-eight feet on each side. But the tower of David measures fifty-six feet by seventy. Still Dr. Robinson argues, from the solidity of the lower part of this tower, and the size and levelling of its stones, both features of the Hippicus, that this is the foundation of that tower; and he disposes of the marked variation in the dimensions of the two, by saying that 'Josephus probably had no such specific measurements; he was writing, after the lapse of years, at Rome, and the numbers here given must therefore be regarded only in the light of conjectural estimates.' Upon other points, however, this learned and cautious critic places much dependence upon the minute details of Josephus. It is difficult to believe that the Jewish historian could have given the dimensions of Hippicus from 'conjectural estimates.' He says, 'It was a quadrangular structure, twenty-five cubits on each side, and built up entirely solid to the height of thirty cubits. Above this solid part was a cistern twenty cubits high; and then, for twenty-five cubits more, were chambers of various kinds, with a breast-work of two cubits, and battlements of three cubits upon the top. The altitude of the whole tower was consequently eighty cubits. The stones of which it was built were very large, twenty cubits long by ten broad and five high, and were of white marble.' This reads like an accurate, not a conjectural description; and it is not likely that the author would have given these minute proportions without data, or have mistaken a quadrangle fifty-six feet by seventy, for a square of but little more than one-half its superficial area. But Josephus describes also two other towers—those of Phasaëlus and Mariamne, both built by Herod, one of them being named after a friend, and the other after his favourite wife. These stood not far from Hippicus, upon the first or most ancient wall, which ran from the latter tower eastward along the northern brow of Zion. Connected with these towers and Hippicus was the royal castle or palace of the first Herod, which was enclosed by this wall on the north, and on the other sides by a wall thirty cubits high. The whole was finished with great strength and regal splendour, and furnished with halls, galleries, cisterns, and apartments without number (Joseph. De Bell. Jud., v. 4. 3, v. 4. 4). Indeed, the historian says that the Temple itself—though rebuilt by Herod in a style of great magnificence—bore no comparison with the palace he built for himself in the upper town. This contained two very spacious buildings, which were named after his friends, the one Cæsarium, the other Agrippium

(Bell. Jud. i. 21. 1). Accordingly, Hippicus must be located at a point in the first wall 'over against' Psephinos at the north-west angle of the third wall, and with enough space along the northern extremity of Zion to admit of two large towers in the line of the wall eastward from Hippicus, and of the very spacious palace of Herod adjoining these several towers, upon the southern or inner side of the first wall. All this would seem to require that Hippicus should be placed further north than the tower of David. The three towers named above as standing in a row upon the north line of the old wall must have been nearly upon a line with the tower of Antonia, which was north of the Temple. For, when Herod's palace was destroyed by fire, 'the conflagration began at the Antonia, passed onward to the palace, and consumed the roofs of the three towers' (Bell. Jud. v. 4). The rabbi, Joseph Schwartz, in his descriptive geography of Palestine (pp. 250-51) states that the Targumist, Jonathan Ben Uzziel, who lived at Jerusalem in the time of king Herod, refers to the tower of Hippicus, built by that monarch, as representing the site of the tower of Hananeel, spoken of by Jeremiah (xxxi. 38) and by Zechariah (xiv. 10). The site of Hananeel was north-east of the prison gate, which Schwartz assumes to have been at or near the grotto of Jeremiah. But this would locate Hippicus too far to the east. Fergusson conjectures that the ruins of the Kasr Jalud in the north-western angle of the modern wall may represent the site of Hippicus; and Robinson, while he maintains the identity of the tower of David with the Hippicus of Herod, conjectures that the ruins near the Damascus gate 'were ancient towers of a date anterior to the time of Herod.' But if Hippicus stood on the spot of the Kasr Jalud, then those ruins may mark the site of Mariamne on the north-eastern brow of Zion, or of a portion of Herod's palace, which would thus be brought directly opposite the tower of Antonia, so that the fire, as described by Josephus, could easily have communicated from the fortress on the north of the Temple to the palace in the upper city, and thence to the towers in its northern wall. In identifying the tower of David with Hippicus, Dr. Robinson attaches much importance to 'the solidity of the antique part' of the structure near the Jaffa gate. While he rejects the measurements of Hippicus by Josephus as 'conjectural estimates,' he says, 'the solidity of the lower part of the tower is a circumstance so remarkable, and was probably of such publicity, that it cannot well be referred to the imagination of the historian' (i. 307). But Josephus states expressly that every one of the towers in the third wall was built in the same manner. 'On this wall were erected towers, twenty cubits in breadth, and the same in height, square, and solid as the wall itself. . . . Over the solid altitude of the towers, which was twenty cubits, were sumptuous apartments; and above these, again, upper rooms and numerous cisterns therein to receive the rain water, and to each room wide staircases. Of such towers the third wall had ninety, disposed at intervals of 200 cubits' (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 3). This 'solidity of the lower part of the tower,' so far from being a remarkable feature of Hippicus, was the common feature of them all; and therefore, when Josephus gives this portion of Hippicus of larger dimensions than the corresponding portion in the rest—Hippicus having a solid foundation twenty-five cubits square, and thirty high and the other towers a solid cubic foundation of twenty cubits—the presumption is, that his estimates are not 'conjectural,' but literally exact. But these measurements do not at all correspond with the dimensions of the present tower of David, which, in the solid part, measures fifty-six feet by seventy. Josephus describes the towers of Phasaelus and Mariamne as minutely as Hippicus. Both these exhibited the same 'solidity in the lower part,' which Dr. Robinson regards as the reliable feature in the Jewish historian's description of that tower; indeed, in Phasaelus, there was a cubic mass of stone as a foundation, measuring forty cubits either way, and the entire altitude of this tower was about ninety cubits, that of Hippicus being about eighty cubits. We cannot then discard the measurements which Josephus gives of Hippicus as 'conjectural;' and therefore we cannot regard it as settled that the tower of such very different dimensions near the Jaffa gate is the representative of the tower that Herod built at the north-west corner of the old wall of Zion. But if Hippicus be displaced from that point, and if to bring it over against Psephinos, and in due range of a fire spreading from Antonia, and also to make room for the three great towers of Herod, and his contiguous palace upon the high northern point of Zion—it seems necessary to place Hippicus near the north-western angle of the modern wall;—then the Zion or upper city of Josephus included the ridge lying between the Jaffa and Damascus gates—the Christian quarter of the present city—and Akra must be looked for upon the eastern side of the Damascus gate valley.

Again, Josephus (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1) states that opposite to Akra was a third hill, naturally lower, and separated from it by a broad valley; but that the Asmoneans, during their reign, filled up the valley with the intention of uniting the city to the Temple; and, levelling the summit of Akra, they reduced its elevation, so that the Temple might be conspicuous above other objects in this quarter also. A more particular account of this is given in the Antiquities (bk. xiii. 64. 7), where it is stated that Simon, having taken the citadel of Jerusalem by siege, razed it to the ground, and persuaded the people, as a measure of precaution, to level the very mountain upon which the citadel stood,—'a work which cost them three whole years before it was removed and brought to an entire level with the rest of the city.' Now, if Akra were upon the western side of the Damascus valley, and north of Zion, it could not have abstracted the view of the Temple from the latter hill, nor the view upon that side from without the city as much as Zion itself obstructed it. But if Akra and its citadel were upon the eastern side of that valley, and north of the Temple—and there is much reason to believe that the citadel was there—then the hill, with its buildings, would obstruct the view of the Temple from the north, besides commanding the sacred edifice strategically from that quarter. According to Josephus, Antiochus built in the lower city a fortress (Akra), which was lofty, and overlooked the Temple; and, indeed, was so near to it, that its garrison could seriously annoy the labourers whom Judas brought to purify and restore the building (Antiq. xii. 5. 4, 7, 6, 9. 3). In the first book of Maccabees (xiv. 36), this Akra is described as a stronghold from which the heathen 'issued and polluted all about the sanctuary, and did much hurt in the holy place.' Josephus states that this citadel overlooked the Temple so closely, that its soldiers would sometimes rush out and slay those who were going up to the Temple to worship (Antiq. xii. 9. 3). When Simon became master of the city, he 'strengthened the hill of the Temple that was by the fortress (1 Maccab. xiii. 52); afterwards, as stated above, he razed the Akra to its foundations, lowered the hill upon which it stood, and filled in the valley between it and the Temple. All this accords extremely well with the supposition that the hill and citadel of Akra were adjacent to the Temple-hill upon the north. Moreover, in every capture of the city Akra and the Temple go together; to secure one was practically to secure the other, while Zion required a separate siege. Thus, in Herod's siege, when the outer court of the Temple and the lower city were taken, the Jews took refuge in the inner court of the Temple and in the upper city (Antiq. xiv. 16. 2). Thus Akra and the Temple are always represented as in close proximity. North of the Haram area are traces of indentations in the surface of the mountain which may possibly represent the broad or flat [Quere, shallow?] valley that anciently separated Akra from the Temple-hill. Dr. Robinson insists that 'in no possible shape or sense can the hill north of Moriah be said to be gibbas or ἀμφικυρτός,' and therefore that it cannot be the Akra of Josephus (Bib. Sac., 1846, p. 424). But the author of the Biblical Researches elsewhere states that 'this word ἀμφικυρτός may mean nothing more than that Akra was sloping on both sides, i. e., was a ridge running down into the city' (i. 278, note 3); and the hill north of the Temple answers to this meaning.

A more serious objection to regarding this hill as the Akra of Josephus is found in the description that he gives of the gates on the west of the Temple enclosure. 'In the western parts of the enclosure stood four gates; one leading over to the royal palace, the valley between being intercepted to form a passage; two leading to the suburb; and the remaining one into the other city, being distinguished by many steps down into the valley, and from this up again upon the ascent; for the city lay over against the Temple in the manner of a theatre, being encompassed by a deep valley on all its southern quarter' (Antiq. xv. 11. 5). Upon this Dr. Robinson remarks, that 'the gate with many steps led to the other city; which, as thus mentioned after the royal palace on Zion, can only be the lower city or Akra. Here, then, we have direct testimony by the Jewish historian, that Akra formed part of the general acclivity on the west of Moriah.' But if Akra and Moriah had been made virtually one, then 'the other city' would be the Upper city, in distinction from the Lower, which was more closely identified with the Temple; and the steps would provide the public with a way of access from one to the other, in distinction from the viaduct which connected the Temple directly with the royal palace. Besides, how could Akra and the Temple have been connected by this double flight of steps for descending and ascending the two hills, when the valley that formerly separated them had been filled in so as to connect the Temple with the lower city?

But any theory which would transfer Akra from the western to the eastern side of the Damascus gate valley, must be made to harmonize with the express statement of Josephus, that Bezetha lay upon that side, north of the Temple area, and adjacent to the tower of Antonia, from which it was separated by an artificial trench or fosse. In describing the third wall, built by Agrippa, Josephus says: 'The city, overflowing with population, had gradually crept beyond the walls, and incorporating with itself the parts on the north of the Temple close to the hill, had extended not a little; so that a fourth hill, called Bezetha, was now occupied, lying over against Antonia, and separated from it by a deep fosse. For a trench had been dug on purpose, lest the foundations of Antonia, being joined to this hill, should be less high and easily accessible' (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 2). Again, in describing the Temple, Josephus says: 'The hill Bezetha was separated, as I have said, from Antonia; and being the highest of all, it was built up adjoining a part of the new city, and alone obstructed the view of the Temple on the north' (Bell. Jud. v. 5. 8).

The fortress of Antonia, it is generally agreed, bounded the north-west angle of the Temple area, whatever the dimensions of that area may have been. Adjacent to this, upon the north, was the hill Bezetha, which, in its highest elevation, cut off the view of the Temple from that quarter. But the fortress Antonia was evidently included within the circuit of the second wall, which, beginning at the gate Gennath in the first wall, enclosed Akra, or the lower city: and the wall which was overflowed by a population crowding outwards upon Bezetha was the northern wall of Akra. Moreover, the Akra, i. e., the tower of the Akra hill, is described as commanding the Temple in the time of the Asmonæans, as Antonia commanded it in the time of Herod (1 Maccab. xiii. 52). If, then, we may regard the fortress Baxis, afterwards Antonia, as identical with the Akra of Antiochus Epiphanes, the hill Akra was the ridge north of the Temple area sloping toward the Damascus valley—then the Tyropæon—and Bezetha, the ridge rising northward from this, and skirted by the valley of Jehoshaphat. As was remarked above, it greatly relieves the perplexity of this subject, if we can conceive of Akra and the Temple-hill as made virtually one by the Asmonæans, and as so regarded by Josephus in his general descriptions of the city. In his account of the sack of the city by Titus, when as yet only the lower city and the Temple had been taken, Josephus states that Roman soldiers 'set fire to the residence of the magistrates, the Akra, the council-chamber, and the place called Ophla, the flames spreading as far as the palace of Queen Helena, which was in the centre of the Akra. The streets also were consumed, and the houses. . . . On the next day the Romans, having driven the brigands from the lower town, burned all, as far as Siloam;' and while the four legions were raising mounds on the western side of the upper city, the auxiliaries 'laboured in the region of the Xystus, the bridge, and the tower of Simon' (Bell. Jud. vi. 6. 6, vi. 7. 2, vi. 8. 1). Thus, the historian seems to group the lower city with Ophel and other localities lying eastward of Zion. Upon the whole, then, the site of Akra is still a question of probabilities; and as yet we can but state the various theories propounded by scholars and topographers, and await the results of future explorations upon the ground. These theories are—

1. Akra is the ridge between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, the principal Christian quarter of the modern city. See in Reland, Von Raumer, Robinson, Stanley, etc. As yet the weight of authorities favours this view. The Tyropœon then began at the Jaffa gate.

2. Akra is north of the Haram area and contiguous to it, and east of the valley that runs southward from the Damascus gate, which then becomes the Tyropœon—Zion is extended northward so as to embrace in whole or in part the ridge which is the Akra of No. 1. The argument for this theory is given above from Ritter. See also in Rabbi Schwartz. Akra thus lies wholly within the Mohammedan quarter of the modern city, and Zion includes the whole of the Christian, Armenian, and Jewish quarters.

3. Akra, as above, is identified with the hill of the present Mohammedan quarter; but Zion is not extended northward so as to stand 'face to face' with it, as the statement of Josephus would require (Williams in Holy City, and in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography). The course which Williams assigns to the second wall includes the Tyropœon with the inclosure of the lower city, instead of making it the division between this and the upper city.

4. Akra was that portion of the Haram es-Sherif which was not occupied by the Temple (Schultz and Krafft). This reduces Akra to the insignificant area of fifteen or twenty acres; and the geological structure of the Temple-hill forbids the supposition that the Haram was ever crossed at that point by a valley from east to west which could answer to Josephus' description of the broad valley separating Akra from Moriah.

5. Akra was the ridge south of the Temple area, and east of Zion, commonly known as Ophel (Prof. Justus Olshausen). But there never was room for a city on that rocky declivity; it could not have been separated from the Temple by a valley; and it is naturally lower than the site of the Temple, whereas Akra was originally higher.

6. Akra was the lower eastern portion of the hill commonly known as Zion, i.e., Akra answers to the Jewish quarter, and Zion to the Armenian quarter of the modern city (Dr. Titus Tobler). But this theory greatly contracts the area of the city, and interposes Akra between Zion and the Temple, which Josephus states were directly connected by a viaduct.

7. Akra is the entire ridge of the Haram, from Stephen's gate to Siloam, including of course the site of the Temple (Thrupp). Thus the Temple stood within the lower city. Thrupp and Fergusson agree that the Temple-hill was the ancient Zion, the city of David. Among all these theories the first and second appear the more tenable in view of all the data furnished by Josephus; and yet those data alone are insufficient to determine the question in favour of either site as the true Akra.

The Walls.—Next in importance to the relative location of the hills of Jerusalem, is the course of the several walls mentioned by Josephus. His general description of these walls is to the following purport. The single wall which inclosed that part of the city skirted by precipitous valleys began on the north at the tower of Hippicus. On the west it extended (southward) through a place called Bethso to the gate of the Essenes; thence it kept along on the south to a point over against Siloam; and thence bending to the east it was carried along by Solomon's Pool and Ophla (Ophel), till it joined the eastern portico of the Temple. On the north this wall began at the tower of Hippicus, and extending (along the northern brow of Zion) to the Xystus, terminated at the western portico of the Temple. The second wall began at the gate of Gennath (apparently near Hippicus), and, encircling only the northern part of the city, extended to the castle of Antonia at the north-west corner of the area of the Temple. The third wall was built by Agrippa at a later period; it also had its beginning at the tower of Hippicus, ran northward as far as the tower of Psephinos; and thence sweeping round towards the north-east by east, it turned afterwards towards the south, and was joined to the ancient wall at or in the valley of the Kidron. This wall enclosed the hill Bezetha (Bell. Jud. v. 4. 2). The Xystus here spoken of was an open area upon the eastern brow of Zion, extending from the first wall, which there crossed the Tyropœon, southward to the bridge which connected the Temple with the upper city. In this area, where perhaps there was a colonnade, the people were accustomed to gather upon public occasions. The position of the bridge, so often referred to by Josephus in connection with the Xystus, has been well identified with the immense fragment of an ancient arch discovered by Dr. Robinson in the western wall of the Haram enclosure, near the south-west corner (Bib. Res. i. 287; iii. 221). This arch measures fifty-one feet along the wall, and three courses of its stones remain. Some of the stones are of great size.

The valley at this point is about 116 yards in width. The discovery of this bridge is of great importance in determining the position of the Xystus, and the line of the western wall of the Temple. Dr. Robinson was the first explorer who identified this fragment of an arch with the bridge that spanned the Tyropœon from the Temple to the upper city.

The first or most ancient wall described above appears to have inclosed the whole of Mount Zion toward the south. Indeed it must have formed the exterior and sole wall on that side, overlooking the deep valleys below Mount Zion; and the northern part evidently passed from the tower of Hippicus on the west side along the northern brow of Zion, and across the valley, to the western side of the Temple area. It probably nearly coincided with the ancient wall which existed before the time of David, and which enabled the Jebusites to maintain themselves in possession of the upper city, long after the lower city had been in the hands of the Israelites. Much of Mount Zion upon the south lies without the walls of the modern city. Some traces of this old wall were visible in the time of Benjamin of Tudela, who says that the stones of the foundation were then taken away for building (Itiner. ed. Asher, i. 73). No trace of it can now be perceived; but by digging through the rubbish the foundations might perhaps be discovered.

The account given by Josephus of the second wall is very short and unsatisfactory. This is the more to be regretted, as on the course taken by the eastern part of that wall rests the question, whether that which is now shown as the site of Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre was anciently beyond the wall or not. While the traditional and the historical evidences are strongly urged in favour of the present site, the topographical evidence is urged as strongly against it. Reference is made to both classes of evidences in the article on GOLGOTHA. The topographical argument is here in place. If the location assigned to Akra in No. 2 above be accepted, with a corresponding extension of Zion, of course the present church of the holy sepulchre cannot mark the scene of our Lord's crucifixion and burial, for it must have been far within the wall of Zion.

The Akra of No. 1 is almost equally fatal to the identity of the alleged site; since the course of the second wall from its starting point at the gate Gennath, near Hippicus, would naturally have included this site in what Josephus describes as its 'circling' sweep northward and eastward to the Temple. The precise course of this wall might perhaps be determined by excavations; especially along one of the two streets which intersect the via Dolorosa. It is likely that the foundations of the old wall still exist; and if it lay at a point within the present wall, those foundations must pass under this street, and an excavation of not greater extent than those which are made every day in London for sewerage would bring them to light, and shew whether the alleged site of Calvary lay within or without the second wall. Dr. Robinson argues that the gate Gennath in the first wall, from which the second wall had its beginning, being a gate that led out of Zion into the country, must have been but a little to the east of Hippicus, which he locates at the Jaffa gate. Regarding the chambers near the Damascus gate as remnants of a gate in the second wall, he claims also to have found traces of an ancient wall running from the Damascus gate to a point near the Latin convent. By this course the second wall would be carried far to the west of the church of the sepulchre, thus including that site within the city walls. Assuming that Zion terminated at the Jaffa gate, and that Gennath was near the present tower of David, this supposed line of wall would answer well to the statement of Josephus that, 'encircling the tract in the north, it extended to Antonia.' Those who advocate the genuineness of the site of the Holy Sepulchre are obliged either to transfer Akra to the east of the Damascus gate valley, without a corresponding extension of Zion to the north; or to place the gate Gennath so far eastward from the Jaffa gate, as greatly to contract the lower city by a wall from that point to Antonia, or to violate Josephus by making a wall with re-entering angles, constructed as if on purpose to throw the Holy Sepulchre without the wall; and in either case to violate the strategic conditions of the ridge in question, by running the wall across the slope of the hill, where it could be easily overtopped by engines of war from without. In a word, then, the whole weight of topographical evidence is against the alleged site of the sepulchre.

Nor is the traditional and historical evidence for this site so continuous and conclusive as is sometimes represented. The historical evidence seeks to identify the site with that selected by Constantine for his commemorative church as described by Eusebius. But if this be assumed, to insist that after Jerusalem had for three centuries been either a desolation or the abode of Pagan contemners, a foreign prince so manifestly given to enthusiasm and superstition as was Constantine, would identify the very place of the crucifixion—which the gospels had left unmarked by any 'local sanctity'—is to demand, not faith in historical evidence, nor even in local tradition, but simple credulity for legendary trifles. We are liable to be misled as to the value of tradition in such a case, by comparing three centuries with nineteen, and imagining that one living in the 4th century after Christ was so near to the events embodied in the traditions as to be able to judge correctly of their truth. But if we go back 300 years from our own time, how obscure and uncertain is oral tradition, how conflicting often are written statements touching important events in church and state! One of the earliest and best sustained traditions makes the ascension of Christ to have taken place from the summit of Olivet; whereas Luke places it near Bethany. When Constantine determined the site of the holy sepulchre, Jerusalem had already been for three centuries in the hands either of Jewish or of Pagan enemies of the Christian faith.

The historical identity of the church of the holy sepulchre with the site selected by Constantine has been called in question by Mr. James Fergusson in an original and very able argument. This writer regards the Mosque of Omar, so called, in the enclosure of the Haram, as the church of the Anastasis, built by Constantine; and the Khubbit-es-Sakrah, or holy stone within the mosque, as the sepulchre of rock in which the Lord was laid. Accordingly, he greatly reduces the Temple area as compared with the Haram; that being an irregular parallelogram about 1500 feet long by from 900 to 1000 in breadth; and the Temple area having been a square of 600 feet at its south-western corner. Thus, he would throw the rock outside of the wall of the old city. He argues also that Eusebius is to be understood as fixing the church of the Anastasis upon the eastern hill of the city, opposite to Zion. 'On the very spot which witnessed the Saviour's sufferings, a new Jerusalem was constructed over against the one so celebrated of old, which, since the foul stain of guilt brought upon it by the murder of the Lord, had experienced the extremity of desolation. It was opposite the city that the emperor began to rear a monument to the Saviour's victory over death, with rich and lavish magnificence' (Life of Con., iii. 33). But Mr. Fergusson's main reliance is upon the architecture of the mosque and of the so-called golden gate—a point upon which he is certainly a high authority, and of which he does not hesitate to speak with the utmost confidence. This he assigns unhesitatingly to 'the first half of the 4th century'; and he makes the golden gate 'the propylon of Constantine's basilica,' and the mosque or 'dome of the rock,' the 'Anastasis built by him.' By reducing the Temple area to the exact dimensions given by Josephus, and locating Antonia close upon its north-western corner, this writer throws the dome of the rock outside of the ancient city wall. His arguments for circumscribing the Temple area to a square of 600 feet are borne out, not only by the frequent statements of Josephus upon that point, but by the appearance of the substructions of the Haram area in its south-western corner. This theory is combated with acrimonious vigour in the Edinburgh Review (Oct. 1860), as violating the relative positions assigned by Eusebius to the Basilica and the Anastasis of Constantine, and his statement that the propylon faced an open market-place, for which the steep brow overhanging Jehoshaphat affords no room. Upon the whole, while the topographical argument appears conclusive against the church of the holy sepulchre as the authentic site of the sepulchre of our Lord, the site proposed by Mr. Fergusson, though urged with so much ability and enthusiasm, can hardly be accepted as satisfactory. Future excavations in Jerusalem may bring to light some reliable evidence touching the sacred places, though they may also undermine and demolish all existing theories upon the subject. The genuineness of the traditional site of the sepulchre is disproved by any plausible and defensible theory of Akra and the second wall, and by the strategical lay of the hill upon which the church of the sepulchre stands: while of Mr. Fergusson's theory it is enough to say, according to a peculiar Scottish verdict, that it is 'not proven.' Dr. Barclay suggests that the place of crucifixion may have been a spur of the ridge 'projecting south-eastwardly into the Kidron valley, a short distance above Gethsemane.' But this is only conjecture; and we must rather say with Kble—

'Dear sacred haunts of glory and of woe, Help us, one hour, to trace His musings high and low;
One heart-ennobling hour! it may not be;
Th' unearthly thoughts have pass'd from earth away,
And fast as evening sunbeams from the sea
Thy footsteps all in Sion's deep decay
Were blotted from the holy ground: yet dear
Is every stone of hers; FOR THOU WAST
SURELY HERE.'

Later Walls.—Although the two walls above described were the only walls that existed in the time of our Saviour, we are not to infer that the habitable city was confined within their limits. On the contrary, it was because the city had extended northward far beyond the second wall, that a third was built to cover the defenceless suburb: and there is no reason to doubt that this unprotected suburb, called Bezetha, existed in the time of Christ. This wall has already been described as having also begun at the tower of Hippicus; it ran northward as far as to the tower Psephinos, then passed down opposite the sepulchre of Helena (queen of Adiabene), and being carried along through the royal sepulchres, turned at the corner tower by the Fullers' monument, and ended by making a junction with the ancient wall at the valley of the Kidron. It was begun ten or twelve years after our Lord's crucifixion by the elder Herod Agrippa, who desisted from completing it for fear of offending the Emperor Claudius. But the design was afterwards taken up and completed by the Jews themselves, although on a scale of less strength and magnificence. Some traces of this wall have been found to the north of the modern city wall.

Robinson thinks that the wall of the new city, the Ælia of Adrian, nearly coincided with that of the present Jerusalem; and the portion of Mount Zion which now lies outside would seem then also to have been excluded, for Eusebius and Cyrill, in the 4th century, speak of the denunciation of the prophet being fulfilled, and describes Zion as 'a ploughed field' (Mic. iii. 2).

We know from Josephus that the circumference of the ancient city was 33 stadia, equivalent to nearly four English miles. The circumference of the present walls does not exceed two and a half geographical miles; but the extent of Mount Zion, now without the walls, and the tract on the north formerly enclosed, or partly so, by the third wall, sufficiently account for the difference. (See wood-cut, page 528.)

The present walls have a solid and formidable appearance, especially when cursorily observed from without; and they are strengthened, or rather ornamented, with towers and battlements after the Saracenic style. They are built of limestone, the stones being not commonly more than a foot or fifteen inches square. The height varies with the various elevations of the ground. The lower parts are probably about twenty-five feet high, while in more exposed localities, where the ravines contribute less to the security of the city, they have an elevation of sixty or seventy feet.

The Ancient Gates.—Much uncertainty exists respecting the ancient gates of Jerusalem. It has been objected that the gates named in the Scriptures are more in number than a town of the size of Jerusalem could require, especially as they all occur within the extent embraced by the first and second walls, the third not then existing. It has, therefore, been suggested as more than probable that some of these gates were within the city, in the walls which separated the town from the Temple and the upper town from the lower, in which gates certainly existed. On the other hand, considering the circumstances under which the wall was rebuilt in the time of Nehemiah, it is difficult to suppose that more than the outer wall was then constructed, and certainly it was in the wall then built that the ten or twelve gates mentioned by Nehemiah occur. But these may be somewhat reduced by supposing that two or more of the names mentioned were applied to the same gate. If this view of the matter be taken, no better distribution of these gates can be given than that suggested by Raumer (Palestina, 3d ed., p. 256).

A. On the north side.

1. The Old Gate, probably at the north-east corner (Neh. iii. 6; xii. 39).

2. The Gate of Ephraim or Benjamin (Jer. xxxviii. 7; xxxvii. 13; Neh. xii. 9; 2 Chron. xxv. 23). This gate derived its names from its leading to the territory of Ephraim and Benjamin.

3. The Corner-gate, 300 cubits from the former, and at the north-west corner (2 Chron. xxv. 9; 2 Kings xiv. 13; Zech. xiv. 10). Probably the Gate of the Furnaces is the same (Neh. iii. 2; xii. 38).

B. On the west side.

4. The Valley-gate, over against the Dragon-fountain of Gihon (Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9). It was probably about the north-west corner of Zion, where there appears to have been always a gate. Dr. Robinson supposes it to be the same with the Gennath of Josephus.

C. On the south side.

5. The Dung-gate, perhaps the same as Josephus's Gate of the Essenes (Neh. ii. 13; xii. 31). It was 1000 cubits from the valley-gate (Neh. iii. 14), and the dragon-well was between them (Neh. ii. 13). This gate is probably also identical with 'the gate between two walls' (2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4; Lam. ii. 7).

6. The Gate of the Fountain, to the south-east (Neh. ii. 14; iii. 15); the gate of the fountain near the king's pool (Neh. ii. 14); the gate of the fountain near 'the pool of Siloah by the king's garden' (Neh. iii. 15). The same gate is probably denoted in all these instances, and the pools seem to have been also the same. It is also possible that this fountain-gate was the same otherwise distinguished as the brick-gate (or potter's gate), leading to the valley of Hinnom (Jer. xix. 2, where the A. V. has 'east-gate').

d. On the east side.

7. The Water-gate (Neh. iii. 26).

8. The Prison-gate, otherwise the Horse-gate, near the Temple (Neh. iii. 28; xii. 39, 40).

9. The Sheep-gate, probably near the sheep-pool (Neh. iii. 1-32; xii. 29).

10. The Fish-gate was quite at the north-east (Neh. iii. 3; xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14).

It will be observed that in two of the cases the distances of the gates from each other are mentioned. Thus the corner gate (3) was only 300 cubits from the gate of Ephraim (2), and the dung-gate (5) was 1000 cubits from the valley-gate (4). If the circumference of the wall of Jerusalem before the third wall was added be assumed to have been two miles and a half, or equal to the present wall, then this extent would have allowed ten gates at the highest named distance of 1000 cubits apart, and more than thrice that number at the lowest named distance of 300 cubits.

In the Middle Ages there appear to have been two gates on each side of the city, making eight in all; and this number, being only two short of those assigned in the above estimate to the ancient Jerusalem, seems to vindicate that estimate from the objections which have been urged against it.

On the west side were two gates, of which the principal was the Porta David, Gate of David, often mentioned by the writers on the Crusades. It was called by the Arabs Bab el-Mihrab, and corresponds to the present Jaffa gate, or Bab el-Khulil. The other was the gate of the Fuller's Field (Porta Villa Fullonis), so called from Is. vii. 3. This seems to be the same which others call Porta Judiciaria, and which is described as being in the wall over against the church of the holy sepulchre, leading to Silo (Neby Samw'el) and Gibeon. This seems to be that which the Arabian writers call Serb. There is no trace of it in the present wall.

On the north there were also two gates; and all the middle-age writers speak of the principal of them as the gate of St. Stephen, from the notion that the death of the protomartyr took place near it. This was also called the gate of Ephraim, in reference to its probable ancient name. Arabic writers called it Bab 'Amud el-Ghurab, of which the present name, Bab el-'Amud, is only a contraction. The present gate of St. Stephen is on the east of the city, and the scene of the martyrdom is now placed near it; but there is no account of the change. Further east was the gate of Benjamin (Porta Benjaminis), corresponding apparently to what is now called the gate of Herod.

On the east there seem to have been at least two gates. The northernmost is described by Adamnanus as a small portal leading down to the valley of Jehoshaphat. It was called the gate of Jehoshaphat, from the valley to which it led. It seems to be represented by the present gate of St. Stephen. The Arabian writers call it Bab el-Ubat, Gate of the tribes, being another form of the modern Arabic name Bab es-Subat. The present gate of St. Stephen has four lions sculptured over it on the outside, which, as well as the architecture, show that it existed before the present walls. The other gate is the famous Golden 290. The Golden Gate.

Gate (Porta aurea) in the eastern wall of the Temple area. It is now called by the Arabs Bab el-Dukariyeh, but formerly Bab er-Rahmeh, 'Gate of Mercy.' The name Golden Gate appears to have come from a supposed connection with one of the ancient gates of the Temple, which are said to have been covered with gold; but this name cannot be traced back beyond the historians of the Crusades. This gate is, from its architecture, obviously of Roman origin, and is conjectured by some to have belonged to the enclosure of the Temple of Jupiter which was built by Adrian upon Mount Moriah; but Mr. Fergusson, as seen above, ascribes it to Constantine. The exterior is now walled up; but being double, the interior forms within the area a recess, which is used for prayer by the Moslem worshipper. Different reasons are given for the closing of this gate. It was probably because it was found inconvenient that a gate to the mosque should be open in the exterior wall. Although not walled up, it was kept closed even when the Crusaders were in possession of the city, and only opened once a year, on Palm Sunday, in celebration of our Lord's supposed triumphal entry through it to the Temple.

On the south side were also two gates. The easternmost is now called by the Franks the Dung-gate, and by the natives Bab el-Mugharibeh. The earliest mention of this gate is by Brocard, about A.D. 1283, who regards it as the ancient Water-gate. Further west, between the eastern brow of Zion and the gate of David, the Crusaders found a gate which they call the Gate of Zion, corresponding to one which now bears the same name.

It thus appears that before the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by the Turks in the 16th century, the principal gates of the city were much the same as at the present day. But of the seven gates mentioned as still existing, three, the Dung Gate, the Golden Gate, and Herod's Gate, are closed. Thus there are only four gates now in use, one on each side of the town, all of which have been enumerated. St. Stephen's, on the east, leads to the Mount of Olives, Bethany, and Jericho. From the nature of the ground, taken in connection with the situation of the Temple, a little south, there must always have been a great thoroughfare here. Zion Gate, on the south side of the city, connects the populous quarter around the Armenian convent with that part of Mount Zion which is outside the walls, and which is much resorted to as being the great field of Christian burial, as well as for its traditional sanctity as the site of David's tomb, the house of Caiaphas, house of Mary, etc. The Jaffa Gate, on the west, is the termination of the important routes from Jaffa, Bethlehem, and Hebron. The formation of the ground suggests this as one of the great thoroughfares of the ancient city, which could here be approached from the quarters just indicated much more conveniently than at any other point. The Damascus Gate, on the north, is planted in a vale, which in every age of Jerusalem must have been a great public way, and the easiest approach from Samaria and Galilee.

Subterranean Quarries.—Dr. Barclay was so fortunate as to discover near the Damascus gate an entrance to a large excavation under Bezetha, which was probably the quarry from which much of the stone was taken for building the Temple. The principal cave is upwards of 3000 feet in circumference, its roof about 30 feet high, supported by rude pillars of rock. There are numerous lateral galleries leading to halls of various sizes, in some of which are traces of artificial excavation. Dr. W. M. Thomson, who also visited the quarry, gives the following graphic description of it:—

'The excavations under the ridge which extends from the north-west corner of the Temple area to the north wall of the city are most extraordinary. I spent a large part of this forenoon examining them with a company of friends from the city. Passing out at the Damascus gate, we ascended the hill of rubbish east of it, and just under the high precipice over which the wall is carried, we crept or rather backed through a narrow opening, and, letting ourselves down some five feet on the inside, we stood within the cavern. Lighting our candles, we began to explore. For some distance the descent southward was rapid, down a vast bed of soft earth. Pausing to take breath and look about, I was surprised at the immense dimensions of the room. The roof of rock is about thirty feet high, even above these huge heaps of rubbish, and is sustained by large, shapeless columns of the original rock, left for that purpose by the quarriers, I suppose. On we went, down, down from one depth to a lower, wandering now this, now that way, and ever in danger of getting lost, or of falling over some of the many precipices into the yawning darkness beneath. In some places we climbed with difficulty over large masses of rock, which appear to have been shaken down from the roof, and suggest to the nervous the possibility of being ground to powder by similar masses which hang overhead. In other parts our progress was arrested by pyramids of rubbish which had fallen from above, through apertures in the vault, either natural or artificial. We found water trickling down in several places, and in one there was a small natural pool full to the brim. This trickling water has covered many parts with crystalline incrustations, pure and white—in others, stalactites hang from the roof, and stalagmites have grown up from the floor. The entire rock is remarkably white, and, though not very hard, will take a polish quite sufficient for architectural beauty

'The general direction of these excavations is south-east, and about parallel with the valley which descends from the Damascus Gate. I suspect that they extend down to the Temple area, and also that it was into these caverns that many of the Jews retired when Titus took the Temple, as we read in Josephus. The whole city might be stowed away in them; and it is my opinion that a great part of the very white stone of the Temple must have been taken from these subterranean quarries' (Thomson's Land and Book, vol. ii. pp. 491, 492).

Water Resources of Jerusalem.—In his account of the siege of Jerusalem by Pompey, Strabo says that the town was well provided with water within the walls, but that there was none in the environs (Geog. xvi. 2, 40). Probably the Roman troops then suffered from want of water, as did other armies which laid siege to Jerusalem. In the narratives of such sieges we almost never read of the besieged suffering from thirst, although driven to the most dreadful extremities and resources by hunger, while the besiegers are frequently described as suffering greatly from want of water, and as being obliged to fetch it from a great distance. The agonies of thirst sustained by the first Crusaders in their siege of Jerusalem will be remembered by most readers from the vivid picture drawn by Tasso, if not from the account furnished by William of Tyre. Yet when the town was taken plenty of water was found within it. This singular circumstance is only in part explained by reference to the system of preserving water in cisterns, as at this day, in Jerusalem. Every house is furnished with cisterns and tanks, into which the rain-water is conducted. Some of the reservoirs are very capacious.

Besides these there were several aqueducts for conveying water from reservoirs outside of the city. The principal of these was that leading from the enormous pools of Solomon near Bethlehem. But in time of war these external supplies of water could be cut off by the besiegers. At the siege of Titus the well of Siloam may have been in possession of the Jews, i. e., within the walls; but at the siege by the Crusaders it was certainly held by the besieging Franks: and yet the latter perished from thirst, while the besieged had 'ingentes copias aquæ.' There is good ground to conclude that from very ancient times there has been under the Temple an unfailing source of water, derived by secret and subterranean channels from springs to the west of the town, and communicating by other subterranean passages with the pool of Siloam and the fountain of the Virgin in the east of the town, whether they were within or without the walls of the town.

Barclay is of opinion that there was a natural but small fountain under the Temple; but he thinks the early travellers and geographers who speak of this were misled by the sound of water falling into a subterranean reservoir from the aqueduct of Ethaia; and that the overflow of this reservoir produced the stream that Oman found flowing from the Temple area when he took the city. The existence of a perennial source of water below the Temple has always been admitted. Tacitus knew of it (Hist. v. 12); and Aristeas, in describing the ancient Temple, informs us that 'the supply of water was unfailing, inasmuch as there was an abundant natural fountain flowing in the interior, and reservoirs of admirable construction under ground, extending five stadia round the Temple, with pipes and conduits unknown to all except those to whom the service was entrusted, by which the water was brought to various parts of the Temple and again conducted off.' The Moslems also have constantly affirmed the existence of this fountain or cistern. But a reserve has always been kept up as to the means by which it is supplied. This reserve seems to have been maintained by the successive occupants of Jerusalem as a point of civic honour; and this fact alone intimates that there was danger to the town in its becoming known, and points to the fact that the supply came from without the city by secret channels, which it was of importance not to disclose. Yet we are plainly told in the Bible that Hezekiah 'stopped the upper water-course of Gihon, and brought it down to the west side of the city of David' (1 Kings i. 33, 38); from 2 Chron. xxxii. 30, it seems that all the neighbouring fountains were thus 'stopped' or covered, and the brook which they had formed diverted by subterranean channels into the town, for the express purpose of preventing besiegers from finding the 'much water' which previously existed outside the walls (comp. also Eccus. xlviii. 17). Perhaps, likewise, the prophet Ezekiel (xlvi. 1-12) alludes to this secret fountain under the Temple when he speaks of waters issuing from the threshold of the Temple towards the east, and flowing down towards the desert as an abundant and beautiful stream. This figure may be drawn from the waters of the inner source, under the Temple, being at the time of the overflow discharged by the outlets at Siloam into the Kidron, which takes the eastward course thus described. (See woodcut, page 521.)

There are certainly wells, or rather shafts, in and near the Temple area, which are alleged to derive their waters through a passage of masonry four or five feet high, from a chamber or reservoir cut in the solid rock under the grand mosque, in which the water is said to rise from the rock into a basin at the bottom. The existence of this reservoir and source of water is affirmed by all Moslems, and coincides with the preceding intimations, but it must be left for future explorers to clear up all the obscurities in which the matter is involved.

Dr. Barclay, who has given much attention to the water sources of Jerusalem, both ancient and modern, and who made several fruitless attempts to explore this subterranean stream, leaves the question of its origin in uncertainty. 'Whether there be indeed any natural spring of water deep-seated within the Temple enclosure, and the waste of which runs off at Siloam, cannot perhaps at present be certainly determined; it is a question which, with many others of the same kind, must await the time when the Holy City comes under the sway of some civilized government' (City of the Great King, p. 293; see also Thomson's Land and Book, vol. ii. p. 530).

The Modern City.—To comprehend the general topography of Jerusalem and its environs, one should have before him Altmüller's raised map of the modern city. Upon the whole the best verbal description of Jerusalem is that from the pen of Dr. Olin. The summit of the Mount of Olives is about half a mile east from the city, which it completely overlooks, every considerable edifice and almost every house being visible. The city seen from this point appears to be a regular inclined plain, sloping gently and uniformly from west to east, or towards the observer, and indented by a slight depression or shallow vale, running nearly through the centre in the same direction. The south-east corner of the quadrangle—for that may be assumed as the figure formed by the rocks—that which is nearest to the observer, is occupied by the mosque of Omar and its extensive and beautiful grounds. This is Mount Moriah, the site of Solomon's temple, and the ground embraced in the sacred enclosure occupies about an eighth of the whole modern city. It is covered with green sward and planted sparingly with olive, cypress, and other trees, and it is certainly the most lovely feature of the town, whether we have reference to the splendid structures or the beautiful lawn spread out around them. (See woodcut, page 520.)

The south-west quarter, embracing that part of Mount Zion which is within the modern town, is to a great extent occupied by the Armenian convent, an enormous edifice, which is the only conspicuous object in this neighbourhood. The north-west is largely occupied by the Latin convent, another very extensive establishment. About midway between these two convents is the castle or citadel, close to the Bethlehem gate, already mentioned. The north-east quarter of Jerusalem is but partially built up, and it has more the aspect of a rambling agricultural village than that of a crowded city. The vacant spots here are green with gardens and olive-trees. There is another large vacant tract along the southern wall, and west of the Haram, also covered with verdure. Near the centre of the city also appear two or three green spots, which are small gardens. The church of the Holy Sepulchre is the only conspicuous edifice in this vicinity, and its domes are striking objects. There are no buildings which, either from their size or beauty, are likely to engage the attention. Eight or ten minarets mark the position of so many mosques in different parts of the town, but they are only noticed because of their elevation above the surrounding edifices. Upon the same principle the eye rests for a moment upon a great number of low domes, which form the roofs of the principal dwellings, and relieve the heavy uniformity of the flat plastered roofs which cover the greater mass of more humble habitations. Many ruinous piles and a thousand disgusting objects are concealed or disguised by the distance. Many inequalities of surface, which exist to so great an extent that there is not a level street of any length in Jerusalem, are also unperceived.

From the same commanding point of view a few olive and fig-trees are seen in the lower part of the valley of Jehoshaphat, and scattered over the side of Olivet from its base to the summit. These are sprinkled yet more sparingly on the southern side of the city on Mounts Zion and Ophel. North of Jerusalem the olive plantations appear more numerous as well as thriving, and thus offer a grateful contrast to the sun-burnt fields and bare rocks which predominate in this landscape. The region west of the city appears to be destitute of trees. Fields of stunted wheat, yellow with the drought rather than white for the harvest, are seen on all sides of the town.

Jerusalem, as seen from Mount Olivet, is a plain inclining gently and equably to the East. (See woodcut, page 520.) Once enter its gates, however, and it is found to be full of inequalities. The passenger is always ascending or descending. There are no level streets, and little skill or labour has been employed to remove or diminish the inequalities which nature or time has produced. Houses are built upon mountains of rubbish, which are probably twenty, thirty, or fifty feet above the natural level, and the streets are constructed with the same disregard to convenience, with this difference, that some slight attention is paid to the possibility of carrying off surplus water. The streets are, without exception, narrow, seldom exceeding eight or ten feet in breadth. The houses often meet, and in some instances a building occupies both sides of the street, which runs under a succession of arches barely high enough to permit an equestrian to pass under them. A canopy of old mats or of plank is suspended over the principal streets when not arched. This custom had its origin, no doubt, in the heat of the climate, which is very intense in summer, and it gives a gloomy aspect to all the most thronged and lively parts of the city. These covered ways are often pervaded by currents of air when a perfect calm prevails in other places. The principal streets of Jerusalem run nearly at right angles to each other. Very few, if any, of them bear names among the native population. They are badly paved, being merely laid irregularly with raised stones, with a deep square channel for beasts of burden, in the middle; but the steepness of the ground contributes to keep them cleaner than in most Oriental cities.

The houses of Jerusalem are substantially built of the limestone of which the whole of this part of Palestine is composed: not usually hewn, but broken into regular forms, and making a solid wall of very respectable appearance. For the most part there are no windows next to the street, and the few which exist for the purposes of light or ventilation are completely masked by casements and lattice-work. The apartments receive their light from the open courts within. The ground plot is usually surrounded by a high enclosure, commonly forming the walls of the house only, but sometimes embracing a small garden and some vacant ground. The rain-water which falls upon the pavement is carefully conducted, by means of gutters, into cisterns, where it is preserved for domestic uses. The people of Jerusalem rely chiefly upon these reservoirs for their supply of this indispensable article. Every house has its cistern, and the larger habitations are provided with a considerable number of them, which occupy the ground-story or cells formed for the purpose below it. Stone is employed in building for all the purposes to which it can possibly be applied, and Jerusalem is hardly more exposed to accidents by fire than a quarry or subterranean cavern. The floors, stairs, etc., are of stone, and the ceiling is usually formed by a coat of plaster laid upon the stones, which at the same time form the roof and the vaulted top of the room. Doors, sashes, and a few other appurtenances, are all that can usually be afforded of a material so expensive as wood. The little timber which is used is mostly brought from Mount Lebanon, as in the time of Solomon. A rough, crooked stick of the fig-tree, or some gnarled, twisted planks made of the olive—the growth of Palestine—are occasionally seen. In other respects the description in the article HOUSE will afford a sufficient notion of those in Jerusalem. A large number of houses in Jerusalem are in a dilapidated and ruinous state. Nobody seems to make repairs so long as his dwelling does not absolutely refuse him shelter and safety. If one room tumbles about his ears he removes into another, and permits rubbish and vermin to accumulate as they will in the deserted halls. Tottering staircases are propped to prevent their fall; and when the edifice becomes untenable, the occupant seeks another a little less ruinous, leaving the wreck to a smaller or more wretched family, or, more probably, to a goatherd and his flock. Habitations which have a very respectable appearance as seen from the street, are often found, upon entering them, to be little better than heaps of ruins.

Nothing of this would be suspected from the general appearance of the city as seen from the various commanding points without the walls, nor from anything that meets the eye in the streets. Few towns in the East offer a more imposing spectacle to the view of the approaching stranger. He is struck with the height and massiveness of the walls, which are kept in perfect repair, and naturally produce a favourable opinion of the wealth and comfort which they are designed to protect. Upon entering the gates, he is apt, after all that has been published about the solitude that reigns in the streets, to be surprised at meeting large numbers of people in the chief thoroughfares, almost without exception decently clad. A longer and more intimate acquaintance with Jerusalem, however, does not fail to correct this too favourable impression, and demonstrate the existence and general prevalence of the poverty and even wretchedness which must result in every country from oppression, from the absence of trade, and the utter stagnation of all branches of industry. Considerable activity is displayed in the bazaars, which are supplied scantily, like those of other Eastern towns, with provisions, tobacco, coarse cottons, and other articles of prime necessity. A considerable business is still done in beads, crosses, and other sacred trinkets, which are purchased to a vast amount by the pilgrims who annually throng the holy city. The support and even the existence of the considerable population of Jerusalem depend upon this transient patronage—a circumstance to which a great part of the prevailing poverty and degradation is justly ascribed. The articles employed in this pitiful trade are, almost without exception, brought from other places, especially Hebron and Bethlehem—the former celebrated for its baubles of glass, the latter chiefly for rosaries, crucifixes, and other toys made of mother-of-pearl, olive-wood, black stones from the Dead Sea, etc. These are eagerly bought up by the ignorant pilgrims, sprinkled with holy water by the priests, or consecrated by some other religious mummery, and carried off in triumph and worn as ornaments to charm away disease and misfortune, and probably to be buried with the deluded enthusiast in his coffin, as a sure passport to eternal blessedness. With the departure of the swarms of pilgrims, however, even this poor semblance of active industry and prosperity deserts the city. With the exception of some establishments for soap-making, a tannery, and a very few weavers of coarse cottons, there do not appear to be any manufacturers properly belonging to the place. Agriculture is almost equally wretched, and can only give employment to a few hundred people. The masses really seem to be without any regular employment. A considerable number, especially of the Jews, professedly live on charity. Many Christian pilgrims annually find their way hither on similar resources, and the approaches to the holy places are thronged with beggars, who in piteous tones demand alms in the name of Christ and the Blessed Virgin. The general condition of the population is that of abject poverty. A few Turkish officials, ecclesiastical, civil, and military; some remains of the old Mohammedan aristocracy—once powerful and rich, but now much impoverished and nearly extinct; together with a few tradesmen in easy circumstances, form almost the only exceptions to the prevailing indigence.

Inhabitants.—The number of the inhabitants of Jerusalem has been variously estimated by different travellers, some making it as high as 30,000, others as low as 12,000. An average of these estimates would make it somewhere between 15,000 and 20,000. Of these, Dr. Barclay enumerates the Christians at about 4500. The Jewish population is perhaps a little less; though Barclay gives about 11,000 for his missionary district, of which this city was the head. The Moslems exceed in number the Jews or Christians respectively, but are fewer than these two bodies united. To all these classes Jerusalem is holy; and it is the only city in the world which peoples of such different origin, races, language, and religions, agree to regard with nearly equal veneration. The language most generally spoken among them is the Arabic. Schools are rare, and consequently facility in reading is not often met with.

The Turkish governor of the town holds the rank of Pasha, but is responsible to the Pasha of Beirout. The government is somewhat milder than before the period of the Egyptian dominion; and has felt somewhat the restraining influence of the treaty of Paris. Yet the Moslems reverence the same spots which the Jews and Christians account holy, the holy sepulchre only excepted. Formerly there were in Palestine monks of the Benedictine and Augustine orders, and of those of St. Basil and St. Anthony; but since 1304 there have been none but Franciscans, who have charge of the Latin convent and the holy places. They resided on Mount Zion till A. D. 1561, when the Turks allowed them the monastery of St. Salvador, which they now occupy. They had formerly a handsome revenue out of all Roman Catholic countries, but these sources have fallen off since the French revolution, and the establishment is said to be poor and deeply in debt. The expenses arise from the duty imposed upon the convent of entertaining pilgrims; and the cost of maintaining the twenty convents belonging to the establishment of the Terra Santa is estimated at 40,000 Spanish dollars a year. Formerly it was much higher, in consequence of the heavy exactions of the Turkish government. Burckhardt says that the brotherhood paid annually £12,000 to the Pasha of Damascus. But the Egyptian government relieved them from these heavy charges, and imposed instead a regular tax on the property possessed. For the buildings and lands in and around Jerusalem the annual tax was fixed at 7000 piastres, or about £80 sterling. The convent contains fifty monks, half Italians and half Spaniards. In it resides the Intendant or the Principal of all the convents, with the rank of abbot, and the title of Guardian of Mount Zion and Custos of the Holy Land. He is always an Italian, and has charge of all the spiritual affairs of the Roman Catholics in the Holy Land. There is also a president or vicar, who takes the place of the guardian in case of absence or death: he was formerly a Frenchman, but is now either an Italian or Spaniard. The procurator, who manages their temporal affairs, is always a Spaniard. A council, called Discretorium, composed of these officials and three other monks, has the general management of both spiritual and temporal matters. Much of the attention of the order is occupied, and much of its expense incurred, in entertaining pilgrims and in the distribution of alms. The native Roman Catholics live around the convent, on which they are wholly dependent. They are native Arabs, and are said to be descended from converts in the times of the Crusades.

There is a Greek patriarch of Jerusalem, but he usually resides at Constantinople, and is represented in the holy city by one or more vicars who are bishops residing in the great convent near the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. At present the vicars are the bishops of Lydda, Nazareth, and Kerek (Petra), assisted by the other bishops resident in the convent. In addition to thirteen monasteries in Jerusalem, they possess the convent of the Holy Cross near Jerusalem, that of St. Helena, between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and that of St. John, between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea. All the monks of the convents are foreigners. The Christians of the Greek rite who are not monks are all native Arabs with their native priests, who are allowed to perform the church services in their mother tongue—the Arabic.

The Armenians in Jerusalem have a patriarch, with three convents and 100 monks. They have also convents at Bethlehem, Ramleh, and Jaffa. Few of the Armenians are natives; they are mostly merchants, and among the wealthiest inhabitants of the place; and their convent in Jerusalem is deemed the richest in the Levant. Their church of St. James upon Mount Zion is very showy in its decorations, but void of taste. The Coptic Christians at Jerusalem are only some monks residing in the convent of Es-Sultan, on the north side of the pool of Hezekiah. There is also a convent of the Abyssinians, and one belonging to the Jacobite Syrians.

The number of Jews in Jerusalem varies with the emigration from special causes. They inhabit a distinct quarter of the town between Mount Zion and Mount Moriah. This is the worst and dirtiest part of the holy city, and that in which the plague never fails to make its first appearance. Few of the Jerusalem Jews are natives; and most of them come from foreign parts to die in the city of their fathers' sepulchres. The greater proportion of them are from different parts of the Levant, and appear to be mostly of Spanish and Polish origin. Few are from Germany, or understand the German language. They are for the most part wretchedly poor, and depend in a great degree for their subsistence upon the contributions of their brethren in different countries. These contributions have of late years been smaller than usual, and when they arrive are the occasion of much heartburning and strife. The Scottish Deputation (Narrative, p. 148) say, 'They are always quarrelling, and frequently apply to the consul to settle their disputes. The expectation of support from the annual European contributions leads many of them to live in idleness. Hence there are in Jerusalem several hundreds who are acknowledged paupers, or who receive charity in a quiet way. Many are so poor that, if not relieved, they would not stand out the winter season. A few are shopkeepers, and a few more hawkers, and a very few are operatives. Few of them are agriculturists, though the colony at Wady-Ustas has done something to revive a taste for the cultivation of the soil. JESHAIAH. יֵשַׁעְיָה [same as Isaiah]; Sept. Ἰσαΐας; Alex. Ἰεσα καὶ Σεφεί, 1 Chron. xxv. 3; Ἰωσά in ver. 15; Alex. Ἰολας.) A son of Jeduthun, chief of the eighth division of the singers in the Temple. 2. (Sept. Ἰωσά; Alex. Ἰωσας.) A Levite in the reign of David [ISSIAH]. 3. (שֵׁעִיָּה; Sept. Ἰολας; Alex. Ἡσαΐα.) The son of Athaliah, and head of the sons of Elam, who with fifty males accompanied Ezra on his return from Babylon (Ezra viii. 7). In 1 Esdr. viii. 33 he is called Josias. 4. (Sept. Ἰωσά.) A Merarite who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 19), called Osias in 1 Esdr. viii. 48. —W. L. A.

JESHANAH (יֵשָׁנָה; Sept. ἡ Ἰεσάνη), a town with its dependencies taken by Abijah from Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 19). It has not been identified.

JESHIMON (יֵשִׁמוֹן). In our A. V. this word is rendered as a proper name in six passages in which it has the article (Num. xxi. 20; xxiii. 28; 1 Sam. xxiii. 19 and 24; xxvi. 1, 3). In two of these passages the Septuagint reads ἔρημος; in the others Ἰεσσαίμους. The Vulgate reads desertum, solitudo, and Jesimon. The word also occurs in the following poetical passages:—Deut. xxxii. 10 and Ps. lxxviii. 7, in which it is translated wilderness; Ps. lxxviii. 40, cvi. 14, and Is. lxiii. 19, 20, translated desert; and Ps. cvii. 4, translated solitary. There can be no doubt that in 'the poetical passages' it means simply wilderness, and is applied to the 'wilderness of Sinai.' In the other passages its import is not so clear. It may possibly be a proper name; but if so there were two Jeshimons; one east of the Jordan, connected with Pisgah and Peor (Num. xxi. 20); the other west of the Jordan, and connected with Hachilah and Maon (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, etc.). We are inclined to believe that in these cases also it means 'wilderness;' in the former the 'wilderness of Arabia,' in the latter the 'wilderness of Judæa.' For farther details see the articles DESERT and HACHILAH. —J. L. P.

JESHUA OR JESHUAH (יֵשׁוּעַ; Sept. Ἰησοῦς), a contraction of Jehoshua, and the same as Joshua, for which it is sometimes substituted, as in Num. viii. 17 for Joshua, the son of Nun [JOSHUA, 1], and in Ezra and Nehemiah for Joshua the high-priest [JOSHUA, 4]. The other persons thus designated in the O. T. are—1. A priest in the reign of David, to whom the ninth course was allotted (1 Chron. xxiv. 11). 2. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, to whom, along with others, was assigned the office under Kore of distributing to their brethren, in the cities of the priests, the free-will offerings of the people (2 Chron. xxxi. 15). 3. The son of Azaniah (Neh. x. 9), a descendant of Hodaviah, whose descendants came up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra ii. 40). In this passage he is associated with Kadmiel, another descendant of Hodaviah, also in Neh. ix. 4, 5; xii. 8, etc.; but in Neh. xii. 24 he is called 'the son of Kadmiel,' which is doubtless to be traced to a clerical mistake. 4. In Neh. vii. 11 mention is made of 'the children of Jeshua and Joab' as included in, or represented by 'the children of Pahath-Moab.' Pahath-Moab was one of the chiefs of the people (Neh. x. 4; Ezra x. 30), but in what relation the children of Jeshua stood to him is uncertain.

JESHUA is also the name of a town mentioned, along with Molada and Beth-Phelet, as one of those occupied by the children of Judah after their return from exile (Neh. xi. 26). —W. L. A.

JESHURUN (יֵשׁוּרֻן), a poetical name for Israel (Deut. xxxii. 15; xxxiii. 5, 26; Is. xlv. 2 [Jeshurun, A. V.]). Various explanations of the word have been given. The opinion generally held by the best authorities is, that it is a diminutive from יָשָׁר Yashar, upright, pious, and is used as a term of endearment, 'quasi rectulus, justulus' (Gesén.); 'das fromme Völkchen, etwa Frommchen' (Fürst). The LXX. render it by ὁ ἀγαπῶμενος, but Aquila and Symmachus give εὖδος, the Vulg. rectissimus & dilectus, and the other ancient versions accord. The notion of Grotius, that the word is a contraction of יִשְׂרָאֵל Yisraelun, a diminutive from יִשְׂרָאֵל Yisrad, is now deservedly rejected by all scholars. —W. L. A.

JESSE (יֵשִׁי; Sept. and N. T. Ἰεσσαί), the father of David, described as 'the Bethlehemite' (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18), or more fully as the Ephraimite of Bethlehem-Judah (xvii. 12). He was the son of Obed, and the grandson of Boaz and Ruth. Though of illustrious descent (Ruth iv. 18-22), he does not seem to have possessed much wealth; what he had consisted in sheep and goats, of which his son David had the care (1 Sam. xvi. 11; xvii. 34-35). Jewish tradition says that he was a weaver of veils for the sanctuary (Targ. Jonath. in

2 Sam. xxi. 19); but for this there is probably no foundation [JAARE-OREGIM]. When his son David was in hiding from Saul, 'his brethren and all his father's house' joined him in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1); and David, to secure a retreat for his aged parents, took them to Mizpeh of Moab, where he left them under the protection of the king of Moab (vers. 3-4). At this point they disappear from Scripture history, but tradition asserts that they, with all their sons except two—David and another—were put to death by the king of Moab. In two passages of the O. T. (Is. xi. 1, 10), the Messiah is described by his relation to Jesse; whilst elsewhere it is as the son of David that he is presented. As in these passages it is as a shoot from the root that the Messiah is figuratively set forth, this probably determined the reference to the parent of David rather than to David himself. In the N. T. Christ is spoken of as ἡ ρίζα Δαβὶδ (Apoc. v. 5; xxii. 16), though St. Paul, citing from Isaiah, calls him also ἡ ρίζα τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ (Rom. xv. 16).—W. L. A.

JESUS CHRIST (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός [in the Epistles often without the article Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, less frequently Χρ. Ἰη.; in the Gospels generally Ἰησοῦς is used]), the ordinary designation of the incarnate Son of God, and Saviour of mankind.

I. IMPORT OF THIS DESIGNATION.—This double designation is not, like Simon Peter, John Mark, Josias Barnabas, composed of a name and a surname, but, like John the Baptist, Simon Magus, Bar-Jesus Elymas, of a proper name, and an official title. JESUS was our Lord's proper name, just as Peter, James, and John, were the proper names of three of his disciples. The name seems not to have been an uncommon one among the Jews. The apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus is attributed to Jesus the son of Sirach; and, in the N. T., we read of Jesus, the father of Elymas, the sorcerer (Acts xiii. 6), and of 'Jesus, which is called Justus, of the circumcision' (Col. iv. 11), one of Paul's 'fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God which had been a comfort to him.' To distinguish our Lord from others bearing the name, he was termed Jesus of Nazareth (John xviii. 7, etc.), Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος, and Jesus the son of Joseph (John vi. 42, etc.).

Some of the fathers, from their ignorance of the Hebrew language, have given a Greek etymology to the name. They derive it from the noun, ἰασις, healing. Thus Eusebius, Ἰησοῦς ὠνομάζετο παρ' ὅσων τῆς τῶν ἀνθρώπων ψυχῶν ἰάσεως τε καὶ θεραπείας χαρίν τὴν παροδόν ἐς ἡμᾶς ἐποιεῖτο (Demost. Evang. lib. iv.); and Cyril of Jerusalem, Ἰησοῦς καλεῖται φερωνύμως, ἐκ τῆς σωτηριώδους ἰάσεως ἔχων τὴν προσγορίαν (Catech. Illum. x.).*

There can be no doubt that Jesus is the Greek form of a Hebrew name, which had been borne by two illustrious individuals in former periods of the Jewish history,—the successor of Moses and introducer of Israel into the promised land (Exod. xxiv. 13), and the high-priest who, along with Zerubbabel (Zech. iii. 1), took so active a part in the re-establishment of the civil and religious polity of the Jews on their return from the Babylonish captivity. Its original and full form is Jehoshua (Num. xiii. 16). By contraction it became Joshua, or Jeshua; and when transferred into Greek, by taking the termination characteristic of that language, it assumed the form Jesus. It is thus the names of the illustrious individuals referred to are uniformly written in the Sept.; and the first of them is twice mentioned in the N. T. by this name (Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8).

The conferring of this name on our Lord was not the result of accident, or of the ordinary course of things, there being 'none of his kindred,' so far as we can trace from the two genealogies, 'called by that name' (Luke i. 61). It was the consequence of a twofold miraculous interposition. The angel who announced to his virgin mother that she was to be 'the most honoured of women,' in giving birth to the Son of God and the Saviour of men, intimated also to her the name by which the holy child was to be called: 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus' (Luke i. 31). And it was probably the same heavenly messenger who appeared to Joseph, and, to remove his suspicions and quiet his fears, said to him, 'That which is conceived in thy wife Mary is of the Holy Ghost, and she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus' (Matt. i. 20, 21). The pious pair were 'not disobedient to the heavenly vision.' 'When eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb' (Luke ii. 21).

The name Jesus, like most of Jewish proper names, was significant; and, as might well be expected, when we consider who imposed it, its meaning is at once important and appropriate. The precise import of the word has been a subject of doubt and debate among interpreters. As to its general meaning there is all but an unanimous concurrence. It was intended to denote that he who bore it was to be a Deliverer or Saviour. This, whatever more, is indicated in the original word; and the reason given by the angel for the imposition of this name on the Virgin's son was 'because he shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. i. 21). But while some interpreters hold that it is just a part of the verb signifying to save, in the form Hiphil, slightly modified, and that it signifies 'he shall save,' others hold that it is a compound word formed by the addition of two letters of the incommunicable name of the divinity, יהוה, to that verb, and that it is equivalent to 'The salvation of the Lord,' or 'The Lord the Saviour.' It is not a matter of vital importance. The following circumstances seem to give probability to the latter opinion. It does not appear likely that Moses would have changed the name of his destined successor from Oshea, which signifies 'saviour,' into Jehoshua (Num. xiii. 16), if the latter signified merely he shall save; whereas, if the word be a compound term, embodying in it the name Jehovah, we see an adequate reason for the change. In the first chapter of the Gospel by Matthew (Matt. i. 22, 23), the most natural interpretation of the words (though they admit of another exegesis) seems to imply that the prediction of Isaiah, that the Virgin's son should be called Immanuel, was fulfilled in the imposition of the name Jesus on the

* Some of the Patristic etymologies are really very odd. Πάσχα is traced to πάσχω; Αεὐτήρης is derived from the Latin levis; and Αἰδβολος from δύο and βῶλος, because he who bears that name swallows man at two bites, first the soul, and then the body.

Son of Mary. This would be the case only on the supposition that Immanuel and Jesus are equivalent terms, a supposition which cannot be sustained unless Jesus can be fairly rendered 'Jehovah will save,' or 'Jehovah the Saviour.' In that case, Jesus and Immanuel—God with us, i. e., on our side—express the same ideas.

It is right, however, to remark, that the merely bearing such a name as either Immanuel or Jesus, even by divine appointment, is not of itself evidence of the divinity of him who bears it. The Hebrews were in the habit of giving names, both to persons and places, which were intended not to describe their distinctive properties, but to express some important general truth. Jacob called an altar built by him El-Elohe-Israel (Gen. xxxiii. 20), 'God the God of Israel,' i. e., God is the God of Israel. Moses called an altar he built Jehovah Nissi (Exod. xvii. 15), 'Jehovah my banner,' i. e., Jehovah is my banner. The name Jehoshua, as borne by him who brought the people of the Lord into the heritage of the Gentiles, means no more than that by him Jehovah would deliver his people. In many of the proper names in the O. T., the name El, or Jehovah, forms a part. Yet when, as in the case before us, he who bears such a name, by express divine appointment, is shewn 'by many infallible proofs' to be indeed an incarnation of divinity, we cannot but perceive a peculiar propriety in this divine appointment, and find in it, if not a new argument, a corroboration of the host of arguments which lead us to the conclusion that He who, 'according to the flesh,' was the Son of David, 'according to the Spirit of Holiness' was 'the Son of God,' 'God over all, blessed for ever' (Rom. i. 3, 4; ix. 5).

The above are the only probable etymologies of the word. Others, however, have been suggested, and supported with considerable learning and ingenuity. The Valentinians, according to Irenæus (lib. ii. c. 41), were in the habit of writing the name ישו , and explained it as meaning 'Him who possesses heaven and earth,' making each letter, according to the cabalistic art called notarikon, expressive of a word or clause; thus, י for יהוה , ש for שמים , and ו for וארץ , 'Jehovah of heaven and earth.'

The learned but fanciful Osiander insists that Jesus is not the Greek form of Joshua, but the ineffable name, the Shem-hamphorash, rendered utterable by the insertion of the letter ψ . The reader who wishes to see the arguments by which he supports this wild hypothesis may consult his Harmonia Evangelica, lib. i. c. 6, Basil 1561. And a satisfactory reply may be found in Chemnitz' dissertation, De nomine Jesu, in Theol. Philol., tom. ii. p. 62, Amst. 1702; and in Caninii Disquis. in loc. aliq. N. T., c. i.; apud Crit. Sac., tom. ix.

Castalio maintains an equally whimsical notion as to the etymology of the word, deriving it from יהוה and שם , as if it were equivalent to Jehova-homo, God-man.

The 'name of Jesus' (Phil. ii. 10) is not the name Jesus, but 'the name above every name,' $\text{ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πάντων ὀνομάτων}$, ver. 9; i. e., the supreme dignity and authority with which the Father has invested Jesus Christ, as the reward of his disinterested exertions in the cause of the divine glory and human happiness; and the bowing $\text{ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ}$ is obviously not an external mark of homage when the name Jesus is pronounced, but the inward sense of awe and submission to him who is raised to a station so exalted.

CHRIST; Gr. Χριστός ; Heb. משיח . This is not, strictly speaking, a proper name, but an official title. Jesus Christ, or rather, as it generally ought to be rendered, Jesus the Christ, is a mode of expression of the same kind as John the Baptist, or Baptist. In consequence of not adverting to this, the force and even the meaning of many passages of Scripture are misapprehended. When it is stated that Paul asserted, 'This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ' (Acts xviii. 3), $\text{ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς}$, etc., that he 'testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ' (Acts xviii. 5), the meaning is, that he proclaimed and proved that Jesus was the Christ, $\text{τὸν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν}$, or Messiah—the rightful owner of a title descriptive of a high official station which had been the subject of ancient prediction. When Jesus himself says that 'it is life eternal to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent' (John xvii. 3), he represents the knowledge of himself as the Christ, the Messiah, as at once necessary and sufficient to make men truly and permanently happy. When he says, 'What think ye of Christ?' περὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ : 'whose son is he?' (Matt. xxiii. 42), he does not mean, What think ye of ME, or of my descent? but, What think ye of the Christ—the Messiah—and especially of his paternity? There can be no doubt that the word, though originally an appellative, and intended to bring before the mind a particular official character possessed by him to whom it is applied, came at last, like many other terms of the same kind, to be often used very much as a proper name, to distinguish our Lord from other persons bearing the name Jesus. This is a sense, however, of comparatively rare occurrence in the N. T.

Proceeding, then, on the principle that Christ is an appellative, let us inquire into its origin and signification as applied to our Lord. CHRIST is the English form of a Greek word, Χριστός , corresponding in meaning to the Hebrew word Messiah, and the English word Anointed. The Christ is just equivalent to the Anointed One. The important question, however, remains behind, What is meant when the Saviour is represented as the Anointed One? To reply to this question satisfactorily, it will be necessary to go somewhat into detail.

Unction, from a very early age, seems to have been the emblem of consecration, or setting apart to a particular, and especially to a religious, purpose. Thus Jacob is said to have anointed the pillar of stone which he erected and set apart as a monument of his supernatural dream at Beth-el (Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 13; xxxv. 14). Under the O. T. economy high-priests and kings were regularly set apart to their offices, both of which were, strictly speaking, sacred ones, by the ceremony of anointing, and the prophets were occasionally designated by the same rite. This rite seems to have been intended as a public intimation of a divine appointment to office. Thus Saul is termed 'the Lord's anointed' (1 Sam. xxiv. 6); David, 'the anointed of the God of Israel' (2 Sam. xxiii. 1); and Zedekiah, 'the anointed of the Lord' (Lam. iv. 20). The high-priest is called 'the anointed priest' (Lev. iv. 3).

From the origin and design of the rite, it is not wonderful that the term should have, in a secondary and analogical sense, been applied to persons set apart by God for important purposes, though not actually anointed. Thus Cyrus, the King of Persia, is termed 'the Lord's anointed' (Is. xlv. 1); the Hebrew patriarchs, when sojourning in Canaan, are termed 'God's anointed ones' (Ps. cv. 15); and the Israelitish people receive the same appellation from the prophet Habakkuk (Hab. iii. 13). It is probably with reference to this use of the expression that Moses is said by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews to have 'counted the reproach of Christ' (Heb. xi. 26, τοῦ Χριστοῦ (λαοῦ), the same class who in the parallel clause are termed the 'people of God') 'greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.'

In the prophetic Scriptures we find this appellation given to an illustrious personage, who, under various designations, is so often spoken of as destined to appear in a distant age as a great deliverer. The royal prophet David seems to have been the first who spoke of the great deliverer under this appellation. He represents the heathen (the Gentile nations) raging, and the people (the Jewish people) imagining a vain thing, 'against Jehovah, and against his anointed' (Ps. ii. 2). He says, 'Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed' (Ps. xx. 6). 'Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity' says he, addressing himself to 'Him who was to come,' 'therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows' (Ps. xlv. 7). In all the passages in which the great deliverer is spoken of as 'the anointed one' by David, he is plainly viewed as sustaining the character of a king.

The prophet Isaiah also uses the appellation, 'the anointed one,' with reference to the promised deliverer, but, when he does so, he speaks of him as a prophet or great teacher. He introduces him as saying, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord God hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them who are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God, to comfort all that mourn,' etc. (Is. lxi. 1, etc.).

Daniel is the only other of the prophets who uses the appellation 'the anointed one' in reference to the great deliverer, and he plainly represents him as not only a prince, but also a high-priest, an expiator of guilt. 'Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and the prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks; the city shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times; and after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself' (Dan. ix. 24-26).

During the period which elapsed from the close of the prophetic canon till the birth of Jesus, no appellation of the expected deliverer seems to have been so common as the Messiah or Anointed One, and this is still the name which the unbelieving Jews ordinarily employ when speaking of him whom they still look for to avenge their wrongs and restore them to more than their former honours.

Messiah, Christ, Anointed, is, then, a term equivalent to consecrated, sacred, set apart; and as the record of divine revelation is called, by way of eminence, The Bible, or book, so is the Great Deliverer called The Messiah, or Anointed One, much in the same way as he is termed The Man, The Son of Man.

The import of this designation as given to Jesus of Nazareth may now readily be apprehended.—(1.) When he is termed the Christ it is plainly indicated that HE is the great deliverer promised under that appellation, and many others in the O. T. Scriptures, and that all that is said of this deliverer under this or any other appellation is true of HIM. No attentive reader of the O. T. can help noticing that in every part of the prophecies there is ever and anon presented to our view an illustrious personage destined to appear at some future distant period, and, however varied may be the figurative representations given of him, no reasonable doubt can be entertained as to the identity of the individual. It is quite obvious that the Messiah is the same person as 'the seed of the woman' who was to 'bruise the head of the serpent' (Gen. iii. 15); 'the seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed' (Gen. xxii. 18); the great 'prophet to be raised up like unto Moses,' whom all were to be required to hear and obey (Deut. xviii. 15); the 'priest after the order of Melchizedek,' 'the rod out of the stem of Jesse, which should stand for an ensign of the people to which the Gentiles should seek' (Is. xi. 1, 10); the virgin's son whose name was to be Immanuel (Is. vii. 14); 'the branch of Jehovah' (Is. iv. 2); 'the Angel of the Covenant' (Mal. iii. 1); 'the Lord of the Temple,' etc. etc. (ib.). When we say, then, that Jesus is the Christ, we in effect say, 'This is HE of whom Moses, in the law, and the prophets did write' (John i. 45); and all that they say of HIM is true of Jesus.

Now, what is the sum of the prophetic testimony respecting him? It is this—that he should belong to the very highest order of being, the incommunicable name Jehovah being represented as rightfully belonging to him; that 'his goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting' (Mic. v. 2); that his appropriate appellations should be 'Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God' (Is. ix. 6); that he should assume human nature, and become 'a child born' of the Israelitish nation of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix. 10), of the family of David (Is. xi. 1); that the object of his appearance should be the salvation of mankind, both Jews and Gentiles (Is. xlix. 6); that he should be 'despised and rejected' of his countrymen; that he should be 'cut off, but not for himself;' that he should be 'wounded for men's transgressions, bruised for their iniquities, and undergo the chastisement of their peace;' that 'by his stripes men should be healed;' that 'the Lord should lay on him the iniquity' of men; that 'exaction should be made and he should answer it;' that he should 'make his soul an offering for sin;' that after these sufferings he should be 'exalted and extolled and made very high;' that he should 'see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, and by his knowledge justify many' (Is. liii. passim); that Jehovah should say to him, 'Sit at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool' (Ps. cx. 1); that he should be brought near to the Ancient of Days, and that to him should be given 'dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, and nations, and languages should serve him—an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away—a kingdom that shall not be destroyed' (Dan. vii. 13, 14). All this is implied in saying Jesus is the Christ. In the plainer language of the N. T., 'Jesus is the Christ' is equivalent to Jesus is 'God manifest in flesh' (1 Tim. iii. 16)—the Son of God, who, in human nature, by his obedience, and sufferings, and death in the room of the guilty, has obtained salvation for them, and all power in heaven and earth for himself, that he may give eternal life to all coming to the Father through him.

(2.) While the statement 'Jesus is the Christ' is thus materially equivalent to the statement 'all that is said of the Great Deliverer in the O. T. Scriptures is true of Him,' it brings more directly before our mind those truths respecting him which the appellation 'the Anointed One' naturally suggests. He is a prophet, a priest, and a king. He is the great revealer of divine truth; the only expiator of human guilt, and reconciler of man to God; the supreme and sole legitimate ruler over the understandings, consciences, and affections of men. In his person, and work, and word, by his spirit and providence, he unfolds the truth with respect to the divine character and will, and so conveys it into the mind as to make it the effectual means of conforming man's will to God's will, man's character to God's character. He has by his spotless, all-perfect obedience, amid the severest sufferings, 'obedience unto death even the death of the cross,' so illustrated the excellence of the divine law and the wickedness and danger of violating it, as to make it a righteous thing in 'the just God' to 'justify the ungodly,' thus propitiating the offended majesty of heaven; while the manifestation of the divine love in appointing and accepting this atonement, when apprehended by the mind under the influence of the Holy Spirit, becomes the effectual means of reconciling man to God and to his law, 'transforming him by the renewing of his mind.' And now, possessed of 'all power in heaven and earth,' 'all power over all flesh,' 'He is Lord of All.' All external events and all spiritual influences are equally under his control, and as a king he exerts his authority in carrying into full effect the great purposes which his revelations as a prophet, and his great atoning sacrifice as a high-priest, were intended to accomplish.

(3.) But the full import of the appellation the CHRIST is not yet brought out. It indicates that He to whom it belongs is the anointed prophet, priest, and king—not that he was anointed by material oil, but that he was divinely appointed, qualified, commissioned, and accredited to be the Saviour of men. These are the ideas which the term anointed seems specially intended to convey. Jesus was divinely appointed to the offices he filled, he did not ultroneously assume them, 'he was called of God as was Aaron' (Heb. v. 4), 'Behold mine ELECT, in whom my soul delighteth.' He was divinely qualified: 'God gave to him the Spirit not by measure.' 'The Spirit of the Lord was upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, and they made him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, so that he does not judge after the sight of his eyes, nor reprove after the hearing of his ears, but he smites the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips he slays the wicked; and righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins' (Is. xi. 2-4). He was divinely commissioned: 'The Father sent him.' Jehovah said to him, 'Thou art my servant, in thee will I be glorified. It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth' (Is. xlix. 6). 'Behold,' says Jehovah, 'I have given him for a witness to the people—a leader and commander to the people.' He is divinely accredited: 'Jesus of Nazareth,' says the Apostle Peter, was 'a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders, and signs which God did by him in the midst of you' (Acts ii. 22). 'The Father who hath sent me,' says Jesus himself, 'hath borne witness of me' (John v. 37). This he did again and again by a voice from heaven, as well as by the miracles which he performed by that divine power which was equally his and his Father's. Such is the import of the appellation Christ.

If these observations are clearly apprehended, there will be little difficulty in giving a satisfactory answer to the question which has sometimes been proposed—when did Jesus become Christ? when was he anointed of God? We have seen that the expression is a figurative or analogical one, and therefore we need not wonder that its references are various. The appointment of the Saviour, like all the other divine purposes, was, of course, from eternity. 'He was set up from everlasting' (Prov. viii. 23); he 'was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world' (1 Pet. i. 20). His qualifications, such of them as were conferred, were bestowed in, or during his incarnation, when God anointed him 'with the Holy Ghost and with power' (Acts x. 38). His commission may be considered as given him when called to enter on the functions of his office. He himself, after quoting, in the synagogue of Nazareth, in the commencement of his ministry, the passage from the prophecies of Isaiah in which his unction to the prophetic office is predicted, declared, 'This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.' And in his resurrection and ascension, God, as the reward of his loving righteousness and hating iniquity, 'anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows' (Ps. xlv. 7), i. e., conferred on him a regal power, fruitful in blessings to himself and others, far superior to that which any king had ever possessed, making him, as the Apostle Peter expresses it, 'both Lord and Christ' (Acts ii. 36). As to his being accredited, every miraculous event performed in reference to him or by him may be viewed as included in this species of anointing—especially the visible descent of the Spirit on him in his baptism.

These statements, with regard to the import of the appellation 'the Christ,' shew us how we are to understand the statement of the Apostle John, 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God' (1 John v. 1), i. e., is 'a child of God,' 'born again,' 'a new creature;' and the similar declaration of the Apostle Paul, 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, i. e., the Christ, the Messiah, 'but by the Holy Ghost' (1 Cor. xii. 3). It is plain that the proposition, 'Jesus is the Christ, when understood in the latitude of meaning which we have shewn belongs to it, contains a complete summary of the truth respecting the divine method of salvation. To believe that principle rightly understood is to believe the Gospel—the saving truth, by the faith of which a man is, and by the faith of which only a man can be, brought into the relation or formed to the character of a child of God, and though a man may, without divine influence, be brought to acknowledge that 'Jesus is the Lord,' 'Messiah the Prince,' and even firmly to believe that these words embody a truth, yet no man can be brought really to believe and cordially to acknowledge the truth contained in these words, as we have attempted to unfold it, without a peculiar divine influence. That Jesus is ὁ θεῶν, ὁ Χριστός, is the testimony of God, the faith of which constitutes a Christian, τὸ ἐν, the one thing to which the Spirit, the water, and the blood, unite in bearing witness (1 John v. 6, 8, 9).—J. II. LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST ON EARTH.—The earthly life of our Lord, with great facility, divides itself into well-marked epochs. Each of these epochs we propose to handle in separate chapters.

CHAPTER I. OUR LORD'S LIFE PREVIOUS TO THE MINISTRY.—The Birth of Jesus Christ and its Circumstances, both Previous and Concomitant.—Instead of a formal register of the date of Christ's birth after the manner of biography, the N. T. uses a general phrase only ('In the days of Herod the king,' Matt. ii. 1. Comp. Luke i. 5, ii. 1-7), which has much engaged the attention of the learned, and given occasion to many chronological conjectures. It does not fall within our plan to consider these; we only place in a note below* a few results derived from the chief authorities. One remarkable designation of the epoch of our Lord's birth occurs in Gal. iv. 4, where St. Paul calls it 'the fulness of time' (τὸ πλῆρωμα τοῦ χρόνου). Few topics have received ampler illustration than this. Dean Alford has briefly summed up the various phases in his note on the passage:—'Not only are God's absolute will and the workings of his providence included in the apostle's phrase, but likewise the preparations which were made on earth for the Redeemer, in the various courses of action which he had brought about by men as his instruments.' The elements contributing to the full ripeness of this πλῆρωμα, on the human side, have been much illustrated, especially by modern writers on the evidences, who have seen in the political state of the world, in the prevalence of the Roman power, in the wide spread of the Greek language, and in the failure of the several schools of philosophy* to fulfil the expectations which they had raised, a complex preparation both for the advent of Christ and for the propagation of Christianity. Others have dwelt on the developed sins of mankind, which called for a remedy ('Ὅτε πᾶν εἶδος κακίας διεξελθοῦσα ἡ φύσις ἡ ἀνθρώπινη ἐδεῖτο θανάτου,' Theophyl. quoted by Meyer; 'Non deicit ante peccatum Deum incarnari, cum non detur medicina nisi infirmis, nec statim post peccatum, ut homo per peccatum humilior recognosceret se liberatore indigere, sed in plenitudine temporis,' etc.—Aquinas, Summa iii. 1-5). Others, again, especially the Fathers, Christ cannot in any case be fixed later than the autumn of A. U. C. 749; while it may have occurred one or two years earlier.' According to Lardner (Works, vol. i. pp. 370-372), 'Jesus was born between the middle of August and the middle of November A. U. C. 748 or 749.' Sanelementius (De Vulg. Æra Emendatione, lib. iv.), Munter (as quoted by Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. [Clark], vol. i. p. 53, note), Ideler (Chronol. ii. 394, etc.), and Winer (R. W. B., ii. 614), agree in thinking our Lord's birth-year to have been A. U. C. 747. Clinton (F. H., vol. ii, appendix, 238), who is followed by Dr. Wordsworth (Gr. Test. on Matt. ii. 20, note), places the Saviour's birth in the spring of A. U. C. 749 = B. C. 5. As to the birth-day itself, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 230) relates how in his time (cent. iii.) some regarded it to be May 20, others April 20. But the great authority, Wieseler, comes to the conclusion that the day must be left undecided. Our ecclesiastical date, December 25, began to be observed in the Western church in the 4th century. Few points have been more elaborately sifted; few, notwithstanding, remain more undecided. Dr. Wordsworth well says on this uncertainty, 'Perhaps the Holy Ghost may have concealed these things from the wise and prudent, in order to teach them humility; to remind them at the very outset of the gospel that their knowledge is very limited; that their powers of discovering even historical truths are feeble, and to make them more meek and docile with regard to supernatural truth,' etc. (Gr. Test. i. 140).

* The following memoranda of the date of our Lord's birth are supplemental to the article CHRONOLOGY, and are here added to give completeness to this portion of our subject. Bishop Ellicott (Lectures on the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ, p. 63, note) 'leans to the opinion that, early in February, most probably A. U. C. 750 [B. C. 4], was the time of the nativity.' This is substantially the opinion of Wieseler (Chronol. Synopse), who says, p. 145, 'that Jesus could hardly have been born before the first of January A. U. C. 750—some-what later, in all probability;' in p. 146 he mentions 'the month of February of that year as the latest period of the birth of Jesus;' in his summing up in p. 150, he supposes 'the end of December and the months of January and February to be worthy of the utmost consideration as the probable time of our Lord's birth; of these he pronounces the December to be least likely, and the February to be extremely probable.' According to the conjecture of Greswell (Dissertations on the Harmony, i. 402), 'April 5 or April 6 must express the day of our Saviour's birth; the former, if he was born on the evening of the tenth of Nisan, the latter, if he was born on the morning' [the year previously determined was A. U. C. 750]. Tischendorf (Synopsis Evangelica, p. 16) endorses Wieseler's date. Dr. Robinson (Harmony, appendix, pp. 195, 196) supposes 'that the birth of dwelt largely on the divine side of the preparation for the Redeemer's advent, in the several progressive dispensations which preceded it, wherein 'the Son of God himself,' as Tertullian strikingly puts it, 'was, in fact, the dispenser of things—ever from the beginning laying the foundation of the course of his own dispensations,* which he meant to follow out unto the end' (see Tertullian's whole statement and other passages quoted and finely annotated by Bishop Bull, Defens. Fid. Nic., as translated by the writer of this art., vol. i pp. 15-20). It is in accordance with this preparation, that the coming of Christ was an object of general expectation about the time of his birth. The longing of the pious Jew was stimulated by the voice of prophecy; indications occur in the sacred songs of Elizabeth (Luke i. 42-45); of Mary (vers. 48-55); and of Zacharias (vers. 76-79); in the character of the holy Simeon (ii. 25, 26); in his thanksgiving (vers. 29-32); in the conversation of the aged Anna and her pious companions (ver. 38); to which may well be added what is said of Joseph of Arimathea (by St. Mark xv. 43, and St. Luke xxiii. 51). Nor was Israel alone expectant. As of old prophecy had shed its message upon the Gentile Balaam (Num. xxiv. 17); so now, on the eve of its accomplishment, Gentile hearts are moved, and one of the most touching events connected with the Saviour's birth is the visit of the Eastern magi, rendering their homage, as Gentiles, to Him whose illumination of their race they saw symbolised in their guiding star (Matt. ii. 1-12, comp. with Luke ii. 32—ὡς εἰς ἀποκάλυψιν ἔθνων, and Acts xiii. 47—εἰς ὡς ἔθνων, which is, in fact, the prophet's phrase, וְיָאֵלְכֶם—Is. xlii. 6; xlix. 6, comp. with Is. lx. 3). It is satisfactory to find that these intimations of the sacred writers are confirmed, as to the latter point, by heathen testimony. The oft-quoted passages of Suetonius, Vespasian., cap. 4-8 ('Percrebuerat oriente toto vetus et constans opinio, esse in fatis ut eo tempore Judeæ profecti rerum potirentur'), and of Tacitus, Hist. v. 9-13 ('Pluribus persuasio inerat, antiquis sacerdotum literis contineri, eo ipso tempore fore, ut valesceret oriens, profectique Judeæ rerum potirentur'), are express and to the point, and seem to afford all the greater corroboration from their very obscurity of language, so natural in pagan writers, who were ignorant of the nature of the fact, and the character of the persons of which they wrote. The actual advent of the illustrious Saviour was not unaccompanied indeed with suitable pageantry. 'The same Evangelist,' says Bp. Ellicott, 'that tells us that the mid-day sun was darkened during the last hours of the Redeemer's earthly life (Luke xxiii.

44), tells us also that in his first hours the night was turned into more than day, and that heavenly glories shone forth not unwitnessed (Luke ii. 9), while angels announce to shepherd-watchers on the grassy slopes of Bethlehem the tidings of great joy, 'the birth of the new-born Saviour. But how unworldly was this display! What humility in the midst of that glory! They were not imperial councillors or lordly courtiers, that were summoned to witness the birth of the Prince of Peace; but lowly men who tended sheep! Nor was it in palatial saloons that this Royal Babe first saw light (Luke ii. 12, 16). Does not the profound simplicity of that humble nativity add wonderfully to its glory? In the appreciation of faith, no doubt, it does. And herein we recognise a great moral purpose! The entire history of the birth, as well as of the life and death of Christ, is an appeal to the purest faculty of human faith. And greater trial still of the same holy faculty is presented to us in his pre-natal history. How often has belief been sorely tested since that announcement of the immaculate conception, which the Holy Virgin herself made to her husband, when even that 'just man' was staggered with a transient apprehension of Mary's unfaithfulness, and was 'minded to put her away' (Matt. i. 19)! Neander (Life of Jesus Christ (Bohn), p. 13) has well shewn the a priori necessity of the immaculate conception. 'It was impossible that the second Adam—the progenitor of a new and heavenly race—could derive his origin from the first Adam in the ordinary course of nature.' But the miraculous entrance of Christ into humanity was misunderstood and rudely calumniated (John viii. 41). To the pure in heart and unwavering in faith only does it occur as an article of the creed in sublime congruity with every other particular of the human life of their Saviour. That life teems with conditions, equally intelligible to faith, equally perplexing to unbelief! Let us mention one case which enters into our present section. The national expectation pointed to Bethlehem-Ephratah as the birth-place of Christ (John vii. 42). Prophecy had stimulated this expectation (Micah v. 2); and authoritative interpreters confirmed it (Matt. ii. 4, 5). Yet He, whose ways are unlike ours (Is. lv. 8), accomplished the prophecy indeed* (Matt. ii. 1; Luke ii. 4-7), but as it were furtively, so that men mistook the qualification of Jesus to be the Christ, in what was one of its clearest points (John i. 46; vii. 41, 42, 52). To our mind this difficult and undemonstrative character of Christ's earthly history adds to its value and beauty, as testing the loyalty of faith.† The cir-

* In these preliminary dispensations, ordered by the Son of God himself, we seem to have a better explanation of the καιροί of St. Paul, in his striking expression, 'the dispensation of the fulness of times' [οικονομία τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν], Eph. i. 10, than that suggested by Dean Alford, who would have the καιροί to be gospel-seasons (whatever they may mean) = οικονομία. The ancient interpretation regarded the οικονομία as pointing to Christ's Incarnation, which was itself the completion and fulness of all the preceding καιροί, or several dispensations leading to it. (For the Patristic sense, see Suicer, s. v. οἰκονομία; also Bishop Bull's Judicium Eccl. as cited above.)

* Bp. Ellicott accepts the statement of Justin Martyr, 'who was born,' as he says, 'but little more than a century afterwards, and not forty miles from the same spot,' to the effect, that 'in one of the caverns in that narrow ridge of long grey hill on which stands the city of David,' Bethlehem, 'was the Redeemer born into the world' (Justin Martyr, Tryph. c. 78 [ed. Otto], vol. ii. p. 264—ἐν σπηλαίῳ τῷ συνέγγυς τῆς κώμης, κ. τ. λ.); comp. cumstances of the Saviour's birth might have been ordered otherwise—and mere human wisdom would probably have accompanied them with so imposing a display of an imperial grandeur as to have coerced the minds of men into a ready acquiescence : with such a display unbelief indeed would have been simply impossible—but equally impossible must have been that ennobling discipline of faith, which now constitutes the value as well as the characteristic of the Gospel. We will now sum up the facts connected with our Lord's birth, noting the features of concealment and mystery, which hid their full appreciation from the mass of mankind, and confined their acceptance to the few, who believed. (1) He was born of 'a pure virgin' by an immaculate conception ; but this fact was disguised either by his passing for the real son of Joseph, his legal father only (Matt. xiii. 55 ; Mark vi. 3), or by the stigma of illegitimacy (John viii. 41). (2) He was actually born at Bethlehem, whither Joseph and Mary had temporarily removed, to be registered according to the census* of Augustus (Luke ii. 6, 7) ; but he was regarded by the Jews as a Galilean (Luke xxiii. 6, 7). His birth-place and home was supposed to be Nazareth (John i. 46 and passim in the Gospels, with which comp. Matt. xiii. 54, 57 ; Mark vi. 1, 4 ; Luke iv. 23, where Nazareth is no doubt the πατρις of Jesus). (3) His parentage was of the highest royalty,† whether we regard his mother's to Strauss, with great ability applies these characteristics of the gospel history in refutation of that unbeliever's mythic theory. It is the invariable style of a mythus to ennoble its object even to ostentation ; to eliminate every feature of weakness and indignity from its conception. But in the evangelic narrative the opposite treatment most commonly occurs in the representation of Jesus Christ . . . glories are concealed, while humiliation and indignities are brought prominently out to our view.

* In addition to the arguments and authorities in vindication of St. Luke's statement of the census of Cyrenius, which are adduced under CYRENIUS, we would here by way of supplement quote from Mr. Merivale, Roman Empire, iv. 457, note, an important observation : 'A remarkable light has recently been thrown upon this point' [i. e., the supposed error of the Evangelist, in making the birth of Christ contemporary with the rule of Cyrenius] 'by the demonstration, as it seems to me, of Augustus Zumpt, in his vol. ii. of Commentationes Epigraphicæ, that Quirinus (the Cyrenius of St. Luke) was governor of Syria for the first time, from the close of A. U. C. 750 [B. C. 4] to 753 [B. C. 1]. Accordingly, the enumeration begun or appointed under his predecessor, Varus, and before the death of Herod, was completed after that event under Quirinus.' Mr. Merivale finds in this a confirmation of the date of our Lord's birth [A. U. C. 750], which we have quoted in a former note from Wieseler and Bp. Ellicott. Cyrenius was 'governor' twice, and held two διοργαγαί. St. Luke seems to refer to both—to the first in Luke ii. 2 ; and to the second, and more important one, in Acts v. 37. The Evangelist is thus found to be minutely accurate, instead of being open to the censure which arose from a want of a full knowledge of the case.

† In our article on the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST we have supposed the line in Luke iii. to contain the ancestry of the blessed Virgin ; if we descent (Luke i. 31, comp. with 32) ; or that of his reputed and legal father (Matt. i. 20 ; Luke i. 27) : but he was looked upon as the son of a humble Galilean, far removed from all regal descent (Matt. xiii. 56 ; Mark vi. 3 ; John vii. 41, 42).

Our Lord's Infancy.—Eight days after his birth the child Jesus was circumcised (Luke ii. 21), and at the ceremony received the name which the angel had originally prescribed, and which has been dearer than all names to unnumbered souls from that time until now. In due season (on the thirty-third day after circumcision, Lev. xii. 3, 4), the blessed virgin and her husband, in pious conformity to the Mosaic ordinance, carried her infant to the Temple at Jerusalem to offer the appointed sacrifice for her purification, and to pay the usual ransom for her first-born (Num. iii. 47). St. Luke's beautiful narrative (ii. 21-39) presents to us the same union of lowliness and honour, which has already struck us, as characteristic of every circumstance connected with our Lord's entrance into the world. The humbler offering of the mother exposed to public view her 'low estate' (Lev. xii. 8), and the rite of her purification concealed and disguised that immaculate purity of her offspring which was indispensable to his efficiency as the Redeemer of mankind. But as in the paradoxes of his nativity, so here also, faith did not stumble at this humility. In that helpless Babe, surrounded as he was with every sign of obscurity and lowliness, the devout Simeon, under the impulse of inspiration, described the Blessed One, who was to be the glory of Israel, and the light of the Gentiles ! And while the astonished parents were yet in amazement at this heavenly attestation of their son, whom they had dedicated, in such humble guise, to the Lord (Luke ii. 33), the widowed prophetess Anna, 'coming in that instant, gave thanks like-are correct in that view, our Lord was descended from David's son Nathan by his mother ; while Joseph her husband has his pedigree traced through Solomon, in Matt. i. To the patristic testimony in favour of our view, which we there adduced, we would add the following from Justin Martyr (Dial. cum Tryphone, sec. 100), who, in evident allusion to the genealogy of the third gospel, expressly says that 'the Virgin derived her descent from David, and Jacob, and Isaac, and Abraham ;' and he adds a rule, which literally applies to St. Luke's table, on the principle for which we have contended, that Heli was the grandfather of Jesus Christ (through his mother, whose place in the table is formally occupied by her husband Joseph) : 'Abraham was the father also of those who are numbered [or registered in the genealogy], from whom the Virgin derives her descent ; for we know that those who have daughters are accounted [in family descent] as the fathers of their daughters' children—εἶναι αὐτὸν τὸν Ἀβραὰμ πατέρα καὶ τοῦτων τῶν κατηρίδ-μημένων, ἐξ ὧν κατὰ γένος ἡ Μαρία τὸ γένος καὶ γὰρ πατέρας τῶν γεννωμένων ταῖς θυγατρῶν αὐτῶν τέκνων, τοὺς τῶν θηλειῶν γεννήτορας ἐπιστάμεθα (Works [Ed. Bened.], p. 206). Justin Martyr wrote this treatise within a century after the publication of St. Luke's gospel. His testimony, added to what we quoted in the former article, goes far to prove that in the earliest ages of the Church the Virgin Mary's genealogy was supposed to be contained in the third gospel.

wise unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem' (ver. 38). It would be difficult to imagine any more impressive scene than that of the Presentation in the Temple, or a really greater honour to the infant Saviour than the meek glory which was accorded to him in the devotion of these venerable personages and in the admiration of the pious group gathered around them at that service! That nothing might be wanting in the witness which God gave of his son even thus early, 'wise men' came, as we have already said, from the East to Jerusalem to render to the new-born Saviour their homage, as representatives of the Gentile world. Not finding him in the metropolis, they proceeded to Bethlehem. Hither Joseph and Mary had returned as to their temporary home from their visit to the Temple but a few days (Bp. Ellicott, Lectures, p. 70, and the authorities quoted by him), when the Magi appeared on their royal errand. Greater than ever must have been the wonder of the parents, especially of the meditative and observant heart of the Virgin (Luke ii. 19, 33, 51), when these strangers, undeterred by the poverty of her lodging, did not disdain, with princely munificence, to offer their gifts and adoration of her infant Son, in whom, by a wonderful faith, they saw under the depths of that lowly condition no less a being than 'him who was born king of the Jews' (Matt. ii. 2, 11)—'One who was the hope of the world, greater than Zoroaster had ever foretold, a truer Redeemer than the Sosiosh of their own ancient creed' (Bp. Ellicott, Lectures, p. 77, gives a brief description, from Anquetil du Perron's Life of Zoroaster, of some articles of the Magian creed contained in the Zend-Avesta). But the excitement which attended the birth of the holy child Jesus was not confined to the faithful and pious. The powers of evil were moved. Alien as he was on the throne of Israel, the first of the Herods did his worst to destroy the Infant whose reputed claim to the kingdom he occupied aroused his cruel jealousy. To secure the death of Mary's son, St. Matthew informs us that the tyrant issued a decree, which was but too faithfully obeyed, for the murder of the babes of Bethlehem, 'from two years old and under' (Matt. ii. 16). We have in these apprehensions of the savage king a rough and unwilling testimony (such alone as he could offer) to the real greatness of the new-born babe, notwithstanding the apparent lowliness which surrounded him at Bethlehem. From the massacre* of the infants, Jesus escaped through the prompt obedience of Joseph to the admonition of the angel, which directed him to flee to the south, into Egypt, and there remain until the tyranny was overpast (Matt. ii. 13-15). The docility of this excellent guardian (comp. on ἀνθρ δι-καος, Wordsworth, Gr. Test. i. 5, col. 2) of the infant Saviour was rewarded by supernatural guidance at every critical step in his precious trusteeship.

* Josephus says nothing of this massacre, and from his silence some ill-considered objections have been raised against the truth of the narrative. For a brief but sufficient vindication of it the reader is referred to Bp. Ellicott, Lectures, pp. 78, 79; and Neander (by Bohn), Life of Jesus, pp. 30, 31. For a fuller discussion, see Dr. Mill, Observations on Pantheistic Principles, pp. 319-359; also Jackson, on the Creed (Works), vol. vii. pp. 259-299.

On the death of the tyrant another angelic voice called him back from Egypt (Matt. ii. 19, 20), and when he felt a natural hesitation at returning to Judæa, which had passed into the hands of a prince whose character only too much resembled Herod's, a divine communication by dream induced him to withdraw again to the north,* and to take up his permanent dwelling in Nazareth (ii. 22, 23). The history, which has been hitherto copious, begins

* Neander replies (Life, p. 31) to an alleged contradiction between the evangelists of the infancy. But there is no discrepancy in the statements of St. Matthew and St. Luke. From the latter we learn that Joseph and Mary resided at Nazareth at the very beginning of these great events (Luke i. 26). Some little time after her conception Mary alone visited her cousin Elizabeth, who dwelt in 'a city of Judæa' (ver. 39); and, after a happy sojourn of three months, she returned to her northern home (ver. 56). Not long afterwards, in consequence of the imperial decree, her husband and she removed to Bethlehem for the purposes of the census (ii. 4, 5). Here her holy child was born, and here it is likely she and her husband meant henceforward to settle, amidst the inheritance of their ancestors, encouraged, as they naturally would feel, by the progress of the Divine accomplishment of the ancient prophecies in which they now saw their personal interest. But the ruthless cruelty of the Herods, and the direction which Joseph received in his dream, disturbed this intention, and Joseph returned to his original residence. Surely the very word ἀνέχρησεν, by which St. Matthew expresses Joseph's removal to the north, ought to save the evangelist from the slur, which Meyer and others suggest, of his being ignorant of what St. Luke mentions—the holy family's previous residence at Nazareth (see the Greek of Matt. ii. 22). The rendering of A. V. 'turned aside [instead of the more accurate 'returned'] into the parts of Galilee, conceals the force of St. Matthew's statement. It contributes to the same vindication of this evangelist, that he calls Nazareth the πατρίς, or 'country,' of Jesus (xiii. 54), as St. Luke does in iv. 23, 24; and as indeed the other evangelists do (comp. Mark vi. 1, 4, and John iv. 44). It is worth while here to refer to the statement of Eusebius (lately published by Cardinal Mai from the Syriac, Patr. Bibl. iv. 279, 280), that there is good reason to suppose that Joseph and Mary returned to Nazareth, soon after the presentation, and thence went back to Bethlehem, where the Magi visited them, not now in a stable, but in a house. The reader is referred to a fuller statement of the order of the events, in this point of view, in a note of Dr. Wordsworth, Greek Test. i. 8. Patricius, who is for this intercalation of the return to Galilee between the presentation and the visit of the Magi, treats on the subject (De Evangel., pp. 330, 331, and 343), and supposes that the temporary return to the north was to wind up his affairs with the view of his ultimate settlement in the land of his progenitors. After an interesting quotation from Papebrochius (Propyl. ad. Act. Sanct., p. 26), he says—'Itaque sentias licet Josephum post purificationem sponsæ Nazarethum cum suis remeasse, non ut ibi degeret, sed ut compositis rebus domesticis migrationem inde alio pararet, idque brevi exequutum Bethlehemum migrasse et ibi Magos ex cepisse,' etc.

now to be sparing in detail. Having certified to us by indubitable evidence the perfection of our Lord's human nature, both as to its purity and reality, it at this point only adds a few brief intimations of its growth to maturity both in mind and body—as a transition to his entering upon that career which was the final cause of his mission into the world.

Our Lord's Youth.—It is not to the beloved disciple St. John, the friend of the Virgin, that we owe the precious record of the Saviour's childhood and youth; but to the methodical evangelist St. Luke, who has been guided to narrate, in general but effective terms, our Lord's gradation from early to mature age. He tells us (ii. 41) that the parents of Jesus were accustomed to resort together to Jerusalem, at least once a year, at the feast of the Passover. Of Joseph's piety and reverence we have several indications; but here the object of the narrative seems to be to set forth, in its unobtrusive manner, the excellence of the Virgin, whose attendance at the festival was not compulsory* (Kuinöel, in loc.) In their blameless care of their son, they took him with them, probably for the first time since his first presentation, when he, at the age of twelve years, emerged from childhood to youth, and, when a Jewish boy, became a בן הברית, son of the law, and בן מצוה, son of the precept, in short, a Hebrew catechumen, emancipated in a great measure from the mere tutelage of guardians, and (like the confirmed members of the Church of England), undertaking the responsibilities of religious duty in his own person and by his own will. In the wonderful Temple scene with the doctors, how completely does the youthful Jesus demonstrate his appreciation of these responsibilities—and not of them only, but of that higher vocation of the Messiahship to which no other Jewish youth but he was ever called! If his display of 'astonishing' wisdom (ii. 47) was unexampled, we must not forget that the occasion was unique. It is a great presumption of the truth of the narrative that the conduct of the young Messiah was entirely worthy of the occasion. The details of the whole event, so graphically given by St. Luke (ii. 41-50), need not detain us. We must notice, however, the two general remarks with which the evangelist both introduces (in ver. 40) and follows up (in ver. 52) his narrative. There is a shade of variety in the midst of the substantial identity of these grand remarks. The former is relative to the twelve years' growth of his childhood; the latter is descriptive of the next eighteen years of his advance through youth to manhood.† Both describe, no doubt, an increase, but rather of the development of the gifts than of their bestowal, for that was perfect from the first (τὸ δὲ παῖδιον ᾗ ὄντι, πληροῦμενον σοφίας; with which compare the πλήρης χάριτος of St. John i. 14, and contrast the account of the Baptist in St. Luke i. 80, where this clause is absent; see also 1 Sam. ii. 26). The first opportunity which legitimate circumstances presented to Jesus of manifesting in public his perfect gifts was in this visit to the Temple and his intercourse with the doctors. He had not studied in human schools of learning (Neander, Life, 36, etc.), but his original, God-inspired gifts, which he modestly exhibited, as became a boy, shewed such unusually high intelligence (σύνεσις, ver. 47) as to astonish not only his parents, but all his audience. We have not the voucher of experience to certify and illustrate the progress of an unfallen and sinless human being in the growth of the perfect faculties of our nature. But this contact of the simple wisdom of the heaven-taught child with the mature learning of possibly a Hillel and a Shammai, and the wise sons of Betirah, and the most august of the masters of Israel (Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, 92), attests at once the superiority of a pure and divine instruction to the sophisticated system of the schools, and the completeness of those endowments with which Jesus was even then invested, and which only wanted time and occasion for their ultimate and perfect display. The brevity with which the sacred narrative treats so many of the years of our Lord's life has often caused surprise. Such brevity is no doubt unusual in the style of fiction or even history, which seek to deck out their heroes in minute and exaggerated terms. The modesty and even silence of the Gospels become thus so far evidence of their truth and inspired origin.* But with all this brevity we yet have in these two general statements, when duly weighed, an adequate introduction to the history of Christ's public career which follows. Before we proceed to that, let us make a passing remark on the answer which Jesus gave to his mother: 'Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?' or 'in my Father's house?' as the words may possibly mean. Among the many features of the wisdom, of which he was full, we must include his appreciation of the Messianic mission with which he was invested. He begins now to assert his consciousness of that duty.

probably is meant to indicate the development of his great natural powers in the eyes of men—'he made way.' It was not the growth and increase of the heavenly gift which the evangelist describes; for that was complete in Him from the beginning; but the greater display of it, as opportunity offered in his growing years. (Aquinas, iii. 9. 7. a 12 ad 3, after distinguishing between 'the increase in the donation of grace, which was not true of Christ,' and 'the increase in its manifested operation,' says 'Sic Christus proficiebat sapientia et gratia sicut et ætate, quia secundum processum ætatis perfectiora opera faciebat, ut se verum hominem demonstraret et in his, quæ sunt ad Deum, et in his quæ sunt ad homines.')†

* Any one would feel this conviction doubly forced on him who took the pains to contrast the beautiful simplicity of the canonical Gospels with 'the silly fictions' (as Bishop Ellicott rightly calls them) 'of the Apocryphal infancies' [APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS].

* There is some diversity of opinion on this point. Our statement in the text, after Kuinöel, has its voucher in Mechilta, f. 17. 2. on Exod. xiii. 9. The school of Hillel, however, seems to have held that women were also bound to attend the Passover at Jerusalem. But this was not the prevalent opinion among the doctors of Israel; see Chagiga, c. i, sec. 1, as quoted by Patritius, De Evang., p. 410. The attendance of women was indicative of that piety, which we have attributed to the blessed Virgin. See Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. et Talm. in loc.; also Patritius, ut antea.

† In the ᾗ ὄντι of the former verse we have the growth of infancy; in the ᾗ ἐκτετακότεν of the other passage there is the subsequent advance, which

His mother had just before referred to Joseph as his father. He does not indeed reject the economic relationship: he even continued to respect it (ver. 51); but he pointedly refers to another Father, Whose 'business' he had in hand, and to Whom it was now time that he should exhibit a public obedience. The piety of the reputed father would no doubt suggest to him a cheerful compliance with the mysterious bent of his wonderful foster-child. Though he understood not the mission, he would in faith submit to the will of God, who was evidently calling the child to a great destiny; and thus worthily did he conclude the guardianship of Jesus, which he had so well discharged from his very birth. We do not again hear of Joseph, who, it would therefore seem, did not live, with Mary, to witness the public career and death of his illustrious ward.

Our Lord's Brethren.—As Jesus has not yet quitted the sphere of domestic life, we will, while he is still at home in Nazareth, adorning it with his meek submission to his parents, consider briefly the other members of his family circle, who are occasionally referred to in the Gospel narrative. They are most perspicuously mentioned in Matt. xiii. 55, 56: 'Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? and his sisters, are they not all with us?' (Comp. xii. 46, 48; xxvii. 56; Mark iii. 31; vi. 3; xv. 40; xvi. 1; Luke viii. 19; xxiv. 10; John ii. 12; vii. 3-10; Acts i. 13, 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5; Gal. i. 19.) Speculation was very early rife on the nature of this relationship to Jesus, and the question is still unsolved and probably insoluble. Passing over the obviously heretical opinions of Cerinthus [Irenæus [Harvey], vol. i. p. 211] and the Ebionites, most of whom at least accompanied their opinions on the human birth of our Lord with the denial of his miraculous conception (Origen, contra Cels. v. 61, 65; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 27), we find, in cent. iv., that the question had assumed a shape from which it has never since quite extricated itself. Helvidius, Jovinian, and Bonosus of Macedonia started opinions which afterwards formed the party whom St. Augustine and Epiphanius call Ἀντιδικουπαιριταί (Adversaries of Mary). St. Jerome vehemently opposed the first and second (see his treatises, Adv. Helvidium and Adv. Jovinianum). His work against Helvidius enters largely into the discussion of our subject. He asserts 'the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother' against his opponent, whom the learned father vigorously rates as a 'heretic.' This censure, however, is too harsh, for Helvidius believed the conception of Jesus to have been sui generis and immaculate. He only held that after the birth of Christ, his mother Mary, by her husband Joseph, became also the mother of the four who in the Gospels are called 'the Lord's brethren.' Much of the argument on either side up to the present time may be found in germ employed by Helvidius and Jerome.* In controverting his opponent the Latin father maintained that the Lord's brethren were in fact his cousins. In accepting this view of St. Jerome as our own, we wish to keep clear of the theological prepossessions in which its advocacy has been much involved, and simply state its biblical grounds. [1.] We first remark, that the Hebrew usage undoubtedly justifies the extension of the word 'brethren' required by our view: See Gen. xiii. 8; xiv. 14; xxix. 12; Lev. xxv. 48, 49; Judg. xiv. 3; Job xlii. 11. [2.] The men of Nazareth, who predicated the fraternal relation to Jesus of James and the rest (Matt. xiii. 55), seem either to have spoken in a lax and popularly understood sense, or to have been ignorant of the real degree of the family relationship of the persons whom they were somewhat contumeliously speaking of. This is apparent from their very first question—'Is not this the carpenter's son?' [3.] Of the Marys who so nobly endured the agonising scenes of the crucifixion, one is called 'the mother of James,' etc. (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40), and 'the other Mary' (Matt. xxvii. 61). These designations, indeed, leave it undetermined whether this mother of James was the Virgin Mary, as Helvidius asserted, and as Gal. i. 19 (considered hastily and alone) might suggest. We have, however, the additional testimony of another eye-witness of the awful events on Calvary, decisive we think of the question. St. John (xix. 25) tells us of a third Mary who saw the Saviour's agony, even his own Virgin Mother. So that 'the other Mary,' the mother of James and others, was the Virgin's sister, and bore [no unusual thing in Hebrew families] her name. The domiciliation of either sister, when a widow, in the other's house at Nazareth, on the decease of either husband, Joseph or Clopas, so that the children of both would thenceforth form but one household, and well be accounted 'brethren,' is therefore a most conceivable and probable event; still more if, as the ancient historian Hegesippus positively testifies, those husbands of the sisters were themselves brothers. (The marriage of two brothers to two sisters appears to have been no uncommon case among the Hebrews; see Surenhusii Mishna, iii. 9, 12, 44; Michaelis, Laws of Moses, Eng. Trans., ii. 82-122.) Dean Alford, in an interesting note on Matt. xiii. 55, goes into the question, and, like Helvidius of old, determines these persons to have been strictly the brothers of our Lord, as the younger children of the Virgin Mary. He sets great store on 1 Cor. ix. 5, and Jude 17, as if these passages established an antithesis between the apostles and the Lord's brethren. On the strength of this he denies that SS. James and Jude were members of the sacred body of the twelve apostles. That James would be incomplete were we to omit mention of the third opinion, which was prevalent in the Eastern Church, to the effect, that the persons whom the evangelists call 'the Lord's brethren' were in fact his brothers-in-law, being the sons of Joseph (who was much older than the Virgin Mary) by a former wife. (So Epiphanius, Hæres. xxvii. [Opera, i. 115], and St. Gregory of Nyssa, Opera, ii. 844; both of whom hold Mary, the mother of our Saviour, to have been the step-mother only, though in a lax sense called the mother, of James, Joses, Simon, and Jude. See more fully Dr. Mill, pp. 258, 282-288.)

* Although the diversity of opinions may be generally classed under the two prevalent heads of Helvidianism (the opinion that Mary had other children after Jesus—even the 'brethren' of Matt. xiii. 55), and the orthodox view opposed to it by St. Jerome, that the mother of Christ was δεῦρα θεῶς and the aunt only of our Lord's brethren, as stated in the text, our account of the controversy is asserted to be an apostle in Gal. i. 19, does not disconcert him; for James he supposes was one of the later and extraordinary apostles—such as Paul himself. This, however, is inadmissible in the face of Gal. ii. 9. The James of this Epistle, if we would take an unsophisticated view of the entire case, was in fact a colleague of Peter and John, and identical with the James who, in the apostolic lists, is called the *son of Alphaeus (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). Now, assuming that the four 'brethren' mentioned in Matt. xiii. 55 were brothers, we infer that (Alphaeus, and Clopas or Cleophas being one and the same person, both names being, it is said, derived† from the Hebrew אֱלִיָּהּ), as they were the sons of the Mary, wife of Cleophas, whom St. John, as we have seen, expressly calls the sister of the blessed Virgin (xix. 25), they must needs stand to our Lord in the relation of first cousins. We do not fear that our assumption will be deemed harsh, in understanding the Nazarenes to state the strict fraternity of James, Josés, Simon, and Jude. In support of it, it is worth while to compare

* St. John, xix. 25, calls the mother of James 'the wife of Cleophas, or Clopas' [ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ, a name not to be confounded with that of 'Cleopas' (Κλεόπας) mentioned in Luke xxiv. 18]. This has given rise to two suppositions, either that Mary had two husbands, named Alphaeus and Clopas; or, that her husband, as was not unfrequent among the Hebrews, bore himself these two names. It certainly supports this latter view, that in an important fragment of the very early Christian writer, Papias, who was a scholar of St. John, the identity of Alphaeus and Clopas is asserted: 'The second Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alphaeus, and mother of James bishop and apostle, and of Simon, and of Thaddæus, and of a certain Joseph, or Josés. John calls Alphaeus also Cleophas, either from his father, or his family, or some other cause.' Papias, we need not add, makes James, Josés, Simon, and Jude, cousins, and not literal brothers of our Lord (Routh, Reliq. Sacr. i. 16).

† The Hebrew name may be rendered either by Chalpai or Chlopai. The former is adopted by SS. Matthew and Mark, who, more Græcorum, reject the oriental aspirate at the beginning of the word, and affix the termination os, whence they have Ἀλφαῖος, like Ἀγγαῖος from ἄν (Hag. i. 1); whereas St. John adopts the latter rendering in the shape of Κλωπᾶς, the π becoming κ, as in 2 Chron. xxx. 1, where the LXX. put Φασέκ for פספס. That Alphaeus and Clopas should be Hellenic forms of one and the same Syriac name, ܐܠܦܝܐ or ܐܠܦܝܐ, is certainly not more strange than that in the far less dissimilar languages of Southern and Northern Europe, Aloysius and Ludovicus should be the representatives of the same Teutonic or Frankish name Louis or Ludwig. This name underwent the following changes:—1. Clo-doveus or Clovis; 2. Chlodovicus; 3. Hludovicus or Hlouis; 4. The same with the aspirate dropped. In Spain and Italy the first-named depravation of the name was adopted—the two extremes, Clovis and Aloysius, bearing a certain inexact analogy to our Clopas and Alphaeus (Kuinoel and Mill).

Jude 1, Matt. xxvii. 56, and Mark xv. 40; for these passages seem to corroborate the statement of Matt. xiii. 55 with regard to three of the four 'brethren.' As to the fourth, Simon, we find no similar link elsewhere in the N. T. binding him with the rest. In Eusebius, however (Ecc. Hist. iv. 22), we have an extract from the very ancient and credible writer Hegesippus, which expressly speaks of a Simon, or 'Simeon, son of Clopas,' who succeeded James the Just in the see of Jerusalem; and there further occurs in the same extract the extremely valuable and consistent statement, that 'this Simeon, son of Clopas, was a first cousin of the Lord' (Συμῶν ὁ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ καθίσταται ἐπίσκοπος, ὃν προέδεντο πάντες ὅντα ἀνεψῖοι τοῦ Κυρίου δεύτερον, where the last word seems to relate to the before-mentioned James the Just, as if he had been the first of the Lord's cousins who had filled the office to which the second of them had now succeeded). We cannot linger to point out the importance of this passage in connection with the places which we have adduced out of the N. T. Its remarkable fitness and consistency with these places is also obvious. (Neander, Planting of Christian Church, Bohn, pp. 350-354, reviews this passage, but curiously endeavours to evade its force, as it seems to us, without success.)

If these premises be correct, it follows that two of the Lord's brethren stood to him also in the far higher relation of apostles. We do not shrink from this conclusion, though we reject the fancy of those writers (including St. Chrysostom himself) who are fond of discovering family relationship to Christ in more of his apostles, and who attach even St. Matthew as a brother to James the less and the others, from the mere circumstance that his father bore the name Alphaeus (Mark ii. 14). In like manner Simon, one of 'the brethren,' has been confounded (by St. Jerome and others) with the apostle Simon Zelotes; and, as if this were not enough, the sons of Zebedee have been brought within the same degree of cousinly affinity through their mother Salome, whom these writers assert to have been another sister of the blessed virgin. Thus no less than six of the original apostles have been, by various writers, connected with our Lord by consanguinity! The claims of the last mentioned four we think to be unsustained by scriptural evidence, but the case is different with respect to James and Judas. We have already endeavoured to show that there is good ground for supposing them to have been really cousins, and, therefore, within the laxer sense 'brethren' of Christ. An objection, however, against this view has been raised from the statement of St. John (vii. 5). None of the apostles, it has been contended, could have been among the brethren of Christ—for, at a late period of his ministry, it is expressly said, that 'his brethren did not believe in him,' an allegation which could not have been true of any of the apostles. The objection, however, thus stated is too rigorously put. [1.] As Grotius suggested, 'the brethren of Christ' may fairly be supposed to include many more persons than the four mentioned in Matt. xiii. 55, so that the assertion of the unbelief of his brethren may be quite true, without involving the two apostolic kinsmen, James and Jude, in the censure. [2.] Moreover, it does not seem to us, even if the two apostles be included in the statement of the evangelist, that it would imply too strong a censure, for there is force in Schleyer's view (über die Brüder Jesu) that 'not even his brethren' (this is the right rendering of John vii. 5, see Malan in loc.), 'though numbering among them three apostles' (he identifies Simon with Zelotes), 'had attained that right spiritual faith in the Lord's divine character, which could enter into his reasons for declining a proclamation of his claims to the world.' The whole passage appears to exhibit the ignorance of Christ's kinsmen as to the nature of his mission. Neither John Baptist (see Matt. xi. 3; Luke vii. 19, 20) nor the apostles (for Peter's mistaken views, see Matt. xvi. 21, 23; that they were probably shared by John and James, see Mark x. 37, 38; and by the blessed virgin herself, see John ii. 4; Matt. xii. 46, 50, even later than the close of his ministry, but previous to the illumination of Pentecost, Acts i. 6) seemed to have possessed anything like a proper idea of our Lord's Messiahship, the want of which (it is very likely) constituted in St. John's sense the 'unbelief,' with which he charges the Lord's brethren in vii. 5 (comp. St. John's own view of adequate belief in xx. 31). [3.] Dr. Mill (in his Christian Advocate's Publications [on 'the Record of the Brotherhood of Jesus in the Gospels'], pp. 248-260) suggests that the apostles James and Jude possessed a higher faith than their non-apostolic brethren, at the time referred to in John vii. 5; that their brothers and other kinsfolk are there censured in general terms; but that even these (at least James and Simon) were converted fully to Christ between the feast of tabernacles, referred to in John vii. 5, and the passover of the following year, when Christ suffered. The fault of such a theory lies less in its incredibility than in its improbable elaborateness. If we have taken a reasonable view in [2], it will be strictly consistent with it to suppose here that nothing tended more to elevate the low and worldly expectations of his disciples, not excluding his blessed mother herself, than the death and resurrection of our Lord. We have a brief glance of these personages permitted us in Acts i. 12-14; and we find that, notwithstanding the terrible shock to their expectations, which two of them described so naturally and strikingly in Luke xxiv. 19-21, they were still hopeful of a future, of which they had as yet failed to see the nature; so with all their imperfection of belief, they well and wisely await the great issue 'with one accord, in prayer and supplication.' The result is complete. The very brethren whose conduct to Jesus wore so much the appearance of rudeness as well as unbelief (John vii. 5), were within fifty days in the upper chamber of Jerusalem, amidst virulent and triumphant enemies, calmly awaiting, in company not only with all the surviving apostles, but with her too who had witnessed, if not partaken of, their 'unbelief,' the descent of that Holy Spirit who should clear up all perplexities, and endue them with a full understanding of the kingdom of heaven. Such were 'the brethren' of our Lord, and such their bearing towards him.

Preparation for His Ministry.—How little help from any human source did Jesus receive in his Galilean home for the work to which he is now approaching! The one key-note of his ministry was, 'I came not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me' (John vi. 38). No training could better prepare him for such a mission than that to which he was content to submit himself, among his humble kindred at Nazareth. Far removed from the metropolis, where learned men were for the most part divided between the hollow pretensions of Pharisaism or the sceptical sophistries of the Sadducees; and shedding around him the graces of a spotless life, full of the charm of social virtues—not austere separate from his kindred, after the manner of an Essene recluse, but by his own active example recommending the excellent worth of an honourable, if humble calling (see Mark vi. 3); our blessed Lord passed through the stages of childhood and youth to the perfect manhood of thirty years, and at that ripe age enters on his great career, educated for it (as one of the noblest of his followers once said of himself) 'not of men, neither by man,' οὐκ ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρώπου (Gal. i. 1), but by the plenary endowments of that Spirit which God gave him without stint or measure (comp. the πληροῦς σοφίας, of Luke ii. 40, with the οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου, κ. τ. λ. of John iii. 34).

CHAPTER II. THE LORD'S MINISTRY UNTIL THE WEEK OF HIS SUFFERING.—How long was it?—The chronological emphasis of Luke iii. 1, 2, marks a great event in the history of the gospels. One, whom none of woman born, through the long ages of God's revelation under the O.T. ever equalled in spiritual gift (Matt. xi. 11), now comes, himself the fulfiller of many prophecies (Matt. xi. 13), to announce the speedy approach of Messiah. His ministry preceded the Lord's by about six months, so that 'the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar' probably was the date of the beginning of the Lord's public life as well as of that of his great forerunner. This, the general opinion, is disputed by Wesseler, who (for reasons which may be seen in Bishop Ellicott's Hist. Lect., p. 104, note 1) conceives that the 15th of Tiberius coincides with the Baptist's imprisonment, and he makes it to be the year which fell between the Aug. of A.U.C. 781 and the same month of A.U.C. 782. It is certain that in ancient times (see Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 24) John's captivity was regarded as the terminus a quo of 'the deeds of our Lord,' as given by the three synoptical evangelists (comp. Matt. iv. 12; Mark i. 14; Luke iv. 14). No doubt this event suitably marks the beginning of Christ's general ministry in the north. Previously to it, however, he had emerged from his private life; and, as Eusebius further observes, we must look to the supplemental gospel of St. John for 'the account of the things done by Christ, among the first of his deeds, and at the commencement of the gospel' (loc. cit.). The same historian (i. 10) says that the whole time of the Lord's public ministry falls within an interval of four years (οὐδ' ὅλος ὁ μεταξὺ τετραέτης παρίσταται χρόνος). However incorrect be the grounds on which Eusebius bases this statement, we cannot but think that grave reasons render his conclusion substantially the right one.* Theodoret also refers to St. John's

* The following chronological notes, which we derive mainly from the fourth gospel, mark the distribution of the three years and a half. The baptism of Jesus, from which his ministry dates, took place about six months previous to his first passover. This passover is mentioned in John ii. 13. His second passover (for we accept the conclusion of Robinson, Harmony [Tract Soc. ed.], Gospel as furnishing chronological data on the point, and expressly names three years and a half as the period of Christ's ministry up to the time of his death (ὡς περὶ τὰ τρία ἔτη καὶ ἡμίση κηρύξας ὁ Κύριος καὶ τοὺς ἀγίους αὐτοῦ μαθητὰς τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ καὶ τοῖς θαύμασι βεβαιώσας, τότε τὸ πᾶθος ἐπέμεινε). For a summary of opinions on this much discussed question, we must refer to Bishop Ellicott's note 2, Hist. Lect., p. 149. We simply add here our conviction, that the remarkable expression used by Daniel, ix. 27 ['the midst of the week, etc.'], and 'the three years' and additional year of the significant parable, Luke xiii. 7, 8, are indications, which cannot be overlooked, that the duration of the Lord's public life, no less than the events of it, was among the appointments of prophecy, and that these indications may, with much propriety, be taken to possess a decisive force in a question but for them insoluble.

Preliminary events of the Ministry.—Among the many services rendered by the great herald, not the least was his baptism of the Saviour in the Jordan. This was the solemn consecration of Christ to his work; it terminated in the divine attestation by the voice from the opened heaven, out of which descended the holy dove and alighted on the praying Saviour (Luke iii. 21, 22). No sooner was the Messiah thus inaugurated in his mission, than he had to confront in spiritual conflict the fearful adversary of his kingdom, and of that race which he came to save. The tempter was baffled at every point, and he left the spotless Jesus to the pursuit of his ministry—not again, as it would seem, to renew his assault until 'the convenient time' (this is unquestionably the force of St. Luke's ἄχρη καίρου, iv. 13) of the Lord's passion, when his last strength would be put forth against the Redeemer's person, and in vain (comp. Luke xxii. 53, and John xiv. 30). While Jesus was undergoing his severe preparation for the work which lay before him, his kinsman was so thoroughly stirring the heart of the nation, that the Sanhedrim sent to him a deputation of priests and Levites, requesting him to explain his mission. With admirable humility and self-denial, the Baptist pointed to the mightier One, even then amongst them, but as yet unknown, 'whose shoe-latchet he was himself,' notwithstanding men's high musings about him, 'unworthy to unloose' (John i. 19-28). On the morrow Jesus unexpectedly appeared, and was greeted by the Baptist with that sublime exclamation, 'Behold the Lamb of God!' to which we might apply Christ's own explanation of another confession of like grandeur (Matt. xvi. 17). Marked was the impression which this testimony produced, when, on the day following, John repeated it on the departure of Jesus. Andrew and another of his followers ('not improbably the evangelist himself who gives the account,' Ellicott, p. 116) were so much struck, that they attached themselves to Christ, and thus became the very first of his disciples. In the evening of that quietly eventful day, which we might well distinguish as, in one sense, the birth-day of the Christian church, Simon Peter was induced to join himself to the little company, which on the morrow was further increased by the accession of Philip of Bethsaida and Nathaniel of Cana (John i. 29-51). These men were afterwards called to the apostleship [NATHANIEL = BARTHOLOMEW]; but at present they were preparing for that trust, by associating themselves with Jesus and beholding the wonderful displays of his gradually revealed power. Their first opportunity of strengthened convictions happened at Cana, where at the marriage-feast Jesus wrought the first of his miracles (John ii. 1-11). Nathaniel, who had just emerged out of the rude prejudice (John i. 46), which offended so many Jews against the Saviour (comp. John vii. 41, 42), must have been singularly confirmed in his belief of the Messiahship of Jesus by this 'manifestation of his glory' (John ii. 11) in his own native town. The Lord was soon, on a grander field, to spread a like conviction of his Messianic mission. After a brief sojourn at Capernaum (ii. 12), he went up to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover (ver. 13).

SECT. 1. His First Passover.—While at the metropolis he gave the highest proofs of his authority, by rescuing 'his Father's house' from the profanation of the buyers and sellers in the Temple (ii. 13-17). This act of dignity and power, added to the miracles which he wrought at the feast, not only moved the people to a favourable view of his claims, but produced in one distinguished member of the Sanhedrim a lasting belief of his divine mission (comp. St. John's notices of Nicodemus; iii. 2; vii. 50; xix. 39). This worthy man shared no doubt in the current views, which supposed that Messiah would establish a throne of earthly splendour; to correct his error, the Lord in his divine discourse set forth the spiritual nature of his kingdom, the entrance into which involved the utter change of man's nature by the new birth (iii. 3-8). In the same discourse we observe thus early the shadow of the cross thrown over the mission of the Son of Man—no doubt meant as another corrective of men's expectations about Messiah (vers. 13-15).

The Early Judean Ministry.—Whatever may have been the suspensions of the Jewish party, there seems to have been no demonstrated opposition to Jesus at his first Passover; for the evangelist, to whom we entirely owe our information on this part of our subject, describes our Lord as leaving Jerusalem indeed, but still tarrying with his disciples in the land of Judea, and baptising (John iii. 22). The success of his ministry, in which he put under contribution the willing help of his disciples, to whom he entrusted the sole administration of the baptismal rite (John iv. 2), was so complete, that, notwithstanding the numbers of John Baptist's followers (Matt. iii. 5; Mark i. 5), his own outnumbered them (John iv. 1). The Baptist himself, in the last of his testimonies to Jesus, frankly acknowledged the manifest superiority of him, to whom he never compared himself but in terms of humblest contrast. On the present occasion the proximity of the Saviour's labours to his own naturally note, p. 199, and of Hengstenberg, Christology, vol. iii. [Clark], pp. 244, sq., as against Wieseler's opinion, that the feast of Purim is referred to in John v. 1. Bishop Ellicott, who adopts Wieseler's view, admits that it is based on no more than 'dependent and negative' arguments; see his note, Hist. Lect., p. 136) is alluded to in John v. 1. The third passover, which Jesus did not attend, is mentioned in John vi. 4. The fourth and last, completing three years of ministry, is mentioned in their history of the passion by the synoptical evangelists, in Matt. xxvi. 17; Mark xiv. 12; Luke xxii. 7, 8; and by St. John in xiii. 1.

enough suggested to his followers a comparison of their master with the new teacher: 'All are coming to him!' they said, not without some signs of jealousy (iii. 26). True to his mission, with touching humility, in words which signified his conviction that his work was done, and prophetically indicated his own speedy removal from the scene, he said: 'This my joy is fulfilled; he must increase, but I must decrease.' So ending his thrilling message with a denunciation of God's abiding wrath on any man who should refuse to believe on his Son (iii. 36), the faithful forerunner is shortly afterwards consigned to the dungeon of Machaerus (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 2) by Herod Antipas, who had taken offence at the good man's bold rebukes of his sin (Matt. xiv. 3-5; Mark vi. 17-20; Luke iii. 19, 20). This event seems to have suggested to Jesus some thoughts of danger to himself and his disciples, for he quitted Judæa (Matt. iv. 12). St. John (iv. 1) connects our Lord's departure from the south, where he had been labouring for about eight months, with certain indications of the rising envy of the Pharisaic party. John's success, as we have seen, had attracted their notice, as an interference with their monopoly of making proselytes (Matt. xxiii. 15); when then they found a new rival, whose intrinsic dignity and popular influence were more formidable than the Baptist had even proved himself to be, Jesus, who never prematurely exposed himself and his cause to danger, thought fit to withdraw from their malice (see Tischendorf, Synops. Evang., p. xxv.) On his way of Galilee he passed through the district of Samaria, and while resting from his fatigue at the well-known well of Jacob at Sychar (as Sychem, or the modern Nab-lûr, was then contemptuously called—see Ellicott, p. 131, note 3), a woman approached to draw water. He asked her for drink to quench his thirst, and seized the occasion (as was the way with him, who never lost an opportunity) to sow the seed of eternal life in her heart. She seems to have been a woman of great energy and intelligence. So, thrilled with the display of that intuition which enabled him to penetrate the secrets of her past life, she hurried home to invite her neighbours: 'Come,' she said, 'see a man which has told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?' They came and listened to the more than usually explicit proofs which he gave them of his Messiahship, and with joy welcomed him to prolong his stay among them. For two days he gratified their request; and this simple race, despised by the Jews around them, though stimulated by no miracle rose to the noble conviction—'We have now heard him ourselves, and are sure that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world!' (John iv. 42). The Lord afterwards pursued his way to Galilee. He was joyously received by the people who had heard of, and in many cases seen, the wonderful works he had done at Jerusalem. Their faith, however, appears in unfavourable contrast with that of the Samaritans (comp. John iv. vers. 41 and 48). They required the stimulus of miracles, and the gracious Saviour would not withhold even this lower means of conviction from their dull hearts. On his return to Cana he wrought another miracle, especially noted by St. John (see iv. 46, 54), by healing the son, who was dangerously ill, of a nobleman of the court of Herod Antipas. This was indeed a notable sign of Jesus' power; he spake the fiat of health at Cana; it took effect at Capernaum where

The Ministry in E. Galilee.—It seems to have been not without misgiving that he approached his northern labours, especially at Nazareth, where he proposed to commence them. The supposed obscurity of his birth created a strong prejudice against him. His foreboding of this even in Judæa is mentioned by St. John iv. 44; nor did the first outburst of enthusiasm in his favour on the part of the Galileans remove his apprehensions (comp. Luke iv. 24). He formally inaugurated his northern ministry in the synagogue of Nazareth, where he had been brought up (Luke iv. 16). From the grand language of the prophet (Is. lxi. 1), he in the most impressive manner asserted his Messiahship. The solemnity with which he proclaimed himself to be the promised one, whose mission it was to give liberty to the captive, produced at first a general sensation of wonder in his audience (ver. 22). But they were dreaming of only a political emancipation. When he declined to gratify their morbid craving for miraculous display (ver. 23), and intimated that the gifts he had to distribute were not to be confined to them; but that, after the examples of their illustrious prophets, Elijah and Elisha, he must offer them even to Gentile outcasts (vers. 25-27), 'they were filled with wrath, and thrusting him out of their city,' were about to follow up their fierce rejection by his death. His escape by his own divine interposition reserved that consummation for the guilty metropolis.

Nazareth and Capernaum.—This was no passing frenzy of the hostile Nazarenes: Jesus almost a year afterwards gave them an opportunity of reversing their antipathy. St. Matthew (xiii. 54-58) and St. Mark (vi. 1-6) both describe another visit of the Saviour to Nazareth. But with not dissimilar results: 'they were offended at him, and he could there do no mighty work'—the very pertinacity of their unbelief even excited the Lord's astonishment, as the graphic St. Mark informs us (vi. 6). Nazareth, after its first rejection of Christ, ceased to be his earthly resting-place. The privileges which, if accepted by its people, might have led on to their salvation, were now transferred to a neighbouring town, which in the sacred history stands out conspicuous as blessed beyond all other places with gifts of spiritual opportunity. How much of heavenly admonition, and how many wonderful and gracious manifestations of his power did Jesus vouchsafe to Capernaum* and its neighbourhood during that 'acceptable year of the Lord,' in which were wrought the grand events of his Galilean career—events which form so large a portion of the synoptical gospels, and were so often lauded by the oldest Fathers as the very coronal of the evangelic story! And yet how sad the issue! After all its advantages, this favoured city seems to have slighted them in a degree of enormity only inferior to that of Nazareth; and at last to have wrung from the grieved Saviour the melancholy reflection: 'Thou

* The ἡ ἰδία πόλις of St. Matthew ix. 1 is no doubt Capernaum. And the adverbial phrases, ἐς οἶκον, domum; ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ, domi sue, at his house, rather than 'in the house' (A. V.), employed by St. Mark in connection with Capernaum, seem to indicate that that city was now the Lord's home.

Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shall be thrust down to hell!' (Luke x. 15; Matt. xi. 23). Before he entered on his active ministry, in which Capernaum was so largely to share, Jesus attached to himself permanently four of the disciples, who had already been so long witnesses of his works. They were Simon Peter and his brother Andrew, and the two sons of Zebedee. In considerate regard to the prepossessions of their past life, the Lord, in his miracle of the draft of fishes (Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark. i. 16-20; Luke v. 1-11), wrought so strongly upon their convictions that they quitted their calling and home, and followed Christ amidst all the perils and obloquy of his future course. The astonishment which this miracle produced on the lake of Gennesaret, especially in the minds of those who witnessed it, and, as St. Luke's account indicates (v. 8, 9), of Peter more than the others, was intensely increased by a series of others, which in various ways manifested Christ's complete dominion over all things. He was rivetting the attention of the Capernaimites in their synagogue in a discourse of commanding authority (Mark i. 22), when he was interrupted by the shrieks of a demoniac. He rebuked the foul spirit, and restored the sufferer to soundness of mind and strength of body. Returning from the synagogue to Peter's house, Jesus added to the excitement of the scene by his instantaneous cure of a 'great' or virulent fever (Luke iv. 38), with which the apostle's wife's mother was afflicted. A few hours later on this eventful day 'the whole city' (Mark i. 33) submitted their sick and possessed to the merciful Saviour, who fulfilled one of the most gracious features which prophecy had assigned to him (Is. liii. 4; Matt. viii. 17), by healing every mental and bodily disease, and curbing the violence of the foul and expelled spirits. Natural was their wish to keep him amongst them.

First circuit of Galilee.—But his philanthropy could not thus be limited. Other cities, as he said, must hear the glad tidings which he was sent to proclaim. So, in company with his few devoted followers, he sets out on a tour of mercy, during which he 'went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and disease among the people' (Matt. iv. 23). The time occupied in this circuit, whether 'a few days' only, as Bishop Ellicott, p. 168, or three or four months, as Mr. Greswell, Dissert. ii. 293, with greater probability (as it seems to us) supposes, we have no data in the narrative to determine. It was probably before the termination of this journey that the Lord performed the miracle, which had about it some features of special interest and power, and perhaps enhanced his exceeding fame more than any previous one. He healed a leper 'in a certain city' (Luke v. 12) with a touch. Lord of all power and might, he here proved his dominion over the direst malady which afflicts the East (Thomson, Land and the Book, new ed., p. 651). Legislator higher than Moses, and priest greater than Aaron, he displayed in this touch of the leper authority over the ancient law (Lev. xiv.), and a command over a fouler disease than it ever fell to a Levitical priest to be 'the cleanser' of. (Ver. 11.—This ethical import of the miracle is well put by Mr. Jameson, Norrisian Prize Essay [Miracles and Doctrines of Scripture], p. 45, comp. Trench. Miracles, p. 216-219; and Greswell, Dissert. ii.

296, 297.) Our Lord's return to Capernaum was signalised by his restoration of one sick of the palsy to health and vigour. But his mighty deeds had brought together many strangers to the city, and amongst them some Pharisees and Scribes from Judæa and Jerusalem. The hostility of these southern Jews is first developed on this occasion. Whilst the simpler and more honest multitude blessed 'God, who had given such power to men' (Matt. ix. 8), the envious Scribes began to mutter about 'blasphemy,' until the actual accomplishment of the miracle in their presence made them silent with amazement and (as Luke adds, v. 26) even 'fear' before one whose power and dignity commanded their unwilling homage. The scarcely dissembled hatred of the Pharisaic party was further stimulated by Christ's admitting to close companionship with himself one of the offensive publicans, Levi or Matthew by name, whose call from his toll-booth took place probably on the very day of the paralytic's cure (Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 13, 14; Luke v. 27, 28). The great Galilean ministry, at this point, is interrupted by the approach of the feast of the Jews, anonymously mentioned by St. John, v. 1. This we, on the authority of the majority of commentators, have assumed to be the Passover.

SECT. 2. Our Lord's Second Passover.—It called our Lord to Jerusalem. During this visit happened the miracle at the pool of Bethesda, when Jesus restored the infirm man from his inveterate malady of thirty-eight years standing to lusty health (John v. 8, 9). In this miracle we have a sign of Christ's authority over the Mosaic law of the Sabbath. His reply to the cavillers, who complained that he had violated the sanctity of the holy day, convinced them that he was claiming an equality with God—a claim which for the first time exposed our Lord to the rancour of the Jews of the metropolis. Jerusalem henceforth vies even with the intolerant Nazareth in its hostility to the Son of Man, and rests not until, to its own ultimate ruin, it has accomplished the death of the Messiah, whom it ought to have loyally welcomed and received. The hostile spirit was spreading everywhere, so active were the efforts of the Pharisaic malignants. On his way back to Galilee (for the persecution of the Jews, which St. John refers to, v. 16-18, shortened our Lord's stay at Jerusalem), on the first of the Sabbaths which intervened between the second [or great] day of the Passover (Levit. xxiii. 11) and the ensuing Pentecost (we adopt this as, on the whole, the simplest of the alleged explanations of St. Luke's phrase ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτέρῳ πρώτῳ, vi. 1; see De Wette, in loc.; Greswell, Dissert., ii. p. 310; Wahl, Clavis; and Robinson's Lexicon of N. T., s. v., and the authorities they adduce), his disciples happened to pluck some ears of corn as they were passing through a ripened field. The act was observed by some Pharisees; and they urged a case of constructive Sabbath-breaking by combined reaping and threshing! The Lord, in answer to their complaint, vindicated his accused companions by the example of the great David, and proceeded to claim, by reason of his Messianic authority, a power over the Sabbath and its alleged restrictions. This was a very high claim, and the assertion of it increased the hostility of his enemies.

Resumption of his Galilean Ministry. His authority over the Sabbath.—The very next of his miracles, wrought on his return to the N. (probably at Capernaum), was a still more open assumption of his right to modify the severity of the Mosaic Sabbath and its traditional exaggeration. In the face of the assembled Scribes and Pharisees, on the seventh day and in the synagogue, he healed the withered hand, to the exasperation of his foes (Luke vi. 11), who, to accomplish their deadly purposes against Jesus, now enlisted the services of the Herodians, whom they generally despised, but from whose interest with Herod Antipas they hoped to secure the destruction of Christ on the spot. The graphic St. Mark describes the Lord, when in the act of performing the miracle, as 'looking round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts' (iii. 5). This miracle is one of the seven which are recorded to have been wrought on Sabbath days. The whole illustrate with almost mystic completeness our Lord's legislative dominion* over this prominent institution of the law. Four of these instances we have already mentioned—the demoniac in the synagogue of Capernaum, the cure of Peter's wife's mother, the healing of the infirm man at the pool of Bethesda, and the present instance of the withered hand. The other three, though occurring later, may conveniently be mentioned here for the sake of unity of subject. Their proper date is during the latter six months of the third year's ministry. The first of these cases is the noted one of the gift of sight to the man born blind, in Jerusalem after the feast of tabernacles (John ix. 1-16). Upon the miserable Pharisees that signal miracle lost its convincing effect. While the physical vision led the happy object of the miracle to the spiritual view of the Son of God (vers. 37, 38), the malignants were blinded to the claims of Jesus, of whom they exclaimed, 'This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day.' The next miracle gave Jesus an opportunity of asserting elsewhere the truth which he had asserted in Jerusalem and in Galilee of his own lordship over the Sabbath. In one of the synagogues of Peræa, east of the Jordan, he healed the infirm woman, who for eighteen years had literally 'bent' beneath her inveterate malady. The grateful patient glorified God, and the people rejoiced at the Saviour's glorious deeds; but the unhappy ruler of the synagogue was indignant at what he chose to construe into a violation of the Sabbath (Luke xiii. 14). The Redeemer with burning words denounced his hypocrisy to his face, and by the cogency of his rebuke reduced 'all his adversaries to shame' (ver. 17). It was in the same district of Peræa that Jesus wrought the last of his Sabbatical miracles—the cure of 'a certain man which had the dropsy.' On these two occasions the great Healer vindicated his merciful acts by the argument a minori ad maius, addressed to his cavillers, 'Which of you shall have an ox or an ass fallen into a pit and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath day?' This plain appeal silenced them effectually (Luke xiv. 6; comp. with xiii. 15, 16). Returning from this short digression, we find our blessed Saviour making two most important provisions for the society which was soon to be consecrated with his holy name and organised into perpetual vitality by the presence of his Holy Spirit. Men, under the strong emotion which Christ's wonderful works and words were everywhere exciting, were crowding around him. The harvest was fast ripening. Labourers were wanted for it. From amongst his most ardent followers, including the five whom we have already heard of as obeying his call, he selects twelve, a symbolical number it may be, not without some mystic reference to the tribes of the commonwealth of Israel (in which sense it is worth while to compare such passages as Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; Rev. vii. 4-8; xxi. 10-14), to be with him, whom he might educate for the noble work of founding and organising under him the church, for which, by his own incredible exertions and surpassing influence over men's minds, amidst the intensest malevolence, he was preparing, like another David, the precious materials.

The Twelve Apostles, and the Sermon on the Mount.—We detain not the reader over the names of the apostles, of whom no less than four lists are given (Matt. x. 2-4; Mark iii. 16-19; Luke vi. 14-17; Acts i. 13). They were probably all of Galilee, except, perhaps, the traitor, whose designation, Iscaariot, seems to point to a Judæan origin (Iscaariotes is, not unlikely, equal to קִרְיֹת).

Ish Keriath, of Keriath, mentioned Josh. xv. 25). For the instruction of both these and others, who through them should believe in Christ, he now delivers that heavenly summary of the life and practice of Christianity which age after age has regarded as the most sacred heritage that God has vouchsafed unto his church (Bp. Ellicott, p. 178). We accept the view of those writers who regard St. Luke's recital of the Lord's discourse (vi. 20-49) as a summary of the whole, given by St. Matthew in chapters v.-vii. If 'the Mount of the Beatitudes' be the square-shaped 'Hattin with its Horns' which tradition asserts, Dr. Stanley (Palest. p. 368 [ed. 3]) sees in the platform below the horns the rebous of St. Luke (ver. 17, not 'plain' [A. V.], but level place; for the plain is some 60 feet below), to which Christ would come down, as the evangelist represents him, from the higher horns of the Mount, for the purpose of addressing the people assembled on the before-mentioned plateau. Dr. Stanley is strong in the conviction that this was the hill, and that its peculiar form, in fact, easily reconciles the statements of the evangelists (Matt. v. 1* and Luke vi. 17, 20). Dr.

* 'In one respect only all these miracles were alike; they were miracles of the Sabbath. They were emphatically the beginnings of a new order [Cf. Ambros. Comment. in Luc. iv. 58. 'Sabbato medicinæ Dominicæ opera coepta significat, ut inde nova creatura coeperit, ubi vetus ante desivit; nec sub Lege esse Dei Filium, sed supra Legem in ipso principio designaret, nec solvi Legem sed impleri.'] The triumph of love over ritual.

* St. Matthew, although he enumerates 'the twelve,' in immediate connection with the sermon on the mount, makes Christ ascend the mount only as if to address the people; whereas St. Luke (and St. Mark with him) mentions the Saviour as already on the mountain with his disciples, and as afterwards descending to the level place to deliver the address. This is an omission of the first evangelist, but no discrepancy. When he comes to the sermon on the mount, he is found in accordance, really, with St. Luke, inasmuch as he repre-

Robinson also, who visited Hattin, allows the probability of the tradition, and (in his Harmony [ed. Tr. Soc.], p. 32, note) asserts that St. Luke's phrase ἐπὶ τόπου πεδίου, exactly indicates the elevated situation of the 'level spot' on which Jesus delivered his discourse. That the two evangelists narrate the same discourse is rendered still more likely by the context. They not only introduce the sermon on the mount with the Lord's nomination of the apostles, but they both follow it up by the narrative of Christ's return to Capernaum, and his there healing the centurion's servant. An unusual circumstance, worthy to be mentioned in refreshing contrast to the examples of Nazareth and Jerusalem, occurs in connection with this miracle. The Gentile centurion in military command of the district, who deserves comparison with the pious Cornelius, is too meek and humble to put himself in immediate correspondence with the Saviour. He therefore despatches such friends as he supposes meet to approach so wonderful a Person. It is a delightful exception to the usual character of the class to find that these friends were 'the elders of the Jews' (Luke vii. 3), who seem to have acted both with kindness to the centurion, their liberal benefactor as well as lenient governor, and with much respect and propriety towards Christ himself. We observe, moreover, in this miracle a natural transition to the still greater one which follows. The patient whom the Redeemer sents Jesus as on some elevated ground while addressing the assembly, as the third evangelist does also in fact, as shewn in the text. It increases the probability that St. Luke's is only an abridged form of the sermon, which St. Matthew gives in extenso, that on a comparison of the two forms the shorter seems to have omitted all such portions as had specially a Jewish cast. In a gospel intended primarily for Israelite readers, such passages as Matt. v. 17-39, and vi. 1-34, are specially suitable from their references to the Mosaic Scriptures, and from their Jewish allusions and illustrations. These long passages are entirely omitted by St. Luke. Moreover, in some of the passages which are common to the two, St. Luke omits the Jewish structure and tone of St. Matthew; e.g., in the injunctions of non-resistance to evil and of love to enemies (Luke vi. 29, 30; 27, 28), St. Luke omits the introductory references to the law, which St. Matthew characteristically gives: and while the latter bases the golden rule of doing to others as we would have done to us on 'the law and the prophets' (Matt. vii. 12), his brother evangelist, not writing for Jews especially, says nothing of this sanction. These and similar points, such as the omission by St. Luke of the warning against 'false prophets,' so suitable in the pages of St. Matthew (vii. 15), seem to account for the diversities which occur in the two evangelists. We do not deny that Christ may have repeated his discourses substantially at times. But we believe that the two evangelists, with their different aims, would probably report any one discourse of the Lord's with the characteristic differences which we in fact possess in their narratives. The nomination of the apostles being the context, which introduces the sermon in both accounts, clearly identifies these accounts as being of one and the same discourse. The context which follows is noticed in the text as affording a like argument.

The raising of the dead.—It was at Nain, a small town on the north slope of the valley of Esdraelon, that the Lord of Life first came into conflict with the powers of death. He was passing the gate as they were carrying to his grave the only son of a weeping widow. Full of kindness as well as of power, he spoke a word of comfort to the mother and of life to the dead son. The effect of both was complete. Amidst the awful fear and adoration of the crowds that thronged him he delivered the young man alive to his mother (Luke vii. 11-17). Three instances only occur in Christ's history of his assertion of this dominion over death. In the present case the corpse was on its way to burial when interrupted by the fiat of the Life-restorer. In the next instance, of the daughter of Jairus (which, as happening only a few days [or at most weeks] after this, may, for the unity of the subject, be here considered), the bands of death were loosened almost at once after life had ceased. The widow's son was raised in the sight of all Nain. The ruler's daughter in the presence only of three apostles (Peter, James, and John), who were afterwards associated with Christ on two other especial occasions, and of her parents. Crowds, however, had been gathered around Jesus on his way to the house of Jairus, and in the throng a suffering woman had pressed close to the Saviour. For twelve years she had tried in vain all the medical resources at her command. Her issue of blood was growing worse. She now thought that a touch even of the clothes of the great Healer would restore her. Whatever we may think of the intelligence of her faith, it possessed the virtue of a rare simplicity. The Lord at once acknowledged it, and in gracious words dismissed her 'in peace and whole of her plague' (Mark v. 34). The third instance of the gift of life, which we must now only glance at, was at the close of his ministry, when he raised Lazarus four days after burial. We mention this great case here as the ultimate degree of his power, so far at least as he was pleased to exert it on others. It was not only the restoration of life to the dead, but of the freshness of health to corruption (John xi. 39). If this gift of life to his friend hastened his own death in fact (John xi. 47, 57; xii. 10, 19), that event only expedited the consummation of his conquest and dominion over death by his own resurrection from the grave (John ii. 19, 21). We group together these wonderful facts. The three resurrections and the climax of the fourth must be noted, in however brief a history of Jesus. They develop the grandest of his Messianic functions which early prophecy foretold, and the whole gospel has only echoed and illustrated (comp. Hosea xii. 14; Is. xxv. 8; xxvi. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26, 54, 55; 2 Tim. i. 10; Heb. ii. 14, 15; Rev. i. 18; xx. 14; xxi. 4).

Death of John Baptist, and remainder of the E. Galilean Ministry.—This was, however, not the idea of Messiah which even good men had been wont to entertain. It was of imperial pomp rather than of spiritual dominion that they dreamt. Even the Baptist's faith seemed to fail under the personal trials which Herod's cruelty imposed on him, when after so much expectation he found Messiah's guise so lowly, and the signs of his kingdom so unearthly

(Matt. xi. 3; Luke vii. 19, 20. See Neander, Life of Christ [Bohn], pp. 60-62). He sent a desponding message to Jesus from his prison: 'Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?' The practical reply which the Lord returned to him, as he bade his messengers report to their master his works and words of grace and power, brings out into strong relief those lineaments of Messiah's character which present him to our spiritual intuition as the Benefactor and Saviour of mankind amidst privation and suffering rather than as an assertor of mere dominion and of material power. He pronounces a fresh beatitude on the man who should not take offence at the lowly blessings which Christ came to distribute amongst the meek and poor (comp. Is. lxi. 1 ['meek'] with Matt. xi. 5 and Luke vii. 22 ['poor']), and who should recognise in his remedies for the blind, the lame, the leprous, and the dead, the most appropriate demonstrations of Messiah's power, and the surest guarantees of his ultimate glory! Christ's testimony to his true-hearted though desponding forerunner (Matt. xi. 7-15; Luke vii. 24-30) is a fine illustration of his sympathy and appreciation of men under trial. John shortly after was removed to his rest by the tyrant's sword;* it is consolatory to see that the Lord's last reference to his mission and conduct of it was one of acceptance and gracious praise. He called him an Elijah, pronounced him equal to the greatest of prophets, and even compared him with the Son of Man himself as a faithful example of 'wisdom justified of her children' (see Matt. xi. 14; Luke vii. 28; and Matt. xi. 18, 19). In melancholy contrast are the reflections which Jesus about this time made as to the effect of his mighty works on the population which witnessed them. The towns around the west and north shores of the Sea of Galilee had enjoyed the clearest evidences of his heavenly mission; but beyond the transient wonder which his miracles could not but elicit, no signs of intelligent faith appeared, even in Capernaum, with all its wealth of opportunity. 'Woe unto thee Chorazin! Woe unto thee Bethsaida! And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell!' Such were the sad words in which he 'upbraided the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not' (Matt. xi. 21, 23).

Two more circuits of Galilee.—Before this year of ministerial activity came to its close, the Lord, who, while dining with a Pharisee, was anointed by a woman whose loving act, sinner though she was, was graciously accepted (Luke vii. 36-50), repeated his visitation around the northern districts of Palestine on two occasions. Last year he was accompanied by Simon Peter and the four others who were the first to follow Christ. This year he took with him in his former circuit his twelve apostles,

* Herod Antipas was a superstitious man. Hearing, after his execution of the Baptist (which he seems to have consented to with regret), of the Saviour's fame, his troubled conscience at once reverted to his victim. He exclaimed, 'This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him!' (Matt. xiv. 2). This is a rough though valid testimony from a man of the world of the profound impression which was created both by the Forerunner and the Saviour.

whom he was educating for their work of founding the church. This second of the circuits is also remarkable for the attendant ministry of certain earnest women, among whom was Mary Magdalene, now for the first time introduced to our notice (Luke viii. 1-3). Between this and the third circuit we trace some of the effects of Pharisaic malignity. Emissaries from Jerusalem are busy everywhere in their fiendish efforts to destroy his popularity, and to thwart the progress of his cause. 'His friends' (Mark iii. 21), including no doubt some of his kindred, who from the first were ignorant of his mission, and displayed that grudge against him of which the poet writes:

A brother on the eternal throne?'
(Christian Year, Trinity Sunday.)

now sought to lay hands on him, for they said, 'he is beside himself.' The opposition of the Pharisees, who had been only feeling their way hitherto, begins to assume a definite shape. In the face of the popular favour they do not resort to violence yet; but they hope to effect their object of crushing the Great Teacher by working on the credulity of the people, whom they would persuade that Jesus was in league with the powers of evil. They could not deny his miracles, but they had their explanation: 'This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils' (Matt. xii. 24). The Lord did not find it difficult to meet this blasphemous imputation by exposing the absurdity of it. But he was not content to do this simply; with words of most awful severity he, in express and immediate reference to this Pharisaic impiety, pronounced their venomous (Matt. xii. 34—γεννώματα ἐχιδνῶν) slander as a sin against the Holy Ghost for which the exhausted long-suffering of God had no forgiveness in store. In strict keeping with that sentence, he went on to remind men of the heavy responsibility they were treasuring up for the day of doom when they indulged in wanton imputations. They probably did not believe them. This excuse, however, would not serve them; the slander remained, and 'for every idle word that men should speak, they must give an account in the day of judgment' (ver. 36, comp. with ver. 32).

Exposures of Pharisaism.—Jesus sought every legitimate opportunity of cautioning men against that Pharisaism which was not more hostile to himself than fatal to their own highest interests. In his severe reflections on the Scribes and Pharisees, who sought a sign from him out of very wantonness in order to tempt him (Matt. xii. 38; Luke xi. 16, 24-36), as well as in his denunciations of woe at the Pharisee's table (ver. 37-54), we have instances. And how full of this righteous indignation he was, becomes yet more apparent, from his long addresses to his disciples and the multitude, in which he bids them 'beware of the leaven of the Pharisees' (Luke xii.). At Levi's feast, though in milder terms, he seized the opportunity of rebutting some less injurious though characteristic censures of the Pharisees, who took offence at his gracious association with the abject class of 'publicans and sinners.' His very mission was, as he said, to call such men to repentance.

Parables.—It was, however, not only by denouncing the hollowness of the Jewish party, but still more by instructing his disciples in the principles of his kingdom, 'the kingdom of heaven,' that our Lord advanced the cause of divine truth. Much of this instruction we have in his inimitable parables. The earliest of these (beginning with that of 'the sower and the seed'), which have a wider range of application than some of his later ones, belong to this period of his history. Those which are given in St. Matthew xiii. and parallel passages, seem to have a mutual relation, revealing 'varied aspects of the kingdom of God on earth' (Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, p. 21, n. 2, briefly traces their connection. See also Wordsworth on Matt. xiii. 3), in its present mixed and imperfect condition. This feature of Christ's teaching was prophetically appointed, as the evangelist observes (Matt. xiii. 34). It was also best suited for the purposes of moral probation: means were provided whereby to the willing and well-affected these parables should become intelligible (Mark iv. 33, 34); to the hostile and self-conceited the truths which underlay the parables would remain an unexplained and useless mystery (comp. Butler's Anal. ii. 4). It was on the shore of the Sea of Galilee that the Lord delivered these parables, in presence of a 'multitude' of eager listeners (Mark iv. 36). In the evening of the same day his disciples, desirous of securing him some retirement and rest, took him across the sea. While he was asleep from weariness, on the passage a storm burst upon their vessel. This circumstance, which filled his companions with alarm, afforded to Jesus an opportunity of asserting a power whereat they were struck with a new amazement. He stilled the raging tempest, and they exclaimed, 'What manner of man is this that even winds and sea obey him!' When he landed on the opposite coast, near Gergasa, he was met by two fierce demoniacs (Matt. viii. 28). The ferocity and deprecating cry of both are mentioned in the first gospel. The cure of one only, who seems to have been the pest and terror of the country, is fully described by SS. Mark (v.) and Luke (viii.), but they omit the mention of the second, as being of no account by the side of his very notorious companion (Ellicott, p. 188, note; Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. ii. p. 169). The two events, which took place shortly after our Lord's return to Capernaum (the raising of Jairus' daughter and the contemporary cure of the issue of blood), we have already adverted to; they were followed by the healing of two blind men and the ejection of the dumb spirit, amidst the grateful exclamation of the multitudes: 'It was never so seen in Israel!' and the renewal of the Pharisees' blasphemous cry: 'He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils!' (Matt. ix.) How prominent a feature in the sacred narrative is this contrast in the results of our Lord's ministration—the contemptuous rejection by the Pharisee and the enthusiastic favour of the impressive crowd (St. John's ὄχλος). Strong, however, as this popular feeling was, it was no match for that unflagging hostility which sought by every means, and at last too successfully, to convert the affection of the people into enmity. The tide of alienation surged first of all from Nazareth, the Saviour's chosen city. We have already noticed the deliberate and repeated rejection of Jesus by this infatuated and guilty population. The last of these miserable acts falls into the present section of our history. With what grief must the merciful Redeemer have turned his back, for the last time, upon a town whose claims upon his divine regard he would gladly have satisfied, but could not because of men's astounding unbelief (Mark vi. 5, 6). His loving labours, however, could not be checked. He immediately sets out on his third circuit of Galilee—whether with the former company of his apostles or not we are not informed. His observation on this tour of mercy excited more than ever his compassion for the multitude—scattered and fainting as they seemed to be, like sheep without a shepherd (Matt. ix. 36).

Mission of the Twelve.—The supply of their need he made an object of prayer, enjoining on his disciples the duty of invoking God's help (ver. 38); and, what was still more, he gave them an effectual lesson how best to secure an answer to prayer by acting on it. He without delay sent forth the twelve on their first missionary tour, and after their departure resumed his own labours among the neighbouring cities (Matt. xi. 1). This mission, which seems to have been made while the Lord was on his third circuit, and not from Capernaum, gave occasion for the delivery of a ministerial charge, in which the great 'Shepherd and Bishop of souls' sets forth to the apostolic pastors a regime of visitation adapted to their primitive field of labour. In this beautiful exhortation Christ makes an affecting allusion to the persecutions with which his own loving labours were met. In their mission they were receiving from him a heritage of like obloquy and trial, but a probation, withal, of noblest aims and a blessed recompense—'Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake, but he that endureth unto the end shall be saved' (Matt. x. 22). The entire charge occupies the chapter. This service was no doubt intended, among other purposes, for instruction to the apostles themselves, to the preparation of whom for their ultimate duties the Lord has evidently at this period of his ministry great regard. They were as yet novices in the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; so they were to limit their teaching to the simple announcement that that kingdom was at hand; miraculous power in attestation of their solemn message was given them, and they exercised it by casting out devils and healing the sick (Mark vi. 12; Luke ix. 6). As their circuit was confined to Galilee, and they took various directions in six different companies (Mark vi. 7), they would not require long time for this their first essay in mission work (Bishop Ellicott conjectures an absence of only two days, p. 193). Their return to Capernaum may also have been hastened by the violent death of the Baptist. Christ, probably with a view to greater privacy, withdraws with the twelve to the Northern Bethsaida (called Julias by the tetrarch Philip, after the emperor's daughter), but he failed to find the quietness which he sought. His fame attracted crowds from the villages and towns of the north shore of the Sea of Galilee. He was not indifferent to their earnest though scarcely intelligent longing after him; and in compassion to their wants he wrought what in some respects was the most imposing of all his miracles. On the slender s'ore of five loaves and two fishes, he satisfied the craving appetite of 5000 men, besides women and children (Matt. xiv. 21), leaving a hoard of fragments enough to fill twelve baskets. This marvellous exhibition of creative power, which so greatly excelled the analogous miracle of the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings iv. 42-44, produced an extreme sensation; and while some lauded him as the long expected prophet who was to introduce Messiah, others were loing so far as to set him up as the very theocratic King himself (John vi. 14, 15). To evade their importunity, Jesus retired to a solitary upland on the north-east of the lake, having requested his disciples to return to the western side. Another of the furious storms so usual on those waters impeded for hours the vessel in which they were crossing. With an astonishment which far exceeded the emotions with which they had viewed the recent miracle, the twelve saw the Lord walking on the troubled waves, as if to pass them (Mark vi. 48). He soothed their bewilderment with reassuring words, and permitted Peter to attempt to approach him on the water. He sustained the sinking apostle until they were received into the ship. The storm then ceased; their faith rose higher still, and they exclaimed, 'Of a truth, thou art the Son of God!' (Matt. xiv. 33). A hasty but not ineffectual visit again to the east shore of Gennesaret is related by SS. Matthew and Mark, during which he was pleased to disperse broadcast gifts of healing to the eager crowds of town and country (Matt. xiv. 35; Mark vi. 56); and the supplemental narrative of St. John then winds up the history of the second year's ministry.

Discourse in the Synagogue of Capernaum.
Apostacy of many.—The material benefits of food and health had by this time attracted numbers to Christ, who had formed no seemly views of his spiritual kingdom. This was only too likely to foster the worldly opinions which were so rife about the Messiah. The Lord therefore determines to correct the error, and to sift the sincerity of his followers. In a discourse full of the profoundest mysteries of man's spiritual relation* to

* Our Lord's bearing towards his relatives deserves mention in connection with this point in our history. It was on one occasion, during this year's ministry in Galilee, that a somewhat urgent request was made to Jesus to gratify the wish of his mother and his brethren, who were awaiting an interview. He was at the moment engaged in an earnest discourse on the blasphemy of the Scribes and Pharisees. So, instead of breaking off immediately to salute his kinsfolk, he seized the opportunity of assuring the bystanders, that by their regeneration his disciples enjoyed a nearer relation to him than even mother or brethren (Matt. xii. 46-50). Probably we may best explain on this same principle the apparent distance of manner which he shewed his mother at the marriage-festival of Cana at the beginning of his public course. Eighteen years before he had intimated to her that he had a work before him which she knew not of (Luke ii. 49, 50). He was now at Cana taking in hand his divine 'Father's business,' and was about to build up a spiritual household. This would bring out to view a changed relation between him and his human mother. She seems, however, to have stood more on her natural tie to him than was convenient, when she urged him to work his earliest miracle. So our Lord's words to her contained, it is certain, a tender rebuke (John ii. 4), and it was not until her subsequent act of faith (ver. 5), that the Lord actually complied with her request. After his resurrection we find this postponement of all human connection and feeling to spiritual relationship, in the Saviour's emphatic the Saviour he gives them to understand that it was not by an earthly career of popularity, excitement, and dominion, that he meant to set up his throne amongst them—nor by physical food was he about to feed them. As before to the woman of Sychar he promised water better than Jacob's well ever produced, to slake her thirst, so now to the men of Capernaum he offers a bread better than the manna of their fathers, his own flesh—the bread of life, which should satisfy their appetite for ever, and impart to the eater an eternal life. The murmurs which the envious 'Jews' first raised (John vi. 41, 52) soon spread to his disciples. Numbers of them exclaimed against his doctrine as harsh and intolerable (ver. 60), and 'from that time went back and walked no more with him' (ver. 66). Painful as was this large secession, it was not altogether unexpected (ver. 64) by Jesus, to whom it was no doubt a real pleasure to discover, at this trying moment, that they who had been the especial objects of his instructing care were making great advances in spiritual knowledge. His touching appeal to the apostles drew from them, through their mouth-piece Peter, the grand confession, 'We believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the son of the living God' (ver. 69).*

End of the second year.—And thus terminated that year of grace and love. Sad it is to reflect that after all its most lavish expenditure of miraculous energy, and faithful admonitions and sublime recommendations of the truth, only twelve public adherents of Christ were at last found in Galilee of all the multitudes that had been moved to follow him! The ultimate result of the Redeemer's mission to his own nation is told by the fourth evangelist in few but expressive words: 'He came unto his own, but his own received him not.' We have by this time seen how much of the crime of that rejection was accomplished in this the most active year of the Lord's ministerial career, and in the province he had most favoured with his presence.

SECT. 3. The Third Passover.—The last year of the ministry, as in many other respects, so at its very beginning, differs from the two preceding. We have seen how the Lord exercised a control over the Sabbath, we now find him using a discretion with regard to the great feast. Though it was his principle 'to fulfil all righteousness,' he yet absented himself from the present Passover to prevent any premature outbreak of the Pharisaic malignants, whose plans were laid for his destruction. 'Jesus would not walk in Jewry,' says St. John, prohibition of the Magdalene's offered embrace. She must not touch him with the bodily touch; but wait for that gift of the Spirit, after the ascension, which should enable her to embrace and touch him with the hand of faith (John xx. 17). And at the cross, besides the transfer of mere human love, implied in the Saviour's beautiful act of commending his mother to the beloved disciple's care, there was surely the inseparable bond of a spiritual relationship more closely cemented amidst the solemnity of that awful hour (John xix. 26, 27).

* Or, according to Tischendorf and Griesbach, 'Thou art the Holy One of God.' This is also accepted by Alford [5th edit.]; but the readings greatly vary.

in reference to this time, 'because the Jews sought to kill him' (vii. 1). But he was not wholly to escape from their opposition. At Capernaum he has to justify his disciples (in noticeable similarity to the apology he made for them at the beginning of the former year) for eating with 'unwashed hands' (Matt. xv.; Mark vii.) He makes this an opportunity of again vindicating moral truth from the miserable traditions with which the Scribes and the Pharisees had overlaid it. Unclean hearts, not unwashed hands it is, which defile the man; and he quotes against them, with much severity, Isaiah's prophecy (xxix. 13), illustrating it by their own evasion of the fifth commandment under the hypocritical maxim of 'Corban.'

Ministry in N. Galilee.—One of the points of contrast between the present and the preceding years of the Great Teacher's career, is the predominance in it of teaching and preaching above miraculous display (see Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, pp. 204-207). Miracles, indeed, he still wrought, and with the usual effect of eliciting from the multitudes, not their admiration only, but their homage; but he did this in new scenes of labour, and in some instances beyond the bounds of 'the land of Israel.' In the neighbourhood of Tyre and Sidon, he, in answer to the admirable faith and humility of the Syrophenician woman, healed her daughter, who was 'grievously vexed with a devil' (Matt. xv. 22). The precise spot where this happened is not mentioned. The Lord, who had probably retired so far north out of the way of Herod's jurisdiction, seems, from the best attested reading of Mark vii. 31, to have been journeying at that time to Sidon (ἐξελθὼν ἐκ τῶν ὁρίων Τύρου ἤλθεν εἰς Σιδῶνος is, after MBDLΔ and other manuscripts, adopted by Tischendorf and Tregelles, as well as Lachmann). From this great Gentile city, the utmost limit of our Lord's travels in that direction, he, in a journey of as much privacy as possible, crossed the Jordan above its uppermost lake, 'the waters of Merom,' and so approached the Sea of Genesareth on its east side, through the Northern Decapolis—still beyond the territories of Herod Antipas, whose hostility to the Redeemer had probably been procured by the Pharisees through the aid of their new allies the Herodians. This unnatural league Christ warned his disciples to beware of under the metaphor of leaven—'the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod' (Mark viii. 15)—intolerant bigotry united to mere worldliness in an effort to destroy the truth, which was as much opposed to the heartless formalism of the one, as it was to the unprincipled levity of the other. The solitary miracle of Phenicia was followed, on Christ's arrival in Decapolis, by another, which St. Mark alone describes (vii. 31-37). This healing of the deaf and dumb man, like that wrought shortly afterwards on the blind man of Bethsaida Julias (Mark viii. 22-26), is noticeable for a few peculiar features, the reason of which we are not informed of. In both cases the Lord withdrew the men from the gaze of the multitude, restored them to soundness by gradual and apparently laboured processes, and prohibited the publication of the miracles. In the former instance, indeed, this injunction was emphatically disobeyed. Instead of keeping silence, they raised a chorus of praise throughout Decapolis: 'He hath done all things well—He maketh both the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak!' While on these eastern shores of the lake, and in the interval between these similar miracles, our Lord repeated his stupendous display of creative power by feeding the four thousand with the seven loaves and a few small fishes in the wilderness. The effort which certain writers, for instance De Wette (on Matt. xv. 29) and Neander (Life of Christ [Bohn] p. 287, note), make to identify this with the like feeding of the five thousand, is refuted by Christ's own distinct mention of both (see Matt. xvi. 9, 10, and Mark viii. 19, 20. For an examination of the minute points of difference in these great and similar miracles, Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, pp. 221, 222 and notes, is worth consulting). We have said that in this period of the Saviour's ministry, more of the didactic than of the miraculous element occurs. His first object now seems to be more than ever the instruction of his followers, of the twelve especially. They have many prejudices to unlearn, and still more of spiritual truth to learn. In this purpose of teaching the disciples we have probably the chief reason of the privacy which characterised our Lord's movements at this time. Various occasions are mentioned suggesting various methods of imparting his divine instructions.

Didactic character of the Ministry of this period.—Besides his long exposure of the Pharisaic traditions at Capernaum, while vindicating his disciples from the charge to which we have already referred, of eating with unwashed hands, there is his angry rebuke of the sign-seeking Pharisees and Sadducees near Magdala. While he indignantly refused to gratify their insolent and treacherous curiosity, he yet, with an emotion of grief at their harsh hostility, intimated to them, under 'the sign of the prophet Jonas' (Matt. xvi. 4), the consummation of his own sacrifice, from the benefit of which their wilfulness would be, alas! too sure a bar to them. This sign, however, if hidden to their unbelief, would serve with many other significant hints to help the faith of his apostles; and it needed help! What ebbing and flowing of intelligence did they not exhibit! For instance, when Christ, shortly afterwards in his desire to caution them against the machinations of the malignants, designated their principles as 'the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees,' the twelve were so dull as to construe his plain metaphor literally, as if he were only rebuking them for a failure of their loaf-store! Such stolidity was a great hindrance to the Saviour in his tuition of the twelve. But his patience under it all was inexhaustible, and his very rebukes won them to conviction by their graciousness. We have already referred to the healing of the blind man of Bethsaida Julias, which belongs to this place. This happened on our Lord's journey northward to Caesarea Philippi, or Panæas. Here in this remote seclusion occurred some of the most striking points of his ministerial occupation. Intent on educating his faithful followers for the great events which were now not far off, he drew them, during one of their walks among the villages of Caesarea (Mark viii. 27), into a conversation respecting himself, 'the Son of Man.' After hearing their report of others' opinions, he pointedly asked them: 'But whom say ye that I am?' and from the forward lips of Peter, the spokesman of the rest, he heard the gratifying confession, which proved that his labours had not been thrown away notwithstanding the tardiness of their minds : 'Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God' (Matt. xvi. 16). But they must not divulge this mystery of Messianic truth. It would be premature. Men's spiritual faculties were all unprepared to receive so sublime a doctrine, which must therefore be guarded in respectful silence until the divine plan was maturely developed (Luke ix. 21). Grand, however, was the encomium which the apostle's noble conviction called forth from the admiring Saviour, and in his faith was laid the foundation of the church as on an impregnable rock, proof against the powers of darkness (Matt. xvi. 17-19). But there was a context in that Messianic truth which the apostle had not heeded. The glorious side of it he readily enough embraced ; but the aspect of affliction and death offended him. So when Jesus proceeded for the first time in explicit words to shew unto his disciples the awful catastrophe which was before long to happen at Jerusalem, the same Peter is as prompt in deprecation as before in faith : 'Be it far from thee, Lord, this shall not be unto thee.' The Master's altered tone is as emphatic as his disciple's. In words of severest rebuke he condemned the apostle's interruption as an interference with the purposes of God, which savoured as strongly of the world's inspiration (ver. 23) as his former faith had of heaven (ver. 17). The cross, however, must be borne (ver. 24) by those who would wear the crown. They must, therefore, resign themselves with heart and will to that dispensation of suffering, with him and for him, which (however little they had regarded it) was yet appointed as the precursor of even Messiah's glory, and the inevitable probation of the subjects of his kingdom.

The Transfiguration.—To assure them of the glories of that kingdom, and to encourage them for the endurance of the trials which were to prepare them for it, he, a week after this discourse, while in the neighbourhood of Cæsarea, and most probably 'on one of the lofty spurs of the snow-capt Hermon' (for the preference of this mountain over the more southern Tabor, see Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, p. 226), revealed to the three of the twelve (Peter, James, and John), whom he occasionally chose out for especial offices (comp. Mark v. 37 ; ix. 2 ; xiv. 33), a view of his glorified condition in the wonderful Transfiguration, which is described in the three synoptical gospels, and expressly alluded to by the two apostles, who lived to hand down their writings to the church (see John i. 14 ; 2 Peter i. 16-18). Over the details of this glorious scene—the Redeemer's pure effulgence vying with the 'glistering' brightness of the snows of the mountain on which he stood (comp. the equally glorious and still fuller description by St. John, Rev. i. 13-16) ; the presence of Moses and Elias, 'speaking of his decease which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem,' and thus giving the vouchers of the law and the prophets to that portion of Messiah's mission, which all men then failed to recognise, even his humiliation and death (Luke ix. 31) ; and the conduct of the apostles in the midst of all—we must not tarry. This scene, though the reverse of Gethsemane, presents to us the same three apostles as similarly affected under the extremes alike of glory and humiliation. On both occasions they were overcome with sleep (comp. Luke ix. 32 with xxii. 45) ; thus presenting to us an expressive contrast to him, whose sensibility and care never flagged at any step he took in the accomplishment of his mission. Like the rest of his recent communications, this revelation of glory and suffering was to be kept secret until after his resurrection (Mark ix. 9)—a limitation of period which excited strange questioning among themselves (ver. 10) ; as did a similar prophecy, afterwards given them on their return to Galilee, wherein the Lord with increasing explicitness foretold to them the particulars of his approaching passion (Matt. xvii. 22, 23). With anxious timidity they kept these things to themselves, afraid to open even to Christ the subject for explanation. The weakness of their faith had received a more practical and obvious exposure shortly before their departure from Cæsarea Philippi. A lunatic youth had been submitted by his father for cure, in the Saviour's absence on the Mount, to the nine apostles. After they had tried in vain to cast out the evil spirit, Jesus at once wrought the miraculous restoration—upbraiding the faithlessness of the perverse generation, and convicting his own companions of a want of that spirit of self-denial and humility which so characterised everything he did and said himself (Mark ix. 14-29). Two circumstances which happened after their return to Capernaum from the north indicate how far they were yet from realising the unworldly nature of Christ's kingdom. Rather than appear to slight any legal demand made of him, he, by a miracle, provides the fee of the temple-tribute, so unwilling was he to encourage any thought of exemption from law, even in a case where exemption might well have been asserted (Matt. xvii. 26). In no sense would he have them believe that his kingdom was of this world. Far other thoughts were in the minds of his disciples. They were dreaming of the establishment of a material kingdom, and were beguiling themselves with a dispute about their own rank and superiority in the new dominion. This section of the Galilean ministry accordingly ends in a series of cognate exhortations, in which the Saviour rebukes the ambition of his scholars by the example of a little child. Humility and not ambition would entitle them to exaltation in his kingdom ! (Matt. xviii. 4). Guilelessness and self-sacrifice would also be a good security for the recompense of heaven (vers. 8, 9), and so would a forgiving temper be (vers. 15-35). These cardinal virtues of Christian lowliness, so little understood as yet by the disciples, Jesus inculcated for the sake of a deeper impression by some touching parables. We are now arrived at the termination of the former moiety of the third year's ministry. 'The Jews' feast of tabernacles was at hand,' and the Lord is about to quit his long residence in Galilee, never more to resume it.*

SECT. IV. Christ after his departure from Galilee ; his anticipation of Death.—There is something very grand in St. Luke's conception of the last six months' labours of Christ. As early as the 51st verse of his chap. ix., he withdraws him from his great Galilean* career, and commences the narrative of what he designates the Lord's journeying to Jerusalem. In contrast with the locally fixed and limited character of his northern residence, this migratoriness is a just description of the latter history. In the verse just referred to we have the key-note: 'It came to pass when the time was come that he should be received up [the ἀναλήψις = his ascension or assumption back to his glory in heaven—Euthymius in Arnold, De Wette, and especially Meyer and Bleek, in loc.], he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem.' In this journeying to his death—these 'funeral marches to the grave'—how finely does the sacred narrative set before us his firm and earnest look towards Jerusalem as the scene of his approaching sacrifice! [Τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἐστήριξε τοῦ πορεύεσθαι εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ.] He will not indeed throw away his precious life, however due he knows it to be to a violent death; nay, he more than once withdraws from danger, to which he at last only succumbs when 'his hour is fully come!' Like a clue we can trace this migration of Christ through the remainder of St. Luke—comp. ix. 53, 56, 57; x. 38; xiii. 33; xvii.; and xix. 28, 36.

* The statement that the Lord never again resumed his residence in Galilee will not be deemed contradictory to the view which we take in a subsequent part of this article, where, in his ultimate circuit of the whole country, we make him once more pass through Galilee (Luke xvii. 11).

His Missionaries—the Seventy.—While yet in Galilee his brethren, who had no intelligent faith in his mission (John vii. 7), urged him to remove to the metropolis, and there exhibit the mighty power which had raised so great a sensation in the north. They blindly thought that he would perhaps achieve some national greatness—possibly the assumption of the Messiahship—which might even reflect, though they hardly knew how, some glory on themselves. (On the character of the brethren's unbelief, see a good note of Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, p. 246.) Their self-seeking expectations the Lord repudiates, and refuses to accompany them to Jerusalem. In this refusal too many, from Porphyry ['inconstantia ac mutationis accusat,' St. Jerome says of him, adv. Pelag. ii.; see also Ullmann, Sundlos. Jes., by Brown, p. 191] to Meyer, have discovered an evidence of weakness and a faltering purpose! Unjustly! The Lord's words, fairly, deny only his intention to travel with his brethren, whose unsympathising ambition would unfit them to be his companions. He rather implies some intention of going up in the very terms of his refusal [ex. gr., in the ὁπῶς ἀναβαίτω of John vii. 8]. Nor will his retinue be unworthy of the true Messiah. On the departure of his brethren, he despatches some apostolic messengers to prepare his way through Samaria, the less frequented road from the north to the capital. Nor is this all. With a solemnity suitable to his last extensive effort to prepare men's hearts for the reception of his kingdom, he commissions no less than seventy of his most devoted followers to disperse themselves in five and thirty different companies, with instructions resembling those he had given to the twelve (only more urgent, as in view of the increasing hostility of the nation). They were to go 'before his face into every city and place, whither he himself was about to come' (Luke x. 1). So that, however widely spread were the Lord's last migrations—a sort of compendious visitation, embracing the entire country (Luke xvii. 11)—he seems to have gone no whither without a plan, and a previous announcement of his approach.

Samaria.—While taking his journey through the district west of the Jordan in comparative quietude (ὁ φανερώς, John vii. 10), as off the usual caravan-route to the festivals, he had to bear the slight of the Samaritans, who, perceiving him to be bent on passing by their Gerizim to visit the city and temple, which were so hateful to them, and forgetful of their former devotion to him, refused to receive him (Luke ix. 53). This indignity kindled the resentment of the sons of Zebedee, and they gave a strong proof (and that not a solitary one, Mark x. 38) of their ignorance of their master's character, and of the spirit which was due to their association with him (ver. 55), by appealing to one of the severest instances of vengeance on record, and requesting a repetition of it on the present occasion (ver. 54). He was, however, not utterly uncheered by some demonstration of favourable feeling in Samaria. One eagerly desired to attach himself to his company (ver. 57) whom the Lord saw fit to warn of the self-denial which such an adhesion would cost him (ver. 58).

Jerusalem; Feast of Tabernacles.—The eight days' festival was half-expired (John vii. 14) when Jesus appeared in the Temple. Great expectation seems to have been formed of his coming. Graphically does St. John describe the freedom with which his character was canvassed. The multitude, as usual, felt favourably towards him. The authorities were more than ever hostile, and laying plans for his apprehension. Their officers (not unlike those who were afterwards sent to arrest him in Gethsemane), awed by the majesty of his demeanour, shrank from their unwelcome office amidst the taunts of their heartless employers (vers. 45-47). 'Never man spake like this man!' was all the answer they could give to the chief priests and Pharisees, when they demanded their prisoner at their hands. But it was not the people only who favoured Christ. In the very Sanhedrim the once timid but now courageous Nicodemus dared to demand, that the council should at least proceed by legal process and not passion, in their vindictive efforts against him, whose secret disciple he had not ceased to be, ever since that memorable night when the Lord taught him the mystery of the second birth. The malignants wreaked their impotent rage on the faithful senator by taunts and gibes. They could do no more in the present temper of the populace, whom they feared while professing to despise them (ver. 49). Notwithstanding the great doubtfulness of its critical authority, the beautiful history of 'the woman taken in adultery' is generally held to be a true portion of inspired Scripture, and fits in without inconvenience at this place and time. In it we have one of the many instances of the wisdom wherewith the Lord baffled the Pharisaic party in their attempts to entrap him into an incautious expression of opinion on a point of delicate and intricate relation to the Jewish law. While still at Jerusalem, on the Sabbath after the feast, Christ wrought the noted miracle, which we have already referred to, of giving sight to the man born blind (John ix.) The evangelist to whom we are indebted for the account of it, makes the miracle an historical occasion for a grand series of most profound discourses of the Lord Jesus, which vary in character from those which he had been speaking in Galilee, and from those which he afterwards delivered, in this respect, that whereas those were primarily designed as instruction to believers and disciples, these were addressed to the Jewish party in the midst of their hostility, and in mild though earnest rebuke of it. His hour is at hand. He must declare the counsel, as well as work the works, of his Father. He, therefore, amidst much virulent interruption (accompanied, however, in some instances with an effort to believe—John viii. 30), vindicates the truth of his mission, sets forth his divine relation to God, proclaims himself as the fight of the world, and enlarges on his own person and salvation. He also rebukes the degeneracy of the nation, and exposes the unavailing confidence of men who, while boasting of their descent from Abraham, had nothing of his faith; he shews them what was the true liberty from the thralldom of sin and the devil with which he was ready to emancipate them; and at the most favourable moment, at the climax of the festival, he with gesture and language of surpassing dignity, offers the gift of his Spirit (John vii. 39) under the beautiful figure which he had used at the well of Sychar, of a pure and flowing stream, whose waters should for ever quench the thirst of the weary soul. We do not pretend in this brief notice to sketch the connection of these discourses, which occupy the greater part of four chapters of St. John (vii.-x.); the reader would find much help to a profounder view of them in Dr. Rudolf Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus, as translated by Mr. Pope, vol. v., pp. 243-507. The former part of the 10th chap. contains the only parable given by St. John, that of the Good Shepherd. It is not a παραβολή, a parabolic story or narrative, like those of the synoptical gospels; but a παροιμία or amplified proverb, as Stier more fully points out, l. c., p. 463. The last twenty verses of the same chapter carry us forward from the October of the Feast of Tabernacles to the December of the Feast of Dedication. During this interval Jesus probably remained in the immediate neighbourhood of the metropolis to make the last experiment of his love in efforts to reclaim his countrymen. St. John is silent on this period of his history. Some events, however, mentioned by St. Luke (chaps. x., xi.) probably best fit in here.

* In our SECT. II. above, we have, following Robinson, placed a passage or two of Luke xi. and xii. in the Galilean ministry, because of the parallel places of the other evangelists. It will, however, be seen that the subjects of these passages (Exposures of Pharisaism) are very general, and might in fact be referred quite as well to other parts of the ministry. In some other dislocations of St. Luke by this excellent harmonist, ex. gr., in x. 1-16, and xvii. 11-19 [see his Harmony, Eng. ed., pp. 89, 90], which are of a more marked character, we have felt ourselves unable to follow him. To our mind, after a careful examination, it is extremely doubtful whether St. Luke has in any case departed from that order of time and place which in the opening of his gospel he undertakes to follow.

His stay in Judæa.—This interval was spent, it would appear, in comparative quietness, and resembles somewhat the latter Galilean ministry in its didactic character. The twelve were with him, and the seventy return to him at this time. To the former, who request instruction in the great duty of prayer, Jesus repeats the same model-form of prayer as he had taught in his sermon on the mount (Luke xi. 2). Only he now insists on the lesson of earnestness and importunity, as then he inculcated forgiveness of injuries, as the corollary of prayer; and he grounds this importunity on the bountiful mercy of their heavenly Father, who will certainly never be behind any earthly parent in the plenteousness and excellence of his gifts (ver. 13). The seventy brought him a report of their simple ministration, which seemed to fill him with a joyous satisfaction. His intuition saw at a glance in the success of these plain and humble men a sample of the future progress of his kingdom, triumphing over the dominion of the evil one. 'I beheld Satan,' he exultingly exclaimed, 'as lightning fall from heaven!' Only not let them grow vain at their success; even this must be subordinate in their joy to the security of their own salvation (Luke xi. 20). But not merely to his own followers did Jesus confine his instruction. The touching parable of the Good Samaritan, which St. Luke places after the return of the seventy (x. 25-37), was directed in answer to the 'tempting' question of a certain lawyer, and to illustrate the principle of love to one's neighbour. The scene of this parable, the historical occasion of which we only set down here—omitting the deeper theological import which probably underlies it, as unsuitable to this sketch (see Alford, Gr. Test., vol. i. [5th ed.], p. 542), seems to imply that it was spoken in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem and Bethany. The evangelist in the same chapter introduces us to the family of Bethany, our Lord's domestic intercourse with which forms a most interesting feature in his later ministry. In the holy quietude of his visits here what a refreshing contrast we have to the hostile turbulence of the city! In the purity of his love for the brother and sisters of that highly-favoured household we find the sublimest consecration of human friendship; while the tears which the Redeemer shed over that brother's grave (John xi. 35) are amongst the truest evidences which the sacred history affords us of his genuine sympathy with man's sorrows (Heb. iv. 15). St. Luke, in a few exquisite touches of that descriptive power which adorns the four gospels, reveals to us in Martha and Mary two types of character perpetually recurring in the Church. They are both impressed with the love of Christ, and are ever seeking to promote his cause. The Mary-type, meekly sitting at his feet, concentrates its energy on him, and wins his praise for its undivided love. The Martha-type, full of nature, yet not insincere in its love, permits the distraction of many collateral cares (μεριμνᾷς καὶ θορυβᾷ ἔνι πολλὰ) are the expressive words of St. Luke x. 41), which does not forfeit indeed the Saviour's kindly regard, but draws from him a rebuke, the very gentleness of which—'Martha, Martha'—is meant to reclaim the perturbed soul from the disquietude of many troubles to the needful solace of a simple fealty to its Lord.

The Feast of Dedication.—This anniversary, instituted by Judas Maccabæus in memory of the purification of the temple from the pollution of Antiochus Epiphanes, differed from the other Jewish festivals in not confining its celebration to the metropolis. Our Lord, however, being in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, attended the feast in that city. The crowds, which had gathered around him in Solomon's porch where he walked (probably to avoid the inclemency of the winter weather), with a grander doctrine to declare than ever fell from the old philosophers in their renowned stoa, plied him with hypocritical petulance to solve their doubts about the Messiahship. 'If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly!' He refers them to his late discussions at the treasury and the public miracle connected with them. These plainly indicated that his mission was of God, and they ought to be evidence enough to them for the decision of their question. 'If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works.' And he went on to assert his own divinity. 'I and my Father are one'—'The Father is in me, and I in him' (John x. 30, 39). He had concluded his former addresses to them in a similarly lofty strain; 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am' (viii. 58). Then they took up [ἄρα] such stones as were casually lying in their way, placed there no doubt for the building of the yet unfinished Temple (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8), to cast at him; but he escaped by an assertion of his own mighty providence, as he had aforetime from a like critical danger at Nazareth (see above). On the present occasion they interrupted his sublime doctrine by a second recourse to stoning. Only this time they seem to have in their hatred come prepared with their weapons of death; ἑβδοντα is now the word used by St. John (x. 31), as if they had brought the stones with them. Having with calm resolution delivered to them his noble message, and having no further purpose to serve by tarrying amongst them, he will save them again from blood-guiltiness, and so escapes out of their hand (ver. 39).

The Perea or Transjordanic Ministry.—Every other province has been traversed; so the Lord, driven from Jerusalem, retires across the Jordan, where the field had been some time ago prepared for him by the illustrious Baptist. That holy man's labours were not in vain; we now see what Bengel calls (Gnomon, in loc.) their 'posthumous fruits' in the great success of the Saviour's ministry. St. John (x. 40-42) intimates that Christ's sojourn was a lengthy one; and he expressly informs us, that 'many resorted unto him . . . many believed on him there.' In this section we must place most of the interesting events which St. Luke [mainly] and his fellow-synoptics [occasionally] relate as having occurred during our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem. This portion of his life is generally deemed by the Harmonists to be attended with much difficulty. (For succinct views of the whole subject, see Dean Alford's Gr. Test. on Luke ix. 51 [ed. 5]; Bishop Ellicott's Lectures, pp. 242-45; Bleek's Synopt. Erklär., ii. 139-145; Alp. Thomson's Art. JESUS CHRIST in Smith's Dict. of Bible, i. 1061; and Dr. Robinson's Harmony [Engl. ed.], pp. 91-94.) We cannot presume here to do more than broadly set the full details of the third evangelist (with the occasional parallels of SS. Matthew and Mark) over against the brief and general statements of St. John, and so construct a probable narrative of this farewell ministry of the Saviour. Much of its transitory course was, as we have said, passed beyond the Jordan. On quitting the metropolis Christ retired at first to Bethabara (John x. 40; where the πάλω refers to i. 28), or rather, as the best critical authority warrants us to call the place, Bethany, where he would meet with much to remind him of his earliest consecration to his public life. The truth of the Baptist's prophecy, of which we spoke early in this Art., haunts us here also (John iii. 30). As in Judæa early in his career, so here in Perea at the end of it, there are not wanting signs of Christ's superiority over his great forerunner being confest to men's view (comp. John iii. 26; iv. 1; and x. 41). This will account probably for some of the subjects on which the Lord discoursed while beyond Jordan. These discourses, like the Baptist's, were in answer to practical questions proposed to him for solution; they are of a higher nature, however, and indicate that an involuntary respect for his greatness was entertained even by his opponents. They relate in some instances to what was uppermost in men's expectations, the kingdom of Messiah and its circumstances. 'Are there few that be saved?' (Luke xiii. 23); 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God' (xiv. 15); 'When shall the kingdom of God come?' (xvii. 20); 'Good master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?' (xviii. 18); and the enunciation of the law of divorce, in which he corrects the imperfection of the law of Moses (Mark x. 4, etc.); and their submission of young children for his blessing (Luke xviii. 15-17) . . . Such profound questions as these elicited from the Saviour some of his sublimest teaching. His audience were of the Pharisaic class generally, to whom he addressed his later parables: The grain of mustard seed (xiii. 18); the lost sheep; the prodigal son; the unjust steward; the rich man and Lazarus; the importunate widow; the Pharisee and Publican (xv., xvi., xviii. 1-14); the labourers in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 1-16). These illustrious lessons, delivered in the hearing of multitudes of eager listeners (Matt. xix. 1, 2; Mark x. 1), bore very much on the mysteries of his kingdom, its growth, and the principles of those who should be its subjects—so different from the prejudices fostered by the monopolists of heaven's favour among the selfish Pharisees; and the catholicity of its embrace—wherein repentant prodigals and contrite publicans would find a welcome, denied to their proud and arrogant oppressors. While thus condemning the exactions of Pharisaism, the Lord did not relax the rigour of his demand on the fidelity of his own followers. 'Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple' (Luke xiv. 27)—he said to the multitudes that crowded his path. 'Sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor, . . . and come take up the cross and follow me,' was the self-sacrifice that he lovingly (Mark x. 21) requested of the rich young ruler, who went away sorrowful from so vast a demand (Matt. xix. 22; Luke xviii. 23). On his disciples he inculcates forbearance, faith, humility; let them build up the fabric of a character perfect in self-denial; but 'when,' said he, 'ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, 'We are unprofitable servants'' (Luke xvii. 10). St. Matthew refers to the exercise of his healing powers in Perea (xix. 2), and accordingly St. Luke gives us an example in the case already referred to above, in the section of the Sabbath-day cures, of the immediate restoration to her natural erectness of the woman who had for eighteen years a spirit of infirmity and was bowed together and could in no wise lift up herself (xiii. 10-17). He also healed a man afflicted with dropsy, and again on the Sabbath (see above, l. c.) at the house of a leader of the Pharisees (Luke xiv. 1-6). But the transjordanic ministry, as it would seem, was mainly didactic (comp. Mark x. 1 and Luke xiii. 22). He was now in the territories of Herod Antipas. On a former occasion we saw how Jesus, with the caution that marked his earlier course, retired to the north out of the tyrant's way, when his attention was directed to him. But now when Christ is warned of the tetrarch's hostile designs, with an indignant protest against his hypocrisy and malice, he boldly persists in his glorious ministry, which he is eager to accomplish in face of all dangers (Luke xiii. 31, 32). He will soon perfect his work by death. Nazareth had prematurely essayed the guilt of that consummation; Capernaum and Galilee had rejected him; Samaria had spurned him; the tyrant of Peræa was now seeking to kill him; but for Jerusalem was reserved at once the accomplishment of his sacrifice and the completion of its own guilt and ruin. This the Redeemer knew, and expressed his lament for the fate of the obdurate city in a strain of compassionate pathos but yet dooming severity, which will never cease to move the heart of the reader: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets . . . How often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen her brood beneath her wings, and ye would not!' (Luke xiii. 34, 35). What the threats of Herod failed to effect was brought about by the call of love.

Raising of Lazarus.—About the time of this message to the tyrant, he received from the sisters of Bethany the afflicting tidings that his loved friend, their brother, was dangerously ill. After two days spent in concluding his ministry beyond Jordan (see Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, pp. 264-268), he sets out to go to Bethany, amidst the expostulation of the twelve, who did not forget the danger from which he had escaped at the feast of dedication (John xi. 9). When Jesus divulged to them the death of Lazarus as the occasion of his visit to the vicinity of the capital, they withdrew all opposition, and acquiesced in the resolution of the devoted though desponding Thomas, to accompany him, and, if it must be, to die with him (ver. 16). The Redeemer, with prescient glance, saw at once what a noble opportunity was at hand for the manifestation of his Father's glory, the object of all his efforts, and for the confirmation of the faith of his disciples and friends, an equally dear object in his view (vv. 4, 15, 26, 40, 42, 45). On the road near the town Jesus is met by the ardent Martha, whose noble response of faith to the Saviour's challenge (ver. 27) justifies the view which makes her, no less than Mary, a true lover of her Lord. The contagion of the tears of Mary and her friends kindled the Saviour's sorrow. In the briefest, but one of the most precious, of the verses of the N. T., St. John informs us how 'Jesus wept' (xi. 35). But even into the midst of that sacred grief did the Jewish cynics intrude (ver. 37), and the Redeemer's sympathetic tears were mingled with an emotion of pain at their obduracy (ver. 38). As he approaches the grave he is again interrupted by an impatient exclamation of Martha, which he first rebukes, and then, after ordering the sepulchre to be opened, with a calm thanksgiving to his Father, he utters the loud fiat which called forth the dead, and exchanged his corruption for the freshness of health and strength! We have already commented on the grandeur of this great miracle (see above, in the section The raising of the dead). Its effect was immense, both on friend and on foe. It stimulated the adherence of many believers; and excited the keener animosity of the malevolent. While the Sanhedrim, under the direction of Caiaphas, were organising a wide-spread plot for his capture, Jesus withdrew to the town of Ephraim (or Ophrah = the modern Taiyibeh, about twenty miles north of Jerusalem). From this place the Lord, after a stay of two or three weeks with his disciples, proceeded on the ultimate journey throughout the country to which we have already adverted.

Final circuit from Ephraim.—Pursuing a northern course, 'he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee' (Luke xvii. 11); and, while on the way, probably on the Samaritan frontier, he healed the ten lepers (vv. 12-14). It strangely symbolised the scant gratitude of the nation, that of all the benefited sufferers one only expressed his thanks for his cure, nor is it less remarkable that the solitary one belonged to the despised Samaria (ver. 16, 18). Crossing the Jordan in Galilee, he traversed Peræa again, in quiet company, as it would seem, with the twelve, to whom for the third time, to prepare them for the shock of his approaching separation from them, he foretells his death and resurrection (Matt. xx. 17-19; Mark x. 32-34; Luke xviii. 31-34). We do not read that this startling announcement brought out from the impetuous Peter a repetition of his former resistance. All apparently were acquiescent, but without intelligence. St. Luke is emphatic in his description of their ignorance (xviii. 34). Of the Messiahship of their friend and master they doubted not; but of death and suffering, as connected with that dignity, they could not bring their minds to think. At this very moment, indeed, the sons of Zebedee were dreaming of regal grandeur, and presumed to request the posts of honour for themselves in the approaching kingdom (Mark x. 35, 37). This they probably did at the prompting of their mother, Salome (Matt. xx. 20, 21). With mild dignity did Jesus check their ambition, as incompatible with the appointments of God. The ten, however, were moved with an indignation against the brothers, which was only quelled by the calm wisdom of the Saviour. He, in counselling forbearance among them, pointed to his own example of self-abnegation, as 'the Son of Man,' who 'came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (ver. 28). But though they understood not, they were not without strange forebodings of the immediate future. Mixed feelings absorbed them on their way. For themselves they feared, as they followed Christ; but at his undaunted courage they were astonished as he put himself at their head (Mark x. 32), with that unflinching purpose, which, as St. Luke remarks, distinguished him ever since he began to have Jerusalem and his sacrifice there in view (ix. 51).

Jericho.—And thus they reach Jericho, one of the most important cities at that time in Palestine. As he was approaching it he was greeted as 'the Son of David' by a certain blind man who sat by the roadside begging. St. Luke, who alone of the evangelists narrates another event of interest connected with this visit to Jericho, by a prolepsis not unusual in the Gospels (see Luke iii. 19; xix. 45; John xi. 2 comp. with xii. 3; Matt. xxvii. 52, 53; xxi. 20 comp. with Mark xi. 20), to finish the history of the blind man's cure, connects it immediately with his salutation of Jesus. St. Mark, whose account is more detailed and literally exact, both mentions the sufferer's name, as Bartimeus, and describes the cure as happening on the morrow, when the Lord was leaving the city on the western side. On this second occasion, however, the blind suppliant was not alone; a fellow-sufferer joins him in his importunity and acclamation. Affected by this double act of faith and praise, the Lord, undeterred by the crowd, who at first endeavoured to suppress the cry of the helpless pair, graciously commanded their approach, and, with a touch, instantly gave them sight. These twin miracles St. Matthew, it will be seen, characteristically (comp. his viii. 28 with Mark v. 2 and Luke viii. 27, and see our notice above) combines (xx. 29-34; comp. with Mark x. 46-52 and Luke xviii. 35-43). Three times does the first evangelist associate this Messianic eulogy of Christ as David's son with his miraculous healing of the blind. It is worth while to compare the present duplicate instance with chap. ix. 27 and xii. 23. In the latter of these two parallels the contagion of the praise spread among the bystanders. It was probably so at Jericho, where there seems, in simpler strain, to have begun that glorious thrill of popular acclamation in honour of Jesus as the Christ, which in heart-moving diapason was a few days afterwards heard from a myriad of tongues on the slope of Olivet. Alas! how inconstant the favour of the impressive multitude! That enormous apostasy of Passion-week, which so soon drifted from the gentle notes of 'Hosannah' to the shriek of 'Crucify him!' has here also its premonitory sign in the 'murmurs' of the fickle crowd (Luke xix. 7), whose prejudices were aroused, when the gracious Jesus offered himself as a guest to the unassuming (ver. 3, 4), earnestly devoted (ver. 4, 5), and sincerely repentant (ver. 8) Zachæus. With modest joy this man entertained his wonderful guest (ver. 6), and received from his lips the assurance of his blessed acceptance (ver. 9). As a divine comment on all that was happening, the Lord delivered the weighty parable of 'The Ten Pounds' (ver. 12-27). They were all in expectation that he was on the eve of establishing his visible kingdom as Messiah (ver. 11). They might have learnt from this parabolic lesson, that, as their own recent princes had only gained their thrones after journeys to distant Rome, so they must postpone their hopes of his asserted royalty till his return from 'the far country' (ver. 12), whither their own hatred and rejection of him (ver. 14) were in fact about to send him. After the delivery of this great parable he resumes the same remarkable position at the head of his followers (ver. 28) which had raised before such a mingled emotion of wonder and alarm (Mark x. 32), and thus reaches the temporary rest of Bethany, previous to the accomplishment of the eventful occurrences which will form the subject of our next chapter, six days before his last Passover (John xii. 1).

CHAP. III. OCCURRENCES OF PASSION WEEK.
Introductory events: Friday and Saturday.—With Wieseler (Chronol. Synops. 386-392), we assume Friday, 8th of Nisan (March 31 of A.D. 30, or A.U.C. 783) to have been the day referred to by St. John (xii. 1) as that of our Lord's arrival at Bethany. After quitting the hospitable roof of Zachæus, and traversing the rough road which lay between Jericho and Jerusalem, he would without difficulty complete his journey before the commencement of the Sabbath at six o'clock. This, the last Sabbath of his mortal life, he spent in the retirement of the village where his most devoted friends, Lazarus and his sisters, lived. The grateful family, to do him honour, prepared him 'a supper' (John xii. 2), at the house of a certain Simon, connected probably with them by a close relationship, on whom, as on Lazarus himself, the Lord it would seem had bestowed his mighty power; for from the epithet attached to his name by St. Matthew (xxvi. 6), and St. Mark (xiv. 3), it has been conjectured that he had been recovered of the frightful disease of leprosy. This domestic entertainment is interesting, not only for the presence of Lazarus, whom the late astounding miracle had made a most observed person (John xii. 2, 10), but as eliciting the character of his sisters. Martha 'served,' deeply impressed, no doubt, with the honour of service to one whose greatness she had, on a former occasion, acknowledged to be more than human (John xi. 27); while the thoughtful Mary proved, by a remarkable act, that she had not in vain sat at Jesus' feet. During the meal she approached the triclinium whereon the Lord reclined, and having first anointed his head and then his bare feet with most costly and fragrant unguents which she had prepared (comp. Matt. xxvi. 7 and Mark xiv. 3, with John xii. 3), she proceeded, in token of a still intenser devotion, to wipe his feet with her hair. As on a former not dissimilar occasion (Luke vii. 37-49), so here also, the Lord commended the act in terms of emphatic praise; but in this case he recognised a specially profound faith in Mary. She seemed to be the only one whose intuition of belief embraced with prophetic power the great consummation, which all were so slow to allow, of his approaching sacrifice. While Judas and (sad to say) his fellow-disciples (Matt. xxvi. 8 comp. with John xii. 4) were disingenuously grudging this precious office of love and faith, the Lord bestowed on it one of the most expressive commendations to be met with in the Gospel: 'She hath done what she could,' he said, 'she is come beforehand to anoint my body to the burying' (Mark xiv. 8): and he graciously added the promise of immortality as the guerdon of her love; the pages of the Gospel should be for ever as redolent with the record of that pious deed (ver. 9) as was all the house at that moment with the odour of the ointment (John xii. 3). After the Sabbath, but before the day was past, many from the neighbouring city seem to have been attracted to Bethany by the information that Jesus and Lazarus were both to be seen there (ver. 9). But, true to their old malignity, while the many were displaying a popular attachment, if not an actual faith and adhesion to Christ (ver. 11), the Pharisaic authorities began to renew their efforts to apprehend him, including, in their malevolent purpose, on this occasion, his friend, whose fame the great miracle had indissolubly linked with his own (ver. 10).

Sunday of Passion week; 10th of Nisan (April 2). Owing to his absence from the last year's Passover, and his cautious attendance only at the festivals of Tabernacles and Dedication, much speculation was rife as to the possibility of his further absence from the present feast (John xi. 56). It was, however, known on the morrow after the Sabbath that Jesus would certainly visit Jerusalem. This evoked the grand enthusiasm, of which some symptoms had appeared at Jericho, and which terminated in the Messianic triumph of a public entry into the metropolis amidst the applause of the nation. Not only the country population who had come to the Passover (ὄχλος πολλὸς ὁ ἐλθὼν εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, John xii. 12), but the urban also, whom the resurrection of Lazarus had lately roused (καὶ ὑπήντησεν ὁ ὄχλος, κ. τ. λ., ver. 18), united their loud and cordial Hosannahs to his praise as the Son of David come to his royal heritage. The four evangelists unite in describing the illustrious welcome which Christ received in his progress from Bethany to the capital (Matt. xxi. 1-9; Mark xi. 1-10; Luke xix. 29-35; John xii. 12-15). Moving beyond description was the scene, when, amidst the palm-bearing multitudes, who shouted their pæans of victory, and strawed the way with their garments, in honour of him whom they were conducting as their sincerely accepted Messiah to the city of his royal ancestors, the meek and lowly Saviour, accepting the homage of the moment, but prescient withal of the approaching apostasy and the miseries it would bring, came to the spot, on a ledge of Olivet, where, as travellers say, 'the whole city in an instant bursts into view' (Stanley, Sinai and Pal. [ed. 3], p. 193). The sudden view which met the Redeemer's eye drew tears of profoundest sorrow from him; and as the glory of his transfiguration was shadowed by his cross and death (Luke ix. 31), so this, the twin glory of his triumph, was dimmed with that 'shower of tears wherewith' [as Jeremy Taylor says] 'he wet the palms with a dew sweeter than the moistures upon Mount Hermon or the manna-drops, as he wept over undone Jerusalem in the day of his triumph' (Life of Christ, part iii. sec. 15). And another bitterness mingled itself with this brief joy. We have seen how often the holiest, happiest moments of the Saviour's life were intruded on by the carping Pharisees. Their spite did not spare him now. They urge him to check the rejoicing crowds (Luke xix. 39). But in vain! He, who in Galilee so often repressed the ambition of his followers and their offers to proclaim him king, now accepts all their homage and encourages all their loyal acclamations: 'I tell you, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out!' (ver. 40). He had actually himself initiated this great demonstration; for, on arriving at Bethphage, the suburb or pomerium which stretches away to the eastern basement of the temple (Renan, Vie de Jésus, p. 374, n. 4), he despatched two of his attendants to fetch the fresh and unsullied colt on which he meant to enter the city (Mark xi. 1-7). Every act almost was a deliberate verification of ancient prophecy (comp. Zech. ix. 9 with Matt. xxi. 4), and every hour was bringing him nearer to that death which was the very purpose of his life and mission. So he will check nothing, conceal nothing. The unrepressed excitement which greeted him outside Jerusalem, contagiously spread to the population within the gates. 'All the city was moved, saying, Who is this?' (Matt. xxi. 10). His approach to the temple was welcomed by the Hosannah-chants of little children (comp. Ps. viii. 2), amidst the murmurs of the chief priests and scribes (Matt. xxi. 15, 16), and signalled by his merciful cures upon the blind and the lame, who gathered around him within the sacred precincts (ver. 14). So complete was the sensation which his arrival excited among the varied inhabitants of the capital whom the Passover had collected, that St. John notices it as a memorable fact, that sundry Gentile proselytes humbly and reverentially sought an interview with Jesus by the assistance of the apostles Philip and Andrew (John xii. 20-36). He freely announced his own impending death, and proclaims its universal efficacy for Gentile no less than Jew. In direct allusion also to the mode of his dying, he said: 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (ver. 33). The short address which Christ delivered on this remarkable occasion (which Dr. Stier strikingly couples with the visit of the Magi, as an indication of the interest of the Gentiles in him, at the end of his career, such as that event had betokened at its commencement), was interrupted by a voice of heavenly approbation like that which had greeted him at his baptism and his transfiguration (vers. 28-30). Far otherwise was its reception among the carping bystanders. It spoke of 'light,' as befitted the announcement of blessing to the benighted heathen (comp. Luke ii. 32 and Matt. ii. 2), and of himself as that light. Happy would he be if they would only bask in such a sunshine! But, alas! their minds were blinded by prejudice against so glorious an extension of spiritual blessing. They were for quenching the light. The melancholy record follows: 'These things spake Jesus, and departed and did hide himself from them' (John xii. 36). This statement probably synchronises with Matt. xxi. 17 and Mark xi. 11; if so, our Lord's retreat from the hatred and opposition of the city was to the love and faith of the happy Bethany. Before this remarkable day, the 10th of Nisan, ends, we cannot refrain from noticing the typical provision of the Mosaic law (Exod. xii. 3), which prescribed to the whole 'congregation of Israel' the separation on it of the paschal lamb in readiness for its offering on the 14th. Do we not read, in the events of the day just past, the solemn, though most unconscious consecration, on the part of the universal nation, of him who was so soon to be sacrificed as the true paschal lamb? From an important statement of St. Luke (xxi. 37, 38), it would appear that during the few remaining days of his earthly ministry, the Lord devoted the mornings to public teaching in the temple, eager to embrace every opportunity which the favourable temper of the people allowed him, of impressing their minds with his instruction. The rest of the day seems to have been given to the disciples, with whom he would at eventide retire to Bethany.

Monday, 11th of Nisan (April 3).—When the Lord visited the temple yesterday, he was not so absorbed by the exciting scenes as to be indifferent to the honour of his Father's house. With Messianic dignity he cast a scrutinising look 'round about upon all things' (Mark xi. 11), and took his measures for the morrow. But on his way to the city in the morning, he was attracted by the foliage of one of the fig-trees of Bethphage; and, being hungry no doubt from the long vigil of the night, he approached it in search of fruit. But in vain! The tree, although so precocious in leaves, was fruitless. Fit but sad emblem of the city and nation! He had in an earlier part of his ministry strikingly pictured the unfruitfulness of the people in the parable of the barren fig-tree (Luke xiii. 6-9). The three years' forbearance and the prolonged probation then vouchsafed were now exhausted. The time for judgment was come. The sentence, suspended in the parable some months before, now falls upon the useless tree before him; and in the spirit and power of Messiah—such as he had asserted yesterday when demanding the use of the colt (Matt. xxi. 3), and would again display this very day in the Temple, and yet again on Thursday on requesting the accommodation of the Passover-chamber (Matt. xxvi. 18)—he pronounces the fatal doom, which before to-morrow's sun we shall see accomplished. On his arrival at the Temple, his indignant zeal at the desecration of its holy precincts was kindled, just as it had been at the outset of his ministry three years before (comp. Matt. xxi. 12, etc. with John ii. 14, etc.: on the two cleansings of the Temple, as the opinion of most of the commentators, ancient and modern; see Alford, and especially Meyer, in locis, and Ellicott, Lectures, p. 122, n. 3). The holy Baptist, among Messiah's attributes, symbolised his judicial and reformatory power by making him wield 'a fan in his hand' (Matt. iii. 12). How signal was his display of this authority, when he purged the courts and purlieus of the Temple of these purveyors and their traffic, who in the godless pursuit of their gain had reduced God's house of prayer to the condition of a den of thieves! This is not the first time we have traced in the meek and lowly Saviour the grandeur of a righteous indignation, and the exercise of a sinless though withering vengeance against the hypocrite and the wordling (comp. his many denunciations [passim] against Pharisaism, and his message to Herod Antipas, with his cleansings of the Temple). This moral power, in action, is no less Messianic than his vast prerogative of miraculous agency. But how utterly alien were the minds of even the most educated classes of the Jews from the true view of Messiah is strikingly shewn by the invariable hostility wherewith those classes pursued Christ after every manifestation of his theocratic power. The present instance is no exception. 'The chief priests and the scribes, and the chief of the people, sought to destroy him,' after his expulsion of the traders and his angry rebuke of their sin. It is true they were as yet powerless. The popularity of Jesus still shielded him from the machinations of the few. But St. Luke, to whom we owe this information, mentions in this passage (xix. 47), for the first time, some new allies of the priestly party (οἱ πρῶτοι τοῦ λαοῦ). His words are remarkable and emphatic. We must bear them in mind, for they will afford us some clue to the astonishing ebb of that tide of public favour, which up to this moment and later still sustains the Lord in his great career. The treble combination mentioned by the evangelist avails nothing as yet to arrest Messiah's progress through this wonderful week, 'for all the people hung upon his lips' (ὁ λαὸς γὰρ ἅπας ἐξέκρεματο αὐτοῦ ἀκούων), being exceedingly struck with the mode and matter of his teaching, as St. Mark informs us (ἐξεπλήσθητο ἐν τῇ διδασκίᾳ αὐτοῦ, xi. 18).

Tuesday, 12th of Nisan (April 4).—This unequalled dignity and authority in the subjects and manner of his teaching was another mark of his Messiahship. It had been indeed observed by his hearers from the beginning of his career (Mark i. 22); but is reserved for perhaps its grandest development on the day upon which we are now entering; a day inferior to none of the Saviour's life on earth in interest, not for miraculous display—for not a miracle was wrought—but for the amount, the variety, and the grave solemnity of the instruction which Jesus now vouchsafed, for the last time, to address to the general public. Full of expectation, the people resorted early to the Temple to hear him (Luke xxi. 38). On his way from Bethany, accompanied by his disciples, the astonished Peter calls his attention to the hapless fig-tree, 'dried up from the roots' (Mark xi. 20), under the withering curse of the preceding day. The Lord points to it as an indication of the mighty power of God; let them learn to put their trust in It. This implicit faith, so necessary to them in the future to which they were called, would enable them to remove mountains. Theirs would not be a walk by sight, as the prevalent hopes of an imperial Messiah might erroneously suggest. They would have to commend their cause to God in earnest prayer; only let their prayers, would they have them prevail, be tempered, as he had already taught them on the Mount (Matt. vi. 14, 15), with a forgiving spirit. Prayer from a vindictive heart was a terrible impropriety which God would surely punish. On his arrival at the Temple, he was met by a phalanx of his bitterest foes, who had united their incongruous forces in the vain hope of confounding him with hard and insidious questions. Could they break the spell of his influence with the masses by this public discomfiture, their purpose would be effected and his ruin sure. Their first challenge [By what authority he was effecting those mighty works, the reality of which they could not deny?] he promptly parried, by proposing to them a dilemma about the Baptist and his mission. It was a fair retort. They instantly saw his advantage; and by declining to answer him, they only justified his own refusal to satisfy their irreverent and hostile curiosity. This first assault seems to have had somewhat of an official tone. The Sanhedrim, when in the beginning they sent a deputation to the Baptist to demand an account of his mission (John i. 19), thereby meant to assert their prerogative as triers and conservators of doctrine and spiritual gifts. The same function they now discharge by challenging the Lord's authority. On the former occasion of cleansing the Temple, they demanded of him a sign, or miracle, in attestation of his mission (John ii. 18). The insincerity of that demand they prove by now ignoring the wonders he had in the meantime wrought, and requesting a fresh voucher. As in the other instance, so in this, Jesus meets their demand with an authoritative rejoinder in the shape of three weighty parables, that of The Two Sons (Matt. xxi. 28-32); of The Wicked Husbandmen (Matt. xxi.; Mark xii.; Luke xx.); and of The Marriage of the King's Son (Matt. xxii. 1-14). In these we have a cætena of solemn protest and warning, in which the Lord exposes the failure of the Pharisaic party to profit from the labours, first of John the Baptist and then of himself. With all their sanctimonious pretensions of fealty to God, they were in fact forfeiting (like the second son) the blessings of his kingdom to 'the publicans and the harlots,' those objects of their proud contempt (symbolised by the first of the sons) whose simple faith was leading them to the heritage which the Lord of the vineyard would take from them. Like the husbandmen of the second parable, they were consummating the reprobation of their ancestors, who had slain God's servants the prophets, by now compassing the death of his Son and heir. The vineyard of their church and nation would soon be judicially taken from them and transferred to other races, whom they indeed had superciliously cursed, but whom

God would surely choose. The same stern truth is taught in the third of these parables, in which the graciousness of the provision which the King of Heaven had made for his subjects is conspicuously illustrated; while their rebelliousness is visited with the burning up of their guilty city, and the offer of their blessings to wayfarers and strangers, who would gladly accept and cherish the gifts which they had slighted and abused. Overpowering was the effect of these parabolic discourses, the second of which, delivered with an unmistakeable point, which converted parable into plain rebuke, so incensed the chief priests and the scribes, that nothing but their paramount dread of a rescue by the yet unestranged multitude deterred them from the immediate apprehension (ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ, Luke xx. 19) of Jesus. Foiled in their united effort, they separate their forces and renew their attempts to embarrass the Lord by dangerous and captious questions. One of the most remarkable proofs of the intense hatred of all parties towards the holy Saviour occurs in the violent incongruity of the alliances which men formed to effect their deadly object. On the present occasion the Pharisees were content to make common cause with opponents, whose hostility on ordinary questions of political and theological interest was implacable. In their first attack they joined the Herodians in proposing the famous dilemma about tribute to Cæsar (Matt. xxii.; Mark xii.; Luke xx.) This was followed by the less perilous but equally insidious inquiry about the sevenfold widow and the resurrection. The Lord's answers were as unvasive and full to the point as they were wise and suggestive of principles of eternal interest; the first settles with delicate precision the compatibility of political and religious duty, and the second reconciles, on intelligible and simple grounds, the necessary discrepancy of social existence in the earthly and the heavenly states.* The Pharisees, undeterred by their first repulse, return to the charge. This time they selected one of their most able scribes to confront the Saviour (comp. Matt. xxii. 34 with Mark xii. 28). To his question about the great commandment of the law, the Lord returned an exhaustive answer, which extorted even from his dialectic assailant an exclamation of approving surprise. The effect of Christ's replies was to silence his foes, one after the other, amidst the astonishment and delight of the listening crowds. The humiliation of his assailants was still further increased by their utter inability to meet him, when he retorted on them the profound but (considering their pretensions of knowledge) not unreasonable question respecting the Son and Lord of David. The Lord's victory was complete over every opponent and at every stage of these discussions. Nothing is more emphatic in the gospels, than the statement, again and again repeated in the history of this great day, of the silence to which Christ reduced his adversaries (comp. Matt. xxi. 27; xxii. 22, 46; Mark xi. 33;

xii. 12, 34; Luke xx. 7, 26, 40). Having thus stilled them, the Lord proceeds, in a final attempt to convince and win them to conversion, to deliver that most solemn of his addresses which St. Matthew has preserved in his 23d chapter. Free from passion (vers. 2, 3), but full of love, he begins by warning his disciples (Luke xx. 45) and the well-affected multitude (Matt. xxiii. 1) against the hypocritical teachers, who had misled them by perverting the doctrines of Moses. Then in words of righteous but withering indignation he goes on to condemn the fatal casuistry of these scribes, who were closing the kingdom of heaven against others and themselves. They were worse than their fathers, whose guilt they were fast consummating, so that upon that reprobate generation must burst the storm of vengeance which had long been gathering. And all this was in spite of his dear love which had so often yearned over the children of Jerusalem in vain! (see the tender expostulation over the city, which he had uttered first in Peræa and repeated here and now, in Matt. xxiii. 37-39). SS. Mark (xii.) and Luke (xvi.) mention one affecting incident, which gives point to the Lord's burning censures. Foremost amongst these he had placed the extortion of the false teachers, who (not unlike the Sophists of Athens) doubled their sin by first poisoning knowledge and then vending the noxious doses at high prices. They enriched themselves by devouring widows' houses and robbing the poor and simple. One of these victims of their rapacity was observed by Jesus humbly offering at the Temple-treasury the scanty remains of her living at the call of unaffected piety. The Lord bestowed his commendation on the widow's mite as the sign of a higher sacrifice, given in her penury, than the copious offerings of the affluent, who felt not the want of their costlier gifts. And now this great day of teaching drew near its end, but not its sacred instructions. For as Jesus was taking his leave of the Temple his disciples remarked on the beauty of its structure and materials. He answered their admiration by prophesying the complete overthrow of the splendid fabric. After pensively traversing their way, Peter and his brother and the two sons of Zebedee, availing themselves of a halt on the Mount of Olives, where the Lord turned another look towards the Temple, anxiously desired an explanation of the mournful prophecy. Their inquiry afforded Jesus a ready opportunity of discoursing on two events fraught with profoundest interest to them, as Jews and as men—the end of the Jewish polity and the end of the world. After what Lord Bacon calls the germinant way of prophecy, which often ignores chronological sequence and springs from a crisis to its analogue, Christ on this momentous occasion, in the long foreview of his prophetic intuition, couples together the two analogous events, the fate of Jerusalem and the final judgment, from which he wishes his immediate audience, and after them his church, throughout all generations, to learn the lessons of vigilance and endurance and preparation, under many trials on earth, waiting for the coming of the Son of Man. He enforces his injunctions of watchfulness and patient discharge of duty by the solemn parables of the Ten Virgins and the Talents; and winds up the instructions of this most memorable day by a revelation, such as he alone could make, of the scenes and processes of the last judgment (Matt. xxv. 31-46).

Wednesday, 13th of Nisan (April 5).—This, the perfect contrast of yesterday, was a day of no excitement and but little incident. In its quietness, however, was planned the treachery which brought about the death of Jesus. The Lord seems to have spent the whole of this, his last day of freedom, in the retirement of Bethany or on the slopes of Olivet. By some the supper of Simon the leper, which we have assigned to the preceding Saturday, is supposed to have taken place to-day. Its sequence in the narrative of SS. Matthew and Mark is the only ground (and it is a most inconclusive one) for the conjecture. More consistent with probability is the view of those who think that Holy Scripture now removes the Saviour from the gaze of men, and throws a veil over him as he approaches death. In the profound causes of that death, in the endurance of it, and in its momentous issues, what room for meditation and prayer, and what need of communion with his heavenly Father! Whether his disciples, whom 'he loved to the end,' were the sharers of his thoughts—or whether he spent these precious hours in absolute solitude—we are not informed. One at least avoided his presence during a part of the day. The Sanhedrim, as we have seen, had long been seeking some means of apprehending Jesus. Though thwarted hitherto by the favour of the people, they were still bent on their malignant purpose, and were met to-day for consultation at the house of Caiaphas, the high-priest. To this body did the traitor Judas, one of the twelve, now go—probably in the afternoon—and offer his miserable services. This unexpected aid put them in higher hope than they had yet dared to entertain of the speedy accomplishment of their wishes. Two of the evangelists expressly mention their joy (Mark xiv. 11; Luke xxii. 12). They gratify the cupidity of their new accomplice with the paltry sum, which Moses appointed for the life of a servant or slave (Matt. xxvi. 15, comp. with Exod. xxi. 32). We have sometimes called attention to the accomplishment of prophecy in this history of our Lord. Not the least remarkable of these prophetic coincidences is connected with this fee of treachery (see Zech. xi. 12, 13, and Matt. xxvii. 9, 10). The bargain thus made in privacy was to be carried out as quietly as possible. The fear of the populace still haunted the rulers, who were laying their plans for the secret death of Christ. This, however, would not accord with the appointment of prophecy, nor with the intimations which the Lord had himself occasionally dropped about the great event. So recently as this very morning he had distinctly said to his appalled disciples, 'Ye know that after two days is the passover, and the Son of Man is betrayed to be crucified' (Matt. xxvi. 1). The death of the cross, therefore, and that of course by public sentence and execution, awaits the Saviour; although such a design (and still more the attainment of it) is, even so late as the present time, far from the thoughts of his bitterest foes. The active counsels of the Pharisaic party, however, as we have said, had received a great impulse to-day from the unexpected adhesion of one of the apostles. They accordingly laid their plans for tampering with the populace, and they found effective helpers in those 'chiefs of the people,' whom we have already observed closely leagued with the malignants. With what success their efforts were crowned we shall soon discover. Jesus, who is now a free man, will be by to-morrow night a prisoner in the house of the high-priest, awaiting death.

Thursday, 14th of Nisan (April 6).—The greater portion of this, like the whole of the previous day, was spent in private, either at Bethany or some other part of the Mount of Olives. The proceedings of the Sanhedrim, no less than the actions of our Lord, are again veiled in obscurity. Never did history fail in her record at a more momentous period than at this great crisis, when the powers of darkness were successfully engaged in their fatal activity to accomplish the Saviour's death. How profoundly sacred were the meditations of Jesus, and how intensely malignant were the labours of his enemies, which this veil of history shrouds from view, we may in some degree gather from the nature of the case and from the events which are revealed to us, on either side, on the resumption of the narrative. Among the many astonishing occurrences which make this week the most wonderful in all history, not the least remarkable is the conduct of 'the people' towards our Lord. And now while the faction which rules at Jerusalem is so engrossed in detaching the multitude from their lingering devotion to Christ, let us bestow a moment's reflection, in passing, on the probable cause of that revolution in the public sentiment which enabled the Sanhedrim to effect their deadly object. From the capricious qualities of a crowd, which shrewd observers of mankind have so often noticed (comp. Eurip. Orest. 1157; Cicero, pro Planc. iv.; Virgil, Æn. ii. 39 ['incertum vulgus']; Horat. Od. ii. 16. 40 ['malignum vulgus']; Od. i. 35. 25 ['infidum']; Shakespere, Coriolanus, i. 1), the Jewish populace was certainly not exempt. Nowhere could one find a more vivid portraiture of popular inconsistency than in the accounts which the evangelists give us of the change in the shouts of the multitude in the streets of Jerusalem, from the 'Hosannas' of Palm Sunday to the 'Away with him, crucify him' of the following Friday. Other examples are given us by St. Luke (Acts xiv. 11-19; xix. 32, 39g.; xxviii. 4-6), but they are faint illustrations indeed of the vast and fatal inconsistency of which we are writing. Startling, however, as it was, we have not far to go for the reason of the change.

Intense was the popular craving to exchange the Roman yoke for a native monarch who should restore the line of their glorious David; and in spite of the Lord's studied efforts to check all political demonstrations in his favour, the great works of mercy, which he designed to instigate only spiritual adhesion to him, suggested to the wonder-stricken crowds which saw them the conclusion, that the Wonder-worker himself could be none else than the very Messiah, the restorer of their ancient kingdom. In vain did Jesus seek every opportunity of discouraging and reproving this mere worldly expectation. His very apostles were full of it to the last. How bitter then was the disappointment of all men, when, instead of displaying the insignia of a revolutionary enterprise to which their Hosannas were intended, on the first day of the week, to invite him, he gradually withdrew himself from all intercourse and apparent sympathy with the people. Disappointment, as is natural, begat a reaction of dislike and a desire of revenge. The higher classes, whom the Lord's severe strictures had within the last day or two exasperated more keenly than ever, saw the change, and instantly embraced it by the help of the popular leaders whom they had already on their side. In this somewhat speedy collapse of their Messianic hopes may we then trace the cause of the defection of the populace from the side of Christ, stimulated as it was by the artful misrepresentations of their subtle guides, who were too well practised in hypocrisy to be at a loss for means of converting a popular disappointment into a strong antipathy. What particular shape their persuasion took we shall have another opportunity of seeing. We need only here remark, that in the face of these considerations we shall feel no astonishment, when to-morrow we find Jesus, whom any attempt to injure would four days ago have brought thousands to his rescue, led out to execution amid the execrations of a hostile multitude. To-day he is still at rest, probably in the company of his beloved disciples. In answer to their natural inquiry—where they should prepare for him the passover?—he, towards the end of the present day, dispatches Peter and John to a certain house within the city, where, as he had foretold, a ready welcome awaited the entire party for the purpose of their commemoration. Before, however, they had begun their sacred festival, the comparatively uneventful Thursday, in its civil sense, was ended, and that day had begun its legal course, which is in its issues immeasurably the greatest of all days.

Friday 15th of Nisan (April 7), first portion, or Thursday evening and night.—It will more accord with the usual treatment of this part of the sacred history, if we divide the 15th of Nisan into its natural sections of (1) Thursday evening and night, and (2) Friday. It is some indication of the importance of this day's events, that hardly one of them is unencumbered with much discussion and contrariety of opinion. Were our space much longer than it is, it would be too brief to admit of any controversial matter. This we therefore forego, and content ourselves with registering such results as seem to us to approach most nearly to verisimilitude. Following the express statements of SS. Matthew (xxvi. 17), Mark (xiv. 12), and Luke (xxii. 7), with which the apparently discrepant narrative of St. John does not in fact disagree (see the arguments succinctly given by Dr. Robinson in the Bibliotheca Sacra of Aug. 1845, pp. 405-436; and with still greater brevity, in the Tract Society's edition of his Harmony, pp. 145-151; while a convenient statement of the opposite view may be seen in Bishop Ellicott's Lectures, pp. 322, 323, notes; and Neander's Life of Jesus Christ [Bohn], pp. 425-427, note), we find, as might a priori be expected of him, who in his holy mission was careful 'to fulfil all righteousness,' that Jesus, according to the prescription of the law (Exod. xii. 1), proceeded this evening to eat with his disciples the paschal meal which had been duly prepared in the afternoon of Thursday by Peter and John (Luke xxii. 8). Fit conclusion was this to his loving intercourse with them; and the celebration gave him an especial joy, as gratifying the most earnest desire which he had of ending his ministry with the holiest of the festivals of the ancient church, into which he was now to infuse a sacred transforming power, whence a new feast was to arise, the memorial of his death, which should become the blessed means of union and strength to his future people (Luke xxii. 15). But not unsullied was his joy. In that extreme infatuation which blinded the eyes of the disciples against the fast approaching humiliation of their Master, and which on the very threshold of his deepest sorrow made them dream of earthly greatness and glory, they were no sooner seated at the supper than they began an unseemly strife 'which of them should be accounted the greatest' (ver. 24). Jesus gently deprecates that ambition, so unfit in the followers of him who came not to be ministered unto, but had ever been amongst them 'as one that serveth.' And, the more emphatically to recommend the meekness of such a character, he, with deliberate earnestness, proceeded to wash the feet of each of them in succession. It was the office of a menial; but, as Christ performed it, it rather enhanced than compromised the inherent dignity of his exalted character, and drew from all the company, and even from the impetuous Peter, who at first protested against the act as a needless humiliation, acquiescence and profound respect. The paschal supper was still going on (the δελτου γενομένου of John xiii. 2 should rather be, when supper had begun, than had ended, as A. V. has it; the reading of B, and other MSS., including C, prima manu, and the newly discovered Δ [δελτου γενομένου], still more clearly shews our version to be improbable), when Jesus with troubled spirit indicates in a few solemn and emphatic words his certain knowledge of the foul treachery which was lurking in the heart of one of his companions and was soon to be displayed in the betrayal of himself to his enemies. This perfidious requital of his love, which was not unmarked in prophecy (Ps. xli. 9; lv. 12-14), was one of the bitterest ingredients of his cup of sorrow, and the announcement of it now filled the disciples with sad and anxious fears. Each felt the anguish of a momentary distrust of even his own fidelity, and with deep emotion asked, 'Lord, is it I?' Nor did the conscious one himself relieve their doubt by any apparent embarrassment. It is impossible to tell what was passing in his heart at this moment of severe trial. Was he by this time utterly estranged from his good and loving Master, or was he even yet reclaimable by the merciful and gentle warnings, which the Lord obviously addressed to him to the very last? On the answer to this question depends the traitor's meaning in repeating the inquiry of the rest, 'Master, is it I?' It might have been the effect of an irrepressible awe, which made him involuntarily re-echo the anxiety of his fellows. It might have been a mere blind to hide himself withal from observation. It might have been the insolence of bravado. Be, however, the fact what it may, the fatal moment of his apostasy is at hand. The Lord, with no ungracious intent (for to give a ψωμιον at an Eastern repast was a mark of affectionate friendship; see Wordsworth and Alford, on John xiii. 26), handed to him a fragment of the paschal viands. The kindness was lost upon his faithless heart, which vacillates no longer. 'After the sop, Satan entered into him' (John xiii. 27). He quits the sacred presence with a few words from the Saviour. His departure seems to have relieved the soul of Jesus of an oppressive weight; 'Now is the Son of Man glorified,' he exclaims, 'and God is glorified in him' (ver. 31). The paschal supper terminates; and at its third cup (the cup of blessing; comp. 1 Cor. x

16) the Lord proceeds to engraft upon it the eucharistic feast of the gospel, the oldest and the highest of Christian institutions, which will only cease to be a blessing to faithful souls when the Lord shall come himself to supersede it to them by his own eternal presence. St. John is silent on this act of Christ in ordaining his holy supper. But the great apostle of the Gentiles (see 1 Cor. xi. 23-25) supplies his place, and unites with the other three evangelists in a beautiful history of an event, in which the Gentile no less than the Jewish believer has an indefeasible interest. A few melancholy words are first uttered by Christ on the desertion and dispersion of those around him, when the near-approaching hour of danger should come; and then, when the self-confident Peter, as usual, interrupts him with his vain protest, the Lord announces to him that his desertion will be especially deliberate and repeated; but he graciously added, 'Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat—but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not.' The tenderness of this expostulation, which St. Luke alone records (xxii. 31), must afterwards have gone home to the heart of the fallen apostle, and with that loving 'look' of sorrowful rebuke, which again St. Luke is the only one to mention (xxii. 61), must have gone far to work that repentance in him which ultimately restored him to the Saviour's side and cause. (We may thus regard the third evangelist as the historian of Peter's contrition, in its causes no less than its fact.) Of all painful communications Christ has now unburdened his mind, and he is free to take his farewell of them in words which breathe only of love and heavenly comfort. Who, in limits far more spacious even than ours in this sketch, can hope to express the sublime instruction, prayer, and consolation, which now flowed from the mouth of the holy Saviour? In the long section which intervenes between the latter part of his chap. xiii. and the close of chap. xvii. the beloved disciple has been permitted to record for the church's eternal consolation the profound secrets of his dear Lord's wise and loving heart. Olshausen (Commentary [Clark's ed.], vol. iv. p. 47) well calls this portion of the evangelical history 'its holy of holies, the view into which our Evangelist, like a consecrated priest, alone opens to us.' Jesus sounds at the very first the key-note of his address. 'Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me.' And he goes on to shew them how intimate, how inseparable, was his relation to the Father; in this close union lay all their security as believers in him. If he had spoken of leaving them, let them be assured that his necessary absence would be more than compensated for by the abiding presence and indwelling of another Comforter, who would faithfully represent Him to them; teach them more than they could then know of him; replenish their memories with all his past instructions; strengthen them for trials, and give them the victory over them all. This Comforter would guide them into all truth and impart to them his spirit and disposition. Possessing that, let them love one another; and he adduces the eternal and indissoluble oneness of the Almighty Father and himself as the groundwork and the model of that union which his people should have among themselves and with him. These sublime instructions, which for their better recollection of them he repeats in various forms, by simile (as that of the

Vine and the Branches [chap. xv.]) no less than precept—he ends with a solemn intercessory prayer for himself and his much loved ones, whom he was leaving—'I am no more in the world, but these are. I am coming to thee. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are.' And that this prayer might never fail in interest to the church, it embraces in its sacred scope the latest converts to a discipleship with Christ; 'Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee.' How profound was the impression made by this address and supplication of the Lord on the minds of those who were privileged to hear them we may gather from him who survived all the rest. He was spared to a ripe old age; but he never failed to address his audience to the very last in the very echoes of Christ's own sweet words, 'Little children' (comp. the Lord's teknia, John xiii. 13, with the venerable apostle's own use, no less than seven times in his epistles, of the same endearing appellation), and 'Love one another.' At the conclusion of the Lord's intercessory supplication, the little company, who had some time before risen to depart (John xiv. 31), having chanted the conclusion of their sacred Hallel, quitted their chamber, and Jesus led the way through the city-gate (probably that now called St. Stephen's) over the brook Cedron, where his great progenitor David, 1000 years before, in bitterness of spirit, had passed flying from persecution and treachery (Burgon on John xviii. 1). Knowing that his hour at last is come, he will not flee from his enemies. He accordingly betakes himself to the garden of Gethsemane, a favourite haunt, as it would seem (ver. 2), the shades of which he had no doubt often consecrated by prayer and holy converse with his disciples. In company with them he enters it (John xviii. 1) under the light of the full moon, which fails, however, to illuminate the deeper recesses into which the Lord penetrates with Peter, James, and John (Matt. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33). These, it will be remembered, were his companions at the Transfiguration; but as then they were oppressed with sleep, amid the effulgent glories of the heavenly scene (Luke ix. 32); so now, when their Master and Friend is bearing the agonies of an amazing sorrow 'even unto death'—(What words are equal to describe the magnitude of the sufferings of Gethsemane? We will not attempt to find any! But we will point to the expressive words of St. Mark, who is always graphic on great occasions: ἤρξατο ἐκδαμνείσθαι καὶ ἀδμονεῖν, xiv. 33; and of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, θεήσεις τε καὶ ἰκετηρίας . . . μετὰ κραυγῆς ἰσχυρᾶς καὶ δακρύων προσετέρας, v. 7, as some indication of the anguish of this night of sorrow, unequalled by any other incident of his passion, but the consummation itself of Calvary)—a like heaviness, though caused by sorrow, as St. Luke is careful to inform us (xxii. 45), removed them from the sight of that mystery of suffering. Deeper and deeper still were the abysses of his grief: 'His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground' (ver. 44); the prince of darkness, whom we saw retreat before his steadfastness at the beginning of his ministry (ἀρχαὶ καὶ ποῦ, Luke iv. 13), returns now to his last and most dreadful assault, no longer with blandish

ments, but with all the force of a rough unsparing hatred. Was the first gush of woe in Gethsemane stronger than the last? or was it that he, who 'learned obedience by the things which he suffered and became perfect' (Heb. v. 8, 9), grew, angel-helped, as St. Luke tells us he was (xxii. 43), more patient even by endurance? For it is a feature in the grandeur of the Redeemer's conflict, that whereas he at first entreated the Father to take away the cup from him if possible, his second prayer modifies that request,* acknowledging its impossibility; while in terms of a most absolute resignation he submits to its bitterest draught: 'O my Father, since this cup cannot pass away from me without my drinking it, thy will be done' (εἰ οὐ δύναται τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον παρελθεῖν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, ἐάν μὴ αὐτὸ πῶ, κ. τ. λ., Matt. xxvi. 42, comp. with ver. 39). The more intense his suffering, the more earnest grew his prayer of meek submission! Human as he was, he affectingly asks of his companions their help and sympathy. But however willing in their loving hearts (Matt. xxvi. 41; Mark xiv. 38), they were unable to render him even this scanty consolation. The most forward of them failed in the hour of need: 'Simon, sleepest thou?' More than once did he gently rebuke them—so gently, that his very gentleness, no less than their own consciousness of neglect, deprived them of all excuse, except that which he was pleased so graciously to find for them; 'they wist not what to answer him' (Mark xiv. 40). In their weakness, which stands as a fool in the sacred narrative, we have a touching contrast to the strong will and calm spirit with which he rose superior to the terrible conflict. The victory of his soul was gained; his will lost its last natural inclination to shrink from suffering; but the scene closes upon the still sleeping disciples. Without resentment at even a third disappointment, he says to them at last in words, which Neander has perhaps best interpreted (Life of Jesus [Iohn], p. 453): 'Sleep on; I will rouse you no more to watch and pray with me; but your rest shall be rudely disturbed; for, behold, the hour of my suffering is at hand. Already my captors are near.' The happy effect of his self-conquest in the fearful struggle of Gethsemane appears in all the sequel of his passion. At every step from the garden to the cross what trials await him! But from none does he for an instant shrink. With the full volition of his soul, he offers himself to meet them all—the pain, the shame, the scorn, the loss' (Christian Year, 10th Sunday after Trinity). The traitor, who had gone from the Paschal chamber straight to the chief priests and Pharisees, conducts a troop of the Temple police, who were aided by a picket of military from the garrison of Antonia, and furnished with every appliance of defence and search—'lanterns and torches,' in case of concealment among the darker

* St. Luke refers to the second prayer as offered ἀκτενέστερον [more earnestly]; not, however, as more urgently supplicating for the removal of the cup; but more vehemently struggling for the victory of submission in his agony. Christ knew that the Father 'always heard him' (John xi. 42). He therefore understands the not passing away of his anguish as the granting in fact of his last petition ['as Thou wilt']; as the indication of the divine will that he should drink the cup. Stier, Words of the L. J. [Clark], vii. 256.

recesses of the garden, 'and weapons,' in case of an attempt at rescue (John xviii. 3). The extent of these precautions gives evidence of the fears of the Sanhedrim lest after all they should miss their victim. But they little knew what had passed in the sufferer's heart, while they had been making all their preparation of arrest! The discipline of the agony had rendered that preparation completely useless! Jesus, instead of resisting, went forth to meet the troop on their approach to the garden. Useless too was the miserable formality of the traitor, who must needs give the kiss, the concerted signal of his treachery! But all was in vain! Though Jesus offered himself to their grasp, such was his majesty and moral dignity, even in weakness, that the entire party who had advanced to seize him involuntarily reeled back and fell to the ground. He presents himself again to them, after they had come to themselves, and gave an additional proof of his voluntary surrender by stipulating for the dismissal and safety of his friends who had sworn to defend him to the last: 'If ye seek me, let these go their way' (John xviii. 8). But the traitor's kiss incensed his old companions. They asked permission to avenge it with the sword (Luke xxii. 49), and Peter actually dealt what was within a little of a deadly blow at the forehead of the arresting party. This mistimed zeal drew forth another proof of the Lord's willingness to surrender himself to the appointment of God. His recent agony and self-conquest are uppermost in his mind: 'The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?' (John xviii. 11). He puts forth for the last time a sign of his miraculous power, by healing the ear of the maimed Malchus; meekly submits to the armed troop with an expression of surprise at the magnitude of their preparation; and when the arrest is completed, he has an augmentation of his sorrow in the cowardice of his disciples, 'who all forsook him and fled' (Matt. xxvi. 56; Mark xiv. 50). And now he enters once more 'the holy city,' which is so soon to cover itself with the guilt of his rejection, no longer with the Hosannas of an admiring people, but a prisoner strictly guarded, as if a robber,* unhelped by the sympathy of the multitudes whom his capture had brought together, even at that early hour (Matt. xxvi. 55). We shall not attempt to narrate the series of examinations through which he was dragged by Jew and Gentile—from Annas to Caiaphas; from Caiaphas to Pilate; from Pilate to Herod; from Herod back again to Pilate. The misery, however, and humiliation of these processes of injustice, probably brought less pain to the heart of the sufferer than the base conduct of his foremost friend and follower. After his fit or unseasonable courage in Gethsemane, Simon Peter joined his brother apostles in their ignominious flight. In company, however, with one of them, and under the cover of the night, he found his way to the house of the high-priest, and in the hurry gained admission into the outer court. He was soon recognised; among others by a kinsman of the man whom he had wounded in the garden. Three times was he charged with a complicity with the prisoner. Three times did he deny his gracious master, accompanying his third denial with curses and oaths. So loud were his protestations as to catch the ear of Jesus, whom they were perhaps leading across the quadrangle at the moment: 'The Lord turned and looked upon Peter' (Luke xxii. 61). The pity and loving correction of that reproving glance, added to the crowing at that instant of a cock, which Christ had only the evening before associated with his grievous fall, roused the unhappy man to a consciousness of his shameful ingratitude. He quitted the scene and wept bitterly. We are not told whether he ventured in openly again during the awful events which followed, but that his penitential tears washed the sin from the Saviour's memory may well be gathered from the merciful signs of reconciliation which he took the earliest opportunity of evincing after his resurrection (among these signs the angel's message is remarkable, Mark xvi. 7).

Friday, 15th of Nisan (April 7). Second portion, or Friday proper.—The evening which had begun with the Paschal celebration, and the night with the agony of Gethsemane—were both terminated. The daybreak of Friday opens (probably at about two o'clock A.M.) on another event, which had grown out of the occurrences of this night of malevolent activity. No sooner was Jesus captured than the Sanhedrim were convened. After some delay (perhaps of an hour), during which Annas the ex-high-priest, a man of influence in the council, had the charge of the captive, the members met at the house of this man's son-in-law, Caiaphas, who was the high-priest this year, and took a leading part in the Saviour's condemnation. It was before this court of Caiaphas that the most deliberate proceedings against Jesus were taken. Much has been written both by Jewish and by Christian writers in vindication of the Sanhedrim. The former (like Mon. Salvador, in his Histoire des Institutions de Moïse, iv. 3, writing on 'the trial and condemnation of Jesus') claim for the council the merit of an honourable and conscientious examination of the entire case, and by a regular routine of law. The latter (like Mr. Wilson in his valuable Illustration of the Method of explaining the N. T.), while repudiating the action of the Jewish tribunal, which is so satisfactory to writers of that nation, admit 'the regularity of the proceedings before Caiaphas, the earnest manner of the high-priest, and the promptitude and unanimity of the whole court, as bearing as strong marks of sincerity as can accompany any public act whatever' (Wilson, p. 79). Sincere they may no doubt have been, and consistent in their hostility to the Saviour: nor do we deny that the seven occasions (John v. 18; vi. 42; viii. 59; x. 31 and 39; Matt. ix. 3; Mark xiv. 64) adduced by Mr. Wilson do furnish an unhappy clue of fatal consistency in the conduct of the Pharisaic party towards the Redeemer. But no admission of this kind can in anywise amount to a justification of the Sanhedrim. Their sincerity was that of malignants; their consistency that of men to whom the death of their victim was a foregone conclusion (Matt. xxvi. 4; Mark xiv. 2), an end to be accomplished by any means—by regular process if possible; but if not, by violence or assassination rather than not at all. Nothing is more evident to the reader of the Gospels than the prejudice of the priests and scribes, whose influence among the people was endangered by the works and words of Jesus. This danger gave them an interest in removing the great teacher out of the way. It also rendered them incapable of judging equitably of his character and claims. The grounds of this incapacity the Lord himself had often pointed out to them; he perceived their inability to be a moral one, founded on their interested malevolence; and as such it was an immorality, a guilt worthy of the condemnation he passed upon it. Such being the disposition of the Lord's judges, who were also his determined foes, it is no wonder if their proceedings against him, when they had him at last in their power, were characterised by a violent and unseemly haste (as if they felt that no time was to be lost, lest their victim should somehow escape, if they lingered), and a disregard of law and justice, when injustice presented to them a shorter way to the accomplishment of their fatal purpose. Mon. Salvador's first assumption (which, however, he only reproduces from Maimonides and other doctors of his nation) of the infallible competency of the Sanhedrim to pronounce on the claims of Jesus, is a paradox which the reader may find refuted in Dr. M'Caul's Lectures on the Prophecies, Lect. i.; while his argument in defence of the decency and regularity of the Council at the trial is shewn to be plainly untenable by Mon. Dupin in his tract entitled Jésus devant Caïphe et Pilate (in Migne's Démonstrations Evang., xvi. 727-754), translated in Greenleaf's Test. of the Evangelists, pp. 531-568. It is enough for us to remark, on the whole transaction of this trial before the high-priest, that, if we carefully regard the primary features of it; such as the unseasonable period of the trial (at night, and during a sacred feast); the lax and undecided way in which they drew up their indictment (first on the lower ground of constructive blasphemy against the Temple, etc., and, when that collapsed through the palpable perjury of their witnesses, shifting their charge to the higher offence against the Divine Being); and their resorting, when all other means failed, to their old method of 'entangling the Lord in his talk,' by compelling him, under an irresistible adjuration (Matt. xxvi. 63), to give that answer to a dangerous question,* which they unanimously made the occasion of an immediate condemnation—we cannot but denounce the entire proceedings as most hostile to justice, and alien from the spirit of even the Jewish law. Nor is this verdict at all modified in our minds, when we contemplate some of the secondary facts; for instance, the barbarous treatment which the Sanhedrim permitted their prisoner to receive, apparently in open court—certainly while under their protection—the blow on the face by one of the officers, before the sentence (John xviii. 22); and, after the condemna-

* This question was dangerous to the accused, inasmuch as it demanded an answer from Jesus which would itself be construed into the capital offence charged against him—but it was more than dangerous to the accused. It was disingenuous, nay dishonest, in Caiaphas to put a question which predicated Divinity of the Messiah: 'Art thou the Christ, the son of the Blessed?' [Mark xiv. 61; 'the son of God?' Matt. xxvi. 63]; when, in the view of himself and of the nation in general, this divine character of the Christ was not believed (Wilson, Illustr. of N. T., pp. 68-76).

tion, the blindfolding, the spitting in his face, the buffeting and the blows with the palms of the hand (Luke xxii. 64; Matt. xxvi. 67). The formality of Caiaphas too, in rending his garments, in which some writers have seen an evidence of the man's unfeigned surprise and horror at the Lord's answer (see Wilson, on the N. T., p. 79, and Bp. Ellicott, Lectures, p. 337), is quite as reasonably by others regarded as an indication of indecent violence meant to produce an abhorrence of the accused in the bystanders, especially in the public whose favour the Jewish authorities were using every method of detaching from the Saviour. It is worth while to observe, in reference to the point of law and order in the proceedings of the Council, that Caiaphas' extravagant act of rending his garments seems to have been plainly illegal. (See Lev. xxi. 10 compared with the remarkable prohibition to Aaron and Eleazar in Lev. x. 6; also Baronius, Annales Eccles. [on year 34], vol. i. p. 196; and I. Q. Hedeni, Scissio Vestium Hebr. [Ugolini, Thes. xxix. 1046]). After the sentence, and the gratification of their shameless brutality, the Sanhedrim hand over their victim, bound, to the Roman governor, Pontius Pilate, whose official residence was either in the fortress of Antonia (Ewald, Christus, p. 12), or, more probably in Herod's palace (Ellicott, p. 339). This transfer seems to have been the result of a second deliberation of the Council, which met for the purpose, probably at about five or six o'clock in the morning (Matt. xxvii. 1; John xviii. 28—but these notes of time are not very distinct. With Robinson [Harm., p. 168], we have assumed St. Luke [xxii. 66] to refer to the commencement of the first meeting which terminated in the Lord's condemnation). At this second meeting they agreed on a report to the governor, on the strength of which they flattered themselves that he would at once order the execution of their sentence. But with the instinct of a Roman, to whom the administration of law was at once a congenial procedure and a mark of sovereignty, Pilate undertook to examine the accused himself. He was the more inclined to take this course, because he doubted the sincerity of the prosecutors, and felt assured that 'envy' was at the bottom of their proceedings (Matt. xxvii. 18; Mark xv. 10). The Sanhedrim well deserved this suspicion of the governor, who had, no doubt, heard of the result of the trial before Caiaphas, and was aware of the real accusation which they had prepared against Jesus. It was not therefore without surprise, and probably disgust, that he now finds them shifting their ground, and accusing the prisoner of sedition and treason—'We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar' (Luke xxiii. 2). Pilate had no difficulty in detecting the hollowness of this charge, which was expressly contrary to a remarkable statement which Christ had very publicly made so recently as on the Tuesday of this week, when, in the great Temple discussions, he counselled the Pharisees to 'render to Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's' (Luke xx. 25). He therefore acquits Jesus of this foul charge, and, to escape from the importunity of the chief priests, avails himself of the circumstance—which came out in the proceedings—that Jesus 'belonged to Herod's jurisdiction' (xxiii. 7), to ask the assistance of the tetrarch of Galilee, who happened to be in the city, in the decision of the case. Herod had long felt an irreverent curiosity to see the Man whose miracles had produced so great a sensation in the north, and accepts the office. He was not without hope that his prisoner would not refuse to win his release by the performance of some mighty wonder. Vain man! All his idle inquiries and solicitations the Lord met with the dignified rebuke of an absolute silence. Thwarted and irritated, 'Herod with his men of war set Jesus at nought, and mocked him, and having arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, sent him again to Pilate' (Luke xxiii. 11). The prisoner's return was nothing short of a calamity to the arrogant but irresolute Roman. It plunged him into a fearful contest with the Jewish populace, and into a still more awful one with his own conscience, the result of which has associated his name in an eternal infamy with the murderers of the Just and Holy Jesus. The verdict passed on his share of this crime by the infant church, in their beautiful prayer (Acts iv. 27), has been corroborated by the universal voice of Christendom and the ineradicable convictions of every reader of the sacred history. Whether it was because he intensely despised and hated the Jews, or because he saw in the wonderful Man before him an object whose patent innocence and meek dignity under provocation and suffering endured his mind with an unprecedented and irresistible interest and sympathy, Pilate, from first to last, and especially after the examination of Herod, who took his 'friend's' (Luke xxiii. 12) view of the blamelessness of the accused, strove by every means to release Jesus. But his will refused to do the bidding of his conscience. With a fatal weakness he parleyed with the Jews. 'I find this man innocent, and so indeed does Herod; but as your resentment is keen against him, I will gratify you by chastising him before I let him go!' (vers. 15, 16). And he followed up this concession by another—a proposal to release Jesus, not so much as an innocent man, but in compliance with a custom of the feast. This stultification of his own acquittal of the accused they at once meet with a fiendish retort, by demanding the release of a notorious robber and murderer, who was awaiting execution in prison. The embarrassment which he felt at this unexpected and insolent demand was increased a hundredfold by a strange message from his wife—'Have thou nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things to-day in a dream because of him' (Matt. xxvii. 19). The yells of the multitude also alarmed him. Mortified with that disappointment of their worldly hopes, which we have already referred to (see above [Thursday]), the designing priests and elders now stimulate the resentment of the rabble with the report of the blasphemy of their late idol, who had not hesitated to arrogate divine honours to himself, and to talk about the destruction of their glorious national Temple! When the faltering governor therefore formally submits to them the option: 'Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you?' they overpower him with loud and savage clamours: 'Not this man, but Barabbas.' Pitiful spectacle of an awful crisis! The issue is—shall the Holy Redeemer die or live? For his death there is a rough and wilful crowd, lashed almost into a riotous fury (Matt. xxvii. 24) as it thirsts for the blood of the Innocent; while the sole, frail advocate for his life, by a compromise as weak as it is unjust (Luke xxiii. 22), only pours oil on the fire of their cruel wrath. The issue cannot long be doubtful. The multitude chafes; Pilate expostulates—'Why crucify him? What evil hath he done?' Their temper will not brook even this slight restraint. 'They cried out the more exceedingly,' says St. Mark (περισσότερος ἐκραζον); 'They were instant with loud voices,' says St. Luke (ἐπέκειντο φωναῖς μεγάλαις); 'And,' as the latter significantly adds, 'the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed' (xxiii. 23). The unhappy magistrate's abused conscience requires a satisfaction. He ostentatiously gives it by taking water and washing his hands before the crowd, vainly protesting his innocence of the blood of the Just Person before him. The ruthless spectators accept the responsibility with frightful promptitude: 'His blood be on us and on our children!' Having lulled his convictions, Pilate plunges more deeply still into those cowardly and infamous concessions which have given him the ineffaceable character of the unjust judge. 'Willing to content the people, he released Barabbas unto them' (Mark), 'and delivered Jesus to their will' (Luke). Then followed those merciless indignities—the stripping by the brutal executioners; the crown of thorns; the crimson or purple robe; the knotty sceptre first thrust into his manacled hands in derision, and then cruelly used to smite his lacerated head; the spitting and the mockery of pretended homage—which were the Gentile counterpart of the appalling scenes of fiendish derision in which the officials of Caiaphas had indulged but an hour or two before. The Prætorium now resounded with the Roman thongs (flogging being the preliminary to capital punishments in the cruel process of Roman executions), and blood followed the stripes, and his tender flesh quivered with the pain. 'The plowers plowed upon his back, they made long their furrows' (Ps. cxxix. 3); but the patience which he brought from Gethsemane could not be exhausted. Not a word of reproach, remonstrance, or entreaty, escaped those parched lips, so ignominiously soiled and smitten. How is it that we can be calm as we contemplate so foul a tragedy?

'Is it not strange, the darkest hour
That ever dawn'd on sinful earth
Should touch the heart with softer power
For comfort, than an angel's mirth?'
(Christian Year, Good Friday.)

The great ancient critic, with no impropriety, contemplated in the awful facts of a true and measured tragedy a subliming and purifying influence on the human spirit (see Aristotle, Poetics, chap. vi., sub init.); but the secret of the touching power of our Saviour's most awful passion lies deeper than the depths of our mental nature. 'He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed' (Is. liii. 5)—in this assurance of prophecy, which modern scepticism has ungraciously tried to make void (e.g., in Dr. R. Williams' contribution to Essays and Reviews), lies the profound and holy and purifying interest which good men have ever felt in the awful scenes through which our narrative is carrying us. In his supplementary history, St. John adds an affecting narrative, full of characteristic incident (xix. 4-16). Pilate, convinced of the Saviour's utter innocence, brings him outside the palace, and, in hopes that the piteous state of the sufferer might possibly turn their hearts, he submits him to the gaze of the populace, with a brief appeal to their compassion—'Behold the man' (Ecce Homo; ὁ δὲ ἀνὴρ). Some hearts might be relenting; but the obdurate chief priests and officers roughly interpose with their hackneyed, wretched shouts for crucifixion. Petulantly does the governor try to fling the execution of such a crime on them—'Take ye him, and crucify him;' adding, as at the first, his acquittal, 'I find no fault in him.' Emboldened by their evident advantage over his irresolution, they now bring up the accusation which they had concealed at the beginning, 'We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.' Strange words to a Roman heathen immersed in worldliness, but with an untroubled spirit, and a conscience not seared yet, though often wounded. The haughty monarch of Babylon was 'astonied' with a thrilling disquietude, when brought face to face with the apparition of the Son of God (Dan. iii. 25). No wonder if a weaker man than he cowered when in the actual presence of the incarnate deity, whom so many portents, both of conscience and external fact, were recommending to his bewildered mind, as infinitely more than the human abject which he seemed to be! Impelled by his increasing fears (ver. 9), he withdrew his prisoner; and within the palace asked him, in few but ardent words, of his origin. Whether it was that Pilate was unable, or, from his want of integrity, unfit, to receive information on so weighty an inquiry, 'Jesus gave him no answer.' But when the governor, ignorant of the quality of his captive, began to rebuke him angrily as forgetful of his official power, the Lord, with calm dignity and in brief but solemn words, informed him of a profound truth, which he had little dreamt of, that the power which he was too ostentatiously claiming, of crucifying him (κατ' ἐμὸν, in reference to Pilate's ἐξουσίαν σταυροῦσαι), was not inherent in his magistracy as derived from Cæsar, but was a special and mysterious commission from on high. Christ then, in evident sympathy with the mental struggle which the pitiable man was passing through, gently implies, that in the execution of this awful commission Pilate was no doubt incurring sin, inasmuch as he was step by step rebelling against the dictates of his own conscience; but there was another agent in the deed, whose sin was greater still (hic erat Caiaphas. Pilatus qualicumque mentione Filii Dei audita timuit; Caiaphas, quum Jesus ex ipso audisset Dei Filium, eum blasphemum dixit et mortis reum judicavit.—Bengelii Gnomon). The high-priest, God's own functionary, with the oracles of heaven in his hand, and his attention thereto quickened by a prophetic impulse (John xi. 51, 52), being led by an intense and selfish hatred (ver. 48), dared to condemn the Son of God as a blasphemer, although Jesus himself had solemnly assured him of his own right and title to that divine relationship; while the heathen governor, with no knowledge of revelation to guide him, could not refrain from fear at the bare mention of the unearthly name (John xix. 8, and 12, in which latter verse ἐκ τοῦτου is probably not a mark of time, but a reference to the Lord's answer in the preceding sentence). Thus did Jesus, humiliated and prostrated though he was beneath the strange conflicting verdicts of his Jewish and Gentile judges, himself anticipate his own sublime function of judgment, by pronouncing his decision on the comparative conduct of the two chief promoters of his sufferings and death. No wonder that the union of unapproachable superiority, rebuke, and kindly interest, which Pilate's conscience detected in the words of Jesus, revived for the fourth time, and in still greater force, his determination to release the captive (ver. 12). The prey was all but delivered, when the enemy made a last desperate thrust at the tremulous heart of Pilate. 'The Jews cried out, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend.' The insolent threat here implied was decisive. The governor instinctively shrank from the risk of a recall to Rome, to answer, it might be, for his life before his gloomy and suspicious master. The protests of his conscience no longer restrain him, and his repeated declarations of the innocence of his prisoner are all forgotten under the panic with which the unfriendly shouts of the multitude now filled him. He delivered Jesus unto the chief priests to be crucified—no longer with an Eccce Homo, to melt their hearts to pity, but with an angry and sarcastic Eccce Rex, which provoked their last and most deliberate clamour for their victim's death—so deliberate, indeed, that in one and the same sentence they rejected their Messiah, cut themselves off from the glory and protection of God's theocratic rule, and bound themselves to the hated dominion of a Gentile and heathen power. . . . 'Away, away with HIM. . . . We have no king but Cæsar' (ver. 15)! Pilate's former interest in the fate of Christ did not induce him to relax the rigours of execution. Cruel mockery of the sufferer is for the third time resorted to, and two companions in death are awarded him in the persons of two ruffians, accomplices, probably, of the murderer who had been rescued from the cross to make way for him. It was, it would seem, between eight and nine o'clock when the governor's final decision set the officials of the execution about their awful but not unwelcome work. As they were leading the holy Saviour to the spot appointed for his final suffering (outside the city, but yet near it, ἐγγύς ἦν ὁ τόπος τῆς πόλεως, John xix. 20), he seems to have sunk from the exhaustion of his recent sufferings beneath the cross, which as usual they made him carry. They immediately find a substitute in a man whose name is given as Simon of Cyrene, whom they compel to bear the sad burden. This is one of the only two instances of relief which we read that Jesus accepted in mitigation of his weight of woe; probably nothing but the physical prostration, which this incident so remarkably attests, was the reason of this noticeable exception. It is some consolation to discover one kindly symptom in this tale of sorrow, for we find that the sight of the drooping sufferer excited the wail and lamentation of some women who were among the attendant multitude. The Lord was not unobservant of their kindness; in words of mild and self-denying solemnity he bade these 'daughters of Jerusalem' to weep not for him—but for the sufferings which that day's crime would too certainly bring upon their children and them (Luke xxiii. 28). Nine o'clock, the hour of the morning sacrifice, had arrived, when the executioners consummated their terrible task. As they were nailing to the cross those hands and feet which had been through life so active in offices of love and mercy, Jesus, amidst the excruciating pain, which he had refused to deaden by drinking of the assuaging cup (Mark xv. 23), said, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do' (Luke xxiii. 34). This was the first of the seven utterances which the holy evangelists were led to record of the dying Saviour on the cross.* manifold, indeed, are the aspects which have been taken of the solemn scenes of Calvary. But to us, none is more interesting than that which is suggested by these sacred words of the dying Redeemer. They profoundly indicate the current of his precious thoughts throughout that most awful period, and coherently illustrate that wonderful combination of the tenderest humanity with conscious deity, and of the most serene composure amidst agonising torture, which is the glory, and the wonder, and, we must add, the crowning value and interest to man of this transaction of human redemption. The first of these ejaculations, which soon produced fruit in the last moments of the first martyr (Acts vii. 60), and the spirit of which has so often since soothed the bitterness of violent death, was, as we have said, occasioned by the hideous work of the four Roman executioners, who were probably the literal objects of the Saviour's prayer. Having completed their task, they unconsciously fulfilled a prophecy in their mode of appropriating their perquisites—the garments of the crucified (John xix. 23, 24). We pass rapidly by the sad sequel of taunts, and gibes, and railing, which the assembled spectators indulged in. All classes combined in this fiendish malignity. With execrable consistency, the chief priests, with the Scribes and elders, were there encouraging the rabble by their own grossly inhuman reproaches—'He saved others; himself he cannot save: if he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him' (Matt. xxvii. 42). Alas! the offence of the cross has not ceased! Mon. Salvador commends 'the good faith' (!) of these sacerdotal mockers; and in words which are not more indecent than demonstrative of a profound ignorance of the occasion and its character, asks—'Would not a miracle at this time have been decisive?' Mon. Salvador thinks, alas, that Jesus lost an opportunity of converting these miserable despisers, and attesting his (we will not say supernatural, but, rather, unnatural) power over the cross! But will Israel never learn the deep purport of its own prophetic Scriptures? We appeal from its past and present temper of unbelief to the relentings of the future, when 'they shall look on him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for him as one mourneth for his only son' (Zech. xii. 10). Instead of a failure of the Messianic character, we regard this very inhumanity of the high-priestly blasphemers, as one evidence that Jesus, in this aspect of his dreadful sufferings, was in fact fulfilling one condition of the true Messiahship, as guaranteed by prophecy—'All they that see me laugh me to scorn; they shoot out the lip; they shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him,' etc. (Ps. xxii. 7, 8).

* In a fine old Latin hymn, which will be found in Dr. H. A. Daniel's Thesaurus Hymnologicus, vol. ii. pp. 348, 349, there is a striking collection of all these sayings.

But the mockers on Calvary had not a monopoly of their vindictive joy. Pilate, who from the first despised the promoters of the suit against Jesus, now felt an aggravation of his antipathy from their insolent violence to himself. In his celebrated inscription on the Saviour's cross, in which, to gratify his contempt of the Jews (if we may not add, to register the strange conviction of his own mind), he most ostentatiously set forth the style of the crucified as 'THE KING OF THE JEWS,' he seems to have had his revenge. The chief priests at once requested a modification of the irritating title; but it was now the governor's turn to be obstinate, and he angrily declined to withdraw or alter a syllable of the trilingual superscription (John xix. 20-22). The gross derision of the bystanders must have greatly increased the suffering of the pure and gentle Jesus; one consolation, however, he received in the conversion of the crucified penitent. At first, both his fellow-sufferers seem to have joined in the reproaches of the crowd (Matt., Mark), and the unbelief of the priests—'If he were the Christ, why did he not save himself and them?' But before the end came, the constancy and the lamblike endurance of the central sufferer wrought conviction in one of the malefactors. He proved his repentance by acknowledging the justice of his own punishment, and rebuking the taunts which his companion in misery was still pouring forth; and his faith, by proclaiming the innocence of Jesus, and, by a wonderful insight, which penetrated the glories of the future through the ignominy of the present, invoking his sovereign grace and mercy. To his prayer of unsurpassed faith—'Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom,' Jesus answered, in the second of his seven great utterances—in terms through which his divinity surely gleams—'Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise' (Luke xxiii. 42-43). Thus the protracted agony of the cross fails to exhaust the mercy of the Redeemer; it failed, moreover, to blunt the kindly affections of his human heart. Near the cross he observed his virgin mother now soul-pierced with the terrible sword of which the aged Simeon had spoken (Luke ii. 35) more than thirty years ago. She was accompanied by her sister and Mary Magdalene, and by the disciple of her son's special love, who seems to have been the only one that braved the dangers of approaching the fatal scene from which the constant-hearted women, who had followed him from the north, were repelled* possibly by the military guard (Mark xv. 40). The sight of his afflicted mother drew from Jesus, who forgot nothing and neglected nothing amidst all his distracting pains, the third utterance from the cross, in which he commended Mary to the guardianship of the beloved John, who 'from that hour' [probably from that moment] withdrew his precious charge from the painful scene, and 'took her unto his own home' (John

xix. 27). Nor did she withdraw too soon. Deeper depths of woe her son has yet to fathom, and she was probably spared the anguish of hearing the cries which too plainly expressed his unequalled sorrow. The sixth hour has arrived, and a moiety of the hours of dying are now passed. But nature at length begins to sympathise with her Lord—the powers of moral darkness are fast culminating for their triumph, and physical darkness for three hours is shed over the land as an emblem of their victory. When the Saviour was born night became radiant with the glory of a heavenly host (Luke ii. 8-14); now when he is dying noon is blackened, as if with the gloom of hell (comp. Luke xxii. 53). Eclipsed is the Sun of Righteousness in the awful mystery of that removal of his divine Father's face, which wrung from him the disconsolate cry—the fourth utterance—'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' We may not attempt to penetrate this scene with a curious eye, nor rudely lift the veil which hides it from our view. The Saviour's suffering is not to be gauged by ordinary human experience, for the cause which produced it can never recur to any man. When St. Peter, in a beautiful passage where he reviews the Saviour's passion, refers expressly to him 'as bearing his own self [alone] our sins in his own body on the tree' (1 Pet. ii. 24), he discloses to us the secret of so transcendent a weight of woe. Of all besides of woman born not one could bear that burden—'none of them could by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him' (Ps. xlix. 7). And where even in the Redeemer's own cup can we find another drop so bitter as this despair? In Gethsemane the foretaste of it was sweetened with the grace of an angel's help; but on Calvary when he drank the full draught the heavens were black, and no helper came thence to 'strengthen' him. No wonder that under the scorching fever of this affliction the tortured Jesus, uttering his fifth sentence on the cross, said, 'I thirst' (John xix. 28). The evangelist sees in this plaint of the Saviour the accomplishment of a prophecy which centuries before the event drew an affecting portrait of the suffering Messiah (Ps. lxi. 8-21). In the awful solitude of his unassuaged grief he felt at last the fatal force of all his passion; 'Reproach hath broken my heart, and I am full of heaviness: I looked for some to take pity, but there was no man—and for comforters, but I found none' (ver. 20). The last moment is at hand, and with it the last of those derisive taunts ('Ἠὼς φωνεῖ οὖτος, Matt. xxvii. 47), which vexed his righteous soul, fell upon his ear. But just at that instant, amid the abounding cruelties of the protracted execution, one refreshing act of compassion is observed. One man dares to obey the instinct of a better feeling than his fellows (comp. Matt. xxvii. 49 with 48), 'runs and takes a sponge, fills it with vinegar [the soldiers' acid drink], raises it to the sufferer's parched lips by the help of a reed or stalk of the hyssop plant, and gives him to drink.' If a cup of cold water given to a disciple shall not lose its reward, we may be sure that this drop of rough mercy presented to the master himself in his last extremity will not be forgotten. Now that the end is come, and the cup is drained, Jesus does not refuse (and it is the second instance) the proffered relief. 'He received the vinegar'—Did it symbolise the last of the dregs of his sharp and bitter cup?—uttered the sixth and seventh of the cries of

* A comparison of John xix. 25-27 with Matt. xxvii. 55, 56, and with Mark xv. 40, 41, seems to indicate that Mary Magdalene and Mary the wife of Cleophas, who were at first near the cross, removed afterwards and joined the distant group of Galilean women including Salome. They no doubt withdrew with St. John and the Virgin mother, who must have sorely needed all the sympathy and help they could render her.

Calvary, simultaneously as it would seem (comp. John xix. 30, and Luke xxiii. 46), but 'with a loud voice of consciously completed victory for man, and of most loving resignation unto God' (Bishop Elliott, after Dräseke and Stier), 'It is finished,' 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit,' then meekly bowed his head and gave up the ghost. Three o'clock, the hour of the evening sacrifice, was the moment of the Lord's death (St. Mark mentions the stages in the duration of the passion, see chap. xv. vers. 25, 33, 34); and again does external nature attest the great event by unusual convulsions. 'The veil of the Temple was rent (the moral force of which portent is explained in Heb. x. 19-22), the earth did quake, the rocks were rent, the graves opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came out of the graves after his resurrection and appeared unto many' (Matt. xxvii. 51-53). The effect of these portentous sights, as a commentary upon that agony and death, was intensely great on all that saw and heard them. Who can tell how many hearts were now prepared for the subsequent convictions of Pentecost and its sequel? 'All the people that came together to that sight [of the dying Redeemer], beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts and returned' (Luke xxiii. 48); the echoes of their own frightful imprecations of innocent blood on their children and themselves had scarcely yet died upon the ear, and their hearts were uneasy. But not Jesus alone were stirred. Three of the evangelists mention as one of the most striking incidents of the moment the conviction produced on the mind of the centurion in command of the military which were on the spot. The Gentile Magi did homage at the Saviour's birth, and now when the Temple veil is rent, and the way to the holiest place is opened to all, the chief of the Gentile functionaries honours his death with not only a declaration of the late sufferer's innocence (Luke), but, anticipating the devout Cornelius, with the very first expression of Gentile belief in the truth of a divine Messiah of which we read (Matt., Mark). In the centurion's belief, moreover, the whole troop seems to have concurred, for St. Matthew tells us that 'they who were with him watching Jesus . . . feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God.' This centurion and Pilate shortly afterwards had an interview (Mark xv. 44). One may well wonder what passed between them, for the alarms of the governor before the execution, and the impressions of the soldier after it, respecting the wonderful Man whose fate had moved Jerusalem so intensely, were of very similar character. The blood of the innocent, so precious to the penitent in all ages, brought vengeance on two at least of those who imbrued their hands in shedding it. The fallen apostle, when he saw the fatal effect of his treachery, hastened to the Sanhedrim, returned the fee of his sin, was goaded to desperation by the harsh taunts with which they heard his remorse, and by a suicidal hand met death even before the execution of the friend whom he had betrayed (Matt. xxvii. 3-10; Acts i. 18, 19. See also JUDAS ISCARIOT). Upon the heathen Pilate the recoil of vengeance was much tardier. The emotions of his conscience were allayed, and he went on awhile in the routine of his government. Two deputations waited on him after the crucifixion, of very different character, though both emanating from members of the

Sanhedrim. One of these was undertaken in friendly concern for the honour of the dead, that the body, which had providentially escaped the mutilation and crushing inflicted on the others (John xix. 32-37), might be rescued from the felon's grave into which it would otherwise have been hurriedly cast after the execution.* Two members of the council, who had vainly protested against the violence of the majority, undeterred by all the odium to which their singular but noble conduct exposed them, and no doubt quickened in their adherence to the cause of the outcast by the portents which were prognosticating his innocence and mysterious greatness, hastened to the governor, secured the sacred body, and fulfilled a remarkable prophecy (Is. liii. 9, 12) by consigning it to a princely grave (Matt. xxvii. 60; John xix. 41. See also JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA and NICODEMUS). After the piety of these admirable persons had provided a sepulchre worthy of the dead, the faithful group of holy women, who had witnessed the horrors of the cross at a distance, now draw near and mournfully inspect the tomb wherein their heart's treasure of love was deposited. After a lingering look they returned home, not utterly prostrated by their sorrow ('cast down but not destroyed,' as St. Paul would describe them, 2 Cor. iv. 9), but able in the midst of it to project fresh offices of ministry for him from whom they could not believe that death had severed them for ever. 'They prepared spices and ointments,' St. Luke informs us (xxiii. 56). The voice now stilled in death had, only a few days ago, bestowed the warmest praise on Mary of Bethany, when, as he said, 'she anointed his body for its burial.' We have no doubt that this ministry of love, so well designed but never wanted, was no less worthy of his emphatic commendation. This most eventful day, unrivalled in its issues by any other day through which the sun ever ran its course, now ends with an affecting incident, which Holy Scripture has rescued from oblivion (see Matt. xxvii. 61). When their companions returned to their homes Mary Magdalene and the Virgin's sister and namesake remained at their sacred watch and ward, 'sitting over against the sepulchre.' Among the sympathies of the human heart room has always been found for acts of pensive piety such as this, even when bestowed on far less interesting occasions. No one reads without some emotion the loving vigils over her dead of Rizpah the daughter of Aiah (2 Sam. xxi. 10). With still more elevated fellow-feeling do we honour the silent grief of these watchers in the garden of the sepulchre—a touching contrast to the sleepers of Gethsemane! We do not suppose, indeed, that, like the daughter of Aiah, our Marys spent days and nights at the tomb, although Friday closes and Sunday breaks upon their holy watch. Saturday brought to them obligations which their piety would not resist, and so we suppose that at its earliest dawn they rejoined their Galilean friends.

* Mishna, Sanhedrim, vi. 5. By the Roman law, however, the body would have been left exposed to birds of prey (Renan, Vie de Jésus, who quotes Horace, Ep. i. 16, 48; Juvenal, xiv. 77; Lucan, vi. 544; Pliny, xxxvi. 24; Plutarch, Clothes, 39; Petronius, Sat., cxi., cxii.) The Jewish usage would be allowed to prevail, on so urgent an occasion as the present approach of the Pass-over [high] sabbath.

Saturday, 16th of Nisan (April 8).—What a contrast does the silence of this Sabbath-day afford to the long, minute, and heart-stirring events of yesterday. All, however, was not peaceful, however quiet. Two evangelists refer to what occurred. St. Matthew, in five verses (xxvii. 62-66), tells us of the anxiety and restlessness of the chief priests and Pharisees, while St. Luke, in few but graphic words (xxiii. 56), informs us of the resignation and obedience of the faithful followers of Christ. This Passover-Sabbath was specially sacred (John xix. 31); but the sanctions neither of the Law nor of their own traditions deterred the Sanhedrim from violating its holy character by a rancorous activity against the body of Jesus. Though they had slain him, they could not repress a vague fear about the future. So they went in deputation to the governor and expressed their apprehensions; they did not hesitate to allude, in their extravagant manner, to the Lord's own predictions of his resurrection. They ill disguise their fears under an opprobrious epithet (Matt. xxvii. 63), 'that deceiver,' ἐκείνος ὁ πλάσας, in violation of the manly decency which has found expression in the maxim 'De mortuis nil nisi bonum.' Of him who had struck a death-blow to their traditional system they could think only evil. So the gospel-narrative up to its last notice of these enemies of Christ consistently records the rancour and impotence of their latest efforts against the object of their hatred. Impotent indeed they were! Pilate, though receiving their deputation with characteristic civility, does not forget their recent violence to himself. They had taken the entire business into their own hands. They had insisted on the death of Jesus of Nazareth; their demand had been complied with; with themselves must rest the consequences. If they thought a military watch necessary as a sedative to their fears he would not object to their having one. Let them use it as diligently as they pleased. 'So they went,' says the evangelist, 'and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone and setting a watch' (ver. 66). With what result we shall soon see! Refreshing it is to turn from these restless and anxious malignants to the peaceful sorrow of Jesus' mourners. Of his own blessedness in Paradise (Luke xxiii. 43); of the bliss, moreover, which his spirit caused, it would seem, among the spirits he found in safe keeping there (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19); and of the 'rest in hope' which was now enjoyed by his recently tortured but now liberated and immortal body (Acts ii. 26, 31), it is less suitable to speak in an historical sketch than in a theological dissertation. We cannot, however, refrain, in closing this history of the wonderful passion week, from one word of humble and adoring contemplation of a thrilling and awful fact, that, while apostate Israel was desecrating the holiest and most memorable of all Jewish Sabbaths, and forfeiting its claim to the continuance of that once holy and happy institution, the faithful few, who 'rested the Sabbath-day according to the commandment,' were by their unobtrusive piety not only in nearest communion with the soul of the Son of Man resting from all its sorrows, but in best training for the higher privilege of the Christian rest and festival, the new Sabbath of the Resurrection, which was to become itself the type of that eternal rest (σαββατισμός) which remaineth in heaven, after life's toils are over, for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9).

CHAP. IV. FROM THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST TO HIS ASCENSION. — Sunday, 17th of Nisan (April 9).—'Sometimes be curious to see the preparation which the sun makes, when he is coming forth from his chambers of the east.' Never was early rising, as thus recommended in the quaint eloquence of Jeremy Taylor (Holy Living, i. 1. 1), so grandly rewarded as in the case of the faithful women who, on the first Easter morning, anticipated the sun-rise in their visit to the tomb of the Crucified. Like him of old (Ps. cxix. 147) they 'prevented the dawn,' and at the earliest gleam of twilight—'the hind of the morning,' as the Rabbins call it*—they made the happy discovery that Jesus had risen, 'the Sun of Righteousness,' 'the bright and morning star,' whose Easter glory the poet Prudentius described (Καθημερινά, Hymn. ad incens. Cer. Paschal.)—

'Non sicut tenebras de face fulgida

'Not as the day-star from his ocean-bed
Striking the night with torch of glowing red,
But upon earth sad with its dying Lord
More than the solar day hath Christ restored,' etc.

Visit of the Women to the Sepulchre.—We have seen how the female disciples of Christ suspended their offices of sorrowing love, which they had begun on Friday evening, in order to keep the Sabbath (Luke xxiii. 56). Having 'rested' at the call of duty, and gained, no doubt, strength for their pious resolution, they resume their preparations, on the expiration of the holy day at six o'clock (Mark xvi. 1), for the supplementary embalming of the sacred body (compare John xix. 39, 40, with the two passages just referred to). Besides the women who had followed the Lord from Galilee, there were, as we may well suppose, not a few earnest hearts of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood who would unite with them in doing honour to the beloved dead. St. Luke seems to imply as much by mentioning 'other women that were with them' (xxiv. 10, the αἱ λοιπαὶ τῶν αὐταῖς is synonymous with the καὶ τινες σὺν αὐταῖς of ver. 1,† and need not be

* This אֵילָנָה בְּרֵיחַ was the first of the four stages of twilight of the Jews (Lightfoot, Works [Pitman], xi. 455), and probably answers to the notes of time used by all the evangelists. Their phrases are perhaps identical in meaning, and would present no difficulty, were it not that St. Mark seems to define his πρωτὶ by ἀνατελῶντος τοῦ ἡλίου (xvi. 2). As, however, the Evangelist could only have meant to employ the terms as synonymous, we get rid of all difficulty by making ἀνατελῶντος τοῦ ἡλίου embrace the whole period from the earliest dawn caused by the sun's approach to the horizon to his actual rising. Dr. Robinson (Biblioth. Sacra, ii. 168) adduces several expressions from the Septuagint, in which the two phrases of St. Mark are united, the union designating nothing more than the dawn—any portion of the 'morning watch,' which the πρωτὶ of Mark xiii. 35 stands for—extending from three to six o'clock A.M. Isaiah's poetical description of Lucifer, as בֶּן־בֹּרַךְ, 'son of the morning' (xiv. 12), is in the LXX. Πρωτὶ ἀνατέλλων.

† Recent critics, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and limited to the other Galilean women in addition to those whose names are given, but may be regarded as including all the women, whoever they may have been, who had combined their testimony of the resurrection to the apostles). If we can hardly imagine that the virgin mother would join the holy company, we feel no such restraint respecting Mary of Bethany and her active sister. The much-serving Martha would scarcely be absent on the occasion of this last office of love. Owing to their numbers, and in order to escape public notice, they probably appointed to resort to the sepulchre by different ways, in separate groups, and very early in the morning. Mary Magdalene, in the intensity of her devotion to him, to whom she owed so much (Luke viii. 2; Mark xvi. 9), was on her road, 'while it was yet dark' (John. xx. 1). In company with 'the other Mary' (Matt. xxviii. 1), who had been her companion also at the burial (xxvii. 61) and the cross (56), as well as with Salome (Mark xvi. 1), fresh, in all probability, from the side of the afflicted virgin, they proceeded to the garden of the sepulchre.* Of the military watch, which had been set there some time since their last visit, they seem to have had no knowledge; for the only difficulty they talk of by the way is the removal of the large stone which they had themselves seen placed at the entrance of the tomb, when the Lord was consigned to it on Friday (Mark xvi. 3). Little did they dream of the heavenly interposition, which even then was preparing not only to remove their embarrassment, but to endue them with an unexpected joy. Never did any precaution of human power more signally miscarry than at this moment!

'Christ's tomb of late the threefold guard
Of watch and stone and seal had barred!'

The Resurrection.—But impotent are all hindrances to His resurrection! Neither Jewish seals nor Roman arms avail! The first Evangelist, in few but divinely graphic words, narrates how heaven met all this defiance of the powers of darkness: 'Behold there was a great earthquake; for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven and came and rolled back the stone from the door and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning and his raiment white as snow: and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men' (xxviii. 2-4). Whether the resurrection took place at this point, or (as the ancient opinion of the church concurrently ran) previous to the miraculous opening of the tomb, we are not told; whether he who had 'power to lay down his life and power to take it again' (John x. 18) arose in solitude from the yet unopened grave; or whether, as Peter was afterwards led by an angel-hand from his prison, he availed himself of the heavenly agency which operated in the earthquake that opened his tomb, we cannot tell. Nor is it at all material to know at what moment the Lord arose. The fact is itself indisputable, and the opened sepulchre and its sequel of wonders were meant to attest the grand event. When the Magdalene and her two companions arrived at the precincts of the grave, the soldiers of the watch were probably quitting the spot after recovery from their terrible fright. The women 'lifted up their eyes' (for ἀναβλέψασαι is St. Mark's word, xvi. 4), probably on entering the garden, and they saw that the huge stone was rolled away. Mary Magdalene, in the keen susceptibility of her grief, instantly conjectured the worst. The decamping watch, whom she possibly descried, added to her suspicion that the sepulchre had been violently robbed of its sacred contents by ruthless hands. 'Then she runneth and cometh to Simon Peter and to the other disciple, whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre and we know not where they have laid him' (John xx. 2). After the Magdalene had thus returned to the city, the other Mary and Salome entered the sepulchre. The angel of the earthquake whom the terrified guards had seen sitting in awful splendour on the removed stone outside, was now observed by the amazed and trembling women within, and in much serenest aspect.

The Angel and the Women.—He had scared the soldiers with withering fear; he now soothed the affrighted women with words of surpassing consolation: 'Fear ye not [the δυνεῖς in opposition to the terror-stricken guard]: I know that ye seek Jesus which was crucified. He is not here. HE IS RISEN' (Matt., Mark). To give clearness to their conviction, he graciously invites them to survey the place where the Lord had lain, and then dismisses them with a message to his disciples, that they should see him in Galilee, as he had indeed appointed before his death (Matt. xxvi. 32; Mark. xiv. 28). This reference to his own distinct appointment with them is remarkable and important—important, as helping them to a belief in his resurrection, when they should recall his words and compare them with the angel's message; and remarkable, as indicating the unswerving advance of his purposed mission to the end. How appalling the events which had happened since Thursday evening, when he said: 'After I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee!' Could anything better tend to rally the prostrate and 'scattered sheep' of his fold than this quiet resumption of a purpose, which Gethsemane and Calvary and the grave had failed to drive from his memory? This clause of the message, on reflection, must have proved to the disciples, notwithstanding their tardiness of mind, a fruitful germ of ultimate conviction.

Message to Peter.—St. Mark, probably from St. Peter's own information, adds a very beautiful and affecting incident of the angel's message, when he inserts in it the fallen but contrite apostle's own name; 'Go your way, tell his disciples, and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee!' The Lord had spared a yearning look of pitiful compassion for the son of Jonas in the midst of his own sufferings. Death quenched not that love. The first act of his restored life, while quitting his tomb, was to give his angel a charge concerning his disciple, whom he would not have isolated a moment from his brethren in the thrilling interest which the glad Easter tidings was to bring to them all! Surely this kindly care for Peter must have presented to the minds of all another sign of the identity of Him, who had risen, with their dear Lord and master! Commissioned with this first message from the tomb, the messengers 'departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy, and did run to bring his disciples word' (Matthew); so intent were they on their errand, and so absorbed (as was natural) with their wonderful subject, that, as St. Mark takes care to inform us, they stopped not by the way to impart to any whom they met the grand secret of their breast (xvi. 8).

Report of the watch.—Others, however, found their way to the city from the sepulchre, who were more communicative of their wonderful information. St. Matthew tells us (xxviii. 11) that some of the terrified watch went and shewed the chief priests all the things that had happened.* These malignant enemies of Christ, true to their miserable determination to resist the truth to the last, instantly convene a meeting of the Sanhedrim either in full body or in committee, and after deliberation resolve upon a measure which brands with the mark of an ineffaceable ignominy the desperate effort of expiring Judaism to check the progress of a sacred cause, of the success of which their own minds could not but entertain painful presentiments. This they gave proof of by the palpably insincere measures which the priests and elders adopted to neutralise the effect in the popular mind, which they had so foully tampered with, of the report of the resurrection. Having seduced the traitor Judas with a bribe, they repeat the expedient and pollute their treasury by appropriating out of it a large sum (Matt. xxviii. 13) to induce the soldiers to propagate their lying report that 'Christ's disciples had come in the night and stolen him away while they slept.' 'If this come to the governor's ears,' said the miserable schemers to their dupes, 'we will persuade him and secure you.' The evangelist concludes his account of this humiliating and futile effort of the Sanhedrim with a sentence of the keenest and most damaging irony, 'So they took the money and did as they were taught; and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day' (ver. 15). Of this last statement a curious and offensive illustration occurs in the Talmudic tractate, Toledoth Jeschu, which is full of the spirit of Jesus-hating Judaism. (This piece of blasphemous ribaldry is reprinted and confuted in J. C. Wagenseil's Tela ignea Satane [sub. fin.]). It is some relief to discover that 'some' of the watch only put themselves in the hands of the malignant hierarchs. The other guards appear to have been so overcome by the phenomena of the sepulchre as to have recognised the true state of the case, and to have declined being a party to a project which was as stupid and self-refuting as it was insincere and malicious—which required them to have been asleep and yet to have seen thieves and tomb-riflers, and to have known them to be disciples!

Mary Magdalene and the two Apostles.—We turn from this unhappy attempt to nip the bud of the great Christian mystery to the wonderful succession of proofs which soon put it beyond all reasonable doubt. Mary Magdalene sought out, apparently without any difficulty, the two apostles to whom she betook herself in her bewilderment. They might be lodging nearer at hand than the others, or Mary might have counted on a special sympathy from them. The promptitude with which they obeyed her summons is noticeable. The eager alacrity of Peter, who, although outrun by his more youthful companion in their hurried course to the garden, was the first to enter the sepulchre, profoundly agrees with the Saviour's advance towards him. John afterwards followed his friend's example, and the result of their combined examination of the burial-place corroborated indeed the substance of the Magdalene's statement that the body was removed, but it seemed at the same time to correct the chief impression which afflicted her, that the removal was the work of enemies. The neat and orderly condition of all the grave clothes, which the Evangelist is careful to mention, as if in refutation of all doubt that the tomb had been robbed by either friend or foe, struck the two apostles with a surprise which led to a conviction of all the truth. St. John, at least, who speaks for himself, expressly attributes his own first belief of the resurrection to the wonderfully convincing appearance of the interior of the tomb (xx. 8). We do not hesitate to accept this higher sense of St. John's ἐπίσταντες with Lampe, Neander, Alford, De Wette, Meyer, Robinson, and Wordsworth, although opposed to Bengel, Stier, Ebrard, Grotius, and even Augustine, who merely suppose the 'belief' to have been that the body was gone, as Mary had told them. Striking that the first ray of the Sun of Righteousness should have flashed upon him in the darkness of the tomb! From the spark of that light of the sepulchre with what 'bright beams of light' has not the church of the risen Christ been 'enlightened by the doctrine of the blessed Apostle and Evangelist St. John!' (See Collect for St. John's Day). What the immediate effect of the sight upon Peter was we are not told by his brother apostle. If the latter could have associated his friend in the joy of his own faith, he, no doubt, gladly would. We may conclude then, from his silence, that Peter's faith was yet to be born. St. Luke (xxiv. 12), referring either to this or a later visit of this Apostle to the tomb, says that he 'departed, wondering in himself at what was come to pass' (see below).

Mary Magdalene at the Sepulchre alone.—Mary Magdalene, who had fetched the Apostles, remained at the sepulchre after their return home. Overcome with the idea that the sacred body had been rudely molested, she wept as she stood without. Then, varying the signs of her grief, she stooped down and gazed at the spot where her Lord had lain. It was guarded by two angels, who addressed the weeping mourner in tones of

* The reader will not fail to observe how strong a testimony to the truth of the resurrection, from a free and independent source, we have in this report of the guard. God's providence, in a similarly independent manner, brought about the most satisfactory attestation of the death of Christ, in the kind of official announcement of it which the centurion made to the civil authority of Jerusalem. The three following passages deserve the best consideration among the many evidences preserved to us of the actual death and resurrection of our Lord—Mark xv. 44, 45; John xix. 32-35; Matt. xxviii. 11-15. Moreover, in Matt. xxvii. 63 we have an acknowledgment from the chief priests and their party of the death of Jesus ['whilst he was yet alive'], while in vers. 63, 64, there occurs an unmistakable proof of the apprehension entertained by these same persons of his resurrection.

kindly concern: 'Woman, why weepst thou?' Her answer proves in what an ecstasy of grief her loving soul was wrapped. She seemed hardly conscious of the dignity of the holy beings before her, as she poured out her complaint in impassioned words: 'Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' But although her sorrow bedims her sight, it does not bedevil her faith. This seems rather to increase in clearness. To the Apostles she called her beloved lost one, 'the Lord.' She now appropriates him as her own, 'My Lord.' As the penitent of Calvary was not checked by the sight of His dying agony from acknowledging the 'Lordship' of Jesus, so our Mary's faith amidst the lowliness of the grave dwells loyally on the self-same attribute of greatness, which she will not believe to have been lost in death! Such allegiance cannot fail of its reward, nor be long kept waiting. 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise'—was not a prompter requital to the repentant malefactor, than what is at this moment in store for the loving penitent of Magdala. She had no sooner opened her grief to the angels than she was destined to hear the echo of their consolation from the lips of her Lord himself! She turned herself back [from the tomb] and saw Jesus standing . . . and he saith unto her: 'Woman, why weepst thou; whom seekest thou?' The Lord, whom she did not at once recognise, recalled her from the stupor of her grief, by the simple salutation 'Mary!' The word was, no doubt, accompanied with a voice and manner which reminded her of his former love and grace. Thus every evidence which is furnished us of the resurrection connects him, who is the subject of it, with old associations. It was the indelible memory of her Lord, impressed on her mind by many a characteristic feature of speech and action, which roused Mary to the instantaneous conviction that none but her beloved could have pronounced her name in that inimitable tone. Her prompt recognition of Jesus was accompanied with an attempt, an excited one no doubt, to embrace him. But embraces henceforth must be spiritual! So Christ puts a double honour upon his disciple, whose simple and ardent love he knows to be equal to the occasion: 'Touch me not,' he says in effect, 'your faith needs not, like that of a weaker conviction, to be helped by a corporeal embrace.' To us the Lord's bearing to his devoted follower of Magdala is an encomium rather than a repulse. He can count upon her faith without the contact which was needful for the satisfaction of Thomas; so he at once entrusts to her the message which should announce to his followers not his return to life merely, but his approaching ascension to his Father. Such an announcement was necessary; without it his disciples might conclude from the tenor of his long discourse to them before his death, that his present return to life was his final appointment, and that this world accordingly was the 'place' of their ultimate glory and rest with himself (John xiv. 3; xvi. 16; xvii. 24). Though, therefore, they were about to see him after 'the little while' of his absence from them through death, yet that sight would be itself but a brief one, for he was not yet ascended to his Father, but was on the way to Him (comp. John xvi. 16 with xx. 17). We therefore discover in Mary Magdalene's case, not only the distinction which St. Mark assigns to her of being the first to behold the risen Jesus (xvi. 9), but the yet higher privilege of receiving from him the sublimest of his messages to his disciples. In it he announces his approaching ascension to heaven, and indicates the spiritual relation which he would have them realise as his 'brethren'—children of 'his Father and their Father, his God and their God' (John xx. 17). In this remarkable message the apostles would, on due reflection, find the best possible voucher of their Lord's resurrection. It contained two plain references to his former teaching. He had in Galilee in a pointed manner declared the principle of their regenerate relation to him (Matt. xii. 46-50; Mark iii. 31-35); and, as late as Thursday evening, he had profoundly discoursed to them of his departure from the world to the Father, and his discourse had at the time deeply impressed them (John xvi. 29, 30). How could Mary Magdalene have had any idea of so profound a truth, unless from the mouth of the Lord himself? When, however, she reported to his late companions the startling fact that she had actually seen the Lord alive, they were incredulous. Prostrated with grief (Mark xvi. 10), they reflected not on the probability of the story which their earnest friend avouched; but if 'they believed not,' as St. Mark informs us, the silence of St. John may justify the supposition that Mary's statement would at least produce some impression on their minds which might contribute somewhat to ultimate belief (comp. John xx. 18). But other influences strangely tending to the same result are at hand. The other Mary and Salome were on their way to the disciples to relate what they had seen and heard at the sepulchre, since their companion of Magdala had left them, when they were met by the risen Saviour (Matt. xxviii. 9).

Second Appearance of Christ.—According to St. Matthew (xxviii. 8) and St. Mark (xvi. 8), these holy women had quitted the tomb with fear and amazement, though not unmixed with joy, at the apparition and words of the angel. They were, no doubt, still under the influence of these emotions when Jesus approached them (observe the ἑστηκότες αὐταῖς, and contrast it with the mode of Christ's approach to Mary Magdalene, evidently from behind; ἐσπράγγεῖς εἰς τὰ ὀπίσω, καὶ θύψει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἐπ' ὤματα, John xx. 14); for, after a gracious salutation (χαίρετε), in which he seemed to sympathise with their joy, as before he had soothed the tears of the Magdalene (γύναι, τί κλαίεις), he bids them dismiss their fears (μὴ φοβεῖσθε, without the emphatic ὑμεῖς of the angel; for the Lord draws no contrast and makes no allusion to the terrified guard). And now the Lord strikingly demonstrates his intuition of human character, and so proves himself to be the same Jesus whom the beloved disciple (ii. 24, 25) described as 'knowing all men, and needing not that any should testify of man; for he knew what was in man.' This Mary and Salome were of far different mould from their friend of Magdala. Equal, no doubt, in love and duty, they were yet inferior to her in firmness of character and grasp of faith. So the Lord having calmed their timid hearts and addressed himself to their joy, at once permits their reverential embrace (ἐκράτησαν . . . καὶ προσέκυνον αὐτῷ), whereby they might increase their faltering faith to a strong conviction. This 'touch' he had, as we have seen, forbidden to the intrepid and unshrinking Magdalene, as unneeded and superfluous; while on a later occasion we shall find him actually commanding a contact of his sacred body, to satisfy the unreasonable doubts of the tardiest of his followers. Having graciously accepted the homage and strengthened the faith of these timorous but faithful women, Jesus gives them an embassy to his apostles, whom he again salutes with the endearing name of brethren: 'Go, tell my brethren that they go before me into Galilee; there shall they see me.' The wisdom of these words is apparent. Christ will not oppress them, with the expectation of a sudden appearance among them, then and there. To retire to Galilee, from the scene of their present sorrow, would allow time for reflection and recovery; it would also, like the angel's message, put the minds of the apostles into a train of recollecting how that Jesus had himself promised, while he was with them, that after his death and resurrection he would see them again in Galilee (Matt. xxvi. 32); nor would the kindness of his salutation be without its influence—it was so much like their loving master's benevolent heart to forgive their cowardly desertion of him in his hour of need! We are not told, however, what reception was given to this message; possibly a more respectful one than to Mary Magdalene's. Four of the eleven apostles were sons of these pious messengers. One of them had, by a personal inspection of the sepulchre, raised himself out of the desponding incredulity of his associates into a frame of mind which would induce him at least to give a serious attention to the statement of his mother and her friend. Added to which the testimony of these women was a weightier one than that of the Magdalene, for they could tell of what their 'hands had handled,' as well as of what their eyes had seen and their ears had heard.

Other Women at the Sepulchre.—It cannot, however, be denied, that the incredulity of the apostolic company was in general extremely obstinate. Unpersuaded by the mouth of the three witnesses, who have thus far laboured to convince them of the glorious truth, which they had discovered that Easter morning, they reject the testimony of a still more numerous body of informants, who now bring similar tidings to them, but with varied vouchers. The Galilean women mentioned by St. Luke (xxiv. 1-9) have been, as it appears to us, conclusively shewn by some careful writers* to be a different set of women from those whose movements we have been describing. The central member of this larger group is Joanna, the wife of Chuzas, Herod's steward. Though probably they acted in concert with their pious neighbours, they seem to have moved independently of them. They on Friday, after the burial, probably made that inspection of the tomb, as the preliminary step in their pious offices to the dead (Luke xxiii. 55), which Mary Magdalene and the other Mary seem to have postponed until Sunday morning (Matt. xxviii. 1). They were apparently beforehand with them also in their provision of materials for embalming the sacred body; for St. Luke informs us that they had prepared their spices and unguents before the Sabbath-day (xxiii. 56), while it is clear from St. Mark, that the two Marys and Salome only procured their sweet spices, and that by purchase, when the Sabbath was past (xvi. 1). This diversity of circumstances continues throughout the narrative. On the arrival of Joanna and her party at the tomb, after the departure of the other women, they enter the opened sepulchre, not invited by an angel, as their predecessors had been, to behold the evidence of Jesus being alive (δεῖτε, ἴδετε τὸν τόπον ὅπου ἔκειτο, Matt. xxviii. 6), but intent only on their sad mission of embalming him dead. They found not the Lord's body, and (full proof that they had not seen their friends of Salome's group) were thrown into extreme perplexity. While they were indulging, as was natural, in painful surmises, behold, two angels in human shape stood by them in shining garments. The apparition filled them with fear, and they fell prostrate to the ground. The three first visitors to the sacred vault had been met with comfortable words; these were accosted by the celestial guards in tones of apparent censure: 'Why seek ye the living among the dead?' as if in gentle reproof of their coming to seek for Christ in the tomb, at a time when he had already shewed, or was now shewing himself to some of their companions conqueror of the grave. Not to depress them, however, with over much sorrow, the angels added the glorious tidings: 'He is not here, but is risen.' This grand announcement is not received by these faithful women with the strong passion of grief, which the Magdalene had displayed; nor with the conflicting feelings of fear and joy which had excited the timorous hearts of her companions; but with a sedate and solemn attention which encouraged their heavenly monitors to appeal to their recollection of the past: 'Remember how he spake unto you, when he was yet in Galilee, saying, The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again.' Of all the angelic announcements this most clearly connects the Christ of the resurrection with the Christ of the preceding period. The pious listeners were collected enough to remember the Lord's prediction, and now to comprehend its meaning. We are apt to think that greater distinction was put on the other women by Christ in vouchsafing to them his gracious appearances. But may we not discover some compensation for the want of that honour in the case of Joanna and her friends, in the benediction which Christ pronounced afterwards to Thomas: 'Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed?' Though not expressly sent on the errand like their predecessors, these excellent persons, having found their Saviour, in the promptitude of their faith returned from the sepulchre, and made apparently (as was easy for them in their larger number) a much wider circulation of the wonderful intelligence than the others had the opportunity of doing (Luke xxiv. 9).

Incredulity of the disciples.—Such are the successive evidences of the resurrection which the various groups of the ministering women brought to the apostles. They were vouchsafed at two appearances of Christ himself, and three apparitions of angels. We have seen how varied were the processes of conviction in the case of the women. Uniform, however, was the effect produced by their different reports upon the men; even invariable incredulity. St. Luke, the historian of this incredulity, expressly mentions the successive

* We would especially name Mr. Gilbert West (Observations on the Hist., etc., of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ [sec. i.-xi.]); Dr. Townson (Discourses on the four Gospels [pp. 292-404]); and Mr. Greswell (Dissertations on the Harmony, etc. [ed. 2], vol. iii., pp. 264-320).

messengers, who came freighted with the marvellous tidings—(1) 'Mary Magdalene, and (2) Joanna, and (3) Mary the mother of James,' and whatever other women respectively accompanied them (see xxiv. 10; and, for this distributive sense of the names,* the convincing remarks of Dr. Townson, Discourses, pp. 296, 394-400); but their reports were uniformly rejected—'their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not.' Some allowance must in charity be made for the apostles. They never had understood the Lord's plainest predictions of 'the decease he was to accomplish at Jerusalem;' why should Messiah die (John xii. 34)? Before they had learnt to solve the startling question, his painful and ignominious death dashed their fondest hopes to the ground, and they were scattered like sheep, when the shepherd is smitten. This result was not unforeseen by Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 31; Mark xiv. 27); nay, it was indicated in prophecy (Zech. xiii. 7). The time is now come when they are to be gathered from their dispersion; and we venture to think that the gentle means employed by 'the Good Shepherd' to recall them from the consternation and grief into which his death had plunged them, affords an irresistible evidence of the truth of the resurrection, by the illustration it yields, at every step, that it was the same Jesus, who in methods of characteristic grace and kindness to his disciples was carrying out, in his post-mortal course, the purpose and counsel which he so often announced to them previous to his death. One reflection we obviously derive from this incredulity of the apostles. How unreasonable is the objection which makes the history of the resurrection an invention of the apostles and their friends! Some (like Mon. Rénan, Vie de Jésus, p. 434) imagine this history to be the offspring of the heated imagination of Mary Magdalene. Others (and they are the majority of the neo-critical school) find in the Evangelists a legendary summary of primitive belief, which took its shape from the fond conceits of the first preachers of Christianity. The best refutation of all such opinions is the simple narrative of the Gospels. This narrative, which is on all hands accepted as the basis of all these speculations, proves most clearly that the apostles and their friends, who were the primitive witnesses of the resurrection, were anything but enthusiasts and framers of legends. They were

* This distributive sense of the names, here mentioned, seems to us to be very strongly indicated in the evangelist's careful phraseology. In verse 9 he says of the women who had seen the two angels at the sepulchre, that they returned and reported (ἀπήγγειλαν) all that they had seen and heard to the eleven and to all the rest. The aorist, which here expresses their single report, is in direct contrast with the ἔλεγον of the next verse, an imperfect tense which well indicates the repeated announcements of the several women as they came back one after the other. That the tenth verse is briefly recapitulatory of the various reports of the different groups of women, is plain from its structure—ἦσαν δὲ ἡ Μαγδαληνὴ . . . αἱ ἔλεγον . . . ταῦτα. In like manner he, in verse 11, describes the apostles' persistent incredulity of one report after the other by the tense of repetition, ἠπίσταντο αὐταῖς, g. d., 'As many women as came, from time to time, they would disbelieve.'

tardy-minded men; far from entertaining a prejudice or expectation of the Lord's restoration from death; and resisting the manifold evidences of that fact, until disbelief became unreasonable. And as to Mary Magdalene, in whose 'hallucination' the newest criticism discovers the unsubstantial foundation of all subsequent faith in the resurrection (Vie de Jésus, l. c.), it happens, that that noble-hearted woman (whose loving devotion to the Saviour is sadly caricatured in Mon. Rénan's rhapsody), though blessed with almost the earliest conviction of the illustrious truth of the risen Christ (St. John's being the very earliest), could induce no one to accept her testimony; for however true it may be that the reports brought by her and the other women may have startled the eleven out of the first inactivity of their despair, they did not impart any conviction to the apostles; nor is it upon the testimony of the women, much less any one of them, that subsequent Christians received their faith. The strong-minded St. Paul was so emphatic in his belief of the resurrection of Christ as to base the whole value of Christianity upon it alone (1 Cor. xv. 14-18). But while he does this in the strongest possible terms, he in the most studied manner excludes Mary Magdalene and all the other women as witnesses of the historical fact (comp. verses 5-7).

Third Appearance of Christ—to Peter.—When Joanna and her companions circulated their temperate and credible report, it, no doubt, soon reached the ears of that apostle, who of all others, we may well suppose, both from his temperament and the sad memory of his great ingratitude, was the most restless and impatient. We have seen him once at the sepulchre with St. John and Mary Magdalene. This is the visit described in the fourth gospel (xx. 3-10). But St. Luke mentions a hasty visit to the sepulchre as paid by St. Peter alone, the circumstances of which are so different from the former (comp. Luke xxiv. 12), as to justify the supposition that the disquieted apostle, influenced it may be by the strong view of his friend St. John in favour of the women's reports, went again (perhaps unknown to any) in quest of that conviction which he would gladly cherish, if he could only find evidence to satisfy him. This time he did not enter the sepulchre, but like St. John on the former occasion, he stooped down, if haply he could behold at least the vision of angels, of which so much was now being said (comp. Luke xxiii. 23). The result of his anxious but reverent gaze was not satisfactory; and St. Luke—the historian of the incredulity—mildly includes the amazed apostle among the instances of those whose minds, though disturbed, were as yet unconvinced by all they heard. Once more 'he departed' (unblessed by that angelic service, which, though not permitted to announce to him the gospel, as it had to the women, was still destined to protect him from danger when he should have to preach it to others—Acts v. 19; xii. 7), 'wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.' We can hardly suppose that he reached his home, as on the last occasion (John xx. 10), without the blessedness of that full conviction which was in store for his perturbed heart, for we have the assurance of St. Paul that the Lord appeared to him (1 Cor. xv. 5), and that appearance, which St. Paul puts as the earliest of the six he mentions, must have taken place in the course of this morning, some time before mid-day, as may be gathered from St. Luke's reference to it (xxiv. 34). We are not informed of the details of this interview, nor must we detain ourselves with imagining what passed between the deeply penitent disciple and his most gracious master. The result was not only a happy one to him, who of all the male disciples of the Lord was the first to see the mighty conqueror of death, but full of importance to the entire body of Christ's scattered followers, as tending more than any recorded incident to impress on them that faith which was to reunite them.

Fourth Appearance—on the road to Emmaus.—

One of the most beautiful passages of the post-resurrection life of Jesus is narrated by St. Luke (xxiv. 13-35) with so vivid a portraiture of details as to deter us from the attempt to reproduce the story, lest our own words should injure the effect of it. In perfect contrast to his third appearance to St. Peter, over which a veil of mystery hangs, we have here a full revelation of Christ's next manifestation of himself to two of his non-apostolic followers (of the seventy perhaps), as they were on their way to Emmaus, a village which the sacred historian describes as between seven and eight miles from Jerusalem. Intensely human is the whole tone of this exquisite narrative. Cleopas and his companion were deep in conversation on the events which had happened during the Pass-over, which they were leaving with saddened hearts. Jesus, joining company with them, hears their simple but earnest commentary on his own life and death. These were an enigma which they despaired of solving. His life, in deeds and words, how like—his death, in pain and ignominy, how unlike—Messiah! And then the third day was come, a day of strange foreboding to foe and friend! Foreboding, which was now indeed filling their soul with sickening anxiety; for certain women had, just as they were quitting the city, actually declared that they had at the tomb seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive; a report which they could not credit, because certain of themselves, having visited the burial-place to test the women's story, had utterly failed to discover a sight of Him, although they found his grave emptied of its precious charge! The Lord, who is as a stranger to them, reproves them for their unbelief; sets forth Messiah's sufferings as the predestined prelude of his glory, which all their Scriptures, Moses and the prophets alike, might have taught them; kindles in their tardy, but not unloving hearts, a strange glow of warmest interest, as he adapts his wonderful exposition to restore their drooping hopes; and, having by this time arrived at their house and accepted their hospitality, he reveals himself to them in the midst of their consecrated meal. With that divine and awful promptitude, which marks all his movements now, Jesus had no sooner convinced them of his identity, than he mysteriously disappears from their view (ἄφαντος ἐγένετο ἀπ' αὐτῶν, ver. 31). They instantly returned to the city and discovered their fellow-disciples aroused from their despondency; for they, too, had been startled by the increasingly persuasive signs of the Lord's resurrection, which his appearance to Simon Peter had produced amongst them. Who can describe the thrilling scene at that moment, when the meeting of the disciples is aroused with the successive testimony of the apostle first, and then of the two from Emmaus? But the soul of the reader is still more profoundly moved as he passes on through St. Luke's most ravishing history. The Evangelist has occupied us alone up to this point. St. John now joins in the narrative*—for a still greater event impends.

Fifth Appearance—to ten of the apostles and some others.—

The two sacred writers together omit nothing to be desired in a perfect description. It is Sunday evening. The sacred company are assembled in the hostile city with closed doors. The fear of the Jews without, and the perturbations of their own hearts within, as they oscillated between the despondency of the last three days and the indefinite hopes of the last few hours, presented a case of painful suspense worthy of the merciful interposition of the Heart-Comforter, and which none but he could soothe! How timely then is the precious record of the two evangelists: 'Jesus himself came and stood in the midst of them and saith unto them, Peace be unto you!' The last convulsion of unbelief arose from their fright rather than from wilfulness. Full of doubt whether more than the spirit of him, whose body had been so wounded and pierced upon the cross, could be possibly now alive, they supposed that it was his ghost before them! But he who had before death, at death, and since death, borne so long with them mildly meets this new development of their flagging faith. 'Why are ye troubled,' he kindly asks, 'and why do these thoughts arise in your hearts? . . . handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have.' The last remnants of their incredulity still flickered in their hearts. Another gracious attempt is made to quench it. He asked for meat; they gave him a piece of their simple food; he took it, and by eating, gave them the best proof of his corporeity (Luke). 'Then,' adds the fourth Evangelist with exquisite and forcible simplicity, 'Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord' (xx. 20). Having thus, by the gradual steps of his admirable wisdom and gracious longsuffering, plucked out of their tardy nature the last fibres of unbelief which clasped their hearts, he begins to edify and instruct them for their glorious work. He renews his peaceful blessing; opens to them the divine credentials of their mission (John xx. 21), and by the breath of his mouth, shedding on them the gift of the Holy Ghost, he consecrates them to the sublimest functions of ministry in his now approaching kingdom (vers. 22, 23). With this august ceremony ends the first and most wonderful of all Easter days, during which the Lord vindicated his dominion over death and the grave, and, by the most interesting process of psychological and moral suasion anywhere on record, beat down the strongholds of the most obstinate incredulity which had settled in the hearts of his dejected followers. Having traced, with unavoidable prolixity, the steps by which they mounted to the

* St. Mark (xvi. 14) only refers to the Lord's rebuke (at this same appearance) of his disciples' unbelief, in so strenuously resisting the repeated reports of the women, who were in fact his own ministers for leading them to conviction. This verse alone of St. Mark, as it seems to us, is synchronistic with the longer narratives of SS. John and Luke. These Evangelists omit the rebuke, and dwell only on the happy fact of the disciples' conviction of Christ's return to life.

inflexible conviction of their master's resurrection, we may hasten to the end of our grand subject with greater brevity.

Events of the ensuing week, ending with the Sixth Appearance—to the eleven, and, probably, some others.

—We are not informed of any other intercourse of Christ with his followers during the remainder of the week. He might well leave them to ponder over the revelations of the Sunday. We cannot, however, suppose that those who had had the happiness of being convinced of his resurrection would be indifferent about it. There was, no doubt, much effort on the part of the convinced to persuade others to accept the truth. St. Mark seems to intimate as much with respect at least to the two disciples of Emmaus (xvi. 13). Their labours were not always successful; many withheld their assent from their testimony. Even among the eleven there was still one unreclaimed from unbelief. 'The same man,' says Stier (Words of the Lord Jesus [Ciark], viii. 177), 'who once would die with Jesus (John xi. 16) continues resolutely in the same mind, and, as much as in him lies, will not rise again with Jesus.' Thomas was absent when Christ on Sunday evening appeared to his brother-apostles, and, notwithstanding their express assurance to him that they had seen the Lord, he was so oppressed with the image of His suffering and death that he peremptorily refused to believe them, unless he had not only the ocular testimony, which after all might have misled them to mistake a phantom for a man, but the demonstration of touch and feeling; if he could see and touch the print of the nails which he had so surely seen fastening the sacred hands to the cross, and probe with his hand the spear-wound of the sacred side, he would be convinced. This was indeed a harsh incredulity! And for a week did the unhappy man nurture his morbid and exaggerated feelings amidst the Easter joy of his brethren; they would soon, he doubtless thought, be disenchanted of their spell, and would then relapse to his level, in the reminiscence of Calvary and the gloom of the grave. How painful must this isolation of their obstinate brother have been to them! Their grief, however, received a solace on the next Sunday, when they found Thomas actually among them, on an occasion from the like of which they had themselves obtained their conviction and joy. Who could tell whether their merciful Master would not repeat his consolatory visit! They were possibly intent on these thoughts, when Jesus came, the doors being shut as before, and stood in the midst and said, Peace be unto you. Happy omen for the unbeliever, whose presence there argued his wish to believe! 'But long time is not allowed him; his profound shame and confusion are cut short in grace, and the Lord presently (étra) proceeded to his milder and reconciling humiliation—he gives him back his own words, for he knows everything!' (Stier). Did Thomas, thus challenged by his Lord, make the offered scrutiny? Probably not. He felt a gush of conviction; the graciousness of Jesus was enough to subdue him. In the ardour of a new devotion, he exclaims, 'My Lord and my God!' The spectacle of his dear Master's restored humanity proved him conqueror over that death in whose grasp he blindly feared he was inextricably bound; and so vast a triumph as that brought with it the conviction that he was nothing short of divine! Jesus accepted his disciple's magnificent confession, as aforetime he had received those of Nathanael (John i. 49) and Peter (Matt. xvi. 16); but the blessing which he accorded him was a modified one. How should it not be! How many the degrees between the ready and modest faith of the beloved disciple, the first believer in the glorious resurrection, and the tardy and hardly achieved conviction of Thomas Didymus! But the loss of the primitive doubter is our gain, for his incredulity not only elicited fresh evidence of Christ's resurrection, and another illustration of Christ's graciousness—but it drew from the Saviour his sanction of a happy truth, a great law of belief to his church for ever—'Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed.' As we walk in imagination through these scenes of surpassing beauty and interest, we may be apt to sigh that we are not privileged to see and hear what the first disciples saw and heard. But let us check that regret in the blessed compensation which the Saviour has himself provided; well assured that, in the administration of his kingdom, he will not forget his own considerate principle, and accord the especial blessing on the prompt and loyal believer, who, with the well-attested word of God in his hand, foregoes the demonstration of sight and touch (1 Pet. i. 8)!

Christ in Galilee.—We have seen the stress which Jesus repeatedly placed on his wish to meet his disciples in Galilee after his resurrection (see Matt. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 7, 10; Mark xiv. 28; xvi. 7). In this old scene of his labours, where many followers had latterly gathered around him, would he now demonstrate the truth of all his teaching by convincing them of his return from the grave. In this northern province, too, was the home of his disciples who were about to leave Jerusalem at the termination of the passover; and there he would be able to meet them often in the privacy which his mysterious and unworldly communications required, undistracted by the turbulent hostility of the guilty city. In obedience, therefore, to his command by the women, 'the eleven disciples went away into Galilee' (Matt. xxviii. 16). The Lord's first interview with them was in a place full of old associations; 'on that sea where everything would remind them of Jesus—the smiling bank of which, and even its dark waves, had borne his holy footsteps' (Jakobi in Stier, viii. 211).

Christ's Seventh Appearance—the Third to the Apostles (John xxi. 13).—In the account of this manifestation we have another exquisite picture, which we must not mar by a paraphrase. St. John is this time the graphic narrator (xxi. 1-23), and we must refer the reader to his beautiful history. Many points will interest him. The manner in which the names are connected is remarkable (Stier). The highly-favoured Thomas, and the much-forgiven Peter, occur side by side, so that the two men who severally had had such especial experience of the love of their dear Master are united lovingly together in this scene—no longer one of probation, but of fruition. To them is added Nathanael, guileless from the very first, whose home in Cana would suggest the first miracle of the ministry. John's mention of himself and his brother, in this place alone, as 'sons of Zebedee,' carries us back to a scene of like circumstance, when these faithful men, obedient to Christ's call, left their father (no doubt not unwilling to be so left), and their all, to become 'fishers of men.' We before remarked on the sensation produced by the earlier miracle. What a tide of reminiscence must have now flowed in upon the memories of the seven by this recurrence of their Master's characteristic power and kindness! As a mighty work designed to announce the return of the Lost One to life and to Galilee, could any means have answered the purpose better, on the shores of the Sea of Tiberias? There is a mysterious grandeur in the manner of Christ's 'manifestation of himself' (St. John's phrase is very expressive, ἐφάνησεν ἑαυτόν, xxi. 1; ἐφανερώθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ver. 14 ['Id grandius sonat, quam ἐφάνη, apparuit,' says Bengel]); not to mention the mystic import of his loving supply to his toiling and disappointed disciples of an abundant capture; happy omen for them, when they, amidst so many cares and trials, should require his help in their endeavours to catch men. 'The apostle whom Jesus loved is the first to recognise the Lord, and yet (as we might indeed have expected) another is the first [in his characteristic ardour] to greet him. He, who on that very lake, and under circumstances strikingly similar, had besought his holy Master to depart from one so sin-stained (Luke v. 8), now casts himself into the water, and is the first to kneel at the divine feet'—Bishop Ellicott, Lectures, p. 406. After the miraculous draft of fishes, the Lord dedicates the first-fruits of it to giving them another incontestible proof of the truth of his corporeal nature, by 'dining' with them upon the shore. After the meal, Christ, in one of the most interesting and significant scenes of this portion of his life, restores (or rather ratifies his former restoration of) St. Peter to the eminent position from which he had fallen. 'We should remember that Peter's offence, which was given to all, and which corresponded to the public warning given before all, could be properly and fully forgiven only by a public word of reconciliation' (Stier). Hence the significance of this reinvestiture of the apostle to the pastoral office, which he had forfeited. Thrice did the Lord request, and thrice did his earnest and heart-smitten disciple reiterate, the confession of his love to the Master whom he had thrice denied. How affecting was the afflicted apostle's outburst at the last, when, finding his mouth fail for words, he appealed to his Master's own knowledge of 'all' his past and 'all' his present (Κύριε, σὺ πάντα οἶδας! John xxi. 17); from the beginning thou hast known me and searched me—known me as the son of Jonas; called me Peter; drawn me to thee in patience; kindled love in my soul; warned my blindness; foreseen and forgiven my fall; looked both before and since thy death into my heart with eyes of grace; Lord, how shouldst thou not know all? Having accepted Peter's genuine confession of his love, Christ prophetically assures him how great a demand he would make upon that love, for his life of apostolic service would be terminated with a martyr's death! The scene ends with the Lord's removal from it, with the significant request to his disciple to 'follow him' (ἀκολούθει μοι, ver. 19). The world of meaning conveyed herein we will not attempt to unfold. Peter instantly obeyed, followed by the unbidden but always welcome St. John. Wishing to secure him as his dear companion, if it might only be in life and in death, the eager Peter, with a touch of his old forwardness, too curiously inquires about his future also. The Lord mildly reproves the curiosity by only half gratifying it. He recalls Peter to his own case, and again bids him with increased emphasis to follow him (this time it is, Σὺ μοι ἀκολούθει, ver. 22). St. John ends his narrative with an exquisitely artless correction of a popular mistake which had gone abroad respecting his own supposed immunity from death, and with the voucher of his own personal knowledge of the facts which he has just described. We stay not to defend the genuineness of this beautiful record, which is contained in all the principal MSS. of the fourth gospel, and of which the internal evidence shews it to be from St. John's pen as strongly as the external—but hasten to notice the next great event in this period of our Lord's career.

Christ's Eighth Appearance.—Great indeed it was, the very culmination of his sacred displays of himself. St. Matthew, to whom we owe the account of it (xxviii. 16-20), seems to confine the interview to the eleven. But it is his manner to mention salient points, and to imply the rest. He does so here, for by informing us that 'some doubted' among the persons now assembled, he suggests the idea that others were present besides the apostles, who, after all the scenes through which we have been following them, had certainly ceased to doubt. We conclude then, with most commentators, that the present meeting was attended by more than the eleven, and was in truth identical with that to which St. Paul refers (1 Cor. xv. 6), who mentions one occasion on which the Lord was seen by 'more than five hundred brethren at once.' That occasion was the present. It was a solemn and an 'appointed' congregation of all the Lord's followers, to whom he would vouchsafe the glorious privilege of seeing him once more on earth. Galilee would contribute most of them; but we hardly believe that the faithful of the southern districts would be absent. The excellent women, who had so long had the privilege of ministering to him before death, having themselves been elevated to the happy belief of his resurrection, would, we may well imagine, be especially zealous in the holy office of pioneering for this assembly, to which they were in some degree appointed by the Lord himself and his angel (see Matt. xxviii. 7; xxviii. 10; Mark xvi. 7). The locality was a mountain of Galilee, probably the mount of the beatitudes, where, as we have seen, a large number of persons might meet on a plateau of one of its slopes. Mountains are the sites of the grandest events in the Lord's career on earth. On a mountain was he tempted; on a mountain did he expound the principles of his kingdom, as well as choose his apostles; on a mountain was he transfigured when he gave his select witnesses an insight of his glory; on a mountain did he foretell the doom of Jerusalem and the end of the world; from a mountain will he soon ascend to heaven; and on a mountain does he now meet the full conclave of his followers, to prove to them the reality of his dominion over death by the only public attestation he ever gave of the truth of his resurrection. How sublime the scene! Himself the centre of all, with the holy eleven around him in profoundest adoration (Matt. xxviii. 17), and the rest either prostrate with them in the conviction of a settled faith, or conquering 'doubt' by the wondering and joyous scrutiny of strained eyes (see Stier, viii. 278). How thrilling the effect when Jesus announced to them, as God's final and full ratification of all his work and passion for them, the mighty words: 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth!' On another mountain the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them were once offered to him by the great usurper, as the guerdon of fealty to him. Glorious constancy, which disdained the glittering bait, and earned the present prize of omnipotence in heaven as well as earth! But not glorious for himself alone: he even at this moment lays his gracious plans for making his followers 'partakers of his glory,' by issuing from this Galilean mount of reunion his great evangelical commission for gathering from all nations a people for himself, who, disciplined by his own appointed means, and blessed by his own abiding presence, shall thus be organised for the eternal fruition of his everlasting reign (Rev. i. 6 and xi. 15; comp. with Dan. vii. 14). When we were contemplating Christ's ministry in Galilee we found abundant reason for congratulating that rough and despised province on the wondrous grace of which it was the favoured recipient. Too often was that grace despised; but yet Christ had verified the promise of an ancient prophet (Is. ix. 1, 2). But have we not in the Lord's posthumous grace to Galilee, by the remarkable event we have just contemplated, a still more glorious accomplishment of the great seer's words?

Ninth Appearance—to James.—We are indebted to St. Paul for the knowledge of the very interesting fact that the Lord vouchsafed an interview with one of the two apostles who bore the name of James. There are some who have thought that he was one of the Emmaus disciples, and that Cleophas was his father, and that therefore his sight of the Saviour was on the day of the resurrection. It is, we need hardly say, fatal to this view that the two disciples are by St. Luke expressly distinguished from the eleven (xxiv. 33). St. Paul probably enumerates his six appearances of Christ in order; if so, we must place Christ's visit to this solitary apostle after the full meeting of his disciples in Galilee (ἔπειτα, i.e., subsequently to the appearance on the mountain, ὑπὸ τῷ Ἰακώβῳ, 1 Cor. xv. 7). The question, which James enjoyed this signal blessing, is not so easily disposed of. Indeed, it is impossible to solve it. The greatly preponderant opinion supposes him to have been the son of Alphæus, and the Lord's cousin. The story of the apocryphal gospel, that Christ appeared to release him from the bond of a rash vow, is unworthy of the least attention. In the Acts, and in one of St. Paul's Epistles, this James is prominently mentioned in connection with the church of Jerusalem (Acts. xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9), of which ecclesiastical tradition makes him the first bishop, designated as such by the Lord himself (so Theophylact and Photius; see Hammond on 1 Cor. xv. 7). Whether the tradition truly illustrates St. Paul's statement, or was suggested by it, we cannot tell. It is not too much to suppose, that among the gracious intentions of Christ's love to Jerusalem, he might have singled out for this special interview his relative, the son of his mother's sister, and imparted to him some of that wisdom which enabled him to take so prominent a part in planting the gospel in 'the Holy City,' and to allay the dangerous schism that threatened the infant church (Acts xv.) To us, however, while we would not venture to reject this prevalent opinion, there seems to be a thrilling interest in the idea, that the gracious Jesus, who had himself tasted the pains of the martyr's death, and had expressly awarded to the son of Zebedee the honourable destiny of drinking the same cup and receiving the same baptism of suffering with himself (Matt. xx. 23; Mark x. 39), did now in truth pay this mysterious visit to James the Great, to strengthen the brother of 'the disciple whom he loved' for the painful but blessed prerogative which awaited him, of being the very first to win the martyr's crown among his twelve apostles!

Tenth Appearance, at the time of the Ascension.—Having accomplished his long-ordained purpose of meeting his people in Galilee, he probably intimated to them that Jerusalem must be the scene of his last sight of them on earth, for in his next interview with them we find him request his disciples not to depart from that city (Acts i. 4). At any rate, whether expressly bidden, or led by some strange mysterious presentiment, such as preceded the translation of Elijah in the minds of his companions and pupils (2 Kings ii. 1-7), the apostles betook themselves to Jerusalem with hearts full of exalted expectations. Taught by the Holy Spirit, which he had breathed upon them in initial grace, they had doubtless corrected their hopes of an earthly dominion. A kingdom, however, they still looked for, spiritual in character and strength, having Israel for the focus of its glory. Of 'the things of that kingdom' they had been hearing for forty days (Acts i. 3) in the recorded and unrecorded (see John xx. 30) communications of their Lord. They seized their last opportunity earnestly to inquire (ἐπηρώτων αὐτὸν is St. Luke's word, Acts i. 6) whether now was the time when he meant to set up his promised kingdom (ἀποκαθιδρύσει τὴν βασιλείαν; i.e.) In his gracious answer Christ does not reprove their question as materially erroneous, but corrects their views as to the time. The period of the revelation of his kingdom, and its epochs (χρόνους ἢ καιροὺς), the Almighty Father, to whose will he once more (as always) refers everything, reserves in his own power, as his own incommunicable secret. But meanwhile the preparations for that kingdom must be made, and here was a life-long work for them all. To empower them for that work he would endue them with the gifts of that Spirit of which they had often heard since they had first received their earliest yearnings for a new life from his faithful forerunner, whose name and baptism he loves once more to acknowledge (Acts i. 5). John from the beginning had announced the grandest of Christ's gifts to man: 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost' (Matt. iii. 18; Mark i. 8; Luke iii. 16; John i. 33). For that gift they were now to tarry awhile; it would soon be bestowed. In the endowments of that gift they should go forth from Jerusalem, Judæa, and Samaria, to the earth's utmost bounds; unfurl the banner of their Lord's kingdom, and win subjects into it. As Christ was opening out to them this wonderful future, he was walking towards the beloved Bethany. While yet on the eastern slope of Olivet, near that village, he was in the act of once more blessing his disciples, with hands upraised towards the sky, when, lo! he was parted from them. With intense and adoring gaze they beheld him as he was rising higher and higher still (ἀνέφερετο marks the gradual ascent, Luke xxiv. 51), until a cloud received him out of their sight. Two angelic monitors restrained their curiosity and regret by the consolatory promise that 'the same Jesus should return in the same manner as they had just seen him ascend.' Onward! has ever been the gospel word. From the incarnation men's look was directed to the cross; from the cross to the resurrection; from the resurrection to the ascension; and now from the ascension to the ultimate return. The cloud hides him not from faith; the sacred volume ends with the echo of the promise: 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus' (Rev. xxii. 20). Nay, it hides him not from sight! From his mediatorial throne he has been seen by his holy servants in their need and peril. The protomartyr saw him 'standing at the right hand of God to succour all that suffer for him' (Collect for St. Stephen's day), and the beloved disciple saw him; he was clad with glory indeed too bright for mortal eye to scan without alarm—but he was the same gracious Jesus still; he laid his right hand upon the affrighted apostle, and calmed his fears with the assurance of his unchangeable identity: 'saying, Fear not; I am the first and the last; I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death' (Rev. i. 13-18).

Authorities.—In writing this sketch of the Lord's life on earth, close use has been made of the Sacred Biographies by the four Evangelists, especially in the 'harmonised' editions of Tischendorf (Synopsis Evangelica, 1854) and Robinson (Harmony of the Four Gospels, Tract Society). Greswell's works have been also consulted, especially his Harmony, Dissertations [2d ed.,] and papers in the Bibliotheca Sacra [1845]. Besides these, more or less use has been made of Bp. Ellicott's Hulsean Lectures on the Life of Christ [2d ed., 1861]; the Commentaries of Alford, Wordsworth, Burgon, Is. Williams, Rosenmüller, Bengel (Gnomon), Olshausen [Clark], De Wette, Meyer, Kuinoel, Lange [Clark], and Tholuck [Clark]; Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus, and Words of the Angels [Clark]; Hengstenberg's Christology [Clark]; Anger's Synopsis Evangeliorum [1852]; Clerici, Harmonia Evangelica; Patritius, De Evangelis [1853]; Das Leben Jesu, by Lange, by Sepp, by Hofmann (nach den Apokryphen), by Hase (who treats most fully of the literature on the subject), and by Neander [Bohn]; Ewald's Christus; Baumgarten's Geschichte Jesu; Bp. Jeremy Taylor's Life of Christ; 'The Messiah' (an anonymous volume published by Mr. Murray); Andrews' Life of our Lord upon the Earth [1863]; Dr. Macbride's Lectures on the Diatessaron; Townson's Discourses on the Four Gospels; Wilson on the New Testament; West and Michaelis on the Resurrection; Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses; De Costa's Four Witnesses; Griesbach's Fontes Evangeliorum [In his Opuscula]; the Chronological Works of Wieseler and Ideler; Browne's Ordo Saeculorum; Abp. Thomson's Jesus Christ [in Smith's Bibl. Dict.]; Lichtenstein's Jesus Christus, Abriss seines Lebens [in Herzog's R. E., vol. vi.]; Pearson on the Creed; Bp. Andrew's Sermons [folio]; Bp. Hackett's Sermons [folio]; the Rabbinical Works of Schoettgen, Meuschen, Lightfoot [Pitman], Ugolini [in The-sauri], Wagenseil, and Dr. Gill [Commentary, quarto ed., 1809]. Rénan's Vie de Jésus has been consulted latterly. It contains, no doubt, much illustrative matter, written in a very interesting style. The author, however, throughout his work, treats our Lord's life before the grave (from which, alas! he is supposed never to have arisen) in an entirely rationalistic point of view. A heathen might have written the work, so utterly are the phenomena of Christianity in its miraculous aspect effaced and rejected by Mon. Rénan, who, professing to receive the four gospels as his authority, retains or eliminates, at will, whatever pleases or embarrasses his critical instinct!

The nature of the subject has prohibited a controversial cast in this article; it may, however, be not improper to state, that this newest phase of scepticism is little more than old unbelief in a modern guise. Old works not only of our own authors on the evidences, but of M. Rénan's own countrymen (especially Duguet, Principes de la Foi Chrétienne, pp. ii. iii.), supply abundant materials for refuting the assumptions of his 'criticism.' These are being well applied by Rénan's opponents in France, such as Freppel (Examen critique de la Vie de Jésus de M. Rénan); Poujoulat (Examen de la V. de J.); Bp. Plantier of Nîmes (Instruction Pastorale contre un ouvrage intitulé V. de J. par Ernest Rénan). In M. Nicholas' Etudes Philosophiques sur le Christianisme (vol. iv. chaps. i. ii.), there is, by anticipation, much help for answering M. Rénan's infidelity.—P. H.

JESUS (Ἰησοῦς; יְהוֹשֻׁעַ), son of Sirach, called among the Jews בֶּן סִירָא Ben-Sira, the celebrated author of the Book of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus, flourished in Jerusalem about B. C. 310-270. This date is obtained from the following facts: 1. Ben Sira celebrates in xlv. 1-1. 21, the praises of Israel's worthies in an almost chronological order. Beginning with Enoch, he continues to recount the deeds or mentions the names of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, Samuel, Nathan, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Josiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, the twelve Minor Prophets, Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and concludes the list with Simon, son of Onias, whom he mentions next to Nehemiah. Now, it is morally certain, that if Ben Sira had lived in the days of Simon II., B. C. 217, and had terminated his catalogue of national benefactors with this insignificant high-priest, he would most assuredly not have omitted the great men between Nehemiah and Simon II., and above all would not have passed over with silence Simon I., whom the Jewish nation regarded as the personification of goodness, nobility, and grandeur, and whom they crowned with the title, the Just, the Pious. From the regularity of the catalogue, therefore, and especially from the extraordinary terms of the description, it is evident that it is Simon I. (flour. B. C. 370-300) who is celebrated next to Nehemiah, and that Ben Sira, who was a contemporary of Simon [ECCLESIASTICUS], must have lived about 310 B. C. 2. The Talmud most distinctly describes the work of Ben Sira as the oldest of the Apocryphal books (comp. Tosifoth Idaim, c. ii.). 3. It had a general currency and was quoted at least as early as 150 B. C. (comp. Aboth. i. 5; Jerusalem Nazier, v. 13), which shows that it must have existed a long period to have obtained such circulation and respect; and 4. In the description of these great men, and throughout the whole of the book, there is not the slightest trace of those Hagadic legends about the national worthies which were so rife and numerous two centuries before Christ.

As to the life and personal character of Ben Sira, this must be gathered from his book, as it is the only source of information which we possess upon the subject. Like all his co-religionists, he was trained from his early life to fear and love the God of his fathers. He travelled much both by land and sea when he grew up, and was in frequent perils (Ecclus. xxxiv. 11, 12). Being a diligent student, and having acquired much practical knowledge from his extensive travels, he was entrusted with some office at court, and his enemies, who were jealous of him, maligned him before the king, which nearly cost him his life (li. 6, 7). To us, however, his religious life and sentiments are of the utmost importance, inasmuch as they describe the opinions of the Jews during the period elapsing between the O. and N. T. Though deeply penetrated with the fear of God, which he declared was the only glory of man, rich, noble, or poor (x. 22-24), still the whole of Ben Sira's tenets may be described as limited, and are as follows: Resignation to the dealings of Providence (xi. 21-25); to seek truth at the cost of life (iv. 28); not to use much babbling in prayer (vii. 14); absolute obedience to parents, which in the sight of God atones for sins (iii. 1-16; vii. 27, 28); humility (iii. 17-19; x. 7-18, 28); kindness to domestics (iv. 30; vii. 20, 21; xxxiii. 30, 31); to relieve the poor (iv. 1-9); to act as a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow (iv. 10); to visit the sick (vii. 35); to weep with them that weep (vii. 34); not to rejoice over the death of even the greatest enemy (vii. 7), and to forgive sins as we would be forgiven (xxviii. 2, 3). He has nothing in the whole of his book about the immortality of the soul, a future judgment, the existence of spirits, or the expectation of a Messiah. These are remarkable facts.—C. D. G.

JETHER (יֶתֶר). 1. Exod. iv. 18 (LXX. 'Ιεθάρ;

Vulg. Jethro; Arab. يثرون; Pesh. ܝܬܪܐ; Targ.

Jon. and Samar. יֶתֶר), the father-in-law of Moses, generally called Jethro. This abbreviated form is enumerated by the Midrash as the first of the seven (or, according to another version, eight) names by which this Midianite priest was known [viz., Jether or Jethro, because he heaped up (הוֹתִיר) good deeds, or because 'he added a Parasha to the Torah'; Cheber (חֶבֶר), because he was a friend of the Lord; Chobeb (חֹבֵב), because he was beloved by the Lord, or because 'he loved the Torah'; Reuel, because he was a companion (רֵעַ) to the Lord; Petuel, because he freed himself (פָּטַר) from Idolatry]. Indeed, Jether is considered his original name, to which, when he became a believer and a convert to the faith, an additional letter (י) was affixed; exactly as, in token of the Divine favour and grace, a ה was added to Abram's name, which thereby became Abraham; or as Sarai was called Sarah, in consideration of her merits; and Hoshea bin Nun was called Jehoshuah. On the other hand, we find a letter taken from a name, if its owner proved less worthy. Ephrôn, is, after his transaction with Abraham, spelt without the ה, Ephrôn; Jehonadab became after his evil deed Jonadab (Beresh. Rab. ; Jalkut, etc., ad loc.)

2. Judg. viii. 20 (LXX. 'Ιεθάρ; Vulg. Jether; Arab. يثار Jâthâr). The eldest of Gideon's seventy-one sons. All we learn of him is, that when asked by his father Gideon to avenge the death of his uncles at Tabor on the two Midianite kings Zebach and Zalmunah, who had fallen into his hands after a hot pursuit, Jether 'did not draw the sword, for he was afraid, being still a lad.' According to Judg. ix. 8 he was slain, together with sixty-nine of his brothers—Jonathan alone escaping—'upon one stone' at Ofrah, by the hands of Abimelech, the son of Gideon's concubine, of Sichem.

3. 1 Kings ii. 5, 32 (LXX. 'Ιεθάρ; Vulg. Jether, etc.); the father of Amasa and husband of Abigail, David's sister. In 2 Sam. xvii. 25, however, Amasa is described as the son of a man whose name was Jithra, יִתְרָא, the Israelite, who had come to Abigail, daughter of Nahash, the sister of Zerujah, mother of Joab. In the parallel passage, 1 Chron. ii. 17, on the other hand, he is called 'Jether the Ishmaelite.' Many have been the attempts of reconciling these discrepancies. That Jether and Jithra were in reality one and the same name was easily recognised, since Jether and Jithro, Tarshish and Tarshisha, Geba and Gibea, and many similar instances, shewed the frequent occurrence of double forms of Hebrew proper names. Less easily disposed of, however, was the difficulty of the contradictory epithets of 'Israelite' in the passage of Sam., and of 'Ishmaelite' in that of Chron. The Talmud records already two divergent opinions on the subject (Jer. Jebam. 9, c, cf. Babli Jeb. 77, a). According to R. Samuel bar Nachmani, Jether was an Ishmaelite by birth, but became a proselyte: hence the two appellations. Another opinion is, that, a staunch upholder of David's reign, he, when the king's descent through Ruth, a Moabite woman, was made a pretext by some of his antagonists to deprive him of his crown, 'girded his loins like an Ishmaelite' and threatened to uphold by the sword, if need be, the authority of the Halacha, which had decided that 'a Moabite man but not a Moabite woman, an Ammonite man but not an Ammonite woman, should be prohibited from entering into the congregation. Similarly we find in the Targ. to 1 Chron. ii. 17 (Wilkins' Edition)—this verse belongs to those wanting in Beck) that the father of Amasa was Jether the Israelite, but that he was called Jether the Ishmaelite because he aided David בְּנִרְכָּאָה (= בֵּית דִּין) before the tribunal [Wilkins, 'cum Arabibus!!']. Later commentators (Rashi, Abrahanel, David Kimchi) assume that he was an Israelite by birth but dwelt in the land of Ishmael, and was for this reason also called the Ishmaelite; as Obed Edom is also called the Gittite (2 Sam. vi.), or Hiram's father the Zuri or Tyrian (1 Kings vi.). David Kimchi also adduces a suggestion of his father, to the effect 'that in the land of Ishmael Jether was called the Israelite from his nationality, and in that of Israel they called him the Ishmaelite on account of his living in the land of Ishmael.' It is the opinion, however, of almost all modern critics (Thenius, Bertheau, etc.), that one reading only is correct, viz., that of Chronicles, that these attempts at explaining the discrepancy are as futile as those of the Vulg. and LXX. at solving the difficulty by substituting in Sam. 'Jezreeli' for 'Israelite,' and that it is also more natural to assume that some ultra-patriotic scribe has altered the 'Ishmaelite' of Chron. into the 'Israelite' of Sam., than that the latter should have been corrupted into the former. It seems remarkable enough—and may for this very reason have been recorded—that the sister of the king should have married one who was born a Gentile. Attention has, indeed, been drawn of old to the peculiar mode in which Jether's name is introduced in Samuel as that of 'a man,'—emphat.: a remarkable man, a good man' (Kimchi). The Talmud interprets the יֶתֶר as denoting that the rightful marriage between Jether and Abigail only took place at a later period, that is, after he had abjured Idolatry. [ABIGAIL; AMASA.]

4. 1 Chron. ii. 32; LXX. 'Ιεθέρ; Vulg. Jether; a son of Jada, nephew of Shamai, and brother of Jonathan, of the tribe of Judah. He died without issue.

5. 1 Chron. iv. 17; LXX. 'Ιεθέρ; Vulg. Jether (identified by some—most gratuitously—with Amram); a son of Ezra and brother of Mered, Ephraim, and Jalon. The verse in which it occurs is evidently corrupted, and the commentators have tried hard to restore the former to its primitive shape. Miriam, in the second part of the verse—explained by the Targum to be identical with Efrath—is taken by many to be a male name, but this expedient no more renders the reading clearer than the transposition of the end of ver. 18 and ver. 17, which was first suggested by Wette. [MIRIAM.]

6. 1 Chron. vii. 38; LXX. 'Ιεθέρ; Al. 'Ιεθέρ; Vulg. Jether; one of the heads of the families—26,000 in number—of the tribe of Asher, who were 'choice and mighty men of valour, chiefs of the princes.' He was the father of Jephuneh, Pispah, and Ara. Whether he be identical with the Jithra—spelt in Alex. and one Kenn. MS. 'Jether'—who is mentioned in the preceding verse as one of the sons of Zophai, is very doubtful.

7. Whether the Ithrites, Ira and Gareb (יִתְרִי, 'Ιεθρί, 'Ιεθρί, 'Ιεθρί, Jethrites, Jethraeus, etc.), mentioned in 2 Sam. xxiii. 38, etc., were natives of an otherwise unknown place called Jether, or of Jathir (יִתִּיר, one of David's places of refuge (1 Sam. xxx. 27), or descendants of one Jether—the least probable suggestion—cannot now be determined.—E. D.

JETHETH (יֶתֶת, 'Ιεθ; Jetheth [a tent stake or nail, from the unused root יָתַר, 'to drive in,' the name being a contraction of יִתְרֶת]). One of the eleven sheikhs or heads of clans (E. V., 'Dukes') descended from Esau, named subsequently to the list of 'the kings that reigned in the land of Edom,' Gen. xxxvi. 40, 1 Chron. i. 51, 'according to their families, after their places, by their names, and according to their habitations in the land of their possessions.' No trace of the name can be pointed out with any certainty at the present day.—E. V.

JETHRO (יֶתְרוֹ, Exod. iii. 1; יֶתֶר, Exod. iv. 18; LXX. 'Ιοθέρ). The priest and Emir (כֹּהֵן) of Midian, possibly a descendant of Abraham and Keturah, and therefore not of necessity an idolatrous priest. According to the Midrash (fol. 53. 54) he had been one of Pharaoh's musicians, and had got possession of Adam's staff, which had belonged to Joseph; but he was driven from Egypt because he opposed the decree for drowning the Israelitish infants. All that is certain about him, before entering into the vexed question of his identity with or relation to Raguel and Hobab, is (1) that he was the father-in-law (חָתָן) of Moses, to whom he gave a secure and honourable home during his flight from Egypt (Exod. iii. 1), and whom he suffered to return to Egypt with his wife and family (Exod. iv. 18) when the hour for the deliverance of Israel arrived; and (2) that, in the second month* after the exodus he came to visit Moses, bringing with him Zipporah, Gershom, and Eliezer, who had apparently been sent back (Exod. xviii. 2) during the interval. He was led to pay this visit by a report of God's mighty deliverance of the Israelites, and when Moses had received him with the greatest affection and respect (ver. 7), and narrated to him 'all that the Lord had done,' Jethro acknowledged the supremacy of Jehovah (ver. 11), which perhaps he had known but dimly before, and took part with Aaron and the elders of Israel in a great eucharistic sacrifice, which may have been intended to commemorate his fuller admission into the Jewish religion. The next morning (ver. 13), observing the overwhelming judicial labours of Moses, he recommended a most wise subdivision of labour, which, with God's approval (ver. 23), was immediately adopted. After this he departs to his own country, and we hear no more of him. The events which further belong to his life, if he be identified with Hobab, will be found under that name, but we may in any case dismiss without further notice the idle suggestion of Göthe that his dealings with the Israelites were partly influenced by a selfish regard for the security of his own tribe.

A certain measure of obscurity has long hung over the names Raguel or Reuel (Heb. רְעוּל), Jethro, and Hobab; nor is it possible, with the Biblical data, to arrive at any final conclusion. Four suppositions are possible respecting these names—1, that they are three different names of the same person; 2, that they are the names of three different persons; 3, that they refer to two persons only, Jethro being identical with Reuel; or 4, Jethro and Hobab being two names of the son of Reuel.

In favour of 1, are these facts—(a) All three names are similar in meaning, and might, either of them, have been mere honorary designations. Raguel means 'friend of God,' a natural name for one who was a priest or prince; Jethro means 'excellence,' and Hobab 'beloved.' (b) They are identified in the Talmudic tradition, which asserts that the father-in-law of Moses had seven names, three of which were Reuel, Hobab, and Jethro. But, on the other hand, why should three names be used for the same person? It is true that the Jews frequently bore two names, as Jacob and Israel, Esau and Edom, Benjamin and Benoni, Gideon and Jerubbaal, Solomon and Jedidiah; and, to take a still closer parallel, we find Nehemiah sometimes called only by his title, 'the Tirshatha' (Neh. viii. 8). But in all these cases we are informed of the double name, and pains are taken to remove all ambiguity. Nor will Eichhorn's suggestion of different documents help us; because even if such were proved to have been the source of this varied nomenclature, it is incredible either that the compiler should have been guilty of so much carelessness, or that he should have added no explanatory note. Besides this, Hobab is in Num. x. 29 distinctly called 'the son of Raguel.'

* The arguments of Aben Ezra, Rashbam, and others, that this visit belongs to the second year after the exodus are untenable. See Kalisch on Exod. xviii. 1.

If (2) we suppose them to be three different persons we are met by the impossibility of explaining the suppression of Jethro's name as the father of Zipporah in Exod. ii., whereas he appears prominently in Exod. iii. 1. We shall also be obliged to make אב mean 'grandfather' in Exod. ii. 18, which the whole tenor of the context here renders inadmissible. For, whatever be the meaning of the disputed term חתן (Exod. iii. 1), it cannot be doubted that Jethro always appears in the capacity of father, and not brother to Zipporah. If indeed we could accept the ingenious conjecture of Ewald (Gesch. d. Volkes, sec. ii. 33) that, by an ancient clerical error the words יתרו בן, 'Jethro son of,' had dropped out before the name of Reuel, it would then be easy with the Targum Jonathan, Aben Ezra, Rosenmüller, etc., to assume that Jethro was Reuel's son. Since, however, there is no trace of such an error, we conclude (3) that Jethro and Reuel are identical, a view supported by the authority of Josephus (Antiq. ii. 12. 1, Ἰεθροῦ υἱὸν ἐπικλήματι τῷ Ραγουήλ), and adopted by Von Lengerke (Kanaan, i. 393), Bertheau (Gesch. Isr., sec. 242), Kalisch (Exod., p. 35), and others. The difficulty arising from the unexplained use of two names in close proximity still remains; but it is less than that involved by any other view.

The fourth supposition—that Jethro is identical with Hobab, is the most common; nevertheless it seems to us exceedingly improbable. It rests mainly on the fact that in Judg. iv. 11* Hobab is called the חתן (A. V., father-in-law) of Moses. It is true that חתן generally means father-in-law, and this is alone sufficient to account for the identification of Jethro with Hobab (Schoeib) in the Mohammedan traditions (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Schoeib; Weil, Bibl. Leg., s. 168, etc.) But it is certain† from Gen. xix. 14, if not from 2 Kings viii. 27 and other passages, that חתן may mean merely 'marriage-connection,' and therefore brother-in-law (Jerome, Cognatus). Nothing therefore prevents us from regarding Hobab as the son of Jethro (or Reuel, Judg. iv. 11), and brother-in-law of Moses, a view which is rendered absolutely necessary by the statements that Jethro could not be persuaded to stay with the Israelites (Exod. xviii. 27), whereas Hobab not only acted as their hybeer, or caravan-guide, in the desert, but actually accompanied them into Palestine, and settled among them (Judg. iv. 11, i. 16. See KENI; KENITES; RECHABITES).

We therefore infer that Jethro and Raguel are identical, the latter being his local title as a 'priest' of Midian, and the former the name by which he was best known to the Jews; and that Hobab was his son, whom he left to act as a guide to the Israelites on his own return to his native land. This supposition seems required by the conditions of the case, and leaves no contradiction in the Mosaic narrative (see HOBAB; JETHER; KENI, etc.)—F. W. F.

* Num. x. 29 adds nothing to this; for there חתן may, and therefore probably does, apply to Raguel.

JETUR (יִטְרָה), perhaps = מִירָה, 'an encampment of Nomads'; יִטְרוֹר, and in 1 Chron. v. 19 Ἰτροῦραι; Jetur, Iturai, a son of Ishmael who, with his family, occupied and colonised the province of ITUREA, which see (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31).—J. L. P.

JEUSH (יְעוּשׁ). 1. (Sept. Ἰεούς.) A son of Esau by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi. 18; 1 Chron. i. 35, Sept. Ἰεούλ), one of the אלוֹפִים, or heads of a tribe among the Edomites. In vers. 5 and 14 the Chetib is יְעוּשׁ, but there is a K'ri in both cases, giving יְעוּשׁ. 2. (Sept. Ἰαούς.) Son of Bilhan, son of Jediel of the tribe of Benjamin, head of a house and a man of valour in the time of David (1 Chron. vii. 10, 11). 3. (Sept. Ἰωάς.) A Gershomite Levite, son of Shemei, reckoned along with his brother Beriah as one house in the census taken by David (1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11). 4. (Sept. Ἰεούς.) Son of Rehoboam by Abihail, daughter of Eliab, the son of Jesse (2 Chron. xi. 19).—W. L. A.

JEW, JEWS THE (יְהוּדִים, יְהוּדִי, or יְהוּדִיָּם; Chald. יְהוּדָאִי; Sept. and N. T. Ἰουδαῖος, or Ἰουδαῖοι). The term 'Jew' seems to have come into use first as the designation of a subject of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings xvi. 6; xxv. 25; Jer. xxxii. 12; xxxviii. 19; xl. 11; xliii. 9), though in some of these passages it is probably used in a wider sense as applicable to all who were of the seed of Abraham, and such is undoubtedly its meaning in Jer. xxxiv. 9. After the return from the Captivity it became the designation of the whole Israelitish people (Joseph. Antiq. xi. 5. 7), a consequence probably of the predominance of the members of the kingdom of Judah among those who returned. In the later books of the O. T. we find the term thus frequently used and even extended to those who still remained dispersed among the Gentiles (Ezra iv. 12, 23; v. 5; vi. 8, etc.; Neh. i. 2; ii. 16; v. 1, etc.; Dan. iii. 8, 12; Zech. viii. 1; Esth. iii. 4, 6, etc.)

In the N. T. Ἰουδαῖος is used as a noun.—1. To describe a descendant of Jacob, a member of the Jewish community as distinguished from one of Gentile birth (Mark vii. 3; Luke xxiii. 51; John iv. 9; Acts xix. 33, 34, etc.). 2. To indicate one who adhered to the Jewish religion and modes of worship, especially as distinguished from the followers of Jesus Christ (Rom. ii. 17; iii. 1; 1 Cor. ix. 20; Gal. ii. 15, etc.). 3. To denote one who truly came up to the spiritual idea of the Jewish institute, who was a true son of the covenant in its higher, its spiritual aspect (Rom. ii. 28, 29; Rev. ii. 9). The phrase of Ἰουδαῖοι sometimes occurs with an implied allusion to the antagonism between those who adhered to the Mosaic institute and those who embraced Christianity, to describe those who came forth as the active enemies of Christ and his cause. In this sense it is used especially by St. John in his Gospel: and in this sense also it appears to be en-

ployed in Matt. xxviii. 13, and in Acts xii. 3; xx. 3. By the classical writers the term 'Jews' is used as the proper designation of the Hebrew people. The references they make shew, for the most part, utter ignorance both of the history and character of the people. As to the origin of the name, Justin says (xxvi. 2): Omnes ex nomine Judæ qui post divisionem decesserat, Judæos appellavit (Israhel); Plutarch makes Judæus, the ancestor of the Jews, a son of Typhon, and brother of Hierosolymus (De Isid. et Osir., c. 31); Tacitus (Hist. v. 2) connects the name Judæus with Ida, a mountain in Crete; while Dio Cassius (xxxvii. 17) honestly acknowledges that he knows not whence it came into use. The most important statements respecting the Jews found in the classical writers are those made by Tacitus (Hist. v. 4. 1; v. 2); but in these we find traces of ignorance and strong prejudice. The national pride and exclusiveness of the Jews, and the contempt with which they regarded all whom they stigmatised as 'the uncircumcision,' could not but produce a reactive effect on the minds of men of other nations; and this appears in such expressions as 'terrima gens,' applied to them by Tacitus (Hist. v. 8. 2); in his ascribing to them 'adversus omnes alios hostile odium;' and in such statements as those of Juvenal (Sat. xiv. 103), Diod. Sic. (Eclog. xxxiv. 1), Quintilian (Inst. iii. 7. 21), Dio Cassius (xlix. 22), and Suetonius (Nero. xvi.) Strabo (xvi. p. 760) charges on them superstition and tyranny, though his account of them is on the whole more favourable than those of the preceding. The most friendly notice of them by any of the classical writers is that of Justin (xxvi. 1-3), which though full of inaccuracies is on the whole just to the reputation of the people. It is not to be expected that the true character and worth of the Jewish people should be understood by the heathen.

The external history of the Jews, after their return from the Captivity, and their full settlement in their own land, may be arranged under five epochs. The first is that of the Persian supremacy, reaching from B.C. 536 to 330, when the Persian kingdom fell with Darius Codomannus. The second is that of the Greco-Macedonian rule, from 330 to 167. During this period the Jews were successively subject to the Greek kings of Egypt (323-221), then alternately to those of Egypt and Syria, and ultimately wholly to those of Syria from the time of Seleucus Philopator to that of Antiochus Epiphanes. The third is that of the struggle for freedom and national independence, the age of the Maccabees, from 167 to 141. The fourth is that of national independence under princes of their own nation, from 141 to 63. The fifth is that of the Roman rule, during which the Jews were at first governed immediately by princes of their own blood, afterwards by princes of the Idumæan race, and ultimately partly by Roman officers, partly by tetrarchs and kings of the family of Herod, from B.C. 63 to A.D. 70, when Jerusalem was taken (Jost, Gesch. der Israeliten seit der Zeit der Maccabæer, 9 vols., Berl. 1820-28). See articles CYRUS; DARIUS; ALEXANDER; ANTIOCHUS; MACCABEES; HERODIAN FAMILY; DISPERSION OF THE JEWS; HELLENISTS; JERUSALEM.

'Through the whole of the post-exilian period,' says Winer (Realw., s. v. Juden), 'the religio-political character of the Jews remained the same as that which the Israelites had gradually assumed during the exile; it unmistakably stamped itself on their public and private life, and its development was sustained even by the trials through which the people passed. That great calamity had confirmed what all the better prophets had so often foretold, that unfaithfulness to Jehovah, and defection from the law of their fathers, would bring the people to their fall. Shame and repentance, consequently, seized the Israelites, now fully roused to reflection; and zeal for the law and religion became the general watchword. As happens, however, usually with the mass, this zeal attached itself chiefly to the outward and visible, degenerated into a painful regard to the letter; coxcombry was allied to rude particularism. The understanding, cultivated by the synagogue worship, which was directed for the most part to instruction, obtained the preponderance over feeling and living intuition; tradition almost wholly suppressed the written law; and work-holiness began to be held for virtue. With all this there nevertheless crept in a foreign element, not only in manners and general culture, but even in belief. The greater their zeal, the more eagerly did they seize upon Chaldaic dogmas, which could be fastened on to Mosaism, or only seemed to be explanatory of it; and though over against the Greek philosophy a Jewish learning was formed, which united the foreign with the native by means of allegorical interpretation, and set forth the Scriptures as the source of all the wisdom of the world, there yet imperceptibly crept into the mind strange beliefs, and foreign speculation cast the simple religion of their fathers into the shade. Agriculture ceased to be the main source of wealth for the nation, partly because this no longer was adapted to the increased population, partly because the Israelites had during the Captivity acquired a taste for traffic, and found in the situation of their recovered fatherland, and in the extension of general intercourse among the nations, a stimulus to mercantile pursuits. There thus arose among the mass of the post-exilian Israelites the same tendency essentially which may be seen in the dispersed Jews of the present day, only now in a more marked form. and exacerbated by the loss of country (comp. Neander, K. G., I. 1. 47 [E. T., I. 47. ff.]; J. W. N. Roringer, de mutati Hebr. ingenii post redit. e Captiv. Babylon. ratione et causis, Leid. 1820; De Wette, Bibl. Theol., sec. 64, ff.; Sittenlehre, II. 69, ff.)'

In Jost's Geschichte d. Judenthums, 3 vols. 8vo, Leipz. 1857-59, is to be found the fullest and best account of Judaism as a system of national and speculative development (comp. Zunz, Gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, Berl. 1832; also Steinschneider, Jewish Literature from the 8th to the 18th century, Lond. 1857; and the articles ALEXANDRIA; EDUCATION; HAPHTHARA; KABBALA; SYNAGOGUE; TALMUD; and the articles on Jewish writers in this work).

From יהודי are formed יהודי, a Jewess, to which corresponds the N. T. Ἰουδαία which is used not only of Eunice, the mother of Timothy, who was undoubtedly of Hebrew descent (Acts xvi. 1, comp. 2 Tim. iii. 13), but also of Drusilla the daughter of Herod Antipas (Acts xxiv. 24); יהודית, Jewish (used adverbially of the Hebrew language, Is. xxxvi. 13, where the Sept. has Ἰουδαϊστῆ), to which corresponds the N. T. Ἰουδαϊκός (applied to the myths and legends of the Rabbis, Tit. i. 14) and 'Ιουδαϊκῶς (used by the apostle of the manner of life peculiar to the Jews, Gal. ii. 14); and ἡθιπαι the Hithpael of הִתְיַחַד, to Judaize or live as a Jew (Esth. viii. 17; Sept. 'Ιουδαῖον; cf. Plut., V. Cic. c. 7), answering to the N. T. 'Ιουδαῖον (Gal. ii. 14), the counterpart of Ἑλληνιστεῖν. The apostle also uses 'Ιουδαῖσμός to describe the religious system and usages of the Jews (Gal. i. 13, 14). This word occurs also in 2 Maccab. ii. 21; viii. 1; xiv. 38; where it is in tacit antithesis to ἀλλοφυλισμός, or ἑλληνισμός (2 Maccab. iv. 13; comp. vi. 24).—W. L. A.

JEWEL. [STONES, PRECIOUS.]

JEWELL, JOHN, D.D., was born at Buden in Devonshire 1522; was sent to Oxford at 13, became B.A. and tutor of Merton five years afterwards, and subsequently professor of rhetoric at Corpus Christi College. During the early part of his university career, while Henry VIII. was still living, he was careful not to take an open or decided part in the theological controversies, though he was secretly attached to the principles of the reformation, and, as far as opportunity offered, did what he could to advance them. Upon the accession of Edward VI. he adopted a bolder line, and on the visit of Peter the Martyr to Oxford attached himself warmly to him. With the death of Edward, however, fortune again turned, and Jewell's position became one of peril. When recantation was proposed to him, he hesitated for a moment, but at length sought safety in exile. He went to Frankfurt, where he found others similarly situated with himself; thence to Strasburg, where he again met with Peter Martyr, and assisted him in some of his works. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England, and the following year, 1559, was raised to the See of Salisbury. Jewell was a prelate of great piety and erudition, a strenuous and determined adversary of the Romish Church, and an indefatigable worker, rising, it is said, at four and not retiring to rest till midnight. In his Exposition of the Two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Lond. 1594, he finds ample scope for his anti-Romanist zeal; the exposition is chiefly polemical and practical. His best known work is Apologia Ecclesiae Anglicanae, translated by Lady Bacon, the mother of Lord Bacon. Jewell used to say that a bishop should die preaching, and it was literally fulfilled in his own case, for he was seized with his mortal illness when on a preaching tour in a retired portion of his diocese, and died Sept. 21, 1571. The best edition of Jewell's works is that by Dr. Jelf, 8 vols. 8vo, Oxford 1848.—S. L.

JEWRY, the rendering of יהודה, the Chaldee form of יהודה, found in Dan. v. 25. It is equivalent to the phrase 'Land of Judah' (ארמת יהודה) in Is. xix. 17. Jewry occurs in several passages in the A. V. of the Apocrypha, being retained from the older translations; and the Greek 'Ιουδαία is so translated in two passages of the N. T. (Luke xxiii. 5; John vii. 1), though elsewhere rendered Judea (see JUDÆA).—J. L. P.

JEZANIAH, occurring in its shorter form יְזַנְיָהוּ (Jer. xlii. 1), and the longer one יְזַנְיָהוּ (xl. 8), is the name given by the prophet to the man who, in the history (2 Kings xxv. 23), is described under the longer name of JAAZANIAH (יְאֶזַנְיָהוּ) as one of Zedekiah's captains of forces (צִרְיָהוּ הַחַיִּים), who, when Nebuchadnezzar's army took Jerusalem, fled with their troops to the fields (Jer. xl. 7); that is, dispersed for fear of the Chaldeans throughout the country fastnesses at home, in contradistinction to those who had, at an earlier period, fled to the neighbouring states of Edom, Moab, and Ammon for refuge (Jer. xl. 11). When the conqueror wisely appointed the prudent and estimable Gedaliah to govern Judah as his viceroy, Jezaniah, with many others, gave in their adhesion to the new government. But Gedaliah fell by a treachery which has an illustrative parallel in the massacre of Glencoe, and Jezaniah was one of those who resented the foul deed and did their utmost to punish the author of it (Jer. xlii. 11-14). Fearful, however, that the death of Gedaliah would involve them in fresh troubles from the incensed king of Babylon, the military leaders, including our Jezaniah, with 'all the people from the least even to the greatest,' consulted the prophet Jeremiah as to what course they should pursue. He gave them advice which was not only in accordance with the will of God, but eminently patriotic, to the effect that they should remain in their native country. We have elsewhere related the insolent rejection of the prophet's counsel, and the migration to Egypt which followed it [JEREMIAH; JOHANAN]. Jezaniah's name has often been most prominently connected with these discreditable events, as if under the name of Azariah (Jer. xlii. 2) he were the very ringleader of the 'proud men' who dared to defy the counsel of heaven as declared by Jeremiah. To us this opinion seems hardly tenable. It is based on the fact that in Jer. xlii. 2 Azariah is described as the son of Hoshai, the same description being in xlii. 1 given of Jezaniah. 'Jezaniah,' it has been suggested, might have been easily corrupted into 'Azariah' (Hitzig in Jerem., p. 335, and Smith's Dict. of Bible, i. 1078). Corruption should not be imputed to the text, except in palpable instances. This is not such a case. The name עֲזַרְיָה (Azariah) is sufficiently distinct from יְזַנְיָהוּ (Jezaniah) to have preserved its independence, and there is no sign of a various reading of Jer. xlii. 2 to be found in Kennicott, De Rossi, or Houbigant. Nor does the retention of this name, as that of a separate person from Jezaniah, create any difficulty in exegesis. There is no more difficulty in supposing that there were two sons of Hoshai connected with these events than that there were two sons of Kareah, as the history expressly affirms (Jer. xl. 8, where indeed another set of brothers besides is mentioned, 'the sons of Ephai the Netophathite'). We would therefore suppose (with Rosenmüller, Scholia on Jerem., p. 247) that the impious leader of the seditious opponents of the prophets at 'the caravanserai of Chimham' (Jer. xli. 17) was a brother of our Jezaniah. The latter was possibly not a participator in the fatal scheme of migrating to Egypt, which seems to have originated with Azariah, who took the lead even of Johanan in replying to the prophet. But is it certain that Jezaniah was 'son of Hoshai,' and brother of Azariah? If corruption of the text is to be thought of at all, may not the name Jezaniah have replaced that of Azariah in Jer. xlii. 1? The Septuagint, throughout the narrative of this interview with the prophet, omits the name of Jezaniah, reading 'Aza-riah, son of Maasiah' ('Αἱάπας υἱὸς Μαασαιου, or 'Αραῖου in one MS.), both in the xlii. and xliii. chapters (LXX., chaps. xlix. and l.) It is some confirmation of this, that, in the history (2 Kings xxv. 23) and the parallel passage of the prophet (Jer. xl. 8), Jezeaniah, or Jaazaniah, is called 'the son of a Maachathite' (בֶּן־מַאחַתִּית), and that the

Septuagint in both places agrees with the Masoretic text ('Εἰσάριος υἱὸς τοῦ Μαχαθί in Jerem., and 'Ιεσάριος υἱὸς τοῦ Μαχαθί in Kings). The word rendered by the gentile phrase 'a Maachathite' is treated as a proper name by Gesenius (Theo. in loc.) and De Wette (Translat. of the Bible). Keil unites בֶּן with the longer word as together = 'a Maachathite'; as if Jezeaniah was himself a native of Maachah. To this Thienius (on Kings, in loc.) reasonably objects, and translates after our A.V. 'son of a Maachathite,' making the father of Jezeaniah, rather than the man himself, to be of foreign birth. This Maachah was on the north frontier of Palestine on the west slope of Hermon. It is mentioned in Josh. xii. 4 as a province of the old kingdom of Bashan. One of David's mighty men of war was 'the son of a Maachathite' (2 Sam. xxiii. 34); so that there is no difficulty in the fact that the son of a foreigner holds a high commission in the army of Zedekiah.—P. JEZEBEL (זִיזְבֵּל [non-cohabited, i. q. ἀλοχος Plat., p. 249 B., intacta, chaste: comp. Agnes, Gesen.; contr. from אֲבִירָבֵּל = father of the heavenly habitation, an epithet of Baal corresponding to בַּעַל זְבוּל, Fürst]; Sept. 'Ιεζάβελ [the name is the same as the modern Isobel or Isabella]), daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon [ETHBAAL], and consort of Ahab, king of Israel (B.C. 918). This unsuitable alliance proved most disastrous to the kingdom of Israel; for Jezebel [whom Josephus describes as γυναικὸν δραστήριον τε καὶ τολμηρόν (Antiq. viii. 13. 2)] induced her weak husband not only to connive at her introducing the worship of her native idols, but eventually to become himself a worshipper of them, and to use all the means in his power to establish them in the room of the God of Israel. This was a great enormity. The worship of the golden calves which previously existed was, however mistakenly, intended in honour of Jehovah; but this was an open alienation from him, and a turning aside to foreign and strange gods, which, indeed, were no gods. Most of the particulars of this bad but apparently highly-gifted woman's conduct have been related in the notices of AHAH and ELIJAH. From the course of her proceedings it would appear that she grew to hate the Jewish system of law and religion, on account of what must have seemed to her its intolerance and its anti-social tendencies. She hence sought to put it down by all the means she could command; and the imbecility of her husband seems to have made all the powers of the state subservient to her designs. The manner in which she acquired and used her power over Ahab is strikingly shewn in the matter of Naboth, which, perhaps, more than all the other affairs in which she was engaged, brings out her true character, and displays the nature of her influence. When she found him fretting like a spoiled child, on account of the refusal of Naboth to gratify him by selling him his patrimonial vineyard for a 'garden of herbs,' she taught him to look to her, to rely upon her for the accomplishment of his wishes; and for the sake of this impression, more perhaps than from savageness of temper, she scrupled not at murder under the abused forms of law and religion. She had the reward of her unscrupulous decisiveness of character in the triumph of her policy in Israel, where, at last, there were but 7000 people who had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor kissed their hand to his image. Nor was her success confined to Israel, for through Athaliah—a daughter after her own heart—who was married to the son and successor of Jehoshaphat, the same policy prevailed for a time in Judah, after Jezebel herself had perished and the house of Ahab had met its doom. It seems that after the death of her husband, Jezebel maintained considerable ascendancy over her son Joram; and her measures and misconduct formed the principal charge which Jehu cast in the teeth of that unhappy monarch, before he sent forth the arrow which slew him. The last effort of Jezebel was to intimidate Jehu as he passed the palace, by warning him of the eventual rewards of even successful treason. It is eminently characteristic of the woman, that even in this terrible moment, when she knew that her son was slain, and must have felt that her power had departed, she displayed herself not with rent veil and dishevelled hair, 'but tired her head and painted her eyes' before she looked out at the window. The eunuchs, at a word from Jehu, having cast her down, she met her death beneath the wall [JEHU]; and when afterwards the new monarch bethought him that, as 'a king's daughter,' her corpse should not be treated with disrespect, nothing was found of her but the skull, the feet, and the palms of her hands. The dogs had eaten all the rest. B.C. 884 (1 Kings xvi. 31; xviii. 4, 13, 19; xxi. 5-25; 2 Kings ix. 7, 22, 30-37).—J. K.

JEZREEL (יִזְרְעֵל, 'what God planteth,' 'Ιεζραήλ, 'Ιεζραήλ, and 'Ιαζήλ; Jezrael), an ancient city of Canaan, situated on the northern declivity of Mount Gilboa, overlooking the great plain to which it gave the name Esdraelon. On the northern side of the city, between the parallel ridges of Gilboa and Moreh (now called Jebel ed-Dukhy; see MOREH), lies a rich valley, an offshoot of Esdraelon, running down eastward to the Jordan. This was called the 'Valley of Jezreel,' and Bethshan, with the other towns in and around the valley, was originally inhabited by a fierce and warlike race who had 'chariots of iron' (Josh. xvii. 16). The region fell to the lot of Issachar, but neither this tribe nor its more powerful neighbour Ephraim, was able to drive out the ancient people (xix. 18).

The 'valley of Jezreel' became the scene of one of the most signal victories ever achieved by the Israelites, and of one of the most melancholy defeats ever they sustained. In the time of the Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and 'children of the East,' crossed the Jordan, and 'pitched in the valley of Jezreel,' almost covering its green pastures with their tents, flocks, and herds (Judg. vi. 33, seq.) Gideon hastily summoned the warriors of Israel round his standard, and took up a position on the lower slopes of Gilboa, close to the 'well of Harod' (vii. 1; also called 'the fountain of Jezreel,' HAROD), about a mile east of the city. The story of Gideon's lamps and pitchers, his night attack, and the utter rout and terrible slaughter of the enemy, is well known.

Two centuries later the Philistines took up the identical position formerly occupied by the Midianites, and the Israelites under Saul pitched on Gideon's old camping-ground by the 'fountain of Jezreel' (1 Sam. xxix. 1-11). The Israelites were defeated, and Saul and Jonathan, with the flower of their troops, fell on the heights of Gilboa (xxxix. 1-6). [GILBOA.]

The valley and the fountain of Jezreel were thus the scenes of stirring events in early Jewish history, but it is not till long afterwards we find any direct reference made to the city, though it appears to have been head of a large province (2 Sam. ii. 9; iv. 4; 1 Kings iv. 12). It was during the reign of Ahab, Jezreel became a place of note. He built a palace there, and made it one of the royal residences. After Elijah's sacrifice and the slaughter of Baal's prophets on Carmel, Ahab drove in his chariot across the plain to Jezreel, and Elijah, 'girding up his loins,' ran before him, like the groom of a modern eastern prince, a distance of some fifteen miles (1 Kings xviii. 45, 46). In Jezreel, Naboth was murdered by the infamous Jezebel, that she might get possession of his ancestral vineyard, which adjoined the royal palace (1 Kings xxi. 1-16). Here, too, in fulfilment of prophecy (vers. 17-23), divine vengeance fell on the guilty house of Ahab. Joram his son was slain and his body cast into the vineyard of poor Naboth (2 Kings ix. 23-26; Joseph. Antiq. ix. 6. 4). Here Jezebel was thrown out of a window and devoured by dogs in the streets (2 Kings ix. 30-37). Here, too, the whole family of Ahab were murdered by Jehu (x. 1-11); and these acts of horrid cruelty did not go unpunished, they were avenged by the utter extinction of the family of Jehu, and the final overthrow of the sinful kingdom of Israel.

The above facts and predictions help to illustrate the highly figurative references to Jezreel by the prophet Hosea. 'And the Lord said unto him, call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause the kingdom of the house of Israel to cease, and it shall come to pass in that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel' (i. 4, 5). The word Jezreel signifies 'God will scatter,' from זרע, 'to scatter,' and אלהים, 'God'; and this was the divinely appointed name of the prophet's son, to symbolize the ruin that was soon to fall on the house of Jehu and the whole kingdom of Israel. The Lord had promised that Jehu's descendants should occupy the throne till the fourth generation (2 Kings x. 30). Two of these had passed when Hosea wrote, and consequently the time of their ruin was at hand. The 'valley of Jezreel' was the battle-field of Israel. In it the Israelites attempted to withstand the first attack of the Assyrians, and being overthrown, the whole kingdom fell, and the prophet's words were fulfilled, 'I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel.'

In Hos. i. 11 there is another characteristic play upon the word Jezreel. The root זרע signifies 'to plant,' or 'sow,' as well as 'to scatter'; hence, referring to the return of the Israelites from captivity, and their re-establishment in Palestine, he says, 'Great shall be the day of Jezreel,' that is, 'the day of what God shall plant,' namely, the Israelites in their own country. In the same sense the word is used in chap. ii. 22, 'And the earth shall respond to the corn, and the new wine, and the oil; and they shall respond to Jezreel,' that is, to 'what God shall plant' (Gesenius, Thesaurus, s. v.; Henderson, ad loc.; cf. Jer. xxxi. 27).

With the fall of Ahab's line Jezreel's glory fell. We hear no more of it in the Bible. In the book of Judith it is mentioned under the form Esdraelon ('Εσδράλων, iv. 5), and is said 'to face the great plain,' and to lie near the northern approaches to Jerusalem. Josephus gives various forms of the name ('Ιερήλα, 'Ιζάρα, etc., Antiq. viii. 13. 6 and 8; 15. 6; see Reland, pp. 602, 863). The city is not again referred to till the 4th century of our era, when Eusebius and Jerome speak of it as a noble village (ἐπισκοποῦσά τῃ κώμῃ), situated in the great plain between Scythopolis and Legio (Onomast. s. v. Jezreel); the Jerusalem Itinerary locates it ten miles from Scythopolis (Vet. Rom. Itineraria, p. 586). In the time of the crusades the Franks called it Gerin, and the Arabs Zerin (Will. Tyr. in Gesta Dei, xxii. 26; Bohadin, Vita Salad., p. 53). The name and the situation of the modern village of Zerin leave no doubt as to its identity with Jezreel.

Zerin occupies a noble site on the western point of mount Gilboa, about 100 feet above the plain. It overlooks the whole expanse of Esdraelon to Carmel and the hills of Galilee; and from it we can look down the broad and fertile vale of Jezreel to the tell of Bethshan, and away beyond it and beyond the Jordan to the hills of Gilead. It was up this valley Jehu came when the kings of Israel and Judah were in Jezreel. The watchman of Joram saw Jehu's escort in the distance, and a messenger was sent to demand who came. When Jehu drew nigh Joram himself went out to meet him in his chariot. The line of the old road can be traced; it descends the steep slope, and enters the valley near a fountain. There, probably, the vineyard of Naboth was situated, and there Joram was killed. The king of Judah turned to flee, taking the road toward Engannim, but he, too, was mortally wounded (ENGANNIM; see in Joseph. Antiq. ix. 6. 4).

Zerin is now a wretched village. It contained, when the writer visited it, about a dozen miserable houses and a shattered tower. With the exception of a stone sarcophagus, and some large caves, perhaps intended for granaries, hewn in the rocky slopes, there are no traces of antiquity. Jezreel is utterly ruined. As the writer rode away from it he saw a number of ravenous-looking dogs prowling among the tombs in the little cemetery, which painfully revived the story of Jezebel and Ahab.

THE PLAIN OF ESDRAELON took its name from the city, the Hebrew Jezreel being gradually corrupted into the Greek 'Εσδράλων. It is one of the richest and most beautiful plains in Palestine. It is triangular in form; the base on the east extending 15 miles, from Jenin to Tabor; one side, formed by the hills of Galilee, is 12 miles long, and the other, formed by the mountains of Samaria, 18 miles. The apex is a narrow pass opening into the plain of Acre. In early spring this vast expanse is green as a meadow—the few spots cultivated green with young corn, and the rest with grass and weeds. This is that 'plain of Megiddo' where Barak triumphed (Judg. v.), and where Josiah received his death wound (2 Chron. xxxv.); perhaps, too, it may have been before the mind of the Apostle John, when, in symbolic vision, he described the final conflict between the hosts of good and evil, who were gathered in a place 'called in the Hebrew tongue Ar-Mageddon,' that is, 'the city' (עִיר, i. q. עִיר) 'of Megiddo' (Rev. xvi. 16)

[ARMAGEDDON]. The river Kishon—'that ancient river,' so fatal to Sisera—drains it, flowing off to the Mediterranean through the plain of Acre [KISHON].

From the base of this triangle three branches stretch out eastward, separated by the parallel ridges of Gilboa and Moreh. The central branch is the 'valley of Jezreel,' already mentioned, which descends in green slopes to the Jordan, having Jezreel and Shunem on either side at the western end, and Bethshan in the centre, near the eastern.

The soil of Esdraelon is of surpassing richness, as is now shown by the luxuriant grass and gigantic thistles. It was the frontier of Zebulun; and well might Moses say, 'Rejoice, O Zebulun, in thy goings out' (Deut. xxxiii. 18); but it became the special portion of Issachar, which the dying patriarch foreseeing, said, 'And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant,' etc. (Gen. xlix. 15). Esdraelon with all its fertility is now desolate. If we except the eastern branches, it does not contain a single inhabited village or house, and not one-tenth of it is cultivated. It is the home of the wandering Arab to-day, as it was the home of the fierce 'children of the East' in the days of Gideon. From time immemorial foreign invaders have swept over Esdraelon; the ancient Canaanites in their iron chariots (Judg. iv. 3-7), the Midianites and Amalekites with their vast herds (Judg. vi. 3, 4), the Philistines (1 Sam. xxix. 1; xxxi. 10), the Syrians (1 Kings xx. 26, etc.), the Greeks, the Romans, the Crusaders, and the French (Hand-book for S. and P., p. 352; Stanley, S. and P., 340, seq.). Who can tell of what momentous events it is yet destined to be the theatre? Its modern name is Merj ibn Amer, 'The meadow of the son of Amer.'

In addition to the authorities already cited, the student may see descriptions of Esdraelon in the works of Robinson, Van de Velde, Thomson, and Miss Martineau.

2. (Ἰαριήλ; Alex. Ἰερδραελ; Jezrael), a town in the south of Judah, grouped with Maon, Carmel, etc. (Josh. xv. 56), and consequently situated among the bleak hills some eight or ten miles south of Hebron. It is only mentioned in one other place, as the residence of Ahinoam, one of David's wives (1 Sam. xxv. 43; xxvii. 3). The site has not been identified.—J. L. P.

JIPHTAH (יִפְתָּח), 'he opens,' omitted in the Vatican text of the LXX.; Alex. Ἰεφθα; Jephtha), one of the towns allotted to Judah in the Shephelah or plain of Philistia. It must have been situated near to Eleutheropolis, as the name occurs in a group of towns which encircled that city (Josh. xv. 43). The site is unknown.—J. L. P.

JIPHTHAH-EL (יִפְתָּחֵל), 'God opens;' Γαιφαήλ and Φθαήλ; Alex. Ἰεφθαήλ; Jephthahel and Jephthael). The Vatican text of the LXX., in Josh. xix. 14, joins the word 'valley,' with the proper name, thus making Γαιφαήλ; and in ver. 27 the translators appear to have read 'and in the valley' (וּבְנֵי) instead of 'and' (וְ) ('and in the valley'), and made it a proper name, Ἐκρυαῖ. The valley of Jiphthah-el formed part of the boundary between Asher and Zebulun. It has been identified as follows.

Jotopata was a celebrated fortress of Galilee [ἸΟΤΑΠΑΤΑ]. It stood upon the hill now called Tell Jefât, about two miles north-west of Cana of Galilee. The name was written by the rabbins, יוֹדֶפֶת, נֹוֹפֶתָא, נֹוֹפֶתָא, etc. (Reland, Pal., pp. 816, 868). Now we know that the Hebrew letters Yod and Gimel are sometimes interchanged (Genenius, Thesaurus, pp. 252, 557); and by the Galileans the gutturals (א and ה) were often confounded (Lightfoot, Opera, ii. p. 232); hence we can see how simply יוֹדֶפֶת might be corrupted into נֹוֹפֶתָא, etc., from which came the Greek Ἰωρδάνα, and the Arabic Jefât.

It is evident also, from the topographical details, that the valley of Jiphthah-el could not have been far distant from Jefât; since the border of Asher passed from the promontory of Carmel to Zebulun, then to the valley of Jiphthah-el, and so to Cabul, which is about four miles north-west of Jefât (Robinson, B. R., iii. 107; see Van de Velde's Map). We are thus warranted in concluding that there was both a local and etymological connection between Jiphthah-el and Jotopata. Near Jefât the great valley of Abilin takes its rise, and runs south-westward into the plain of Acre; and there is every reason to believe that it is the Jiphthah-el of Scripture, and that it thus forms a most important landmark by which to define the boundaries of Asher and Zebulun (Van de Velde, Memoir, 326; Ritter, Pal. und Syr., iii. 768).

Dr. Thomson mentions a 'very ancient ruin called Jiftah, or Giftah,' lying at the junction of the vale of Kefr Kenna with the plain of Turan, about five miles north-east of Nazareth. Guided by this, he identifies the plain of Turan with Jiphthah-el (The Land and the Book, p. 426). This theory is inadmissible, for two reasons.—1. Turan is a plain, to which the Hebrew word נָא would not be applicable; it would be called עֵמֶק or בְּקָעָה. 2. The territory of Asher could never have extended so far eastward.—J. L. P.

JOAB (יֹאָב), God-fathered; Sept. Ἰωάβ), one of the three sons of Zeruiah, the sister of David, and 'captain of the host' (generalissimo) of the army during nearly the whole of David's reign.

He first appears associated with his two brothers, Abishai and Asahel, in the command of David's troops against Abner, who had set up the claims of a son of Saul in opposition to those of David, who then reigned in Hebron. The armies having met at the pool of Gibeon, a general action was brought on, in which Abner was worsted. In his flight he had the misfortune to kill Joab's brother, the swift-footed Asahel, by whom he was pursued (2 Sam. ii. 13-32). The consequences of this deed have been explained elsewhere [ABNER; ASAHEL]. Joab smothered for a time his resentment against the shedder of his brother's blood; but being whetted by the natural rivalry of position between him and Abner, he afterwards made it the instrument of his policy by treacherously, in the act of friendly communication, slaying Abner, at the very time when the services of the latter to David, to whom he had then turned, had rendered him a most dangerous rival to him in power and influence (2 Sam. iii. 22-27). That Abner had at first suspected that Joab would take the position of blood-avenger [BLOOD-REVENGE] is clear, from the apprehension which he expressed (2 Sam. ii. 22); but that he thought that Joab had, under all the circumstances, abandoned this position, is shewn by the unsuspecting readiness with which he went aside with him (2 Sam. iii. 26-27); and that Joab placed his murderous act on the footing of vengeance for his brother's blood, is plainly stated in 2 Sam. iii. 30; by which it also appears that the other brother, Abishai, shared in some way in the deed and its responsibilities. At the same time, as Abner was perfectly justified in slaying Asahel to save his own life, it is very doubtful if Joab would ever have asserted his right of blood-revenge, if Abner had not appeared likely to endanger his influence with David. The king, much as he reprobated the act, knew that it had a sort of excuse in the old customs of blood-revenge, and he stood habitually too much in awe of his impetuous and able nephew to bring him to punishment, or even to displace him from his command. 'I am this day weak,' he said, 'though anointed king, and these men, the sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me' (2 Sam. iii. 39; 2 Kings ii. 5, 33).

Desirous probably of making some atonement before David and the public for this atrocity, in a way which at the same time was most likely to prove effectual—namely, by some daring exploit, he was the first to mount to the assault at the storming of the fortress on Mount Zion, which had remained so long in the hands of the Jebusites. By this service he acquired the chief command of the army of all Israel, of which David was by this time king (2 Sam. v. 6-10; 1 Chron. xi. 4-9).

It is not necessary to trace the subsequent acts of Joab, seeing that they are in fact the public acts of the king he served. And he served him faithfully; for although he knew his power over David, and often treated him with little ceremony, there can be no doubt that he was most truly devoted to his interests, and sometimes rendered him good service even against his own will, as in the affair at Mahanaim (2 Sam. xix. 5-8). But Joab had no principles apart from what he deemed his duty to the king and the people, and was quite as ready to serve his master's vices as his virtues, so long as they did not interfere with his own interests, or tended to promote them by enabling him to make himself useful to the king. His ready apprehension of the king's meaning in the matter of Uriah, and the facility with which he made himself the instrument of the murder, and of the hypocrisy by which it was covered, are proofs of this, and form as deep a stain upon his character as his own murders (2 Sam. xi. 14-25). As Joab was on good terms with Absalom, and had taken pains to bring about a reconciliation between him and his father, we may set the higher value upon his firm adhesion to David when Absalom revolted, and upon his stern sense of duty to the king—from whom he expected no thanks—displayed in putting an end to the war by the slaughter of his favourite son, when all others shrunk from the responsibility of doing the king a service against his own will (2 Sam. xviii. 1-14). In like manner, when David unhappily resolved to number the people Joab discerned the evil and remonstrated against it; and although he did not venture to disobey, he performed the duty tardily and reluctantly to afford the king an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and took no pains to conceal how odious the measure was to him (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-4). David was certainly ungrateful for the services of Joab, when, in order to conciliate the powerful party which had supported Absalom, he offered the command of the host to Amasa, who had commanded the army of Absalom (2 Sam. xix. 13). But the inefficiency of the new commander, in the emergency which the revolt of Bichri's son produced, arising perhaps from the reluctance of the troops to follow their new leader, gave Joab an opportunity of displaying his superior resources; and also of removing his rival by a murder very similar to, and in some respects less excusable and more foul than that of Abner [AMASA]. Besides, Amasa was his own cousin, being the son of his mother's sister (2 Sam. xx. 1-13).

When David lay on his deathbed, and a demonstration was made in favour of the succession of the eldest surviving son, Adonijah, whose interests had been compromised by the preference of the young Solomon, Joab joined the party of the natural heir. It would be unjust to regard this as a defection from David. It was nothing more or less than a demonstration in favour of the natural heir, which, if not then made, could not be made at all. But an act which would have been justifiable, had the preference of Solomon been a mere caprice of the old king, became criminal as an act of contumacy to the Divine King, the real head of the government, who had called the house of David to the throne, and had the sole right of determining which of its members should reign. When the prompt measures taken under the direction of the king rendered this demonstration abortive (1 Kings i. 7), Joab withdrew into private life till some time after the death of David, when the fate of Adonijah, and of Abiathar—whose life was only spared in consequence of his sacerdotal character—warned Joab that he had little mercy to expect from the new king. He fled for refuge to the altar; but when Solomon heard this, he sent Benaiah to put him to death; and, as he refused to come forth, gave orders that he should be slain even at the altar. Thus died one of the most accomplished warriors and unscrupulous men that Israel ever produced. His corpse was removed to his domain in the wilderness of Judah, and buried there, B.C. 1015 (1 Kings ii. 5, 28-34).—J. K.

Two others of the name of Joab are mentioned in the O. T.—viz., the son of Seraiah (1 Chron. iv. 14), who was chief of the valley of Charashim (artificers or craftsmen), so called, according to a tradition preserved by Jerome (Quaest. in Paral.), from its being the place whence the builders of the temple were brought; and the Joab who is named along with Joshua as the ancestor of a family represented by the children of Pahath-Moab (Ezra ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11). It is doubtful whether this Joab is the same who is mentioned Ezra viii. 9 and 1 Esd. viii. 35. If not, another Joab must be added to the list.—W. L. A.

JOACHIM (LXX. Ἰωακὴμ; Vulg. Joachim). According to a Jewish tradition preserved by Clement of Alexandria, this was the name given to Moses by his parents at his circumcision (Strom. lib. i. cap. xxiii.) In the A. V. it occurs in this form twice only. 1. = Jehoiakim (Bar. i. 3). 2. Son of Chelcias, and high-priest in the reign of Zedekiah (Bar. i. 7).—S. N.

JOACIM (LXX. Ἰωακίμ). 1. (Vulg. Joachim) = Jehoiakim (1 Esd. i. 37, 38, 39). 2. (Vulg. Joachim) = Jehoiachin (1 Esd. i. 43). 3. (Vulg. Joachim), son of Zerubabel (1 Esd. v. 5). This passage, however, is apparently corrupt. The leaders of the first caravan of the Jews who returned from Babylon were, as is well known, Zerubabel and the high-priest Jeshua, but here Jeshua and Joacim only are mentioned. Moreover, no name at all resembling this occurs amongst the sons of Zerubabel (1 Chron. iii. 19). Hence some have suggested that the words 'Joacim the son of,' are an interpolation. Others identify this Joacim with Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 10, 12), and propose to correct the text into 'Joacim his son, and.' 4. (Vulg. Eliakim, Joacim.) The high-priest who is introduced into the story of Judith (Jud. iv. 6, 8, 14; xv. 8), but whether he is to be regarded as a historical character, or as an invention of the writer of the tale, we have no means of determining. 5. (Vulg. Joakim.) A wealthy Jew of Babylon, the husband of Susannah (Sus. i. 4, 6, 28, 29, 63).—S. N.

JOAH (יוֹאָה, Jehovah is a brother, i.e., a confederate of Jehovah), a name of frequent occurrence in the later times of the monarchy among the Levites.

1. 2 Kings xviii. 18, 26, 37, Ἰωᾶς; Alex. Ἰωραφάρ; ver. 37, Ἰωᾶς; Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22, Ἰωᾶς; Joseph. Ἰωᾶχος; Joah. 'Joah, the son of Asaph the recorder,' is mentioned as one of the three officers of state sent out by Hezekiah to receive the message of Sennacherib by his general Rabshakeh. He was historiographer, or keeper of the records (הַמְּכַתֵּב), LXX., in Kings, δ ἀρχιγραμματεὺς, in Isaiah, δ ἱστοριογράφος; Vulg. a commentarius, cf. 2 Sam. viii. 16; 1 Kings iv. 3), to Hezekiah, whose business it was to keep the יְמִינִים (1 Chron. xxvii. 24), or 'chronicles,' in which were recorded the chief events of each year of the reign (cf. Esth. vi. 1).

2. Ἰωᾶβ; Alex. Ἰωᾶς; Joah; appears in the genealogy of the Gershonite branch of the house of Levi (1 Chron. vi. 21). If we compare the same genealogy as given vers. 42, 43, Ethan appears to be substituted for him (see Vatablus, in loc.), but it is probable that neither catalogue is complete, and that each contains some names that do not appear in the other.

3. Ἰωᾶθ; Joaha; the third of the eight sons given to Obadedom (1 Chron. xxvi. 4), in whose house the ark had temporarily halted after the death of Uzzah, as an evidence of the Divine favour, 'for God blessed him,' ver. 5 (cf. 2 Sam. vi. 11), 'all mighty men of valour,' 'able men for strength in the service,' vers. 6, 8. They belonged to the Korhite band of the Levites, and to them and the rest of this family, sixty-two in all, was assigned the keeping of the south gate of the Temple, four a day, and 'the house of Asuphim,' ver. 15, which, though the Vulgate translate it 'domus seniorum concilium,' was probably a storehouse in the outer precincts of the Temple.

4. Ἰωᾶδδ; Alex. Ἰωᾶς; Joah. One of the Gershonite branch of the Levites, the son of Zimma, and father of Eden (2 Chron. xxix. 12). The LXX., however, read Ἰωᾶδδ δ τοῦ Ζεμμὰδ καὶ Ἰωᾶδμ, οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰωᾶδ, the latter clause in the Alex. standing thus, καὶ Ἰωᾶδ δ τοῦ Ἰωᾶδ. Joah and Zimma, it may be remarked, occur as father and son in the same family (1 Chron. vi. 20, 21), No. 2. Bertheau, Chronik, p. 388, is of opinion that 'Joah ben Zimma' stands for the particular Levite family, indicating its head for the time being. He is mentioned as taking a leading part in the religious reform set on foot by Hezekiah, by purifying the Temple from the pollutions of Ahaz.

5. Ἰωᾶς; Alex. Ἰωᾶς; Joseph. Ἰωᾶνης; Joah. 'Joah the son of Joahaz, the recorder,' i.e., keeper of the records to King Josiah (see 1), joined with Shaphan the scribe (the recurrence of the name probably indicating the continuance of the office in the same family) and Maaseiah the governor of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8). The three were appointed by Josiah as commissioners to superintend the repairs of the Temple.—E. V.

JOANNA occurs in the A. V. both as the name of a man and as the name of a woman. 1. (Ἰωάννης T. R. Ἰωαννᾶς.) The son of Rhesa, and one of the ancestors of our Lord. Lord A. C. Hervey would identify him with Hananiah, the son of Zerubabel (1 Chron. iii. 19). As the two names חַנְיָה and יְהוֹנָן have the same meaning, and are compounded of substantially the same elements, it is possible that these may have been transposed in reference to the same person. But what is gained by this? There is still the difficulty in Luke's genealogy from Rhesa's appearing as the father of Joanna, and Judah's appearing as his son, neither of whom is named in the list of Zerubabel's descendants in Chronicles. The former of these difficulties his Lordship gets over by supposing that Rhesa is not a proper name at all, but the Chaldee רִשְׁמָא, a title of the princes of the captivity in the 2d or 3d century after Christ, which some Christian Jew, deeming it appropriate to Zerubabel, inserted in the form פְּרָשָׁא over against his name in Luke's list, whence it crept into the text. This is undoubtedly ingenious, but a reading sustained by all the authorities cannot be invalidated on conjectural grounds such as this. The other difficulty is disposed of more violently. The Judah of Luke is identified with the Hodaiah of 1 Chron. iii. 24; Hodaiah is made the son of Shemaiah (ver. 22); and Shemaiah is identified with Shimei of ver. 19. For such extensive amputation of the text no authority is pleaded; it is simply proposed as getting rid of a difficulty. But after all, this difficulty is not thus got rid of; it is only shifted; for this scheme fails to connect Judah with Zerubabel, who was the mother, and not the father, of Shimei (ver. 19). Is it not better to acknowledge at once that we cannot reconcile the genealogy of Luke with that in Chronicles than attempt to do it by such violent expedients? [GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.]

2. (Ἰωάννα.) The wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Luke viii. 3). She was one of the pious women who contributed to the support of Christ during his personal ministry; and of those who went to the sepulchre to embalm his body, but found him risen from the dead (Luke xxiv. 10). That it was in consequence of her relation to Chuza that Herod 'said to his servants, This is John the Baptist' (Matt. xiv. 2), as Mr. Blunt, in his Coincidences (p. 270, ed. 1847), remarks, is a supposition on which nothing can be built.—W. L. A.

JOASH (יוֹאָשׁ, God-given; Sept. Ἰωᾶς), a contraction of JEHOASH (יְהוֹאָשׁ). 1. Son of Aha-ziah and eighth king of Judah, who began to reign in B.C. 878, at the age of seven, and reigned forty years.

Joash, when an infant, was secretly saved by his aunt Jehoshebah, who was married to the high-priest Jehoiada, from the general massacre of the family by Athaliah, who had usurped the throne [ATHALIAH; JEHOIADA]. By the high-priest and his wife the child was privily brought up in the chambers connected with the Temple till he had attained his eighth year, when Jehoiada deemed that the state of affairs required him to produce the youthful heir of the throne to the people, and claim for him the crown which his grandmother had so unrighteously usurped. Finding the influential persons whom he consulted favourable to the design, everything was secretly but admirably arranged for producing Joash, and investing him with the regalia, in such a manner that Athaliah could have no suspicion of the event till it actually occurred. On the day appointed, the sole surviving scion of David's illustrious house appeared in the place of the kings, by a particular pillar in the temple-court, and was crowned and anointed with the usual ceremonies. The high-wrought enthusiasm of the spectators then found vent in clapping of hands and exulting shouts of 'Long live the king!' The joyful uproar was heard even in the palace, and brought Athaliah to the Temple, from which, at a word from Jehoiada, she was led to her death.

Joash behaved well during his non-age, and so long after as he remained under the influence of the high-priest. But when he died the king seems to have felt himself relieved from a yoke; and to manifest his freedom, began to take the contrary course to that which he had followed while under pupillage. Gradually the persons who had possessed influence formerly, when the house of David was contaminated by its alliance with the house of Ahab, insinuated themselves into his councils, and ere long the worship of Jehovah and the observances of the law were neglected, and the land was defiled with idolatries and idolatrous usages. The prophets then uttered their warnings, but were not heard; and the infatuated king had the atrocious ingratitude to put to death Zechariah, the son and successor of his benefactor Jehoiada. For these deeds Joash was made an example of the divine judgments. He saw his realm devastated by the Syrians under Hazael; his armies were cut in pieces by an enemy of inferior numbers, and he was even besieged in Jerusalem, and only preserved his capital and his crown by giving up the treasures of the Temple. Besides this, a painful malady embittered all his latter days, and at length he became so odious that his own servants conspired against him, and slew him on his bed. They are said to have done this to avenge the blood of Zechariah, who at his death had cried, 'The Lord look upon it and require it;' and it is hence probable that public opinion ascribed all the calamities of his life and reign to that infamous deed. Joash was buried in the city of David; but a place in the sepulchre of the kings was denied to his remains (2 Kings xi. xii.; 2 Chron. xxiv.).

2. Son and successor of Jehoahaz on the throne of Israel, of which he was the twelfth king. He began to reign in B.C. 840, and reigned sixteen incomplete years. He followed the example of his predecessors in the policy of keeping up the worship of the golden calves; but, apart from this, he bears a fair character, and had intervals, at least, of sincere piety and true devotion to the God of his fathers. Indeed, custom and long habit had so established the views of political expediency on which the schismatical establishments at Dan and Bethel were founded, that at length the reprehension which regularly recurs in the record of each king's reign, seems rather to apply to it as a mark of the continuance of a public crime than as indicative of the character or disposition of the reigning prince, which is to be sought in the more detailed accounts of his own conduct. These accounts are favourable with respect to Joash. He held the prophet Elisha in high honour, looking up to him as a father. When he heard of his last illness he repaired to the bed-side of the dying prophet, and was favoured with promises of victories over the Syrians, by whom his dominions were then harassed. These promises were accomplished after the prophet's death. In three signal and successive victories Joash overcame the Syrians, and retook from them the towns which Hazael had rent from Israel.

These advantages rendered the kingdom of Israel more potent than that of Judah. He, however, sought no quarrel with that kingdom; but when he received a defiance from Amaziah, king of Judah, he answered with becoming spirit in a parable, which by its images calls to mind that of Jotham [PARABLES]: the cool disdain of the answer must have been, and in fact was, exceedingly galling to Amaziah. 'The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife; and there came by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trod down the thistle.' This was admirable; nor was the application less so: 'Thou hast, indeed, smitten Edom, and thine heart hath lifted thee up: glory of this, and tarry at home; for why shouldst thou meddle to thy hurt, that thou shouldst fall, even thou and Judah with thee?' In the war, or rather action, which followed, Joash was victorious. Having defeated Amaziah at Bethshemesh, in Judah, he advanced to Jerusalem, broke down the wall to the extent of 400 cubits, and carried away the treasures both of the Temple and the palace, together with hostages for the future good behaviour of the crest-fallen Amaziah. Joash himself did not long survive this victory; he died in peace, and was buried in Samaria (2 Kings xiii. 9-25; xiv. 1-17).—J. K.

Five others of the name of Joash are mentioned in the O. T., viz.—1. The father of Gideon, a man of wealth among the Abiezrites, who, though so far led astray by the prevailing tendency as to have an altar dedicated to Baal on his grounds, was the first to applaud the act of his son in destroying that altar (Judg. vi. 11, 29-31); 2. A person described as 'the king's son,' to whom the superintendence of the royal prison was entrusted (2 Chron. xviii. 25); it is not necessary to suppose that he was a brother of Ahab, as any prince of the blood-royal might be called 'the king's son'; 3. A descendant of Judah, and apparently the son of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22); 4. A Benjamite who resorted to David at Ziklag, and helped him against the rovers to whose attacks he was exposed (1 Chron. xii. 3, 21); 5. An officer of David, who had charge of the cellars of oil (1 Chron. xxvii. 28). The A. V. presents another Joash, the son of Becher (1 Chron.

vii. 8); but in the Heb. this name is different from the preceding, being שׁוּחִי, not שׁוֹחִי. The LXX. also makes both the same, 'Ιωδς.—W. L. A.

JOB, THE BOOK OF. We shall consider, first, the contents of this book; secondly, its object; thirdly, its composition; and, lastly, the country, descent, and age of its author.

I. CONTENTS.—In the land of Uz, belonging to the northern part of Arabia Deserta, lived an upright, pious man, called Job. For his sincere and perfect devotedness, God had amply blessed him with worldly property and children; but on Satan obtaining leave to tempt him, he suddenly lost the fortune of his life. Ultimately he is smitten with a severe and painful disease; but though his wife moves him to forsake God, he still continues true and stanch to the Lord. Three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, hear of his calamities, and come to console him. His distressed state excites their heartfelt compassion; but the view which they take of its origin prevents them from at once assisting him, and they remain silent, though they are sensible that by so doing they further wound his feelings. Seven days thus pass, until Job, suspecting the cause of their conduct, becomes discomposed and breaks silence. His first observations are based on the assertion—not, indeed, broadly expressed—that God acts harshly and arbitrarily in inflicting calamity on men. This causes a discussion between him and his friends, which is divided into three main parts, each with subdivisions, and embraces the speeches of the three friends of Job, and his answers: the last part, however, consists of only two subdivisions, the third friend, Zophar, having nothing to rejoin. By this silence the author of the book generally designates the defeat of Job's friends, who are defending a common cause. Taking a general view of the argument which they urge against him, they may be considered as asserting the following positions:—

1. No man being free from sin, we need not wonder that we are liable to calamities, for which we must account by a reference, not to God, but to ourselves. From the misery of the distressed, others are enabled to infer their guilt; and they must take this view in order to vindicate divine justice.

2. The distress of a man proves not only that he has sinned, but shews also the degree and measure of his sin; and thus, from the extent of calamity sustained, may be inferred the extent of sins committed; and from this the measure of impending misfortune.

3. A distressed man may recover his former happiness, and even attain to greater fortune than he ever enjoyed before, if he takes a warning from his afflictions, repents of his sins, reforms his life, and raises himself to a higher degree of moral rectitude. Impatience and irreverent expostulation with God serve but to prolong and increase punishment; for, by accusing God of injustice, a fresh sin is added to former transgressions.

4. Though the wicked man is capable of prosperity, still it is never lasting. The most awful retribution soon overtakes him; and his transient felicity must itself be considered as punishment, since it renders him heedless, and makes him feel misfortune more keenly.

In opposition to them Job maintains:—

tunate—more so than the inevitable faults and shortcomings of human nature would seem to imply. There is a savage cruelty, deserving the severities of the divine resentment, in inferring the guilt of a man from his distresses. In distributing good and evil, God regards neither merit nor guilt, but acts according to his sovereign pleasure. His omnipotence is apparent in every part of the creation; but his justice cannot be seen in the government of the world; the afflictions of the righteous, as well as the prosperity of the wicked, are evidence against it. There are innumerable cases, and Job considers his own to be one of them, in which a sufferer has a right to justify himself before God, and to repine at his decrees. Of this supposed right Job freely avails himself, and maintains it against his friends.

2. In a state of composure and calmer reflection, Job retracts, chiefly in his concluding speech, all his former rather extravagant assertions, and says that, although God generally afflicts the wicked and blesses the righteous, still there are exceptions to this rule, single cases in which the pious undergo severe trials; the inference, therefore, of a man's guilt from his misfortunes is by no means warranted. For the exceptions established by experience prove that God does not always distribute prosperity and adversity after this rule; but that he sometimes acts on a different principle, or as an absolute lord, according to his mere will and pleasure.

3. Humbly to adore God is our duty, even when we are subject to calamities not at all deserved; but we should abstain from harshly judging of those who, when distressed, send forth complaints against God.

Both parties not only explain their principles generally, but apply them to the case which had caused the discussion. At first the friends of Job only hint, but in the course of the discussion they broadly assert, that his very great afflictions must have been caused by equally great sins; and they tax him with crimes of which they suspect him to have been guilty. They also admonish him to confess and repent of the guilt of which, by the divine punishments inflicted on him, he stood already convicted. If he should follow this counsel, they promise him a return of prosperity; but if he proved refractory, they threaten him with divine punishments even more severe. Job, on the contrary, represents himself, venial frailties excepted, as altogether upright and innocent, thinks himself unjustly dealt with by God, and reproaches his friends with heaping on him unfounded criminations, with a view of ingratiating themselves with the Almighty, who, however, would visit with condign punishment such busy, meddling, officious vindicators of the divine government.

The interest of the narrative is kept up with considerable skill, by progressively rising and highly passionate language. At first, Job's friends charge him, and he defends himself, in mild terms; but gradually they are all betrayed into warmth of temper, which goes on increasing until the friends have nothing more to object, and Job remains in possession of the field. The discussion then seems to be at an end, when a fresh disputant, Elihu, appears. Trusting in his just cause, Job had proudly opposed God, with whom he expostulated, and whom he charged with injustice, when the sense of his calamities should have led him to acknowledge the sinfulness of human nature, and humbly to submit to the divine dispensations. Making every allowance for his painful situation, and putting the mildest construction on his expressions, he is still substantially wrong, and could not therefore be suffered to remain the vanquisher in this high argument. He had silenced his friends, but the general issue remained to be settled. Elihu had waited till Job and his friends had spoken, because they were older than he; but when he saw that the three visitors ceased to answer, he offers himself to reason with Job, and shews that God is just in his ways. He does this:

I. From the nature of inflictions.—He begins by urging that Job was very wrong in boasting of his integrity, and making it appear that rewards were due to him from God. How righteous soever he was, he still had no claim to reward; on the contrary, all men are sinners in God's eyes; and nobody can complain that he suffers unjustly, for the very greatest sufferings equal not his immense guilt. Then Elihu explains a leading point on which he differs from the friends of Job: he asserts that from greater sufferings inflicted on a person it was not to be inferred that he had sinned more than others afflicted with a less amount of calamity. Calamities were, indeed, under all circumstances, punishments for sins committed, but at the same time they were correctives also; and therefore they might be inflicted on the comparatively most righteous in preference to others. For he who was most loved by God, was also most in danger of forgetting the sinfulness inherent in all men, and, consequently, also in himself: the rather because sin would in him less strongly manifest itself. If the object of afflictions was attained, and the distressed acknowledged his sinfulness, he would humble himself before God, who would bless him with greater happiness than he ever before enjoyed. But he who took not this view, and did not amend his ways, would be ruined, and the blame would rest wholly with himself. Consequently, if Job made the best of his misfortune, God would render him most happy; but if he continued refractory, punishment would follow his offences. According to this view, the truly righteous cannot be always miserable; and their calamities, which God, not only from his justice, as the friends of Job stated, but also from his love, inflicts temporarily on them, are only the means employed to raise them to higher moral rectitude and worldly happiness. The end shews the distinction between the perverse sinner, and the righteous man subject to sinfulness.

2. From a clear conception of the nature of God.—‘How darest thou,’ says Elihu, ‘instead of humbling thyself before God, defy him, and offer to reason with him?’ The whole creation shews forth his majesty, and evinces his justice. For a man to stand up against Him and to assert that he suffers innocently, is the greatest anthropomorphism, because it goes to deny the divine majesty, evident in all the facts of the created world, and including God's justice. His nature being one and indivisible, it cannot on one side exhibit infinite perfection, and on the other imperfection: each example, then, of God's grandeur in the creation of the world is evidence against the rash accusers of God's justice. Thus it appears that, from the outset, there must have been a mistake in thy calculation, and thou must the rather acknowledge the correctness of my solution of the question. God must be just—this is certain from the outset; and how his

Job had, in a stirring manner, several times, challenged God to decide the contest. Elihu suspects the approach of the Lord, when, towards the end of his speech, a violent thunder-storm arises, and God answers Job out of the whirlwind, shewing how foolishly the latter had acted in offering to reason with Him, when his works proved his infinite majesty, and, consequently, his absolute justice. Job now submits to God, and humbly repents of his offence. Hereupon God addresses Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, declaring unto them his displeasure at their unmerciful dealing with their friend, the consequences of which could only be avoided by Job offering a propitiatory sacrifice. This is done, and the Lord grants unto Job ample compensation for his sufferings.

II. DESIGN OF THE BOOK.—We here assume the integrity of the book of Job, or that it has been preserved in its genuine, unadulterated state; and we may do so the rather, because those who would eliminate single portions, must still allow the difficulty of showing in the remainder a fixed plan and leading idea, which again argues against them. Moreover, by determining the design of the book the best foundation is laid for proving its integrity. All agree that the object of the book is the solution of the question, how the afflictions of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked can be consistent with God's justice. But it should be observed that the direct problem exclusively refers to the first point, the second being only incidentally discussed on occasion of the leading theme. If this is overlooked, the author would appear to have solved only one-half of his problem: the case from which the whole discussion proceeds has reference merely to the leading problem. There is another fundamental error which has led nearly all modern interpreters to a mistaken idea of the design of this book. Pareau (De Immortalitatis not. in libro Jobi, Deventer 1807, p. 207) is the only one who saw the error adverted to, and partially combated it with success. They assume that the problem could be satisfactorily solved only when the doctrines of immortality and retribution had been first established, which had not been done by the author of the book of Job: a perfect solution of the question was therefore not to be expected from him. Some assert that his solution is erroneous, since retribution, to be expected in a future world, is transferred by him to this life; others say that he cut the knot which he could not unloose, and has been satisfied to ask for implicit submission and devotedness, showing at the same time that every attempt at a solution must lead to dangerous positions: blind resignation, therefore, was the short meaning of the lengthened discussion.

On nearer examination, however, it appears that the doctrine of retribution after death is not of itself alone calculated to lead to a solution of the problem. In contemplating the lives of the righteous, who were perfectly embued with this doctrine, it will appear that they also struggled with doubts; that a satisfactory solution of the question is to be derived only from the fundamental doctrine on which the faith in retribution rests; and that this faith is shaken where it has not the necessary basis. The belief in a final judgment is firm and rational only when it rests on the belief in God's continued providential government of the world, and in his acting as sovereign Lord in all the events of human life. If God is holy and just, he must also have the will to manifest these qualities in our present life by his bearing towards those who represent his image on earth, as well as towards those who renounce it. If he is omnipotent, nothing can in this life prevent him from exhibiting his justice; but if this is not manifested, and if no reason can be given for which he at times defers his judgments, the belief in retribution after death would be flimsy and shallow. Woe to him who expects in a future world to be supplied with everything he missed here, and with redress for all injuries sustained! He deceives himself. His God was, during his life on earth, inactive, shutting himself up in heaven: is he sure that his God will hereafter be better disposed or more able to protect him? As his essence remains the same, and the nature of sin and virtue is unchanged, how should he then in a future life punish the former and reward the latter, if he does not do so in this life! Temporary injustice is still injustice, and destroys the idea of a holy and just God. A God who has something to redress is no God at all. Lucian, the satirist, composed a dialogue entitled Zeûs 'Ελεγχόμενος, with the view of subverting the belief in Divine Providence; in which he justly finds fault with that God who allows the wicked to lead a happy and pleasant life in order that, at a distant time, they may be tortured according to their deserts, and who, on the contrary, exposes the righteous to infinite misery, that in remote futurity they may receive the reward of their virtue. Some men of sense among the heathens displayed deep penetration on this subject. Claudian, in the commencement of his poem against the wicked Rufinus, hints that doubts had been often entertained of Divine Providence, but that they had been now removed by the downfall of Rufinus:—

'Abstulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna tumultum
Absolvitque deos. Jam non ad culmina rerum
Injustos crevisse queror. Tolluntur in altum
Ut lapsu graviore ruant.'

This worldly retribution leads him to a firm belief in that after death. He represents Rufinus descended to the nether world, doing penance and enduring the keenest pains. See the rich collection by Barth (in his Notes to Claudian, 1078, s.s.) of those passages in the works of heathen writers in which doubts of future retribution are raised on the ground of disbelief in present requitals. Scripture knows nothing of a God whose power admits of increase, or who is active only in the life to come: its God is always full of strength and vigour, constantly engaged in action. God's just retribution in this world is extolled throughout the O. T. The notion of return accommodated to actions, is its substance and centre. It is particularly urged in the Pentateuch, and it is only when it had been deeply rooted in the public mind, and the belief in future requital had acquired a firm and solid basis, that the latter doctrine, which in the books of Moses is but dimly hinted at, is clearly and explicitly promulgated. The N. T. holds out to the righteous promises of a future life, as well as of the present; and our Saviour himself, in setting forth the rewards of those who, for his sake, forsook everything, begins with this life (Matt. xix. 29). A nearer examination of the benedictions contained in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.) shows that none of them exclusively refer to future blessings; the judgment of the wicked is in his view proceeding without interruption, and therefore his examples of the distribution of Divine justice in this world are mingled with those of requital in a future order of things. The Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their own sacrifices (Luke xiii. 1), were in Christ's opinion not accidentally killed; and he threatens those who would not repent, that they should in like manner perish. That sickness is to be considered as a punishment for sin, we are clearly taught (John v. 14; Luke v. 20, 24): in the former passage it is threatened as punishment for sins committed; in the latter it is healed in consequence of punishment remitted. Nay, every patient restored by Christ, who acted not as a superior kind of Hippocrates, but as the Saviour of men, is by that very act declared to be a sinner. The passage in John ix. 2, 3, which is often appealed to, in proof that our Lord did not consider sickness as a punishment for sin, does not prove this, but only opposes the Jewish position—founded on the mistaken doctrine of retribution—that all severe sicknesses and infirmities were consequences of crimes. But what is, from this point of view, the solution of the problem regarding the sufferings of the righteous? It rests on two positions.

1. Calamity is the only way that leads to the kingdom of God. Even the comparatively righteous are not without sin, which can be eradicated only by afflictions. Via crucis est via salutis. He who repents will attain to a clearer insight into the otherwise obscure ways of God. The afflictions of the pious issue at once from God's justice and love. To him who entertains a proper sense of the sinfulness of man, no calamity appears so great as not to be deserved as a punishment, or useful as a corrective.

2. Calamity, as the veiled grace of God, is with the pious never alone, but manifest proofs of Divine favour accompany or follow it. Though sunk in misery, they still are happier than the wicked, and when it has attained its object, it is terminated by the Lord. The nature of acts of grace differs according to the quality of those on whom they are conferred. The consolations offered in the O. T. are, agreeably to the weaker judgment of its professors, derived chiefly from external circumstances; while in the N. T. they are mainly spiritual, without, however, excluding the leading external helps. This difference is not essential, nor is any other, the restitutio in integrum being in the O. T. principally confined to this life, while in the N. T. the eye is directed beyond the limits of this world.

It is this, the alone correct solution of the problem, which occurs in the book of Job. All interpreters allow that it is set forth in Elihu's speeches, and, from the following observations, it will appear that they contain the opinion of the author:—1. The solution cannot be looked for in Job's speeches; for God proves himself gracious towards him only after he has repented and humbled himself. The author of the book says (i. 22; ii. 10; comp. iii. 1) that Job had charged God foolishly, and sinned with his lips; and the πῶτον ψεύδος, the materia peccans, in his speeches, is clearly pointed out to be, that 'he was righteous in his own eyes, and justified himself rather than God' (xxxii. 1, 2). To gather from Job's speeches a consistent view of the subject, and a satisfactory solution of the question mooted, is impossible also on account of the many contradictions in them; as, for instance, when he says at one time, that God's justice never appears in the government of the world, and at another, that it generally does appear, but that there are evident exceptions to the general rule, not liable to objections. Sound principles are mixed up by him with wrong ones; his views want sifting, and the correct ideas must be completed, which, even in his concluding address, is not done by himself, nor is it performed by his three friends. Job continues to be embarrassed for the solution, and he is only certain of this, that the solution of his friends cannot be satisfactory. Job erred chiefly in not acknowledging the sin inherent in him; notwithstanding his integrity and sincere piety, which prevented him from apprehending the object of the calamity inflicted on him, led him to consider God's punishments as arbitrary, and made him despair of the return of better days. The greatness of his sufferings was in some measure the cause of his misconception, by exciting his feelings, and preventing him from calmly considering his case. He was in the state of a man tempted, and deserving God's indulgence. He had received considerable provocation from his friends, and often endeavoured to soften his harsh assertions; which, particularly in ch. xxvii., leads him into such contradictions, as must have occurred in the life of the tempted; he is loud in acknowledging the wisdom of God (ch. xxviii.), and raises himself at times to cheering hopes (comp. ch. xix.) But this can only excuse, not justify him, and therefore it is in the highest degree honourable to him, that he remains silent, when in Elihu's speeches the correct solution of the question is given, and that he ultimately acknowledges his fundamental error of doing justice to himself only.

2. The solution of the question mooted cannot be contained in the speeches of Job's friends. Their demeanour is reproved by God, and represented as a great sin, so much so, indeed, that to obtain pardon for them Job was directed to offer a propitiatory sacrifice. Their error proceeded from a crude notion of sin in its external appearance; and, inferring its existence from calamity, they were thus led to condemn the afflicted Job as guilty of heinous crimes (ch. xxxii.) The moral use of sufferings was unknown to them; which evidently proved that they themselves were not yet purged and cleared from guilt. If they had been sensible of the nature of man, if they had understood themselves, they would, on seeing the misery of Job, have exclaimed, 'God be merciful to us sinners!' There is, indeed, an important correct principle in their speeches, whose centre it forms; so much so, that they mostly err only in the application of the general truth. It consists in the perception of the invariable connection between sin and misery, which is indelibly engrafted on the heart of man, and to which many ancient authors allude. The saying, male paria male dilabuntur, is to be found in every language. The problem of the book is then solved by properly uniting the correct positions of the speeches both of Job and his friends, by maintaining his comparative innocence, and by tracing the errors of both parties to a common source, the want of a sound insight into the nature of sin. Job considers himself righteous, and not deserving of such afflictions, because he had not committed any heinous crime; and his friends fancy they must assume that he was highly criminal, in order to justify his misery.

3. The solution of the question at issue is not exclusively given in the addresses of God, which contain only the basis of the solution, not the solution itself. In setting forth his majesty, and in showing that imputing to him injustice is repugnant to a correct conception of his nature, these addresses establish that there must be a solution which does not impair divine justice. This is not, indeed, the solution itself, but everything is thus prepared for the solution. We apprehend that God must be just, but it remains further to be shown how he can be just, and still the righteous be miserable.

Unless, then, we are disposed to question the general result, we are, by the arrangements of the book, led to the speeches of Elihu as containing the solution of the problem, which the author, moreover, has indicated with sufficient clearness by making the commencement and end of the narrative agree perfectly with those speeches. The leading principle in Elihu's statement is, that calamity in the shape of trial was inflicted even on the comparatively best men, but that God allowed a favourable turn to take place as soon as it had attained its object. Now this is the key to the events of Job's life. Though a pious and righteous man, he is tried by severe afflictions. He knows not for what purpose he is smitten, and his calamity continues; but when he learns it from the addresses of Elihu and God, and humbles himself, he is relieved from the burden which oppresses him, and ample prosperity atones for the afflictions he has sustained. Add to this, that the remaining portion of Elihu's speeches, in which he points to God's infinite majesty as including his justice, is continued in the addresses of God; that Elihu foretells God's appearance; that he is not punished by God as are the friends of Job; in fine, that Job by his very silence acknowledges the problem to have been solved by Elihu; and his silence is the more significant because Elihu had urged him to defend himself (xxxiii. 32), and because Job had repeatedly declared he would 'hold his peace,' if it was shown to him wherein he had erred (vi. 24, 25; xix. 4). This view of the book of Job has among modern authors been supported chiefly by Staudlin (Beiträge zur Religions und Sittenlehre, vol. ii. p. 133) and Stickel (Das Buch Hiob, Leipzig 1842), though in both it is mixed up with much erroneous matter; and it is further confirmed by the whole O. T. giving the same answer to the question mooted which the speeches of Elihu offer: in its concentrated form it is presented in Ps. xxxvii., xlix., lxxiii.

From these considerations, it appears that those interpreters who, with Bernstein, De Wette, and Umbreit, assume that the book of Job was of a sceptical nature, and intended to dispute the doctrine of retribution as laid down in the other books of the O. T., have entirely misunderstood it. The doctrine of divine retribution is here not disputed, but strengthened, as the case under consideration required that it should be. The object of the book would also be too much narrowed, if it was restricted to proving that the doctrine of retribution, as expounded by the friends of Elihu, was erroneous. The speeches of Elihu evidently oppose the discourses of Job in stronger terms than those of his friends. The object of the book is rather to explain generally the nature and tendency of afflictions, and thereby to contribute towards the attainment of their design, to console the mind, and to cheer the drooping spirits. It is difficult for men to understand that their sufferings, however great, are still under that degree which they deserve. To consider afflictions as proofs of divine favour, we must first learn to bring them into unison with divine justice. Upon the doctrine of retribution after death our author does not enter; but that he knew it, may be inferred from several passages with great probability; as, for instance, chap. xiv. 14, 'if a man die shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.' The if here shows that the writer had been before engaged in considering the subject of life after death; and when such is the case, a pious mind will necessarily indulge the hope, or will, at least, have an obscure presentiment of immortality. The truth, also, of God's unbounded grace, on which the doctrine of immortality is based, will be found clearly laid down in chap. xix. Still the author does not recur to this hope for the purpose of solving his problem; he would not ground it on something in itself wanting support and a foundation, namely, that which is presented in this book. The doctrine of future retribution, if not sustained by the belief in retribution during this life, is truly a castle in the air. The author did not intend in his discussion to exceed the limits of what God had clearly revealed, and this was in his time confined to the vague notion of life continued after death, but not connected with rewards and punishments. Explicitly expressed, then, we have here only the doctrine of a Sheol (see the collection of passages, p. 123 sqq. of Pareau's work above quoted), which, indeed, is not erroneous in itself, but which still keeps the background veiled.

Having thus established the design of the book of Job, it remains to consider the view taken by Ewald. He justly rejects the common, superficial view of its design, which has recently been revived and defended by Hirzel (see his Commentar, Leipzig 1839), and which represents the author as intending to shew that man cannot apprehend the plans of God, and does best to submit in ignorance without repining at afflictions. The author would thus be rendered liable to the charge of having cut the knot which he could not loose. When this view was first set up, the solution of one of the most important religious problems was very unsettled, and the public mind generally remained in suspense; in accordance with which state of feeling this opinion is framed relating to the design of the book of Job. The alleged theme occurs in no passage, not even incidentally. The writers in question chiefly base it on the discourses of God; and so, latterly, does Stickel, who, although acknowledging that the solution of the problem was afforded by Elihu, still thinks that in the sentiments uttered by God the sufferer was ultimately referred to human short-sightedness and directed to be silent, the author of the book distrusting the correctness of his solution, and intending at all events to vindicate God's justice. Thus they entirely misunderstand the main point in the discourses of God, which set forth his infinite majesty with a view, not of censuring Job's inquisitiveness and of taxing him with indiscretion, but of shewing that it was foolish to divest God of justice, which is inseparable from his essence. His searching is not itself blamed, but only the manner of it. Nowhere in the whole book is simple resignation crudely enjoined, and nowhere does Job say that he submits to such an injunction. The prologue represents his sufferings as trials, and the epilogue declares that the end had proved this; consequently the author was competent to give a theodicee with reference to the calamity of Job, and if such is the case he cannot have intended simply to recommend resignation. The Biblical writers, when engaged on this problem, know how to justify God with reference to the afflictions of the righteous, and have no intention of evading the difficulty when they recommend resignation (see the Psalms quoted above, and, in the N. T., the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. xii.) The view of the book of Job alluded to would isolate it, and take it out of its natural connection. Thus far, then, we agree with Ewald, but we cannot approve of his own view of the design of the book of Job. According to his system, 'calamity is never a punishment for sins committed, but always a mere phantom, an imaginary show, above which we must raise ourselves by the consciousness of the eternal nature of the human mind, to which, by external prosperity, nothing can be added, and from which, by external misfortune, nothing can be taken away. It was (says Ewald) the merit of the book of Job to have prepared these sounder views of worldly evil and of the immortality of mind, transmitting them as fruitful buds to posterity.' Now from the outset we may be sure that this view is not to be found in our book. Credit has always been given to Scripture for knowing how to console the distressed—which Ewald's system must fail to do. Let it be offered to those who are afflicted with severe and painful illness, and it will prove abortive. Fictitious sufferings may be soothed in this manner, real pains certainly not. Consciousness of the eternal nature of our mind is wanted to do all; but how is it possible when the mind itself is depressed? Turn to the Psalms: do we find in them shadowed out this cold consolation—the doctrine of the Stoics, which has been always considered to be opposed to that of Scripture? Read especially Psalms xxxvii., xli., and lxxiii., which profess to treat our problem: take, in the N. T., the passage in Heb. xii. 6, and you will find afflictions considered at once as punishments inflicted by divine justice, and as means which God's love employs to lead us to higher happiness. 'Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' If suffering and happiness are as nothing, and have no reality, why promises our Saviour rewards to his followers, and why threatens he the wicked with punishment (Matt. xix. 16-30)? Why blesses he the meek, 'for they shall inherit the earth' (Matt. v. 5)? Why says he, 'seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you' (Matt. vi. 33)? If righteousness already possesses everything and lacks nothing, why says St. Paul, to righteousness are held out the promise both of this life and of the life to come? Being thus impressed against Ewald's view, from the Scriptures themselves, we also find, on closer inspection, that it does not apply to the book of Job. To make it appear that it does, he excludes the speeches of Elihu—which seems rather suspicious; but what he objects against them is of little importance, and has been proved by Stickel to be erroneous. Taking, however, what remains of the book, it is evident that the epilogue is decidedly contrary to Ewald's view. Why is it that Job receives the double of all that he had lost, when, judged by Ewald's principles, he had lost nothing? If in any place, it is in the epilogue that the leading idea of the author must appear; and here we have not speeches, whose drift might admit of doubt, but acts, divine acts, the solution of the question by facts. Equally irreconcilable is Ewald's view with the prologue. The opening scene is in heaven; Satan appears before God, and obtains leave to tempt Job. This enables the reader from the outset to see clearer into the case under consideration than did Job and his friends, who judged only according to what passed on earth. He suspects from the outset what will be the end of the narrative. If it is by way of temptation only that Job is subjected to misery, this cannot be lasting; but if it cannot and must not be lasting, it must be also more than an imaginary phantom—it must be reality. We might easily shew further that the view referred to is also incompatible with the speeches of Job, who never renounces happiness; he is always either disconsolate and complains, or expresses cheering hopes of a return of better days; he either despairs of God's justice, or expects him to prove it at least partially by his rehabilitation. We might likewise, with little trouble, prove that the view of Ewald is not in accordance with the speeches of God, who does not address Job in exhortations to the effect, 'Be in-ensensible of thy calamity;' but, 'Humble thyself before me; acknowledge in thy severe sufferings my justice and my love, and thy own sinfulness, and procure release by repentance.' But what we have stated on this head may be deemed sufficient.

III. CHARACTER OF THE COMPOSITION OF THE BOOK.—On this subject there are three different opinions:—1. Some contend that the book contains an entirely true history. 2. Others assert that it is founded on a true history, which has been recast, modified, and enlarged by the author. 3. The third opinion is, that the book contains a narrative entirely imaginary, and constructed by the author to teach a great moral truth.

The first view, taken by numerous ancient interpreters, is now abandoned by nearly all interpreters. It seems, however, to have been adopted by Josephus, for he places Job in the list of the historical books; and it was prevalent with all the fathers of the church. In its support four reasons are adduced, of which the third and fourth are quite untenable; the first and second are outweighed by other considerations, which render it impossible to consider the book of Job as an entirely true history, but which may be used in defence of the second view alluded to. It is said, 1. That Job is (Ezek. xiv. 14-20) mentioned as a public character, together with Noah and Daniel, and represented as an example of piety. 2. In the Epistle of James (v. 11), patience in sufferings is recommended by a reference to Job. 3. In the Greek translation of the Septuagint a notice is appended to Gen. xxxv. 33, which states that Job was the King Jobab of Edom. This statement is too late to be relied on, and originates in an etymological combination; and that it must be erroneous is to a certain extent evident from the contents of the book, in which Job is not represented as a king. 4. Job's tomb continues to be shewn to Oriental tourists. Now the fact of a Job having lived somewhere would not of itself prove that the hero of our narrative was that person, and that this book contained a purely historical account. Moreover, his tomb is shown not in one place, but in six, and, along with it, the dunghill on which Job is reported to have sat!

Against this view it must be remarked generally, that the whole work is arranged on a well-considered plan, proving the author's power of independent invention; that the speeches are, in their general structure and in their details, so elaborate, that they could not have been brought out in the ordinary course of a conversation or disputation; that it would be unnatural to suppose Job in his distressed state to have delivered such speeches, finished with the utmost care; and that they exhibit uniformity in their design, fulness, propriety, and colouring, though the author, with considerable skill, represents each speaker whom he introduces arguing according to his character. Moreover, in the prologue and epilogue, as well as in the arrangement of the speeches, the figures 3 and 7 constantly occur, with the decimal number formed by their addition. The transactions between God and Satan in the prologue absolutely require that we should distinguish between the subject-matter forming the foundation of the work, and its enlargement; which can only be done when a poetical principle is acknowledged in its composition. God's speaking out of the clouds would be a miracle, without an object corresponding to its magnitude, and having a merely personal reference, while all the other miracles of the O. T. are in connection with the theocratical government, and occur in the midst and for the benefit of the people of God. This argument, which might be further extended without much difficulty, proves the first view above stated of the book of Job to be erroneous, and is meant to support the second; but it does not bear on the third, which contends that the narrative is an entire fiction, without any admixture of real facts. The latter opinion is, indeed, already stated in the Talmud, which says that Job never existed; and in modern times it has been defended chiefly by Bernstein; but is contrary to the practice which anciently prevailed, when writers rarely invented the subject of a narrative, and rather took the materials furnished by tradition, digesting, enlarging, and modifying them, so as to make them harmonize with the leading theme. Taking the second view, we must still abstain from undertaking to determine what the poet derived from tradition and what he added himself, since we know not how far tradition had already embellished the original fact. The separation of the historical groundwork from the poetical embellishments could only succeed, if the same history had been, although in a poetical dress, transmitted to us by several narrators. Would any person, if he was not assisted by other authorities, undertake to determine what is history, and what is fiction, in an historical romance of Walter Scott, or in an historical drama of Shakspeare or Schiller? Ewald, indeed, had the courage to undertake vindicating for history certain parts of our narrative, but his efforts were abortive, as we shall presently show. It will appear, indeed, that exactly those particulars which Ewald considers historical may possibly have been invented, though we do not contend that they really were so, which would be equally presumptuous. He asserts, 1. That 'the name Job is not invented by the author of our book.' This would have some semblance of truth, if the name had no meaning connecting it with the contents of the narrative. But Job means in Hebrew 'the assailed,' and may be traced in the form of לֹחַד, born, שָׁכֹר, intoxicated, from אִיב, to attack; whence also אֹיֵב, the enemy, and אִיבָה, enmity, are derived. Ewald observes, indeed, that the import of the word is not very apparent, and is not easily discoverable; but when it strikes us at once, must it not have much more readily occurred to Hebrew readers? The sense in which the hero of the book is called 'the assailed,' appears at once in the prologue, where Satan obtains leave to tempt him. 2. 'The names of the friends of Job are historical.' As to the name Eliphaz, it occurs in Gen. xxvi. 4, 10, 12, and seems to be taken from thence. Adopting names in this manner amounts to inventing them. 3. 'It is a fact that Job lived in the land of Uz, which, in Hebrew history, is distinguished neither in itself nor its inhabitants; and it is difficult to understand why the author selected this country, if he was not led to it by history.' We shall see below that the plan of the author required him to lay the scene without Palestine, but still in its immediate neighbourhood; which led him to Uz, a country already mentioned in Genesis. This observation applies also to the place of abode of Job's friends, which could not be Canaan, but must be in its vicinity; wherefore the country named in the book is assigned to them. 4. 'The sickness of Job is an historical fact; he was afflicted with elephantiasis, and it is inconceivable why the author chose this disease, which is of rare occurrence, if he had not drawn this particular fact from real history.' Now the reason of this selection was, that elephantiasis is a most awful disease, and that the author probably knew none more so; and persons labouring under elephantiasis were generally considered as smitten by God (Deut. xxiv. 8, 9) [JOB'S DISEASE].

These are all the particulars which Ewald points out as historical, and from our examination of them, it will be clear that we must confine ourselves to contending for an historical foundation of the book, but must not undertake to determine the exact nature of the groundwork: we infer the character of the composition from analogy, but cannot prove it from the book itself. That its historical framework was poetically enlarged by the author, has been already observed by Luther (see his Tischreden, or Table Talk, p. 318). As for the rest, the subtilty displayed in explaining opposite views, the carefully drawn characters of the persons introduced, and their animated discourses, lead us to suppose that the question at issue had previously been the subject of various discussions in presence of the author, who, perhaps, took part in them. Thus there would be an historical foundation, not only for the facts related in the book, but to a certain extent also for the speeches.

IV. DESCENT, COUNTRY, AND AGE OF THE AUTHOR.—Opinions differed in ancient times as to the nation to which the author belonged; some considering him to have been an Arab, others an Israelite; but the latter supposition is undoubtedly preferable. For, 1st, we find in our book many ideas of genuine Israelite growth: the creation of the world is described, in accordance with the prevailing notions of the Israelites, as the immediate effect of divine omnipotence; man is formed of clay; the spirit of man is God's breath; God employs the angels for the performance of his orders; Satan, the enemy of the chosen children of God, is his instrument for tempting them; men are weak and sinful; nobody is pure in the sight of God; moral corruption is propagated. There is promulgated to men the law of God, which they must not infringe, and the transgressions of which are visited on offenders with punishments. Moreover, the nether world, or Sheol, is depicted in hues entirely Hebrew. To these particulars might, without much trouble, be added many more; but the deep-searching inquirer will particularly weigh, 2dly, the fact, that the book displays a strength and fervour of religious faith, such as could only be expected within the domain of revelation. Monotheism, if the assertions of ancient Arabian authors may be trusted, prevailed, indeed, for a long period among the Arabs; and it held its ground at least among a portion of the nation till the age of Mohammed, who obtained for it a complete triumph over polytheism, which was spreading from Syria. Still the God of the Arabs was, as those of the heathens generally were, a retired god, dwelling far apart, while the people of the Old Covenant enjoyed the privilege of a vital communion with God; and the warmth with which our author enters into this view, incontrovertibly proves that he was an Israelite. 3dly, As regards the language of our book, several ancient writers asserted that it was originally written in the Aramaean or Arabic tongue, and afterwards translated into Hebrew by Moses, David, Solomon, or some unknown writer. Of this opinion was the author of the Appendix in the Septuagint, and the compiler of the tract on Job added to the works of Origen and Jerome: in modern times it has been chiefly defended by Spanheim, in his Historia Jobi. But for a translation there is too much propriety and precision, in the use of words and phrases; the sentences are too compact, and free from redundant expressions and members; and too much care is bestowed on their harmony and easy flow. The parallelism also is too accurate and perfect for a translation, and the whole breathes a freshness that could be expected from an original work only.

Sensible of the weight of this argument, others, as Eichhorn, took a medium course, and assumed that the author was a Hebrew, though he did not live among his countrymen, but in Arabia. 'The earlier Hebrew history,' they say, 'is unknown to the author, who is ignorant of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In portraying nature, also, he proves himself always familiar with Arabia, while he is silent respecting the characteristics of Palestine. With Egypt he must have been well acquainted; which can be accounted for better by supposing him to have lived in Arabia than in Palestine.' These reasons are, however, not cogent. The cause why the author did not enter into the history of the Hebrews, and the nature of Palestine, appears from his design. In deciding the question at issue he waves the instruction given by divine revelation.

and undertakes to perform the task by appealing only to religious consciousness and experience. On the plan of the author of Ecclesiastes, he treats the question as one of natural theology, in order that the human mind might arrive at its solution spontaneously, and be more deeply impressed. He would not, by referring to a few passages of Scripture, overturn errors which might afterwards spring up again; but they should be exposed and demolished separately, and the truth then be found by uniting the correct ingredients of opposite views. In following this plan the author intended to support Scripture; in a similar manner Pascal, in his Pensées, explains the nature of man first from experience only, and next from Scripture. This plan is indicated by the scene being laid not in Palestine, but among a people quite unconnected with its inhabitants; at the same time he will not go farther than his object required, and he therefore chooses the immediate neighbourhood of Palestine. Thus the placing of the scene in a foreign country is not historical, but proceeds from the free choice of the author. The scene being laid in a foreign country, the portraying of life and nature must of course agree with that country, and not with Palestine (see ch. xl. 23). It may no doubt be said, that the remarkable vigour and sprightliness of the author's descriptions of the scenery and people justify us in assuming that he was actually acquainted with them; but this cannot be asserted as quite certain, since it would impair the high idea entertained of the powers of poetry. The correctness of this view is eminently strengthened by the manner in which the author designedly uses the names of God. The O. T. distinguishes between Elohim, the abstract God, the Deity, on the one hand, and Jehovah, the concrete God, with whom the Israelites had made a covenant, on the other (Gen. vi. 3, 4). Now the latter name occurs in Job generally, where the author himself appears, not only in the prologue and epilogue, but in the short sentences introducing the speakers, as in xxxviii. 1; xl. 1, 3, 6. In the body of the work, however, we have only the names Elohim, Eloah, and similar terms, with the exception of xii. 9, where Jehovah occurs. This very passage argues against those who, from the distinct names of God, would infer that the prologue and epilogue are not genuine. Eichhorn (see Einleitung, sec. 644, a) assumes that the author had, by his particular use of the names of God, intended to represent himself as younger than the other interlocutors; but the notion of the name Jehovah having come later into general use, is contrary to history, and we must then arrive at this result, that the author by his selection of the names of God, which he lends to the interlocutors, intended to express his design of waving all theocratic principles. The few passages in which he seems to abandon this design, namely, in addition to that quoted, ch. i. 21, where Job, in speaking of God, uses the name Jehovah, make it appear even clearer. By thus forgetting himself, he betrays the fact that his general use of the names of God proceeds from designedly forsaking the usage of the language. The context, moreover of the two passages in which he seems to forget himself and uses the name Jehovah, proves that this change is judiciously made, the deep and awful sense of his subject prompting him to an elevated, solemn style, to which the name Eloah was not suitable. And if there is design in the selection of the names of God, why not also in the selection of the country in which the scene is laid? This may be assumed the rather, because history says nothing of Israelites having permanently taken up their residence in the land of Uz, and because other circumstances already detailed oblige us to admit that the author was not only an Israelite by descent, but lived also in the midst of his people, and enjoyed the advantage of a religious communion with them. It should also be remembered, that the author, without directly mentioning the Pentateuch, frequently alludes to portions of it, as in ch. iii. 4, to Gen. i. 3; in ch. iv. 19, and xxxiii. 6, to Moses' account of the creation of man; in ch. v. 14, to Deut. xxxii. 32; in ch. xxiv. 11, to Deut. xxv. 4. That the name of Eliphaz the Temanite, one of the three friends of Job, seems also to have been taken from the Pentateuch, was mentioned above. In addition to these allusions there are several more to other books of the O. T., as the Psalms and Proverbs—which proves that the author must not be severed from the Israelite communion. From what we have stated against the hypothesis that our book was composed in Arabia, a judgment may be formed of the opinion of Hitzig and Hitzel, who assume that it was written in Egypt; the sole foundation for which is, that the author shews himself perfectly acquainted with that country, which proves him to have been a long observer of it. Most particulars adduced in support of this view cannot stand a close examination. Thus it is a mistake to suppose that the description of the working of mines in ch. xxviii. must necessarily have reference to Egypt: Phœnicia, Arabia, and Edom afforded much better materials. That the author must have known the Egyptian mausolea rests on an erroneous interpretation of ch. iii. 14, which may also be said of the assertion that ch. xxix. 18 refers to the Egyptian myths of the Phœnix. Casting aside these arbitrarily assumed Egyptian references, we have only the following:—Our author knows the Egyptian vessels of bulrushes, ix. 26; the Nile-grass, viii. 12; the Nile-horse (Behemoth), and the crocodile (Leviathan), xi. 15, xli. 1. Now, as these things belong to the more prominent peculiarities of a neighbouring country, they must have been known to every educated Israelite: the vessels of bulrushes are mentioned also in Is. xviii. 2. Neither are we disposed to adopt the compromising view of Stickel, who assumes that the author wrote his book in the Israelite territory, indeed, but close to the frontier, in the far south-east of Palestine. That the author had there the materials for his descriptions, comparisons, and imagery, set better before his eyes, than anywhere else, is true; for there he had an opportunity of observing mines, caravans, drying up of brooks, etc. But this is not sufficient proof of the author having lived permanently in that remote part of Palestine, and of having there written his book: he was not a mere copyist of nature, but a poet of considerable eminence, endowed with the power of vividly representing things absent from him. That he lived and wrote in the midst of his nation, is proved by all analogy and by the general character of the book. It looks not like a writing composed in some remote corner of the world, where the question at issue could not have been so fully discussed, nor have created such a deep interest. Jerusalem was the metropolis of the Jews in a sense quite different from that which belongs to any other capital: it was, by order of God, the religious centre of the nation, where all general and leading measures of the nation originated, and to which all pretending to distinction and superiority resorted.

Proceeding to the inquiry as to the age of the author of this book, we meet with three opinions:—1. That he lived before Moses, or was, at least, his contemporary. 2. That he lived in the time of Solomon, or in the centuries next following. 3. That he lived shortly before, or during, or even after the Babylonian exile. The view of those who assert the book to have been written long after the Babylonian exile, can be supported, as Hirzel justly observes, neither by the nature of its language nor by reasons derived from its historical groundwork, and is therefore now generally rejected; but, apart from this opinion, there is, in those remaining, a difference as to the date of no less than 1000 years.

We must, first, declare ourselves decidedly against the view of those who—as Le Clerc among earlier interpreters; and among recent expositors, Bernstein, Gesenius, Umbreit, and De Wette—place our book in the time of the Chaldean exile. They were led to this conclusion by their preconceived opinion that the doctrine of Satan, who is introduced in the prologue, was of Chaldean origin; which has also induced others, while contending for a higher antiquity of the book, to pronounce the prologue, at least the scene in ch. i. 6-12, to be spurious; or losing sight of the poetical character of the prologue as well as of the speeches, to assert that the Satan of this book was different from the Satan of later times; or finally, to assume with Stickel, that the author had lived in a place where he could be impressed with Babylonian opinions before they had spread among the great body of his nation. But the assertion, that the doctrine of Satan originated among the Jews during the Babylonian exile, and was derived generally from Babylonian suggestions, has been shown by several interpreters to be erroneous, and very recently, by Hengstenberg (Ägypten und die Bücher Moses, p. 164, sq.) This opinion was, however, suited to and supported by those who, headed by Bernstein, asserted that Job was a symbolic personage—a personification of the Jews suffering in the Exile—and who thus gave to our book a national reference and meaning; in like manner as some had before introduced a preposterous system of interpreting psalms containing personal lamentations, by converting them into national lamentations, and applying to them the principle of symbolization. Now, in the book of Job there is certainly no trace of national reference; and it would be absurd to assume an allegory running through an entire work, and still nowhere manifesting its presence. It is said by other interpreters, that, in the times of trouble, during the Babylonian exile, first originated the disheartening view of human life, and that then the problem of our book first engrossed the public mind; by which observation they, by way of compromise, refer its composition to that period, without contending for a symbolic exposition. But the sense of misery and of the nothingness of human life, is found among all nations, ancient and modern, cultivated and uncultivated: Noah, Jacob, Moses, complain, and as old as suffering must be the question of the seeming disparity in the distribution of good and evil, and how this disparity can be reconciled with God's justice. It is frequently under consideration in the Psalms.

Against those who refer the composition of Job to the time of the Babylonian exile, militate, first, the references to it in the O. T., which prove that it was before this period a generally known writing. Thus, in Ezek. xiv. 14-20, are mentioned 'three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job,' as examples of righteousness. Mr. Bernstein, indeed, in defending his hypothesis, rejects this passage as spurious, but it bears every mark of genuineness. Further, in Jeremiah xx. 14, we find evidently imitated Job's cursing of the day of his birth (ch. iii.). Not only the sentiments but the words are often the same; and that this coincidence is not accidental, or that the author did not imitate Jeremiah, appears from the literary character of each. Jeremiah shows himself throughout dependent on ancient writings, whereas our author is quite original and independent, as proved by Küper (see Jeremias librorum sacrorum interpres atque vindex, p. 164, sq.) There are also in the Lamentations of Jeremiah many passages clearly alluding to our book, which must have eminently suited his taste and interested him (comp. xvi. 13 with Lam. ii. 16; and xix. 8 with Lam. iii. 7, 9). In Isaiah the peculiar use of נָסָה (xl. 2) refers us to Job i. (comp. x. 17; xiv. 14); and the double received from God's hand alludes to the end of the history of Job, who is there considered as typifying the future fate of the church. Is. lxi. 7, 'In their land they shall have the double,' alludes to the same point; ch. li. 9 depends on Job xxvi. 13; and ch. xix. 5, almost literally agrees with Job xiv. 11 (see Küper, p. 166). Another example of words borrowed from Job occurs in Ps. cvii. 42, where the second part of the verse agrees literally with Job v. 16. 2. A most decisive reason against assigning the composition of Job to the period of the Exile is derived from the language, since it is free from those Chaldaisms which occur in the books written about that time. Eichhorn justly observes, 'Let him who is fit for such researches, only read, first, a writing, tainted with Aramæisms, and next the book of Job: they will be found diverging as east and west.' There is no example of an independent, original work, composed in pure language, after the Exile. Zechariah indeed, though writing after the Exile, has few Chaldaisms; but a closer inspection shews that this case is not analogous to that of our book. The comparative purity of Zechariah's language can be accounted for by his constant occupation with the sacred writings of the period before the Exile, on which he proves himself entirely dependent. 3. Equally conclusive is the poetical character of the book. The Exile might produce a soft, moving poem, but could not give birth to such a rich, compact, animated, and warm composition as ours, breathing youthful freshness throughout. Ewald, in acknowledging this, says justly, 'The high skill displayed in this book cannot be well expected from later centuries, when poetry had by degrees generally declined, and particularly in the higher art required by large compositions; and language so concise and expressive as that of our author is not found in writings of later times.'

To the view which places the age of the book of Job in the time of the Babylonian exile, is most opposed that which assigns the composition of it to a period prior to Moses. In support of this latter view, only two arguments having a semblance of force can be adduced, and they will not bear the test of strict inquiry. It is said, 1. 'There is in the book of Job no direct reference to the Mosaic legislation; and its descriptions and other statements are suited to the period of the patriarchs; as, for instance, the great authority held by old men, the high age of Job, and fathers offering sacrifices for their families—which leads to the supposition that when our book was written no sacerdotal order yet existed.' These points, however, are quite intelligible, if the design of the book, as stated above, is kept in view. The author intended not to rest the decision of the question at issue on particular passages of Scripture, but on religious consciousness and experience. This at once explains why he places the scene without Palestine, why he places it in the patriarchal age, and why he avoids the use of the name Jehovah; of these three items the first sufficiently accounts for no reference being made to the Mosaic legislation. It is indeed said, that for an author of a later period, who undertook to portray earlier times, it would hardly have been possible to perform his task, without occasionally forgetting his roll. But it is not easy to determine what, in such a case, is possible. What might be expected from our author in this respect may be inferred from his skill in the intentional use of the names of God—from the steadiness with which, among foreign scenery, he proceeds to develop his subject—from the able disposition of the speeches, and the nicely drawing of the characters of the interlocutors, who are always represented speaking and acting in conformity with the part assigned to them. In the proper execution of his work he may have been assisted by witnessing abroad the patriarchal life of nomades, which, in its essential features, is always the same. This supposition is rendered in some degree probable, from the descriptions of Arabia being exactly agreeable to its natural condition, and being even more specific than those of Egypt, though Hirzel is pleased to select the latter country, in determining where the author of our book lived and composed it. 2. 'The language of the book of Job seems strongly to support the opinion of its having been written before Moses.' It has been often said, that no writing of the O. T. may be more frequently illustrated from the Arabic than this book. Jerome observes (Prefat. in Din.) 'Jobum cum Arabica lingua plurimam habere societatem;' and Schultens proved this so incontrovertibly that Gesenius was rather too late in denying the fact (see his Geschichte der Hebräischen Sprache, p. 33). Now, from this character of its language we might be induced to infer, that the work was written in the remotest times, when the separation of the dialects had only begun, but had not yet been completed. This inference would, however, be safe only if the book were written in prose. It is solely from works of this class, that the general usage of the language prevailing at the time of the author can be seen. On the contrary, the selection of obsolete and rare words and forms, with the Hebrews, was a peculiar feature of the poetical style, and served to distinguish it from the usual, habitual way of writing. This peculiarity belongs to our book more than to any other; which may be explained from its elevated character and general plan; it rises above commonplace ideas more than any other Hebrew writing, and the plan of the author made it incumbent on him to impress on the language, as much as possible, an antique and foreign character.

The most complete statement of the reasons in support of the opinion that the book of Job was written after the age of Moses, may be found in Richter's essay, De Aetate Jobi definienda, reprinted in Rosenmüller's edition of Lowth's Praelectiones De Poesi Sacra Hebraeorum: in which he maintains that it was written in the age of Solomon. Most of these reasons, indeed, are either not conclusive at all, or not quite cogent. Thus it is an arbitrary assumption, proved by modern researches to be erroneous, that the art of writing was unknown previous to the age of Moses. The assertion too, that the marks of cultivation and refinement observable in our book belonged to a later age, rests on no historical ground. Further, it cannot be said, that for such an early time the language is too smooth and neat, since in no Semitic dialect is it possible to trace a progressive improvement. The evident correspondence also between our book and the Proverbs and Psalms is not a point proving with resistless force that they were all written at the same time. It is, indeed, sometimes of such a kind, that the authors of the Proverbs and Psalms cannot be exactly said to have copied our book; but it may be accounted for by their all belonging to the same class of writings, by the very great uniformity and accordance of religious conceptions and sentiments expressed in the O. T., and by the stability of its religious character.

Still the argument derived from the correspondence between our book and the Psalms is not devoid of force; for the accordance of ideas, sentiments, and colouring in them is such that the circumstances referred to cannot be considered as completely accounting for it. There are passages in which the author of our book clearly alludes to the Psalms and Proverbs. A striking example of this kind occurs in Ps. xxxix. 13. All the words of this verse, which, as they conclude the psalm, may have been deeply impressed on the public mind, are again found in various passages of the book of Job, whose author must have been acquainted with that psalm (comp. ch. vii. 19; xiv. 6; x. 20, 21; vii. 8, 21, in the Hebrew Bible). The whole psalm is a text-book for the speeches of Job. The argument, also, derived from the skilful plan of our book and its able exposition, must be allowed its weight in deciding that its composition is not to be assigned to an age prior to Moses; though we must not forget that what to us appears to be art, because it is done according to established rules, may also be the product of a creative genius. But a conclusive argument against assigning so early a date to the composition of our book is its reflecting and inquiring character. A didactic poem could never have been written in the time of the patriarchs; but our book presents a strong contrast to those immature conceptions and those statements which strike the senses but do not appeal to reason, which are of so frequent occurrence in Genesis. The notion which our author entertains of God, of his omnipotence and omnipresence, is undoubtedly more refined than that presented in the books of Moses. In addition to this it should be observed, that from many indications the problem treated in our book was at the time of its composition frequently discussed and variously solved. We have observed, indeed, above, that it is as old as the cause which originated it; but it must be allowed that the Mosaic revelation, with its leading doctrine concerning retribution, was calculated to direct the attention more forcibly towards it than had been previously the case, till God vouchsafed, through an instrument appointed by him, to promulgate the true solution. There are, moreover, indirect allusions to the Pentateuch, as stated above.

Summing up the whole of our investigations, we take it to be a settled point that the book of Job does not belong to the time of the Babylonian exile; and it is nearly equally certain that it was not composed prior to the time of Moses. Could it then have been written in some age preceding Samuel and David? It is only with them that a new period of sacred literature began; and our book is related to products of that period, or enlarges on them. But it cannot have been composed later than Isaiah, who alludes to it. Thus we come to this general determination of the age of our book, that it was written, not before Samuel and David, but not later than the era of Isaiah. With this result we must rest satisfied, unless we would go beyond the indications presented. The intermediate period offers no ground on which we can safely fix the composition of the book of Job. There remains then uncertainty, but it does not concern an important point of religion. The significance of our book for the church rests on the evidence of our Lord and his apostles in support of the inspiration of the whole collection of the O. T., and on the confirmation which this external evidence has at all times received, and continues to receive, from the internal testimony, among the true believers of all ages.—E. W. H.

[There is perhaps no single book of Scripture of which so many versions and commentaries have been published as that of Job, or respecting which a greater number of treatises and dissertations have been written. The following are the principal examples:—Mercer, 1573; Drusius, 1636; Abbott, 1640; Spanheim, 1672; Schmid, 1670; Caryl, 1669; Leigh, 1656, 1736, 1742; Schultens, 1737; Peters, 1751; Chappelow, 1752; Heath, 1756; Scott, 1773; Reiske, 1779; Dathe, 1789; Garden, 1796; Eichhorn, 1800; Gaab, 1809; Eliza Smith, 1810; Good, 1812; Bridel, 1818; Umbreit, 1824 (translated in the *Bibl. JOB'S DISEASE. The opinion that the malady under which Job suffered was elephantiasis, or black leprosy, is so ancient, that it is found, according to Origen's Hexapla, in the rendering which one of the Greek versions has made of ch. ii. 7. It was also entertained by Abulfeda (Hist. Antisl. p. 26); and, in modern times, by the best scholars generally. The passages which are considered to indicate this disease are found in the description of his skin burning from head to foot, so that he took a potsherd to scrape himself (ii. 7, 8); in its being covered with putrefaction and crusts of earth, and being at one time stiff and hard, while at another it cracked and discharged fluid (vii. 5); in the offensive breath which drove away the kindness of attendants (xix. 17); in the restless nights, which were either sleepless or scared with frightful dreams (vii. 13, 14; xxx. 17); in general emaciation (xvi. 8); and in so intense a loathing of the burden of life, that strangling and death were preferable to it (vii. 15).

In this picture of Job's sufferings, the state of the skin is not so distinctly described as to enable us to identify the disease with elephantiasis in a rigorous sense. The difficulty is also increased by the fact that שָׁחִין, shechin, is generally rendered 'boils.' But that word, according to its radical sense, only means burning, inflammation—a hot sense of pain, which, although it attends boils and abscesses, is common to other cutaneous irritations. Moreover, the fact that Job scraped himself with a potsherd is irreconcilable with the notion that his body was covered with boils or open sores, but agrees very well with the thickened state of the skin which characterizes this disease.

In this, as in most other Biblical diseases, there is too little distinct description of symptoms to enable us to determine the precise malady intended. But the general character of the complaint under which Job suffered, bears a greater resemblance to elephantiasis than to any other disease [LEPROSY].—W. A. N.

JOBAB (יֹבָב; Sept. Ἰωβὰβ). 1. One of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chron. i. 23). The site of his tribe has not been ascertained, as no name answering to his is found in the part of Arabia occupied by the descendants of Joktan. Bochart (Phaleg ii. 29) compares the Ἰωβὰβῖται whom Ptolemy (vi. 7, p. 154) places on the Sachalitic gulf, and suggests that this should be read Ἰωβὰβῖται. Michaelis (Spicil. ii. 303) and Gesenius approve of this, as also of the suggestion that Jobab = desert, from yab to howl as a wild beast; but all this rests on very slight grounds.

2. One of the kings of Edom, son of Zerah of Bozrah, and successor of Bela (Gen. xxvi. 33, 34; 1 Chron. i. 44, 45). The LXX. identify this Jobab with the patriarch Job (Append. to Job xlii.).

3. King of Madon, one of the northern chiefs who joined Jabin in the attempt to oppose Joshua, and were routed by him in the decisive battle of Merom (Josh. xi. 1, ff.).

4. Head of a house in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 9).—W. L. A.

JOCHEBED (יֹכֶבֶד; Sept. Ἰωχαβήδ), wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron. In Exod. vi. 20, Jochebed is expressly declared to have been the sister of Amram's father, and consequently the aunt of her husband. As marriage between persons thus related was afterwards forbidden by the law (Lev. xviii. 12), various attempts have been made to show that the relationship was more distant than the text in its literal meaning indicates. We see no necessity for this. The mere mention of the relationship implies that there was something remarkable in the case; but if we shew that nothing is remarkable, we do away the occasion for the relationship being at all noticed. The fact seems to be, that where this marriage was contracted, there was no law forbidding such alliances, but they must in any case have been unusual, although not forbidden; and this, with the writer's knowledge that they were subsequently interdicted, sufficiently accounts for this one being so pointedly mentioned. The candour of the historian in declaring himself to be sprung from a marriage afterwards forbidden by the law, delivered through himself, deserves especial notice.—J. K.

JOEL (יְהוֹאֵל), Whose God is Jehovah, i.e., a worshipper of Jehovah, Gesen.; Sept. Ἰωὴλ). 1. The eldest son of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 33), appointed in the old age of his father, along with his brother Abia, a judge in Beersheba, an office which they dishonoured by their corruption and profligacy, and thereby paved the way for the placing of the government in the hands of a king (1 Sam. viii. 3-5). In 1 Chron. vi. 12 [A. V. 28], Vashni appears as the name of Samuel's eldest son; but this is evidently a mistake, arising from 'Joel' having fallen out of the text, and יְהוֹאֵל, which means 'and the second,' and applies to Abia, being taken as a proper name. Joel was the father of Heman the singer (1 Chron. vi. 33; xv. 17). Another error occurs in ver. 20 [A. V. 36], where Joel stands for Shaul of ver. 8 [A. V. 24].

2. One of the minor prophets, the son of Pethuel. Beyond this, nothing is known with certainty concerning him. That his sphere of prophetic activity was in Judah, may be gathered, however, from his own book, in which he addresses the priests as in the midst of them (Joel i. 13, 14; ii. 15, 17); speaks of the house of the Lord and of Zion as places in the vicinity of which he was (i. 9; ii. 1, 23); and dwells exclusively on what relates to Judah and Jerusalem without any allusion to Israel. This throws discredit on the statement of Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vit. Proph. c. 14), that he was of the tribe of Reuben, and was buried at Bethhoron. From the frequent reference which he makes to the Temple, its offices, and services, it has been inferred that he was himself a priest; but the manner in which he addresses the priests leads rather to the opposite conclusion, for he invariably addresses them as a body to which he himself did not belong. The close resemblance between parts of his prophecy and parts of that of Amos (comp. Joel iii. 16 with Amos i. 2; Joel iii. 18 with Amos ix. 13; Joel i. 4, ii. 25, with Amos iv. 6-9; Joel iii. 4-6 with Amos i. 6-10) points to the conclusion that they were nearly contemporaries, and as Amos appears to have connected his book with that of Joel by commencing with the words with which Joel introduces his closing utterance, it is probable that Joel was the earlier of the two. This would place the time of his prophesying somewhat earlier than the reign of Azariah king of Judah, during which Amos prophesied. Some, however, contend for an earlier date. Thus Credner, Hitzig, Ewald, Keil, and others, place Joel in the early part of the reign of Joash, before the attack of the Syrians under Hasael, on the ground that had this event preceded his writing, he would have included (iii. 4) the Syrians among the doomed enemies of Judah, as Amos includes them among those of Israel. But it might as well be argued that because Joel does not include Moab and Ammon in his denunciation, he must have written before the invasion of Judah by them in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 1); and, moreover, the doom of Syria was incurred, not by the attack upon Judah, in which the Syrians were God's instruments to punish the Jews for their apostasy (2 Chron. xxiv. 24), but by their oppression of Israel (2 Kings xiii. 22), and especially by the cruelty they practised in Gilead (Amos i. 3); so that it did not fall to Joel as the prophet of Judah to refer to them. As has been justly remarked, 'the religious aspect of the single invasion of Judah by this band of Syrians was very different from the perpetual hostility of the Philistines, or the malicious cupidity of the Phœnicians' (Pusey, Min. Proph., p. 90). [JOEL, BOOK OF.]

3. The head of one of the families of Simeon, and one of those who in the time of Hezekiah made an inroad on the Hamites in Gedor (Gerar?) and took possession of their pasture lands (1 Chron. iv. 35-41).

4. A descendant of Reuben (1 Chron. v. 4). In the following verses his descendants to the seventh generation are named, and as the latest of them synchronises with the Assyrian invasion, Bertheau conjectures (Die Büch. der Chronik, p. 54) that Joel must have lived in the time of David.

5. Chief of the Gadites in the land of Bashan (1 Chron. v. 12).

6. Son of Izrahiah, one of the chief men of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 3).

7. Brother of Nathan, one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. xi. 38). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 he is called Igal 'the son of Nathan.' That by a clerical error יְהוֹאֵל should be confounded with יְהוֹנָתָן is easily supposable, but which is the true reading cannot now be determined. It is less easy to account for the one passage making him the son and the other the brother of Nathan. The former is probably the correct statement, as it is not usual to designate men from their brothers.

8-13. Six others bearing the name of Joel are mentioned in the O. T. (1 Chron. xv. 7, 11; xxiii. 8; xxvi. 22; xxvii. 20; xxix. 12; Ezra x. 43; Neh. xi. 9).—W. L. A.

JOEL, BOOK OF. This prophet opens his commission by announcing an extraordinary plague of locusts, accompanied with extreme drought, which he depicts in a strain of animated and sublime poetry under the image of an invading army. The fidelity of his highly-wrought description is corroborated and illustrated by the testimonies of Shaw, Volney, Forbes, and other eminent travellers, who have been eye-witnesses of the ravages committed by this most terrible of the insect tribe. Their accounts tend strongly, we think, to free the literal interpretation from the charge of being 'the greatest exaggeration.' It is also to be observed that locusts are named by Moses as instruments of the Divine justice (Deut. xxviii. 38, 39), and by Solomon in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings viii. 37). In the second chapter, the formidable aspect of the locusts—their rapid progress—their sweeping devastation—the awful murmur of their countless throngs—their instinctive marshalling—the irresistible perseverance with which they make their way over every obstacle and through every aperture—are delineated with the utmost graphic force. Dr. Hengstenberg calls in question the mention of their flight, but, as it appears to us, without adequate reason. He considers the expression 'before them,' in ch. ii., as equivalent to 'before they rise:' but in the third verse the same word (לפניהם) occurs twice, evidently in the sense of 'in the presence of,' 'in their front.' The eminent critic just named lays great stress on the alleged omission of this particular, which he considers inexplicable, unless on the supposition that the reality presented nothing corresponding to it. But whether this characteristic be alluded to or not, the argument for or against the literal interpretation will not be materially affected. Other particulars are mentioned which literally can apply only to locusts, and which, on the supposition that the language is allegorical, are explicable only as being accessory traits for filling up the picture (Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 310). The figurative interpretation has, it must be allowed, the support of antiquity. It was adopted by the Chaldee paraphrast, Ephrem the Syrian (A.D. 350), and the Jews in the time of Jerome (A.D. 400). Ephrem supposes that by the four different denominations of the locusts were intended Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar. The Jews, in the time of Jerome, understood by the first term the Assyrians and Chaldeans; by the second, the Medes and Persians; by the third, Alexander the Great and his successors; and by the fourth, the Romans. By others, however, the prophecy was interpreted literally; and Jerome himself appears to have fluctuated between the two opinions, though more inclined to the allegorical view. Grotius applies the description to the invasions by Pul and Shalmaneser. Holzhausen attempts to unite both modes of interpretation, and applies the language literally to the locusts, and metaphorically to the Assyrians. It is singular, however, that, if a hostile invasion be intended, not the least hint is given of personal injury sustained by the inhabitants; the immediate effects are confined entirely to the vegetable productions and the cattle. Dr. Hengstenberg, while strongly averse from the literal sense, is not disposed to limit the metaphorical meaning to any one event or class of invaders. 'The enemy,' he remarks, 'are designated only as north countries. From the north, however, from Syria, all the principal invasions of Palestine proceeded. We have therefore no reason to think exclusively of any one of them. Nor ought we to limit the prophecy to the people of the old covenant. Throughout all centuries there is but one church of God existing in unbroken connection. That this church, during the first period of its existence, was concentrated in a land into which hostile irruptions were made from the north was purely accidental. To make this circumstance the boundary-stone of the fulfilment of prophecy were just as absurd as if one were to assert that the threatening of Amos, 'by the sword shall all sinners of my people die,' has not been fulfilled in those who perished after another manner' (Christology, Keith's transl., iii. 104). [Comp. Pusey, Minor Proph., p. 99, ff.]

The prophet, after describing the approaching judgments, calls on his countrymen to repent, assuring them of the Divine placability and readiness to forgive (ii. 12-17). He foretels the restoration of the land to its former fertility, and declares that Jehovah would still be their God (ii. 18-26). He then announces the spiritual blessings which would be poured forth in the Messianic age (iii. 1-5, Heb. text; ii. 28-32, A. V.) This remarkable prediction is applied by the Apostle Peter to the events that transpired on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 16-21). In the last chapter (iv. Heb. text; iii. A. V.), the Divine vengeance is denounced against the enemies and oppressors of the chosen people, of whom the Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Edomites, are especially named. A minute examination of these predictions would exceed our limits; we must refer the reader for further information to the works named at the close of this article.

The style of Joel, it has been remarked, unites the strength of Micah with the tenderness of Jeremiah. In vividness of description he rivals Nahum, and in sublimity and majesty is scarcely inferior to Isaiah and Habakkuk. 'Imprimis est elegans, clarus, fusus, fluensque; valde etiam sublimis, acer, fervidus' (Lowth, De Sacra Poesi Hebr. Præl. xxi.)

The canonicity of this book has never been called in question.—J. E. R.
